3633. U. S. President. U. S. participation in the U N; report by the President to the Congress for the year 1955. [Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off.] 1956. 277 p. ([U.S.] Dept. of State. Publication 6318. International organization and conference series, III, 115)
47–32785 JX1977.2.U5A32 1955

The United Nations Participation Act of 1945 calls upon the President to transmit to Congress an annual report on United States participation in United Nations activities. These reports have regularly been prepared and published by the Department of State; variant titles were used before the present one was settled upon. The present report is the tenth, and begins with a brief account of the meeting of the United Nations held in San Francisco in June 1955 to commemorate the tenth anniversary of the signing of the Charter there. President Eisenhower's letter of transmittal affirms that the United Nations in its second decade "is increasingly vital and effective." The work of the Specialized Agencies such as the Food and Agricultural Organization and the International Monetary Fund is also included in this report. The report is organized under the following headings: "Maintenance of Peace and Security," "Economic and Social Cooperation and Human Rights," "Dependent Territories," "Legal and Constitutional Developments," and "Budgetary, Financial, and Administrative Matters." Appendixes outline the United Nations System and other organizational and statistical information; a list of all United States representatives within the System during 1955 occupies p. 271–274.

3634. The United States in world affairs, 1954. By Richard P. Stebbins and the research staff of the Council on Foreign Relations. New York, Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by

Harper, 1956. 498 p. 32–26065 E744.U66 1954

This annual review of the foreign relations of the United States has covered years since 1931, with the exception of the war years 1941–44, for which no volumes were issued. Double volumes were issued for 1934–35 and for 1945–47. The original compilers were Walter Lippmann and William O. Scroggs; Whitney H. Shepardson replaced Mr. Lippmann with the 1934–35 volume; John C. Campbell prepared the first three volumes after the war; and Mr. Stebbins has been in charge since the 1949 volume. The present volume for 1954 is the first to omit a formal bibliography, which is replaced "by a more copious use of bibliographical footnotes at appropriate points in the text," but the classified "Chronology of World Events" (p. 465–487) is retained. After introductory chapters on the salient developments of the year, and on the political, military, and economic aspects of American foreign policy, the course of events is traced in four major areas, and a concluding chapter deals with "Disarmament and the United Nations." A companion series under the same imprint, Documents on American Foreign Relations, began with a volume for 1952, has reached that for 1955, and has frequently changed editors. A comparable series produced and published by the Brookings Institution of Washington, D. C., Major Problems of United States Foreign Policy, reached a sixth volume for 1952–53, published in 1952, but unfortunately none have appeared since. These annual volumes were more abstract in their approach, and were intended "to illustrate a technique for the study of the foreign relations of the United States closely approximating that used by Government officials in the formulation of foreign policies."

3635. Wilcox, Francis O., and Thorsten V. Kalijarvi, eds. Recent American foreign policy; basic documents 1941–1951. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1952. xviii, 927 p. maps. 52–1546 JX1416.W5

Originally issued in 1950 as A Decade of American Foreign Policy (1st sess. 81st Cong., Senate document no. 123), this collection of the "more important documents and official statements bearing upon the foreign policy of the United States in the period following our entrance into World War II" was revised to include additional materials for the period 1950–51. Topics covered are: wartime pronouncements regarding the postwar settlement; postwar conferences; the United Nations; the inter-American regional system; defeated and occupied areas; other areas of special interest; and current international issues. A brief commentary accompanies each item, a feature lacking in the original publication. The editors are members of the research staff of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

Biv. ECONOMIC POLICY

3636. Brown, William Adams, and Redvers Opie. American foreign assistance. Washington, Brookings Institution, 1953. 615 p. 53–11921 HC60.B7

Bibliography: p. [587]–598.

A detailed description of all forms of American assistance to foreign nations from the inauguration of Lend-Lease in March 1941 through the Mutual Security Program implemented in October 1951. The authors emphasize that assistance for economic reconstruction, if less popular and more difficult to grasp, is no less important to ultimate security than military assistance.

3637. Ellis, Howard S. The economics of freedom; the progress and future of aid to Europe. By Howard S. Ellis assisted by the research staff of the Council on Foreign Relations. With an introd. by Dwight D. Eisenhower. New York, Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper, 1950. xviii, 549 p. 50–9247 HC240.E43

A progress report on the Marshall Plan and its consequences by the staff of ten experts headed by Dr. Ellis, who was on leave from the University of California for the purpose. During two years the United States furnished between four and five billion dollars worth of aid, and European production rose by about 30 billion dollars in each year. "In comparison with the progress achieved after World War I toward reconstruction, rehabilitation and internal economic stability, Europe has scored a phenomenal success." Descriptive chapters are devoted to the objectives and methods of the program, to its financial complications, and to its implementation in the United Kingdom, Western Germany, France, and Italy.

3638. Harris, Seymour E., ed. Foreign economic policy for the United States. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1948. 490 p. 48–4988 HF1455.H3

The work of 24 experts, most of them practicing economists. After individual discussions of our economic relations with Great Britain, Germany, Japan, Canada, Latin America, the U. S. S. R., and China, attention is focused on international economic agencies and tariff agreements, the European Recovery Program, and problems of international economic equilibrium. The editor states that the International Trade Organization, the International Monetary Fund, and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development represent "a bit of sovereignty sloughed off the sovereign states and grafted on to the international agencies operating in behalf of all countries."

3639. Mikesell, Raymond F. United States economic policy and international relations. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1952. 341 p. (Economics handbook series) 51–12630 HF1455.M53

A comprehensive survey of American foreign economic policy. The first fourth of the book is devoted to the years 1919–39; the balance to the period since 1939, with major emphasis on the period since World War II. Monetary, investment, and defense policy are the leading topics discussed, with separate chapters on the Truman Doctrine, the Marshall Plan, and American objectives in Western Europe. The Truman Doctrine is regarded as marking the acceptance of international responsibility, the New Deal economic program having accustomed the American people to governmental action in economic affairs.

3640. Price, Harry Bayard. The Marshall plan and its meaning. Ithaca, N. Y., Cornell University Press, 1955. xvi, 424 p. 55–14635 HC60.P7

"Published under the auspices of the Governmental Affairs Institute, Washington, D. C."

Born of the effects of World War II upon the economies of Europe, Asia, and Africa, the Marshall Plan was intended to ensure long-term recovery rather than to provide temporary relief. Analysis of 300 interviews with participating ERP officials, and of industrial, agricultural, and monetary statistics forms the basis of this evaluation, which shows that the Marshall Plan did place Europe in a position of economic stability. This survey covers all countries which received aid under the European Recovery Program as well as Asiatic countries which were granted aid by the other agencies of the Economic Cooperation Administration.

3641. U. S. Dept. of State. Point four, cooperative program for aid in the development of economically underdeveloped areas [prepared with assistance of an Interdepartmental Advisory Committee on Technical Assistance and of the staff of the National Advisory Council. Rev. Jan. 1950. Washington, 1950] 167 p. map, diagrs. (Its Publication 3719. Economic cooperation series, 24) 50–60118 HC59.A3U52 1950

Issued also without series title.

The official program of American technical assistance to underdeveloped areas, e. g., Asia, Africa, and Latin America, first proposed by President Truman in his 1949 inaugural address, is outlined. The encouragement of capital investment, both domestic and foreign, is proposed as a second means of stimulating the economic improvement and democratization of these regions. After a consideration of the problem, its financial aspects are explored.

3642. Woodrow Wilson Foundation. The political economy of American foreign policy; its concepts, strategy, and limits; report of a study group sponsored by the Woodrow Wilson Foundation and the National Planning Association. [William Y. Elliott, chairman] New York, Holt, 1955. xv, 414 p. 55–6125 HF1455.W6

An inquiry by a study group of nine prominent experts, who find the central objective of American foreign economic policy to be "the construction of a better integrated and more effectively functioning international economic system." Under present-day conditions, international economic re-integration can be brought about only through "a deliberate coordination of national economic policies either by cooperation among national governments or—more effectively and reliably—by supranational authorities." Means for increasing the effectiveness of such existing grouping as the European Payments Union are considered, as well as for opening up the domestic market of the United States to a greater flow of imports from Europe. The role of the United States in increasing and regularizing the flow of capital and technology to the underdeveloped countries is outlined.

X

Military History and the Armed Forces

A.	General Works	3643–3652
B.	The Army	3653–3665
C.	The Navy	3666–3677
D.	Wars of the United States
Di.	The Revolution	3678–3684
Dii.	1798–1848	3685–3689
Diii.	The Civil War	3690–3706
Div.	The Spanish-American War	3707–3708
Dv.	World War I	3709–3716
Dvi.	World War II	3717–3727

THE United States has been, until very recent times, a quite unmilitary nation with a very small standing army. Here the English tradition of distrust of armed forces, and control of military by civilian authorities, has continued or been strengthened, inasmuch as there has been no general agreement on the necessity of a large navy. Nevertheless, the nation was born in war, and has fought six considerable wars since, not to mention lesser conflicts such as the innumerable ones with Indian tribes on its western frontier. Each large war has demanded a sudden and severe effort of rearmament, and a corresponding one of organization which has usually proved the more difficult. Three of these wars have absorbed during their time nearly the whole of the national energies. Such being the case, the literature which is sampled in this chapter is an indispensable part of the national record, but it must not be taken to imply any predominance of the military element in American life, thought, or character. There have been Generals in the White House, but only three of them professional soldiers, and only one of these had spent his adult life in uninterrupted military service.

This relative unconcern for the military side of life is reflected in the literature. The United States has never undertaken any large-scale publication of the military records of the Revolution, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, or of World War I. Military history was for the most part a neglected subject in the graduate schools of American universities from their establishment, and especially from 1919–1939. The selections that follow contain only three works of academic origin earlier than World War II: those of Hatch (no. 3681), Smith (3689), and Shannon (3702), and the second of these is a general history which might well have been placed in Chapter VIII. Nor, if we except the Civil War, was there any considerable output of such literature on the part of professional soldiers and sailors. Admiral Mahan (no. 3688) is the great exception, but the unfinished magnum opus of General Emory Upton (no. 3651) had to wait over 20 years for publication. Some valuable work has been contributed by leisured amateurs such as Gardner W. Allen and Hoffman Nickerson. In consequence of all this, there is no adequate general history of the U. S. Army, or general history of the Revolutionary War, or operational history of World War I. Since the last war, of course, the picture is entirely changed: the armed forces have their own large staffs of professional historians, and the universities are increasingly giving the subject its due emphasis.

The arrangement by sections that follows is self-explanatory, save that Section A, General Works, is necessarily a mélange, including books on the civil-military relation, on national military policy, on veterans' problems and organizations, and on conscientious objectors, and a biography of a prophet of air power. There is no separate section on the Air Force simply because its independent status is too recent, whence the state of the literature does not warrant it.

A. General Works

3643. Bernardo, C. Joseph, and Eugene H. Bacon. American military policy, its development since 1775. Harrisburg, Pa., Military Service Pub. Co., 1955. 512 p. 55–7529 UA23.B43

A routine textbook which provides the only general survey of American military policy from the Revolution through the Korean War. Naval policy is included, but in subordinate and inadequate emphasis. The size of the Army receives chief attention, and questions of organization, training, staff, mobilization, and economic resources follow in importance. Public opinion is rather mechanically presented through brief extracts from newspapers and magazines. The authors regularly discount "the specter of militarism."

3643a. Brophy, Arnold. The Air Force; a panorama of the Nation's youngest service. Foreword by Robert L. Scott, Jr. [New York] Gilbert Press; distributed by Messner, 1956. 362 p. 56–6784 UG633.B76

This is the only comprehensive history of the United States Air Force in a single volume. The function, organizational structure, and type and number of equipment and personnel of Air Force staff, combat, operational, technical, transport, supply, and training commands are summarized as each comes into operation to repel a hypothetical attack on North America. Such branches as the Strategic Air Command, the Air University, the Military Air Transport Service, and the Air Materiel Command are described along with a short history of American military aviation from its formation as a unit in the Army Signal Corps in 1907 until the present (1955). Industry's contribution is acknowledged by the inclusion of short histories of the principal industries now under contract with the Air Force. Tables of casualty, personnel, aircraft, and fiscal statistics help the average reader to realize the scope of the Nation's youngest service.

3644. Davies, Wallace Evan. Patriotism on parade; the story of veterans' and hereditary organizations in America, 1783–1900. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1955. xiv, 388 p. (Harvard historical studies, v. 66) 55–11951 E172.7.D3

"Bibliographical essay": p. [359]–367.

Although the Society of the Cincinnati was founded in 1783, it remained "a poorly organized and ineffective affair," of negligible influence upon American life. The pattern for patriotic societies was really set by the survivors of the Civil War in the Grand Army of the Republic, and its extraordinary success led to a mushrooming of other groups of veterans and of veterans' relatives. This led, in the 1890's, to a rash of societies open only to persons of requisite pedigree, of which the Daughters of the American Revolution is the most conspicuous. This study traces their influence and interest in such varied subjects as veterans' preference, pensions, the teaching of history, immigration policy, labor disturbances, etc.

3644a. Dupuy, Richard Ernest, and Trevor N. Dupuy. Military heritage of America. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1956. 794 p. (McGraw-Hill series in history) 55–11169 E181.D8

Bibliography: p. 729–752.

Written by a father-and-son team, both of whom hold the rank of colonel in the U. S. Army, this work, in a preliminary form, has been used by the Harvard Department of Military Science and Tactics since 1954 and is the only up-to-date survey of American "military history presented from the American point of view." In order to acquaint the general reading public with the art of war as practiced by Americans, all prominent battles and campaigns of the eight major wars participated in by the United States from the Revolution (1775–83) to the Korean War (1950–53) are outlined along with short accounts of Indian wars and police actions involving American forces. The nonmilitary reader is aided in following the operational accounts by numerous battle plans and maps in the text, clear definitions of the principles and terms of military strategy and tactics, and a brief account of world military history since the Battle of Marathon (490 B. C.). It is the authors' belief that the general rules of strategy and tactics have not changed and must be followed by United States forces in the future as they have been followed in the past.

3645. Jones, Richard Seelye. A history of the American Legion. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1946. 393 p. 46–7962 D570.A1J6

Not an official history of the largest and most influential organization of World War I veterans, but written with full access to the Legion's quite complete official records. The author gives attention to organization and finances, and provides an objective treatment of such controversial issues as the bonus, education, and un-Americanism.

3646. Kerwin, Jerome G., ed. Civil-military relationships in American life. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1948. 181 p. (Chicago University. Charles R. Walgreen Foundation lectures) 48–7342 UA23.K415

A series of eight lectures by Hanson W. Baldwin, Charles E. Merriam, T. V. Smith, Adlai Stevenson, and others. Their purpose "is to identify the change in conditions which has caused a much greater pervasiveness of the military in American life and at the same time to raise the question of how our cherished freedoms can be preserved by the safeguarding of the predominancy of civilian power."

3647. Levine, Isaac Don. Mitchell, pioneer of air power. New York, Duell, Sloan, & Pearce, 1943. 420 p. 43–51051 UG633.M45L4

"Mitchell's own writings": p. 401–405.

A biography based on Mitchell's own papers and sharing the strenuous partisanship of its subject. After his court-martial in 1925, William Mitchell resigned from the Army and devoted himself to propaganda on behalf of the major development of air power. He died in 1936 at the age of 56, worn out by his struggle to convert a reluctant military hierarchy. In 1945 he was posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor and the rank of major general.

3648. Palmer, John McAuley. America in arms; the experience of the United States with military organization. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1941. 207 p. 41–9795 UA25.P27

Far slighter than Upton's massive work (no. 3651), it pursues throughout our military history the single theme of a "well-organized militia" on the Swiss model, as recommended by General Washington in his "Sentiments on a Peace Establishment" of 1783. Our military ills are traced to its absence, and to the "ill-organized militia" and the "expansible standing army" which came to be substituted.

3649. Sibley, Mulford Q., and Philip E. Jacob. Conscription of conscience; the American state and the conscientious objector, 1940–1947. Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1952. 580 p. (Cornell studies in civil liberty)

52–12673 UB342.U5S52

"Selected and annotated bibliography": p. 549–566.

Because of inadequate records the treatment of the conscientious objector by draft boards and the armed services is sketchily presented, but the 12,000 inmates of Civilian Public Service Camps are thoroughly studied. The authors conclude that, largely because of the violent hostility of special groups channeled through veterans' organizations, only a very limited degree of tolerance was achieved.

3650. Smith, Louis. American democracy and military power; a study of civil control of the military power in the United States. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1951. xv, 370 p. (Studies in public administration)

51–13393 JK558.S5

A comprehensive analysis of a problem which has been present from the foundation of the Republic, but has become increasingly urgent with total war and continuing crisis. The book combines theoretical and historical considerations with administrative practice, in describing the control of national armed forces by the President, executive departments, Congress and its committees, and the judiciary.

3651. Upton, Emory. The military policy of the United States. 4th impression. Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1917. xxiii, 495 p.

War 18–9 UA23.U75 1917

War Department document no. 290.

Edited by Joseph P. Sanger, assisted by William D. Beach and Charles D. Rhodes, of the Military Information Division of the General Staff.

The classic indictment of the early failures of American democracy in maintaining an army of trained officers and men, and in providing for its effective organization and command. General Upton had covered the campaigns of 1862 when his death in 1881 left the manuscript unfinished; it was rediscovered and published by Secretary Elihu Root in 1904.

3652. Wecter, Dixon. When Johnny comes marching home. [Boston] Houghton Mifflin, 1944. 588 p. (A Life-in-America prize book)

44–7507 E181.W43

Bibliographical references included in "Notes" (p. [559]–577).

A review of demobilization and veterans' problems after our first three major wars: the Revolution, Civil War, and World War I, with some appraisal of prospects from the viewpoint of 1944. Necessarily incomplete, it is based to a remarkable degree on veterans' own narratives and other primary sources. It emphasizes the common soldier's own attitudes, his adjustment during his first five years of civilian life, and the reaction that follows the high endeavor of war. Over the period covered, the nation's sense of responsibility toward the soldier substantially widened.

B. The Army

3653. Carter, William G. Harding. Creation of the American General Staff. Personal narrative of the General Staff system of the American Army. Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1924. 65 p. ([U.S.] 68th Cong., 1st sess. Senate. Document 119) 24-26546 UB223.C3

The Army entered the 20th century without any effective agency of planning or higher command. During the next few years Elihu Root, Secretary of War, and W. H. Carter, Assistant Adjutant General, collaborated first to draft and secure the passage of the Act of Feb. 14, 1903, establishing a General Staff Corps, and then to organize the staff so authorized. General Carter's personal narrative must be sought in a Congressional document printed 20 years later.

3654. Carter, William G. Harding. The life of Lieutenant General Chaffee. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1917. 296 p. 18-32 E181.C43

Adna Romanza Chaffee (1842-1914) was an Ohio farm boy who enlisted in the Regular Army the day after Bull Run, and retired in 1906 as lieutenant general and chief of staff. His army career included a maximum of active service, as a cavalry officer under Sheridan, as an Indian fighter under Crook, in the Santiago campaign of 1898, in command of the relief expedition to Pekin, and in pacifying the Philippines. General Carter tells a very plain tale, but the indomitable spirit of this hard-bitten old campaigner shows through.

3655. Elliott, Charles Winslow. Winfield Scott, the soldier and the man. New York, Macmillan, 1937. xviii, 817 p. 37-18570 E403.1.S4E6

Bibliography: p. 769-781.

Scott (1786-1866) entered the Regular Army in 1808, made his reputation and achieved general rank in the hardest fighting on the Niagara frontier (1813-14), succeeded as commander-in-chief in 1841, conducted one of the most brilliant campaigns in history against Mexico City in 1847, ran for President in 1852, and did all he could to hold the Union cause together at the outset of the Civil War. Major Elliott aimed to write a definitive biography, and quotes at length from a great variety of original sources to produce a work of great detail, but no more so than the subject deserves. Scott's own Memoirs (New York, Sheldon, 1864. 653 p.) are rather naive and full of special pleading. There are reminiscences of value in the memoirs of his sometime aide, Erasmus D. Keyes (no. 2711).

3656. Forman, Sidney. West Point; a history of the United States Military Academy. New York, Columbia University Press, 1950. 255 p. 50-8255 U410.L1F6

Thesis—Columbia University.

Bibliography: p. [229]-242.

The national Military Academy was founded in 1802, enlarged in 1812, and given its characteristic impress during the superintendency of Sylvanus Thayer in 1817-33. Formed on French models, it has always emphasized a scientific curriculum, physical training, and rigid discipline, and has been the recurrent target of civilian criticism. This concise historical sketch emphasizes its success in training leaders.

3657. Ganoe, William Addleman. The history of the United States Army. Rev. ed. New York, Appleton-Century, 1942. 640 p. 42-20792 E181.G17 1942

"Selected bibliography": p. 557-593.

Those wishing to read a general narrative may be referred to Spaulding below (no. 3664), but the strictly chronological treatment and the marginal dating of every incident render this volume very useful for reference consultation. It provides indeed well-nigh the only peacetime annals of the Army in any printed work. There are no maps, but some serviceable appendices.

3658. Gillie, Mildred H. Forging the thunderbolt, a history of the development of the Armored Force. Harrisburg, Pa., Military Service Pub. Co., 1947. 330 p. 47-6050 UA30.G5

In Algeria early in 1943, American tanks proved that they could stand up to Rommel's armored veterans. The development which made this result possible is here described, beginning with the establishment of a permanent mechanized force in 1930.

The central figure is the younger Adna R. Chaffee (1884–1941), who wore himself out while hastening the organization and training of the Armored Force.

3659. Herr, John K., and Edward S. Wallace. The story of the U. S. Cavalry, 1775–1942. Boston, Little, Brown, 1953. 275 p. 53–7319 UE23.H4

An appreciative sketch of the achievements of the mounted forces in the wars of the United States, copiously illustrated with prints and photographs well reproduced. General Herr was the last Chief of Cavalry of the United States Army. Nostalgic in tone, the book concludes with a plea for a limited retention of mounted troops in the establishment.

3660. Jacobs, James Ripley. The beginning of the U. S. Army, 1783–1812. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1947. 419 p. 47–5140 E181.J2

Bibliography: p. [387]–397.

This narrative treatment of the three post-Revolutionary decades emphasizes the Indian fighting which secured the settlements of the Old Northwest, the extraordinary intrigues of James Wilkinson, commander-in-chief after 1796, and the occupation, exploration, and policing of the Louisiana Purchase. The author condemns the "cheeseparing" of the Democratic administrations after 1801, and pronounces Secretaries Dearborn and Eustis unequal to their tasks of organization.

3661. Kreidberg, Marvin A., and Merton G. Henry. History of military mobilization in the United States Army, 1775–1945. [Washington] Dept. of the Army, 1955. 721 p. illus. ([U. S.] Dept. of the Army. Pamphlet no. 20–212) 56–60717 U15.U64, no. 20–212

A preliminary draft of parts 1–2 was issued in 1953.

Bibliography: p. 698–705.

A study intended to provide staff officers, students at Army schools, and others with detailed information on past mobilizations—"the assembling and organizing of troops, materiel, and equipment for active military service in time of war or other emergency"—and their lessons. Brief accounts of the mobilizations of 1775, 1812, 1846, 1861, and 1898 precede comprehensive descriptions of the planning and preparations for United States participation in two world wars. The new and unexampled scale of operations in 1917–18, and the need for economic mobilization caused nearly as much confusion and improvisation as in earlier wars, despite a degree of preplanning. The lessons learned from this experience were only partly utilized in the interwar period, since planning was based upon mobilization following rather than preceding the outbreak of war, and partial mobilization was already in progress by December 7, 1941. Integrated military, industrial, and agricultural mobilization plans must be made prior to any future wars, and must be flexible enough to meet limited as well as total war.

3662. Matthews, William, and Dixon Wecter. Our soldiers speak, 1775–1918. Boston, Little, Brown, 1943. 365 p. 43–4305 E181.M34

"Bibliography and acknowledgments": p. 360–365.

"The purpose of this book is to let the common soldier, private or noncom, tell the story of his share in America's wars." An anthology of extracts from soldiers' diaries and letters, rather hastily put together during World War II, it concentrates on material bearing on important operations.

3663. Prucha, Francis Paul. Broadax and bayonet; the role of the United States Army in the development of the Northwest, 1815–1860. [Madison] State Historical Society of Wisconsin, 1953. 263 p. 53–6511 F597.P7

A work of original research which stands almost alone in relating the Army's work to the peaceful processes of territorial expansion and social development. Studying the 13 army posts established in Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, and northern Illinois, the author demonstrates their importance for Indian and land policy administration, as cash markets for the early settlers, and as centers of exploration, roadbuilding, and cultural development.

3664. Spaulding, Oliver Lyman. The United States Army in war and peace. New York, Putnam, 1937. 541 p. 37–4575 E181.S78

Bibliography: p. 501–513.

The author aims "to trace the development of the Army, its physical and spiritual growth," rather than to concentrate upon military operations, but his book is nevertheless largely a concise narrative of campaigns from the Colonial Period through World War I. There are, in addition, occasional summaries concerning weapons and several chapters on the peacetime activities of the Army.

3665. U. S. Dept. of the Army. Office of Military History. The personnel replacement system in the United States Army, by Leonard L. Lerwill, lieutenant colonel, Infantry, United States Army. [Washington] 1952–53. 2 v. 53–60151 UB323.A54

Bibliography: v. 2, p. 457–468.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Colonial period–World War I.—v. 2. World War II.

Replacement being the current official name for the process historically known as recruitment, this constitutes a history of the raising of the armies of the United States during its successive wars. Designed for use in the Army school system, it is severely factual, but the first unitary treatment of a subject of special importance in a democracy.

C. The Navy

3666. Chapelle, Howard I. The history of the American sailing Navy; the ships and their development. New York, Norton, 1949. xxiii, 558 p. 49–48709 VA56.C5

Naval history from the standpoint of marine architecture, extending from colonial shipbuilding to the close of the era of sail about 1855. Based on surviving ship-plans in the National Archives, the text is illustrated by 32 folding plans and 155 figures. The technical material is skillfully integrated with national affairs, naval policy, and naval administration.

3667. Knox, Dudley W. A history of the United States Navy. Rev. ed. New York, Putnam, 1948. xxiii, 704 p. 48–2547 E182.K77 1948

A concise, balanced, and accurate historical sketch of the Navy in action through World War II, with adequate emphasis on the strategic situations basic to the achievements of fleets or single vessels. There are numerous maps and diagrams, largely drawn from earlier publications. It contains little on the development of ships, weapons, administration, education, or bluejacket life.

3668. Metcalf, Clyde H. A history of the United States Marine Corps. New York, Putnam, 1939. 584 p. 39–6652 VE23.M45

Marines were authorized by the Continental Congress in November 1775, and the present Marine Corps has been in existence since July 1798. Originally adjuncts to the old type of ship-to-ship fighting, since the Mexican War marines have had their major employment in establishing overseas beachheads. During the first three decades of the 20th century they were a primary instrument of the United States' policy in the Caribbean. Col. Metcalf describes their active operations down to 1938 in great detail, with incidental passages on their organization and administration. Jeter A. Isely and Philip A. Crowl's The U. S. Marines and Amphibious War; Its Theory and Its Practice in the Pacific (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1951. 636 p.) provides a comparable chronicle for World War II.

3669. Mitchell, Donald W. History of the modern American Navy, from 1883 through Pearl Harbor. New York, Knopf, 1946. xiv, 477, xxv p. 46–4382 E182.M65

Bibliography: p. 455–477.

"An interpretative and comprehensive general history" since the revival of 1883, based entirely on printed materials and intended for the lay reader. Its balance of policy, matériel, organization, administration, and operations is superior to that of any previous history, and it incorporates such "previously underemphasized subjects" as naval aid in diplomacy and polar exploration, and naval aspects of the munitions problem. The author is critical both of the Navy's performance and of its personnel policies, particularly its failure to promote according to ability.

3670. Peck, Taylor. Round-shot to rockets; a history of the Washington Navy Yard and U. S. Naval Gun Factory. Annapolis, United States Naval Institute, 1949. xx, 267 p. 49–11615 VA70.W3P4

The only full-length study of a Government navy yard, and one which effectively combines local circumstances, the current of national history, technological developments, and administrative changes. The Washington Yard, established with the city in 1800, began specializing in ordnance in 1847, and during the two World Wars became exclusively occupied with this function.

3671. Potter, Elmer B., ed. The United States and world sea power. Englewood Cliffs [N. J.] Prentice-Hall, 1955. 963 p. 55–9323 E182.P8

Bibliography: p. 923–938.

A monster textbook which presents the naval history of Western Civilization since the Graeco-Persian Wars, but gives special attention to the place of the United States in that development. Since the emphasis is on major fleets and strategy, the American story down to 1861 is treated as the small-scale affair that it was, but the Civil and subsequent wars receive the detailed treatment accorded to major conflicts. Despite the multiple authorship, a coherent point of view, and a balanced emphasis on both technological progress and fighting doctrine, contribute to a unitary impression.

3672. Puleston, William D. Mahan; the life and work of Captain Alfred Thayer Mahan. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1939. 380 p. 39–10963 E182.M256

List of Mahan's writings: p. [359]–364.

Mahan (1840–1914) saw service in the blockading squadrons of the Civil War and sat on the three-man War Board which directed the naval operations of the Spanish-American War. In the interval, and largely as a result of his appointment to the presidency of the Naval War College in 1886, he had become a world-famous historian and the great theorist of the place of seapower in international relations. Captain Puleston uses Mahan's correspondence to elucidate the development of his characteristic outlook and doctrines, and to illustrate his remarkable influence abroad. Mahan's own From Sail to Steam; Recollections of Naval Life (New York, Harper, 1907. 325 p.) is more rewarding for its picture of the post-Civil War Navy than for any revelation of the man.

3673. Sprout, Harold H., and Margaret Sprout. The rise of American naval power, 1776–1918. Rev. ed. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1942. 404 p. NNC

3674. Sprout, Harold H., and Margaret Sprout. Toward a new order of sea power; American naval policy and the world scene, 1918–1922. 2d ed. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1943. 336 p. A43–2765 E182.S79 1943

The first title is an indispensable work which breaks new ground in reviewing the outlook of national authorities upon seapower from the outbreak of the Revolution, and the consequences in warships, trained personnel, and organization for combat. It formulates the lessons of America's successive naval wars and indicates the extent to which they have been heeded in subsequent policy. The sequel describes, on a much larger scale, the post-Versailles situation in world seapower, the revolt against "navalism" in America, and the partial limitation of naval armaments by the Washington Conference of 1922.

3675. Taylor, Albert H. The first twenty-five years of the Naval Research Laboratory. Washington, Navy Dept., 1948. 75 p. 48–46752 V394.B4T3

"Navexos P–549."

A concise account, by one of its original staff members, of the scientific organ of the Navy Department, which was first planned in 1916 but not brought into being until 1923. In spite of a lean budget, the Laboratory succeeded in developing radar and a host of other devices which profoundly affected marine warfare during 1942–45.

3676. Turnbull, Archibald D., and Clifford L. Lord. History of United States naval aviation. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1949. 345 p. 49–11818 VG93.T8

"Sources": p. [324]–331.

Not an official history, but prepared by two Navy historians with complete access to official records. It carries the story from 1910, when the Navy Department first assigned an officer to watch aviation developments, through World War I bombing, the first transatlantic flights, the first carriers, and the experimental bombings and controversies of the 1920's, to the outbreak of World War II.

3677. U. S. Office of the Comptroller of the Navy. The naval establishment, its growth and necessity for expansion, 1930–1950. [Washington] 1951. 178 p. 52–63190 VA53.A74

"NavEvox–P–1038."

A document which seeks to explain and justify the increasing expense of the naval establishment over two decades. Apart from the element of inflation, the essential facts are that in 1950 there were 456,000 officers and men as against 116,000 in 1930, 645 vessels as against 317, and 14,030 aircraft as against 989. Many organizational charts and data are included.

D. Wars of the United States

Di. WARS: THE REVOLUTION

3678. Allen, Gardner W. A naval history of the American Revolution. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1913. 2 v. (752 p.) 13–9743 E271.A42

"Sources of information": v. 2, p. [671]–686.

Utilizes British and American archival and other manuscript sources, as well as all primary records in print, to produce a very full narrative of all operations of warships under Continental commission, in which many extracts from first-hand authorities are incorporated. Within its sphere it is very nearly definitive, but it has only incidental treatment of the State navies, the privateers which so grievously harried British commerce, and of marine administration, which last receives thorough analysis in Charles O. Paullin's The Navy of the American Revolution (Chicago [Burrows] 1906. 549 p.). Nor does it enter into the fateful large-scale operations of the French, Spanish, and British navies from 1779, which may be followed in Sir William M. James' The British Navy in Adversity (London, Longmans, Green, 1926. 459 p.).

3679. Bolton, Charles Knowles. The private soldier under Washington. New York, Scribner, 1902. 258 p. 2–23616 E255.B69

Old as it is, this remains the only rounded treatment of the soldiers who made up the armies that won American independence. It is based upon a wide exploration of original materials, many of which are reproduced as illustrations. Among the subjects handled are firearms, the officer-private relationship, camp organization, diversions, hospitals, and transport.

3680. Frothingham, Thomas G. Washington, Commander in Chief. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1930. 404 p. 30–24708 HE312.25.F94

Covers Washington's education, prior military experience, and appointment, but is primarily a military history of the Revolutionary War, including both the operations conducted by Washington, and the others as seen from headquarters of the commander-in-chief of the Continental Army. It is based on the older editions of Washington's writings, but remains a clear and reliable outline.

3681. Hatch, Louis Clinton. The administration of the American Revolutionary Army. New York, Longmans, Green, 1904. 229 p. (Harvard historical studies, v. 10) 4–1599 E255.H36

"List of authorities cited": p. 210–215.

The American colonists, if sturdy material, "knew little of military training or military subordination." The Continental Congress and their commander-in-chief had therefore the task of creating an effective military organization nearly from scratch, and this volume tells how they performed it and what major problems arose in its course. A major aim was the creation of a corps of officers, and questions of rank had to be settled, native officers given proper rights against a flood of foreign claimants, and reasonable incentives provided. The several outbreaks of insubordination toward the war's end are analyzed. A solid dissertation, which half a century of scholarship has failed to replace.

3682. Nickerson, Hoffman. The turning point of the Revolution; or, Burgoyne in America. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1928. 500 p. 28–10475 E233.N63

Bibliography: p. [481]–486.

A leisurely narrative of the campaign of Saratoga (1778) by a philosophical student of the art of war, with exceptional knowledge of the armies and campaigns of 18th-century Europe. Howe and Germaine spoiled the decisive blow which would have cut the Union in two, the General by planning the diversionary attack on Philadelphia, and the Minister by failing to veto it. Burgoyne himself ruined his remaining prospects by relaxing after his easy capture of Ticonderoga. His surrender brought France in, and "Yorktown was the child of Saratoga."

3683. Ward, Christopher. The War of the Revolution; edited by John Richard Alden. New York, Macmillan, 1952. 2 v. (989 p.) 52–14233 E230.W34

Bibliography: v. 2, p. 943–954.

Mr. Ward published his detailed battle history of The Delaware Continentals, 1776–1783 in 1941 (Wilmington, Del., The Historical Society of Delaware, 620 p.) and before his death two years later had expanded it into a nearly complete narrative of the military operations on land. Prof. Alden had only to add a chapter on G. R. Clark's campaign in the West, correct some slips, and add a few citations. The result has a minimum of background materials, as well as of strategic summaries and conclusions, but excels in the presentation of detailed and accurate battle reports. The narrative first disposes of "The War in the North," and then, a third of the way through volume 2, returns to 1775 and begins "The War in the South," concluding with Yorktown. Willard M. Wallace's Appeal to Arms (New York, Harper, 1951. 308 p.) gets a well-documented military narrative into briefer compass, with considerably less tactical detail but more strategic commentary.

3684. Wildes, Harry Emerson. Anthony Wayne, trouble shooter of the American Revolution. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1941. 514 p. 41–18202 E207.W35W5

Bibliography: p. 489–501.

Wayne, a prosperous farmer-tanner of Chester County, Pa., without military training or experience, was a rather flamboyant and convivial individual, who was yet a born leader of men, a close student of the military classics, and a commander who combined careful planning with great vigor of execution. This biography, which makes full use of Wayne's own papers as well as much supplementary research, is spirited enough, and indeed the first "to put the warrior-statesman in his proper social, economic, political, and military setting," but is considerably less successful in elucidating military operations.

Dii. WARS: 1798–1848

3685. Allen, Gardner W. Our naval war with France. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [192–] 323 p. 30–18792 E323.A422
"Sources of information": p. [283]–290.
First published in 1909.

3686. Allen, Gardner W. Our navy and the Barbary corsairs. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1905. 354 p. 26–9008 E335.A422
"Sources of information": p. [305]–311.
Although the U. S. Office of Naval Records and Library has since published extensive collections of Naval Documents on the quasi-war with France (7 v., 1935–38) and the Barbary wars (6 v., 1939–44), Mr. Allen's careful, documented, and unexciting volumes remain the most useful monographs for the earliest exploits of the restored Navy. For the diplomatic side of the second title, Ray W. Irwin's The Diplomatic Relations of the United States with the Barbary Powers (Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1931. 225 p.) is somewhat, if not greatly, to be preferred.

3687. Beirne, Francis F. The War of 1812. New York, Dutton, 1949. 410 p. 48–9712 E354.B44
Bibliography: p. 393–395.
For a detailed and documentary general history of the War of 1812, the student must still resort to Henry Adams' famous History of the United States, 1801–1817 (q. v.). Mr. Beirne, a Baltimore journalist, readily admits his primary indebtedness to Adams and to the topographical Pictorial Field-Book of Benson J. Lossing (New York, Harper, 1868. 1084 p.), but he has digested these and other largely secondary authorities to good effect. His book is a clear, well-balanced, and critical outline, and a generally serviceable introduction to this exasperating conflict.

3688. Mahan, Alfred T. Sea power in its relations to the War of 1812. Boston, Little, Brown, 1905. 2 v. 5–33220 E354.M21
"The present work concludes the series of 'The influence of sea power upon history.' "—Pref.
A classic of naval history which begins by exploring the maritime antecedents of the war in Britain's conduct of her commercial policies and naval power after 1783. By regularly defining the strategic situation and the strategic aspect of operations, Admiral Mahan vividly reveals the naval War of 1812, not as a spectacular series of single-ship actions, but as a progressive strangulation of American economic life.

3689. Smith, Justin H. The War with Mexico. New York, Macmillan, 1919. 2 v. 19–19605 E404.S66
"Appendix—The sources": v. 2, p. 517–562.
A monumental narrative of the remoter and more immediate causes, the campaigns, the peace settlement, and the consequences of the comparatively brief war of 1846–1848. The author estimated that he had examined over 100,000 manuscripts, 1200 books and pamphlets, and the files of 200 periodicals, and that nine-tenths of his material was new. He has eased the reader's task by removing scholarship, controversy, and references to a massive series of notes at the end of each volume, and presenting his results in a vigorous and colorful narrative. Criticism of the work has been aimed largely at its rather whole-hearted justification of the case of the United States concerning responsibility for the war. One chapter (30 in vol. 2) is devoted to the relatively unimportant naval operations. Readers preferring a briefer treatment will find a competent and balanced one in Robert Selph Henry's The Story of the Mexican War (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1950. 424 p.).

Diii. WARS: THE CIVIL WAR

3690. Catton, Bruce. Mr. Lincoln's army. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1951. 372 p. 51–9468 E470.2.C37
Bibliography: p. 341–347.

3691. Catton, Bruce. Glory Road; the bloody route from Fredericksburg to Gettysburg. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1952. 416 p. 52–5538 E470.2.C36
Bibliography: p. 363–370.

3692. Catton, Bruce. A stillness at Appomattox. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1953. 438 p. 53–9982 E470.2.C39
Mr. Catton's trilogy constitutes a history of the Army of the Potomac for the general reader which does not attempt a detailed narrative of operations, but concentrates on the personalities of the leaders, the criticism of generalship, and especially the combat experience of the common soldier. For the latter purpose he has drawn more upon regimental histories than other recent writers, and emphasizes the effects of heavy losses in individual units. He is at all times concerned with the effectiveness of supply and the state of morale. Few military histories have so vividly realized the feeling of war from the viewpoint of the individual participant.

3693. De Forest, John William. A volunteer's adventures; a Union captain's record of the Civil War. Edited, with notes, by James H. Croushore. With an introd. by Stanley T. Williams. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1946. xviii, 237 p. A46-3486 E601.D3

Personal narratives of the Civil War are legion; that of De Forest (1826–1906) may be chosen to represent the others because of its author's skill as a novelist and man of letters. His manuscript, given its final revision about 1890, was put together from wartime letters to his wife, and from articles published in Harper's New Monthly Magazine and The Galaxy during or shortly after the war. The first part, which describes the author's experience as a line officer of a Connecticut regiment serving on the lower Mississippi, has a first-hand intensity which does not recur in his narrative of Sheridan's valley campaign from the viewpoint of a staff officer at army corps headquarters.

3694. Freeman, Douglas Southall. R. E. Lee, a biography. New York, Scribner, 1934–35. 4 v. 34-33660 E467.1.L4F83

Bibliography: v 2, p. 591–595; v. 4, p. 543–569.

3695. Freeman, Douglas Southall. Lee's lieutenants, a study in command. New York, Scribner, 1946. 4 v. 46-3415 E470.2.F7 1946

"Select critical bibliography": v. 4, p. 799–825.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Manassas to Malvern Hill.—v. 2. Cedar Mountain to Chancellorsville.—v. 3–4. Gettysburg to Appomattox.

Dr. Freeman was engaged for 19 years upon the biography, which at once took its place as a classic. As a study of Lee's generalship, its originality lies in its systematically taking account of the "fog of war," and of the primary function of military intelligence in every commander's strategy. Save in one or two instances, "the reader remains at Confederate G. H. Q. throughout the war and receives the intelligence reports only as they arrive." The massive accumulation of detail regularly strengthens the evidence for Lee's military and personal greatness. Lee's Lieutenants, six years in the making, was undertaken as a supplement to the earlier work, in order to do justice to the other leaders there overshadowed by Lee. It assumed the form of "a review of the command of the Army of Northern Virginia," during the 14 months before Lee was placed at its head, and on the subordinate levels thenceforward. "Where familiar battles again were described, the viewpoint would not be that of Lee but that of the men executing his orders or making decisions for themselves."

3696. Grant, Ulysses S. Personal memoirs. Edited with notes and an introd. by E. B. Long. Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1952. xxv, 608 p. 52-5191 E672.F7617

First published in 1885–86.

The famous book was undertaken by the ex-President in order to provide an estate for his family, otherwise unprovided for, and completed, after eleven months of work, a week before he died of cancer of the throat. The first sixth is largely concerned with Grant's experiences in the Mexican War, the remainder with his campaigns during 1861–63, and with the campaigns of 1864–65 in general. Seldom has a narrative of great events by the leading participant been so utterly free of pretension and fanfare. Grant speaks plainly of his superiors' mistakes in the early years, and as plainly admits his own: "I have always regretted that the last assault at Cold Harbor was ever made." Mr. Long's unobtrusive editing consists largely in supplying full names in brackets, and adding a number of corrective footnotes. Lloyd Lewis lived to complete only the first installment of what was to have been a large-scale modern biography: Captain Sam Grant (Boston, Little, Brown, 1950. 512 p.). It is to be continued from June 1861 by Bruce Catton, who has already contributed a graceful interpretative sketch: U. S. Grant and the American Military Tradition (Boston, Little, Brown, 1954. 201 p.).

3697. Henderson, George F. Stonewall Jackson and the American Civil War. With an introd. by Field-Marshal the late Right Hon. Viscount Wolseley. Authorized American ed. London, New York, Longmans, Green, 1937. xxiv, 737 p. 38-30209 E467.1.J15H55 1937

First published in two volumes, 1898.

Thanks to the unprecedented documentary publication of the U. S. War Department, The War of the Rebellion: A Compilation of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies (Washington, 1880–1901. 130 v.), usually referred to as the Official Records of the Rebellion, it has been nearly as easy to study the Civil War in detail in Europe as in America. One of the earliest and most influential results of such study was the work of Col. Henderson, Professor of Military Art and History at the British Staff College. It is a brilliant presentation of Jackson (1824–1863) as a selfless Christian knight and a supreme master of the art of war comparable to Napoleon and to Wellington at their best. His death at Chancellorsville from the fire of his own men was a fatal loss to the Confederacy; Lee was left with no one "to whom he could entrust the execution of those daring and delicate manoeuvres his inferior numbers rendered necessary."

3698. Henry, Robert Selph. The story of the Confederacy. New and rev. ed. New York, New Home Library, 1943. 514 p.
43–18537 E487.H544 1943

First published in 1931.

An outline of the war from the viewpoint of the Confederate armies, based on the principle that "the preponderance of power on the part of the North was so great that nothing short of perfect performance by Southern statecraft and Southern command could have reversed the result." In consequence, missed opportunities by Southern commanders are heavily emphasized. Mr. Henry, an experienced railroad executive, makes of it a very dramatic story, much admired by the late Douglas S. Freeman who, in 1936, called it "at present the book with which to begin one's study of the period it covers and the book to which to return when everything else on the subject has been read."

3699. Lewis, Lloyd. Sherman, fighting prophet. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1932. 690 p.
32–33980 E467.1.S55L48

Bibliography: p. 655–669.

William Tecumseh Sherman (1820–1891) was an Ohio West Pointer with extensive Southern connections, who remained inflexibly loyal to the Union and the Constitution, but foresaw from the outset the magnitude of the effort that would be required to defeat the Confederacy. Of nervous temperament, habitually outspoken, and a trenchant penman, he had frequent clashes with politicians and the press, which delayed his recognition as an outstanding commander. Lewis' volume, studded with extracts from Sherman's own letters, builds up a portrait of this complex character in convincing detail. Basil H. Liddell Hart's Sherman; Soldier, Realist, American (New York, Dodd, Mead, 1930. 456 p.) is somewhat better for operations, but Lewis' is a rounded presentation of an exceptional American.

3700. The Navy in the Civil War. New York, Scribner, 1883. 3 v. 5–19351 E591.N32

Contents.—v. 1. Soley, James Russell. The blockade and the cruisers.—v. 2. Ammen, Daniel. The Atlantic Coast.—v. 3. Mahan, Alfred T. The Gulf and inland waters.

Identical in format with the same publisher's series of volumes on the Campaigns of the Civil War. But whereas the latter, although still worth occasional consultation, have been replaced in detail and as a whole, The Navy in the Civil War remains the only large-scale survey of its subject, and this in spite of the 30-volume publication of the U. S. Navy Department, Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies (Washington, 1894–1922). Written by two naval officers and a professor at the Naval Academy, they are sound and sober narratives, but that of Commander Mahan, as he then was, lacks the philosophical depth of his later and greater writings.

3701. O'Connor, Richard. Sheridan, the inevitable. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1953. 400 p.
53–5847 E467.1.S54O3

"Notes on sources": p. 361–391.

Philip H. Sheridan (1831–1888), the son of an Irish Catholic immigrant who settled in Somerset, Ohio, made his way against social and personal difficulties to graduate from West Point in 1853. In the course of hard-fighting service as brigade and division commander in the West, he impressed himself on Grant, who brought him East to command the cavalry of the Army of the Potomac early in 1864. Here he crushed Stuart at Yellow Tavern, and Early in the Shenandoah Valley, and increasingly became Grant's reliance as his agent for offensive operations. He struck the hammer-blows of March–April 1865 which forced Lee to surrender. Mr. O'Connor's vigorous narrative goes on to describe his later service, in charge of the final years of Indian warfare, and as commander-in-chief, but naturally emphasizes the great year in Virginia when Sheridan established himself as one of the great captains.

3702. Shannon, Fred Albert. The organization and administration of the Union Army, 1861–1865. Cleveland, Clark, 1928. 2 v.
28–15871 E491.S52

Bibliography: v. 2, p. [285]–294.

Since the Civil War soon called for unprecedented numbers of men under arms, the problem of raising and organizing this host naturally overstrained existing facilities, and involved much improvisation and sheer confusion. Prof. Shannon dwells so exclusively upon the mistakes as nearly to lose sight of the achievement, and he puts excessive blame upon what he terms "the state-rights fetish." His volumes nevertheless contain by far the most information assembled concerning the respective shares of Federal and State authorities in raising troops; the methods employed in procuring food, clothing, and munitions; the adoption and enforcement of the draft; the policies of paid substitutes for those who could afford them, and of bounties for volunteers, and their consequences; and the treatment of slackers and conscientious objectors. Another view of the administrative crisis after Sumter is contained in Alexander Howard Meneely's The War Department, 1861 (New York, Columbia University Press, 1928. 400 p.).

677676 O–63–30

3703. Thomason, John W. Jeb Stuart. New York, Scribner, 1930. 512 p.
30–28932 E467.1.S9T46

"Jeb Stuart was a symbol, gonfalon that went before the swift, lean columns of the Confederacy." Captain Thomason of the Marine Corps tells us that he attempted, "not a history of a war, but a portrait of a splendid human soul, expressed through the profession of arms." The result, embellished with his own skillful drawings, glows with his enthusiasm, affection, and pride in the great Confederate cavalryman (1833–1864), and tells a great deal about the cavalry operations of the Eastern campaigns as well.

3704. Wiley, Bell Irvin. The life of Johnny Reb, the common soldier of the Confederacy. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1943. 444 p.
43–3253 E607.W5

Bibliography: p. [419]–426.

3705. Wiley, Bell Irvin. The life of Billy Yank, the common soldier of the Union. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1952. 454 p.
52–5809 E491.W69

"Bibliographical notes": p. 438–446.

The citizen armies of the Civil War wrote home innumerable letters and kept an extraordinary number of diaries. Prof. Wiley has spent years in tracking down and digesting these materials, which he has combined with the Official Records of the Rebellion and other printed sources to reconstruct with complete fidelity the daily life of the soldier in either camp. There are chapters on drunkenness and other vices, heroism and cowardice, rations and ersatz rations, clothing, religion in camp, discipline and punishments, morale, etc. On completing the second work the author wrote: "The two were so much alike that the task of giving this book a flavor and character distinct from The Life of Johnny Reb has at times been a difficult one."

3706. Williams, Kenneth P. Lincoln finds a general; a military study of the Civil War. With maps by Clark Ray. New York, Macmillan, 1949–52. 3 v.
49–11530 E470.W765

Includes bibliographies.

The author is a professor of mathematics at Indiana University, but there is nothing amateurish about his close analyses of Civil War generalship from the evidence supplied in the Official Records of the Rebellion. He believes that when President Lincoln said, a few weeks after appointing him to the supreme command, "Grant is the first General I have had," he spoke the plain truth. Grant he describes as "the embodiment of the offensive spirit that leaves the enemy no rest," and "the most profitable and the most inspiring of all generals to study." The first two volumes describe the failures of generalship in the successive commanders of the Army of the Potomac, and the third follows Grant's Western campaign through June 1862. Two or more additional volumes will be required to complete the work.

Div. WARS: THE SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR

3707. Chadwick, French Ensor. The relations of the United States and Spain: the Spanish-American War. New York, Scribner, 1911. 2 v.
11–23013 E715.C43

Bibliography: v. 2, p. 475–478.

Chadwick was Admiral Sampson's flag-captain during the blockade and battle of Santiago de Cuba. His narrative of the war, by far the most thorough and detailed that has been written, is "intended in the main as a documentary history," printing in whole or part all important orders, telegrams, and reports, including those on the Spanish side in translation. These have been pieced together with such skill as to provide a narrative of true continuity, clarity, and suspense. Admiral Chadwick makes no attempt to conceal the disparity of force, and he resolutely keeps the Sampson-Schley controversy out of his book. The land campaigns, in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, fall entirely within volume 2.

3708. Wilson, Herbert W. The downfall of Spain; naval history of the Spanish-American War. London, Low, Marston, 1900. 451 p.
1–27847 E727.W74

"Authorities": p. 442–444.

H. W. Wilson of London was the author of the standard Ironclads in Action (London, S. Low, Marston, 1896. 2 v.) which, 30 years later, he would revise and expand into Battleships in Action (Boston, Little, Brown, 1926. 2 v.). Admiral Chadwick in 1911 called this "the best naval history of the war," and drew upon it for authoritative comments at several points. Although published so soon after the war's end, it remains a remarkable example of what can be done when a Government publishes its documents fully and promptly, as did the United States, and a genuine expert analyzes them thoroughly. On one point Wilson revised his opinion by 1926: a number of instances of spontaneous combustion in warship magazines between 1898 and 1914 led him to doubt that an external mine had destroyed the Maine.

Dv. WARS: WORLD WAR I

3709. Dickinson, John. The building of an army; a detailed account of legislation, administration and opinion in the United States, 1915–1920. New York, Century, 1922. 398 p. 22–12553 UA25.D5

On April 1, 1917, the United States, a completely unmilitary nation, had 127,000 men under arms. Nineteen months later the American Army consisted of 3,665,000 men, of whom nearly two million were in Europe. This book supplies a thoughtful narrative of how the Selective Service Acts of 1917 were utilized to achieve this result.

3710. Harbord, James G. The American Army in France, 1917–1919. Boston, Little, Brown, 1936. xviii, 632 p. 36–6451 D570.H275

General Harbord's experience was one of the most varied in World War I. During the first year of the A. E. F. he was Pershing's chief of staff; he commanded the Marine Brigade at Belleau Wood (May 1918) and the 2nd Division in the Soissons offensive (July); at its conclusion he took over the Services of Supply for the duration of the war. For each of these phases General Harbord provides a clear, direct, and critical narrative worthy of the intelligent and incisive administrator that he was. A more perfunctory outline covers the aspects of the A. E. F. with which he was not personally concerned.

3711. Holley, Irving B. Ideas and weapons; exploitation of the aerial weapon by the United States during World War I; a study in the relationship of technological advance, military doctrine, and the development of weapons. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1953. 222 p. (Yale historical publications. Miscellany, 57) 52–13971 UG633.H6

"Bibliographical note": p. [179]–209.

One of the Air Force historians of World War II here applies his experience to explaining the aerial failure of 1917–18. He tracks it down in the spheres of doctrine, equipment, and organization. The men in charge failed to develop any clear ideas concerning the purposes and composition of an American air force. They failed to recognize the fluidity of the technological factor, necessitating constant improvements in airplane design. They failed to create efficient agencies for decision, information, and research. As a result of their emphasis on quantity rather than quality of production, American-made planes proved obsolete by the time they began to reach the front in quantity, and the American air force had to be equipped with aircraft of allied manufacture.

3712. March, Peyton C. The nation at war. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1932. 407 p. 32–25157 D570.M35 1932a

General March (1864–1955) was the original selection for commander of the A. E. F.'s artillery and held that post, occupied in organizing and training, until Jan. 1918, when Secretary Baker recalled him to head the General Staff. His volume, from that early point, is in large part polemic, to justify the Staff against the criticisms, real or supposed, in General Pershing's reminiscences (no. 3715). March put the staff on 24-hour duty, reorganized it according to function, reduced paper work, and drove it hard. "Raising the men; putting them in camps; clothing them; equipping them; training them; shipping them to France; sending ammunition, rifles, and supplies to France to make the A. E. F. a going concern: all that was done by the vast military hierarchy at home, working under me as Chief of Staff of the Army."

3713. Palmer, Frederick. Newton D. Baker; America at war. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1931. 2 v. 31–28311 D570.P32

Baker (1871–1937) was an Ohio Progressive with pacifist convictions whose selection for the War Department provoked some derision, but who proved an exceptionally able mediator between the military organization and civilian groups and interests. Palmer, an experienced war correspondent, used Baker's own papers as well as official war agency records to relate in detail Baker's distinguished services in coördinating the American war effort and facilitating the task of the soldiers at home and in France. Baker was made a special target by assailants of the Wilson administration, but the military leaders are well-nigh unanimous in testifying that his genuine concern for civil liberties did not in the least get in the way of his effective mastery of the gigantic administrative problems of his office.

3714. Palmer, Frederick. John J. Pershing, General of the Armies, a biography. Harrisburg, Pa., Military Service Pub. Co., 1948. 380 p. 48–8289 E181.P512

Palmer, a friend and admirer of "J. J. P.," completed this biographical sketch in 1940, and added the two final chapters after Pershing's death in 1948. It is without references and contains little on Pershing's career before 1917, and less on his life after 1919. However, it adds color to Pershing's own narrative (no. 3715) of his war experiences, and it emphasizes, as Pershing does not, the magnitude of his achievement in maintaining the integrity of the A. E. F. against the insistent pressure of the allied commands that American men and matériel be employed to fill the gaps in their own organizations.

3715. Pershing, John J. My experiences in the World War. New York, Stokes, 1931. 2 v.
31–10662 D570.P44 1931

Pershing (1860–1948) was in his 57th year, the junior major general of the U. S. Army, and in charge of the Southern Department when, in May 1917, he was chosen to head the American Expeditionary Force. He took over a decade in the careful preparation of these memoirs. They are strung upon entries in his official diary and mirror very faithfully the outlook from American G. H. Q. They are for the greater part concerned, as was Pershing, with problems of planning, organization, training, supply, and inter-allied relations in every sphere. Operations are encountered only in volume 2, and are somewhat formally described.

3716. Sims, William Sowden. The victory at sea. In collaboration with Burton J. Hendrick. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1920. 410 p.
20–18578 D589.U6S6

American warships played a vital part in winning World War I, for if our dreadnoughts never saw action, our cruisers and destroyers were numerous enough to permit the adoption of the convoy system, which finally shook off the German submarines' stranglehold upon British commerce. With the help of a veteran journalist, the commander of the American fleet in European waters tells the fascinating story in untechnical language.

Dvi. WARS: WORLD WAR II

3717. Arnold, Henry H. Global mission. New York, Harper, 1949. 626 p.
49–10894 D790.A9

The memoirs of a West Pointer of the class of 1907 who was assigned to military aviation in 1911 and succeeded to the command of the Air Corps the day before Munich (1938). The narrative of subsequent events, if somewhat cluttered and gossipy, is a unique depiction of the coming of age of the Air Force as a third arm of national defense.

3718. Bradley, Omar N. A soldier's story. New York, Holt, 1951. xix, 618 p.
51–11294 D756.B7

A personal narrative of the Algerian, Sicilian, and Normandy campaigns which, although more chatty and anecdotal, closely parallels Eisenhower's (no. 3719) but affords instructive comparisons by giving the viewpoint of our most successful army-group commander rather than that of SHAEF. A list of principal persons and a glossary are helpful in following the narrative.

3719. Eisenhower, Dwight D., Pres. U. S. Crusade in Europe. Garden City, N. Y., Garden City Books, 1952. 573 p.
52–2207 D743.E35 1952

First published in 1948.

The personal narrative of the Supreme Commander, Allied Expeditionary Forces, from his departure from the Philippines at the end of 1940 to the postwar occupation of Germany. It illuminates the processes of planning and coördinating, at the highest level, such gigantic combined operations as the African, Italian, and Normandy invasions.

3720. Merriam, Robert E. Dark December; the full account of the Battle of the Bulge. Chicago, Ziff-Davis Pub. Co., 1947. 234 p.
47–4797 D756.5.A7M4

One of the Army's field historians, who was present during the fighting of Dec. 16, 1944–Jan. 16, 1945, interviewed many of the participants, and helped prepare the still unreleased official narrative, presents his own dramatic and critical interpretation. The primary blame for von Rundstedt's Ardennes breakthrough is placed upon the excessive optimism of American intelligence officers. The effort, however, quite exhausted Nazi offensive power.

3721. Morison, Samuel Eliot. History of United States naval operations in World War II. Boston, Little, Brown, 1947+ 47–1571 D773.M6

Large-scale naval history on an unusual plan: the author has enjoyed all the facilities for writing official history, including participation in a number of the campaigns, but has taken personal responsibility for all statements of fact and opinion. The result has been generally acclaimed as contemporary history of rare authority, unity, and power, as interesting to the layman as the professional sailor. With the 10th volume the huge work is approaching its conclusion.

3722. Pratt, Fletcher. War for the world; a chronicle of our fighting forces in World War II. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1950. 364 p. (The Chronicles of America series, v. 30)
52–4358 E173.C58, v. 30

"Bibliographical note": p. [351]–353.

A concise narrative of the two great wars which America conducted in 1941–1945, with neither the Pacific nor the European theater slighted. It presents the logistic basis of our expanding operations, and stresses the technological developments which, after one grim year of containment, gave superiority by land, sea, and air, and made offensive warfare and victory possible. The textbook edition of this noteworthy feat of condensation can be obtained separately from the series.

3723. Stilwell, Joseph W. The Stilwell papers, arr. and edited by Theodore H. White. New York, Sloane, 1948. xvi, 357 p.
48–6966 D811.S83

Excerpts from General Stilwell's command journal, memoranda to self, and letters to his wife are interspersed with background passages by the editor to form the most completely personal record of any pivotal figure in World War II. While "Vinegar Joe" was hardly the ideal personality for liaison with an oriental power, his version of his struggle with what he regarded as Kuomintang laxity, deceit, and corruption has few counterparts.

3724. Studies in social psychology in World War II. Prepared and edited under the auspices of a special committee of the Social Science Research Council. [Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1949–50] 4 v. 49–2480 U22.S8

Contents.—v. 1. The American soldier: adjustment during Army life, by S. A. Stouffer and others.—v. 2. The American soldier: combat and its aftermath, by S. A. Stouffer and others.—v. 3. Experiments on mass communication, by C. I. Hovland, A. A. Lumsdaine and F. D. Sheffield.—v. 4. Measurement and prediction, by S. A. Stouffer and others.

These massive volumes constitute the end product of the war-time activity of the Research Branch of the War Department's Information and Education Division. A study of soldiers' attitudes, it is based on 243 separate surveys by questionnaire, some involving as many as 25,000 men. The first two volumes are deeply revealing reflections of the states of mind prevalent in a vast citizen army; the last two are chiefly of interest to professional psychologists. The series is discussed from the latter point of view in Studies in the Scope and Method of "The American Soldier," edited by Robert K. Merton and Paul F. Lazarsfeld (Glencoe, Ill., Free Press, 1950. 255 p. Continuities in Social Research).

3725. U. S. Bureau of the Budget. The United States at war; development and administration of the war program by the Federal Government. Prepared under the auspices of the Committee of Records of War Administration by the War Records Section, Bureau of the Budget. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1946. xv, 555 p. ([United States. Historical reports on war administration, Bureau of the Budget, no. 1])
47–32819 D769.A55 1946

More than any previous war of the United States, World War II produced an enormous increase in governmental controls, and in the number and size of the agencies which exerted them. This is an administrative history of the Government's war effort, organized by essential functions rather than by the several agencies, merely to list which requires a 15-page appendix (p. 521–535).

3726. U. S. Dept. of the Army. Office of Military History. United States Army in World War II. Washington, 1947+ 47–46404 D769.A533

This monumental enterprise, to which only the Official Records of the Rebellion can be compared, was authorized by the Chief of Staff in 1946. Behind it, says General Albert C. Smith, "lies the greatest mass of records and recollections ever produced—17,200 tons of records created by the U. S. Army alone." More than 85 volumes are planned, of which 27 have appeared as this chapter is completed. The work is arranged in a number of subseries: The War Department, of which 3 vols. have appeared; The Army Ground Forces, 2 vols.; The Army Service Forces and the Technical Services, 5 vols.; The War in Europe, 4 vols.; The War in the Pacific, 6 vols.; China-Burma-India, 1 vol.; Middle East, 1 vol.; Special Studies, 2 vols.; and Pictorial Records, 3 vols. The Chief Historian of the office, Kent Roberts Greenfield, is the general editor of the series, and also one of the authors in The Army Ground Forces subseries. He has also prepared a Master Index; Reader's Guide (1955. 81 p.) to the volumes thus far issued, in which the content of each volume is summarized, and its importance for the study of modern warfare analyzed. Dr. Greenfield has also discussed the general problems of writing contemporary military history in The Historian and the Army (New Brunswick, Rutgers University Press, 1954. 93 p.). The series is on a grander scale than many users of this Guide will require, but since it will be years before it is completed and its results digested in works of lesser scope, it must be listed as the most authoritative source within its field.

3727. U. S. Office of Air Force History. The Army Air Forces in World War II. Prepared under the editorship of Wesley Frank Craven [and] James Lea Cate. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1948–55. 6 v. 48–3657 D790.A47

A coöperative official history, with sections or chapters by various hands under the general editorship of two professional historians. Volume 1 opens with a review of military aeronautics from 1917–1939. Volumes 2 and 3 cover the war in Europe, 4 and 5 the war in the Pacific. Volume 6 "deals with the Zone of the Interior—with the development of an effective air organization, with the forging and distribution of weapons, with the recruiting and training of airmen." The series as a whole presents an abundance of detail, at times more than could be useful to anyone but the professional student of military aeronautics.

XI

Intellectual History

A.	General Works	3728–3737
B.	Periods	3738–3749
C.	Topics	3750–3762
D.	Localities	3763–3767
E.	International Influences: General	3768–3772
F.	International Influences: By Country	3773–3780

ALTHOUGH intellectual history is the latest of the historical specialties to attain some measure of separateness and autonomy, the present selection may seem scanty in comparison with the huge bibliography appended to Curti (no. 3729). Closer examination will show that the great majority of those titles fall within a single one of the humanities, arts, or sciences, and, insofar as they have proved suitable for inclusion here, appear in the appropriate section elsewhere. The titles which follow are those, as yet comparatively few, which take a general view of American intellectual life, or deal with "culture" or "civilization" conceived primarily as an activity of mind, or attempt to arrive at the "national character," or include a certain span of the humanities, arts, and sciences, or deal with the two-way international commerce in ideas, or handle some specific topic in so large and generalized a way as to display it in a wide context of thought and so to lift it out of the more specialized discipline to which it might at first seem to be confined. Thus Davies (no. 3752) deals with phrenology as a current in American reformist ideology and popular culture rather than as a dead end in the development of scientific psychology, and Egbert and Persons (nos. 3753 and 3758) expound socialism and evolution as large trends in general American thought rather than as special doctrines of economics or biology. There can be no clear-cut dividing line in such groupings; there is much here that social, political, or literary historians should not miss, while anyone interested in the intellectual history of the United States will find many other titles to his purpose elsewhere in this Guide, and particularly in Sections VIII A and B (Historiography and General Histories), XV B, C, and D (Social History and Thought), XVII (Science), XXII (Philosophy and Psychology), XXIII C (Religious Thought and Theology), XXVIII A and B (Economic Thought), XXIX A (Political Thought), etc.

A. General Works

3728. Cohen, Morris R. American thought; a critical sketch. Edited and with a foreword by Felix S. Cohen. Glencoe, Ill., Free Press, 1954. 360 p. 54–10667 B851.C6

Cohen had for years aspired to write a major and systematic work on American thought—"not on technical philosophy but rather on the general ideas which are taken for granted in various fields"—and made a beginning in a course of lectures delivered at Chicago the year after his retirement, 1939. The notes for these lectures were in part expanded into written expositions down to 1946, the year before his death. His son and literary executor, Felix S. Cohen, put the completed or nearly completed portions into form for publication, but died before he could read the proofs. The sections on psychology, sociology, ethics, education, and literature, and a final summing-up had to be omitted. The volume as published contains substantial treatments of legal thought and general philosophy, lesser ones of economic and religious thought, and sketches of historical, scientific, economic, political, and aesthetic thought. An introductory chapter on the American tradition deals with such matters as the nature of intellectual leadership, the democratic dilution of education, and the prevalence of standardization and intolerance. Fragmentary as it is, the book is the only attempt of the kind by an original mind, and is crowded with illuminating perceptions and penetrating criticisms.

3729. Curti, Merle E. The growth of American thought. 2d ed. New York, Harper, 1951. xviii, 910 p. 51–1238 E169.1.C87 1951
Bibliography: p. 801–876.

The most complete survey of American intellectual history, which includes organized knowledge, speculation organized or traditional, as well as values, and pays special attention to related institutions such as schools and the press. All of these are so related to the whole social milieu as to constitute a social history of American thought. General tendencies rather than individual thinkers are emphasized here. The work is organized in chronological periods characterized by their leading ideas; the first third of the 19th century, for instance, is taken to have been marked by patrician leadership in thought.

3730. Fox, Dixon Ryan. Ideas in motion. New York, Appleton-Century, 1935. 126 p. 35–34879 E169.1.F76
Contents.—Civilization in transit.—Culture in knapsacks.—A synthetic principle in American social history.—Refuse ideas and their disposal.

Four essays principally concerned with the diffusion of ideas throughout the United States. "Civilization in transit" distinguishes four stages in the development of professional life in a new country, from total dependence on foreign practitioners to final autonomy.

3731. Mumford, Lewis. The golden day; a study in American literature and culture. New York, Norton [1934?] 283 p. 34–27096 E169.1.M943
Published in 1926 under title: The Golden Day; a Study in American Experience and Culture.

An interpretive historical sketch of American culture, which becomes almost a diagnosis by a healer anxious to prescribe, and which ha had a combining influence on later interpreters. The title derives from the author's characterization of the years 1830–60, when "the old culture of the seaboard settlement had its Golden Day in the mind." "This period nourished men, as no other has done in America before or since. Up to that time, the American communities were provincial; when it was over, they had lost their base."

3732. Perry, Bliss. The American mind. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1912. 248 p. 12–24430 PS31.P4
Contents.—Race, nation, and book.—The American mind.—American idealism.—Romance and reaction.—Humor and satire.—Individualism and fellowship.

A common-sense examination of American literature as a mirror of American national character. Both are dominated by American idealism, which in literature most commonly manifests itself as sentimentalism. Romance and the reaction against it, and American humor and satire, are illustrated from both literature and life. The conclusion calls for "fellowship based upon individualism, and individualism ever leading to fellowship."

3733. Perry, Ralph Barton. Puritanism and democracy. New York, Vanguard Press, 1944. 688 p. 44–41893 E169.1.P47
Identifies the two main formative elements in the American national tradition as the Puritanism embodied in the New England theocracy, and the democracy of the Enlightenment given classic expression in the Declaration of Independence. Each is analyzed as a system of ideals, and the link between them found in the individualism which gave allegiance to ideas rather than to persons and institutions. Each is appraised, and found to have a large measure of validity for our day—they "reinforce one another's truths and aggregate one another's errors," but "also serve to correct and complement one another's limitations." The whole book is an unusual synthesis of historical and philosophical interpretation. In a lesser work, Characteristically American (New York, Knopf, 1949. 162 p.), Prof. Perry uses similar ideas in attempting the "teasing and baffling task" of defining national characteristics and devotes one lecture to William James as the classic exponent of American individualism.

3734. Potter, David M. People of plenty; economic abundance and the American character. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1954.

xxvii, 219 p. (Charles R. Walgreen Foundation lectures) 54–12797 E169.1.P6

In publishing his lectures at the University of Chicago (1950), the writer widens his original theme to include a discussion of national character and the respective contributions of historians and "behavioral scientists" to the concept. Economic abundance is then advanced as a kind of case study for American national character, and pursued through a sequence of relationships. It has, for instance, "given to the concept of 'democracy' a distinctive meaning in America which sets it apart from democracy in other parts of the world."

3735. Quinn, Arthur Hobson. The soul of America, yesterday and today. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1932. 261 p. 32–12287 E175.9.Q56

Combines a brief interpretive sketch of the main stream of American history with a presentation of "the American soul" as manifested in its seven characteristic qualities of democracy, efficiency, liberality, provincialism, individuality, humor, and vision. Reflects the outlook of a sensible and well-informed, if somewhat discursive, conservative.

3736. Rourke, Constance M. The roots of American culture and other essays. Edited, with a preface, by Van Wyck Brooks. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1942. 305 p. 42–19827 E169.1.R78

Eight studies collected the year after the author's death, including "The Rise of Theatricals," "Early American Music," and "The Shakers." "Her work," says Mr. Brooks, "was mainly exploratory," but her delicate and sensitive approach to her subjects, and a type of statement at once cautious and precise, give it far more than a tentative value. Few writers on the arts have been so perceptively aware of the social milieu in which they exist, or have been able to deal so effectively with either side of the relationship.

3737. Wright, Louis B. Culture on the moving frontier. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1955. 273 p. 54–6207 E169.1.W82

"Lectures delivered on the Patten Foundation at Indiana University in the spring of 1953."

Six lectures which deal with the transmission and diffusion of the Anglo-Saxon tradition—"the tradition of English law, the English language, English literature, and British religion and customs"—in the United States. After a general treatment of the colonial period, the author concentrates upon this process in the Kentucky borderland, in the Northwest Territory, and in California during the Gold Rush age. Two concluding lectures describe the "instruments of civilization," both spiritual and secular. The latter includes English belles-lettres, historical and legal books, textbooks, academies and colleges, women's clubs, lectures and lyceums, and country newspapers.

B. Periods

3738. Commager, Henry Steele. The American mind; an interpretation of American thought and character since the 1880's. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1950. 476 p. 50–6338 E169.1.C673

Bibliography: p. [445]–467.

The author searches the writing of the last 70 years for "ideas that illuminate the American mind and ways of using ideas that illustrate the American character," drawing at will upon philosophy, religion, literature, politics, and the social sciences, but not seeking to present formal histories of any of them. His major theme is the transition from the traditional and self-confident America of the 19th century, by way of the "watershed of the'90's," to the fast-changing and troubled America of the 20th. The mass of material surveyed is not too successfully assimilated.

3739. Curti, Merle E., ed. American scholarship in the twentieth century. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. 252 p. (The Library of Congress series in American civilization) 53–5699 AZ505.C8

The editor offers an essay on "The Setting and the Problems," seeking to relate the development of the social sciences and the humanities to national and world history and viewing the present situation as a schism between absolutists and instrumentalists. Louis Wirth interprets the social sciences as a conquest of more and more ground for quantitative methods, although many areas of social life remain subject to the artist and the humanistic scholar. Historical, literary, classical, and philosophical scholarship are presented by W. Stull Holt, René Wellek, Walter R. Agard, and Arthur E. Murphy, in essays which terminate on a note of qualified optimism.

3740. Eggleston, Edward. The transit of civilization from England to America in the seventeenth century. New York, Peter Smith, 1933. 344 p. A34-396 E162.E283

First published in 1901.

CONTENTS.—Mental outfit of the early colonists.—Digression concerning medical notions at the period of settlement.—Mother English, folk-speech, folk-lore, and literature.—Weights and measures of conduct.—The tradition of education.—Land and labor in the early colonies.

Although this pioneer work has often been spoken of with condescension by latter-day scholars, it remains a remarkably concrete and intimate treatment of the popular mind in England and during the first two generations of settlement in America. It was an extraordinary achievement for the turn of the century, both in breadth of outlook and in the exploitation of a wide range of sources for a specialized purpose.

3741. Gabriel, Ralph Henry. The course of American democratic thought. 2d ed. New York, Ronald Press, 1956. xiv, 508 p. 56-6263 E169.1.G23 1956

An eternal moral order, the free individual, and the national mission of America were the three essential doctrines of American democratic faith, universally assumed after 1815. Mr. Gabriel analyzes them and sets them against the social and intellectual background of the "Middle Period," conducts them safely through the fires of sectional controversy, sees them modified and developed so as to harmonize with the evolutionary naturalism and industrial revolution which followed 1865, and leaves them facing rival systems of social belief in the post-Versailles age of disillusionment and insecurity. A diversity of thinkers have given their testimony by the way in what has been called an exceptionally perceptive attempt "to identify the central intellectual tradition of the United States."

3742. Miller, Perry. The New England mind; the seventeenth century. New York, Macmillan, 1939. 528 p. 39-22760 F7.M56

3743. Miller, Perry. The New England mind: from colony to province. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. 513 p. 53-5072 F7.M54

In the first of these volumes, the labors of a single scholar have restored the intellectual framework of a vanished, in this aspect forgotten, and much misunderstood age. To an exceptional degree, Massachusetts in 1630 was founded on the basis of a coherent system of thought, and this volume furnished the hitherto missing key to the comprehension of a whole society and its orthodoxy. The essential character of the New England mind derives from the circumstances that the founders were simultaneously Ramists in logic, Congregationalists in church policy, and "federalists" in theology—that is, they adhered to the doctrine of the Covenant of Grace worked out by William Perkins, William Ames, and John Preston, which was the only original contribution of Puritanism to its own system of ideas. From Colony to Province follows the fortunes of this orthodoxy in Church and State during the seven decades which followed the restoration of the Stuarts (1660–1730), and traces the effect of the progress of events upon that "dictatorship of the visible elect" which was the practical consequence of the Covenant theology. It is seen as a process of accelerating disruption, but one in which a very specialized, archaic, and rigid system died amazingly hard.

3744. Miller, Perry, ed. American thought: Civil War to World War I. New York, Rinehart, 1954. 345 p. (Rinehart editions, 70) 54-7243 PS682.M5

A compact and exceptionally unified anthology, presenting extracts from thirteen thinkers of the era which opened "when the mind of America was aroused and challenged by the twin invasions of Hegel and Darwin." The editor, who contributes a substantial introduction, has aimed to provide at least one explicit statement of "each of the controlling conceptions," and believes that his selections "do expound the crucial points of view by which Americans between 1865 and 1917 were ruled."

3745. Morison, Samuel Eliot. The intellectual life of colonial New England. [2d ed.] New York, New York University Press, 1956. 288 p. 56-8487 F7.M82 1956

First published in 1936 under title: The Puritan Pronaos.

"Primitive New England is a puritan pronaos to the American mind of the 19th Century, and of today"—not because of the books or new ideas produced there, but because the settlers of the 1630's took steps to avoid the intellectual degeneracy which leads to spiritual decay, and made great sacrifices to import the apparatus of civilized life and learning. These lectures describe from contemporary sources Harvard College, elementary and public grammar schools, printing and bookselling, private and public libraries, pulpit literature, histories and political pamphlets, verse, and the beginnings of science.

3746. Morris, Lloyd R. Postscript to yesterday; America: the last fifty years. New York, Random House, 1947. xxvi, 475 p.
47–11260 E741.M65
Bibliography: p. 451–465.
Aims to present the attitudes of the American people to the principal social changes that took place between 1896 and 1946, and so "to tell the story of the American mind and heart during the past 50 years." This is done, however, by a succession of highly-wrought sketches of individual figures—literary men, journalists, philosophers, jurists, and social thinkers. The main theme is the widening breach, approaching "absolute polarity," "between two sets of standards; those by which American culture judged American society, and those which governed American life as it was actually being lived."

3747. Savelle, Max. Seeds of liberty; the genesis of the American mind. New York, Knopf, 1948. xix, 587, xxxi p. illus.
48–6861 E169.1.S27 1948
"Chapter nine . . . entitled 'Of music, and of America singing,' was written by Mr. Cyclone Covey."
The author has "attempted to find every important figure who flourished in the period between 1740 and 1760 and to find out what he was thinking, and where possible, why he thought as he did." He thus surveys the whole intellectual and cultural output of the colonies during these two decades, dealing in succession with religion, Newtonian science, philosophy, economic, social, and political thought, literary expression, painting, architecture, and music. At times he strains the facts in order to find liberty and a conscious nationalism burgeoning in every sphere.

3748. Wertenbaker, Thomas Jefferson. The golden age of colonial culture. [2d ed.] New York, New York University Press, 1949. 171 p. (New York University. Stokes Foundation. Anson G. Phelps lectureship on early American history) 49–4583 E162.W48 1949
Regarding the decades just preceding the American Revolution as the full development of colonial culture, characterized by elegance, good taste, and charm in its chief centers, the author emphasizes the diverse origins and patterns to be found in these. This view is developed in brief but well-balanced sketches of the cultural life of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Annapolis, Williamsburg, and Charleston. Each sketch presents the civic background, and the local achievements in literature, architecture, music, the artistic crafts, the theater, and natural science.

3749. Wright, Louis B. The first gentlemen of Virginia; intellectual qualities of the early colonial ruling class. San Marino, Calif., Huntington Library, 1940. 373 p. 40–8029 F229.W965
While Provincial Virginia produced very little in the way of a literature, its large landowners are here presented as "an aristocracy not only of wealth and position but of intelligence and learning." Although their concern for education produced only a somewhat haphazard system of private tutoring, they owned considerable libraries, which can often be reconstructed on the basis of surviving inventories. Supplementing these with other evidence, the author has worked out detailed case-studies of the literary culture of such figures of the first two generations as William Fitzhugh, Ralph Wormeley II, Richard Lee II, Robert Beverley II, the Carters, and the Byrds.

C. Topics

3750. Beard, Charles A., and Mary R. Beard. The American spirit, a study of the idea of civilization in the United States. New York, Macmillan, 1942. 696 p. 42–50003 E169.1.B285
Bibliography: p. 675–683.
Formally a 4th volume of The Rise of American Civilization, this differs so radically from its predecessors as to warrant separate listing. Selected authors from Jefferson, Paine, and Adams to Irwin Edman and W. T. Stace are analyzed in order to elicit a composite formulation of the American idea of civilization. This embraces a conception of history as a struggle of human beings for individual and social perfection, a social principle which views all the agencies in the process of civilization as social products, and a respect for life, for "the utmost liberty compatible with the social principle," and "for the rule of universal participation in the work and benefits of society."

3751. Boas, George, ed. Romanticism in America; papers contributed to a symposium held at the Baltimore Museum of Art, May 13, 14, 15, 1940. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1940. 202 p.
40–32317 PS201.B6
Contents.—Democratic bifocalism, by E. F. Goldman.—New patterns of greatness, by Eleanor

P. Spencer.—Thomas Cole and the romantic landscape, by W. L. Nathan.—The romantic lady, by R. P. Boas.—Books for the lady reader, by Ola E. Winslow.—The romantic interior, by Roger Gilman.—Early American Gothic, by Agnes Addison.—The Beethovens of America, by Lubov Keefer.—Romantic philosophy in America, by George Boas.

Five of the articles in this symposium deal with the arts—painting, architecture, and music—but there are also contributions on literature, philosophy, and general ideas. To Romanticism, the editor believes, we owe our sense of toleration for individualism, our interest in primitive man, and our love of rural nature. It was therefore, he concludes, a philosophy much more useful to America, with its medley of races and religions, than the traditional classicism.

3752. Davies, John D. Phrenology: fad and science; a 19th-century American crusade. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1955. 203 p. (Yale historical publications. Miscellany 62)
55-9438 BF868.D3

By treating phrenology from the inside and sympathetically, instead of from the outside and contemptuously, Dr. Davies is able to reveal the logic of its development and its interrelations with other aspects of American culture. To its originator, Franz Joseph Gall, his studies sought the physiological basis of physiological phenomena, but his disciples, Johann Gaspar Spurzheim and George Combe, turned it into an optimistic secular philosophy of social progress. In this form, it won a vogue in the course of the 1820's among upper-class discussion groups in the eastern cities; it was "phrenology made practical" by Orson and Lorenzo Fowler, in the form of craniometrical character readings and aptitude diagnoses, that swept American society like wildfire, and survived into the present century. This lucidly organized monograph deals with both levels of phrenology, and their effects in American education, psychiatry, penology, hygiene, literature, medicine, and religion.

3753. Egbert, Donald Drew, and Stow Persons, eds. Socialism and American life. Princeton, N. J., Princeton University Press, 1952. 2 v. (Princeton studies in American civilization, no. 4)
51-5828 HX83.E45

Volume 2 has special title: Bibliography, Descriptive and Critical. Bibliographer: T. D. Seymour Bassett.

In one of the most elaborate contributions to American intellectual history thus far made, various hands present the European background, Christian communitarianism, secular Utopianism, the development of American Marxism, and the relations of American socialism to philosophy, economics, political theory, sociology, psychology, literature, and art. The bibliography, which runs to 510 pages, is interlarded with so elaborate a commentary as to constitute an independent work in its own right.

3754. Ekirch, Arthur A. The idea of progress in America, 1815–1860. New York, Columbia University Press, 1944. 305 p. (Columbia University. Faculty of Political Science. Studies in history, economics and public law, no. 511)
H31.C7, no. 511
A44-5611 E338.E35 1944a

Contemporary magazines and academic addresses have been ransacked in order to portray the general American faith in progress during this important period, and to analyze the idea in terms of the interests and groups which it served or promised to serve, such as the early labor movement, or "the rising class of industrial capitalists." Attention is also given to the defenders of social stability, who argued that an inevitable steady progress should not be jeopardized by rash attempts to speed its course. The South constituted a special problem to believers in progress, whether sympathetic or hostile to slavery. Programs for social renovation, and systematic expositions of the idea of progress receive separate chapters.

3755. Hofstadter, Richard. Social Darwinism in American thought, 1860–1915. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1944. 191 p.
44-8078 HM22.U5H6

"Prepared and published under the direction of the American Historical Association from the income of the Albert J. Beveridge memorial fund."

Bibliography: p. 177–186.

An incisive exposition, from a harshly critical viewpoint, of the reception of the doctrine of natural selection in America, its application to social phenomena, and its use during three decades to justify "a vision of competition as a thing good in itself." It was not until the mid-90's that "the American middle class shrank from the principle it had glorified," and listened to the critics who were destroying the "flimsy logical structure" of Herbert Spencer's sociology. But Social Darwinism had its second flowering in a nationalist or racist form, and down to World War I was used to support overseas expansion.

3756. Jones, Howard Mumford. The pursuit of happiness. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. 168 p. (The William W. Cook Foundation lectures, 7)
52-12265 BJ1481.J65

A most unusual book which might be called a case-study in American semantics. The well-known phrase of the Declaration of Independence is traced to its origin in the mind of George Mason and the Virginia Bill of Rights, and then pursued to a multitude of inferences and consequences in American life and thought since 1776. It is "the pursuing and securing of happiness and safety as a fundamental constitutional element in our society" which is in question, and the appearance of the idea in a sequence of judicial decisions is noted. The book closes with the 20th-century preoccupation with the "techniques of happiness"; in the shift of meanings "happiness becomes a problem in expertise."

3757. Parry, Albert. Garrets and pretenders; a history of bohemianism in America. New York, Covici, Friede, 1933. 383 p.
33–27114 PS138.P3

Bibliography: p. 359–369.

Henri Murger's vision of the aesthetic life in Paris has received the compliment of imitation in nearly every civilized nation, although "the French lightheartedness became somewhat rough and uncivilized in some of its American imitations." Mr. Parry follows the American phenomena from Pfaff's saloon on Broadway in 1854, to the Bohemian Club of San Francisco, and back to Greenwich Village. There is no way, he warns, of isolating the poseurs from the sincere "gypsies of art."

3758. Persons, Stow, ed. Evolutionary thought in America. [Edited for the special program in American civilization at Princeton University] New Haven, Yale University Press, 1950. 462 p.
50–10345 B818.P4

Contents.—The theory of evolution: The rise and impact of evolutionary ideas, by R. Scoon. Evolution in its relation to the philosophy of nature and the philosophy of culture, by F. S. C. Northrop. The genetic nature of differences among men, by T. Dobzhansky. Evolutionary thought in America: Evolution and American sociology, by R. E. L. Faris. The impact of the idea of evolution on the American political and constitutional tradition, by E. S. Corwin. Evolutionism inAmerican economics, 1800–1946, by J. J. Spengler. The influence of evolutionary theory upon American psychological thought, by E. G. Boring. Naturalism in American literature, by M. Cowley. The idea of organic expression and American architecture, by D. D. Egbert. Evolution and moral theory in America, by W. F. Quillian, Jr. Evolution and theology in America, by S. Persons.

The second published symposium to originate from the Princeton Program of Study in American Civilization, and organized as a continuation of the first (no. 3768) in that it presents an intellectual stimulus from Western Europe, the context in which the new ideas asserted themselves, and the compromises and adjustments which resulted. The first three chapters are intended to provide the general background for the specifically American material which follows.

3759. Smith, Henry Nash. Virgin land; the American West as symbol and myth. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1950. 305 p.
50–6230 F591.S65 1950

The idea of the pull of a vacant continent beyond the frontier, drawing population westward and thereby giving American civilization its characteristic stamp, is to be found in Benjamin Franklin, and assumed a multitude of forms in literature and social thought before it received its classic statement from Frederick J. Turner in 1893. The author pursues the theme even into the dime novels which flourished after 1860, but concludes by criticizing it as the persistence of an agrarian tradition which took no account of the industrial revolution, and which, in the light of World War I, even Turner found inadequate.

3760. Weinberg, Albert K. Manifest destiny; a study of nationalist expansionism in American history. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1935. 559 p.
35–9403 E179.5.W45

"American expansionism is viewed here as an 'ism' or ideology, exemplified but by no means exhausted by the ideas of manifest destiny. The ideology of American expansion is its motley body of justificatory doctrines . . . Taking the liberties necessary to an analytic history of ideas, this work considers separately the leading expansionist doctrines in the order in which successive annexationist movements brought each into focus, and with special reference to the issue or period in which it figured as chief, even if by no means sole, ideological determinant." The content extends from Thomas Paine's "natural right" to Woodrow Wilson's "world leadership."

3761. White, Edward A. Science and religion in American thought; the impact of naturalism. Stanford, Stanford University Press, 1952. 117 p. (Stanford University publications. University ser. History, economics, and political science, v. 8)
52–5982 BL245.W63
AS36.L54, v. 8

The relationship of science and religion as viewed by representative thinkers "during the two generations in which naturalistic presuppositions were dominant in American thought." The author's viewpoint is that of Christian philosophy, but is implicit rather than explicit in his critical passages. The thinkers considered are John W. Draper, Andrew S. White, John Fiske, William James, David Starr Jordan, and John Dewey, and there is a concluding section on the fundamentalist controversy of the 1920's.

3762. Wyllie, Irvin G. The self-made man in America; the myth of rags to riches. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1954. 210 p. 54–10602 E169.1.W93

"A note on sources": p. 197–205.

Concerned "not with business history but intellectual history, and specifically with the realm of ideas about self-help under American conditions of opportunity," this book supplies a long-needed analysis of the American gospel of success conceived as money-making. Although anticipations may be found from early colonial times, the gospel attained its fullest development and influence in the period after 1865, and although much battered in the years before 1917, enjoyed a noteworthy rejuvenation during the prosperous 1920's. The author has no difficulty in showing that it has always been a matter of simple faith, since the great majority of men at the top have always started a long way from the bottom.

D. Localities

3763. Bowes, Frederick P. The culture of early Charleston. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1942. 156 p. A43–857 F279.C4B6

Revision of thesis (Ph.D.)—Princeton University, 1941.

Bibliography: p. [137]–145.

A Princeton dissertation which covers the first century of Charleston, from its foundation in 1670 to the Revolution. Religious life, education, books, libraries and publications, science, and literature and the arts are successively examined. This was the brightest period of the city's culture, for after the Revolution, "without the fertilizing contact of English culture, the intellectual life of Charleston became increasingly insular," absorbed in politics and the law.

3764. Bridenbaugh, Carl, and Jessica Bridenbaugh. Rebels and gentlemen; Philadelphia in the age of Franklin. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1942. 393 p. 42–22812 F158.4.B6

"Bibliographical note": p. 373–379.

Presents 18th-century Philadelphia as the American port of entry for the Enlightenment—secular, humanistic, and bearing democratic and individualistic implications. Philadelphia, while becoming the second city of the British empire, became also the first example in the Western World of a culture resting on a broadly popular base. Much social history is presented, but the emphasis is on education, printing and authorship, the fine arts and the art of living, the professions, and the rise of a scientific outlook.

3765. Davenport, Francis Garvin. Cultural life in Nashville on the eve of the Civil War. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1941. 232 p. 41–11227 F444.N2D33

Bibliography: p. 211–224.

During the quarter-century preceding 1850, "the influence of the frontier mind as a negative force" lay heavy upon Nashville, but the missionary work of Philip Lindsley, president of the university, and his professor of sciences, the South-born Gerard Troost, was preparing for a far-reaching change. Its manifestation in the pre-Civil War decade, in education, medicine, religion, music and the theater, libraries and publishing, and in architecture, forms the subject of this book. By 1860, the author thinks, Nashville had earned its title, "the Athens of the South."

3766. Eaton, Clement. Freedom of thought in the old South. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1940. 343 p. 40–5232 F209.E15

"This study of the cultural history of the South between 1790 and 1860, in which freedom of thought and speech is the central theme, is offered as a case history in the record of human liberty and intolerance." The liberal culture of the older Southern aristocracy disintegrated soon after the death of Jefferson in 1826. A thorough-going conservative reaction took its place, and set up taboos which put slavery and religious orthodoxy beyond the reach of criticism. There resulted an intellectual cordon sanitaire which sealed the South from Northern "isms."

3767. Miller, James M. The genesis of western culture, the upper Ohio Valley, 1800–1825. Columbus, Ohio State Archaeological and Historical Society, 1938. 194 p. ([Ohio State Archaeological and Historical Society] Ohio historical collections, v. 9) 39–715 F518.M55 F486.O526, v. 9

Bibliography: p. 165–176.

Covers the period of stable settlement, "during which the permanent centers of population were established and a permanent culture began to assert itself," and concentrates upon the principal towns: Pittsburgh, Marietta, Cincinnati, and Lexington. The activity of the several professions—ministers, lawyers, physicians, teachers, and journalists—is emphasized. "Backwoods ignorance contests with the forces of education far superior to the demands of frontier life, and the utter rout of the muscular powers of darkness can be explained only by the tremendous vitality of the frail forces of light."

E. International Influences: General

3768. Bowers, David F., ed. Foreign influences in American life; essays and critical bibliographies. Edited for the Princeton Program of Study in American Civilization. Princeton, N. J., Princeton University Press, 1944. 254 p. [Princeton studies in American civilization] A44–4627 E169.1.B782

"Critical bibliographies": p. [173]–254.

A considerably more heterogeneous and uneven collection than the subsequent products of the Princeton Program of Study in American Civilization, but containing some material not easily found elsewhere. The editor, whose early death was a loss to American studies, contributed a theoretical discussion of "social and cultural impact," and a study of the effect of Hegel and Darwin upon the American tradition. Donald D. Egbert and R. P. Blackmur take large views, respectively, of foreign influences in American fine art, and of the American literary expatriates. The critical bibliographies are extensive, partially so because some individual titles are frequently repeated.

3769. Koht, Halvdan. The American spirit in Europe, a survey of transatlantic influences. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1949. 289 p. (Publications of the American Institute, University of Oslo, in cooperation with the Dept. of American Civilization, Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, University of Pennsylvania)

49–8752 E183.7.K64

"Selected bibliography": p. 279–280.

Offered as an avowedly incomplete picture, in the hope that a preliminary survey of the whole field will prove useful and provoke further studies. Together with the European repercussions of the American Revolution and the Civil War, and the emergence of America as a world power, Dr. Koht treats a variety of nonpolitical influences: the reform movements of the earlier 19th century (peace, temperance, penology, etc.), invention, economic organization, technology, scientific cooperation, etc. The European vision of America also receives attention: the land of opportunity, and of the strange contrast between American idealism and the commercial spirit.

3770. Kraus, Michael. The Atlantic civilization: eighteenth-century origins. Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1949. 334 p.

49–50435 CB411.K7

"Published for the American Historical Association."

Bibliography: p. 315–325.

In this formidable array of cultural data, based on a mass of monographic material as well as original sources both published and in manuscript, the author is concerned to stress the mutuality of the process: if America was the recipient in medicine and kindred fields, she was also giving greater substance to such concepts as political and religious freedom, economic opportunity, and humanitarian ideals, and hurrying the Western World to the realization of them. If Europe is still the biggest fact in North America, "North America has long been the biggest fact in Europe."

3771. Spoerri, William T. The old world and the new; a synopsis of current European views on American civilization. Zürich und Leipzig, M. Niehan, 1937. 236 p. (Schweizer anglistische Arbeiten; Swiss studies in English, 3. bd.)

39–11768 E169.1.S75

Issued also as an inaugural dissertation, Zürich.

Bibliography: p. 233–236.

This Swiss writer had spent five years in the United States working his way through college and teaching, but, as he says, had been back in Europe long enough to de-Americanize himself without relapsing into the anti-American attitude common among intellectuals. He reviews the English, French, and German literature on America, 1918–36, in an effort to explain the reactions, usually both adverse and violent, of some eminent observers. His own contribution consists largely of a classification—scientific investigators, reports, prophets of doom, literary critics, contrast critics, social reformers, and satirists—and of summaries with extracts of individual writers; but in a brief conclusion he asserts that a horror of reality and hunger for romance constitute the key to the American character.

3772. Visson, André. As others see us. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1948. 252 p.
48–9390 E169.1.V53

A French intellectual who has become an American citizen is able to present, because he formerly entertained them, the attitudes toward the United States of the intellectuals of western Europe. They arise, he is convinced, out of profound misunderstandings, most of them the result of ignorance, prejudice, envy, or fear. At the bottom of these he finds the "Athenian complex," insisting upon a cultural and intellectual superiority when political and economic leadership have been lost, and upon a privileged social position for the intellectuals themselves.

F. International Influences: By Country

France

3773. Faÿ, Bernard. The revolutionary spirit in France and America; a study of moral and intellectual relations between France and the United States at the end of the eighteenth century. Translated by Ramon Guthrie. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1927. 613 p. 27–23830 DC138.F32

Bibliography: p. 575–600.

Originally a dissertation based on a very thorough study of all French publications concerning America during the last three decades of the 18th century, this work is considerably more successful as a presentation of authors and books than as an interpretation of national states of mind. The author believes that "from 1775 to 1800 there reigned an impassioned intellectual union between" France and America, symbolized by the reception of James Monroe by the National Convention in 1794, and that it was brought to an end only by the military dictatorship of Bonaparte. The critical bibliography is available only in the original French edition: Bibliographie critique des ouvrages français relatifs aux Etats-Unis, 1770–1800 (Paris, Champion, 1925. 108 p.).

3774. Jones, Howard Mumford. America and French culture, 1750–1848. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1927. 615 p.
28–2551 E183.8.F8J7

Bibliography: p. 573–602.

An ambitious pioneer study which tries to arrive at "the general American attitude toward things French" during an important century, as a prolegomenon to a survey of the American reception of French literature. The author first offers an analysis of American culture, which he sums up in the cosmopolitan spirit, the spirit of the frontier, and the middle class spirit—together with the urban spirit which was just emerging in 1848. He deals successively with French migration, the French language, French art, religion, and philosophical and educational influences. "On the whole," he concludes, "it is in the departments of manners and fashions that the French have exerted their most notable influences in shaping American culture. In intellectual matters they have had vogue rather than influence."

3775. White, Elizabeth Brett. American opinion of France from Lafayette to Poincaré. New York, Knopf, 1927. 346 p.
27–12393 E183.8.F8W5

In spite of the subtitle, the text begins with the War of 1812, and reaches the discussion of the French debt question in 1926. The emphasis is upon public affairs, the successive regimes which have governed France, and phases of French policy. American opinion is derived from diplomatic correspondence, congressional debates, the utterances of prominent Americans, magazine articles, and especially newspaper editorials. Chapter 8, "Signs and Portents," is concerned with educational, literary, and other intellectual interrelations.

Germany

3776. Long, Orie William. Literary pioneers; early American explorers of European culture. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1935. 267 p. 35–18097 PS201.L6

Essays on six New Englanders—George Ticknor, Edward Everett, Joseph G. Cogswell, George Bancroft, H. W. Longfellow, and J. L. Motley—who studied in Germany between 1815 and 1835. Most of them matriculated at the University of Göttingen, and the earlier arrivals sought out the venerable Goethe. The author's commentary is somewhat naïve, but the abundant extracts from his subjects' own letters and other writings make this a useful source for German-American intellectual relations.

Great Britain

3777. Heindel, Richard Heathcote. The American impact on Great Britain, 1898–1914; a study of the United States in world history. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1940. 439 p. 40–31371 E183.8.G7H5

By "impact" the author means British knowledge of or interest in the United States, opinions and attitudes about it, and the imitation or modification of the American example. The year 1898, when the United States suddenly became an imperial power, was the annus mirabilis in which it was demonstrated that America had become an important factor in British life. Anglo-American intellectual relationships are examined in the fields of diplomacy, business, education, literature, entertainment, and social phenomena.

3778. Lillibridge, George D. Beacon of freedom; the impact of American democracy upon Great Britain, 1830–1870. [Philadelphia] University of Pennsylvania Press, 1954, ©1955. 159 p. 54–11541 E183.8.G7L54

"Bibliographical note": p. 151–157.

This dissertation by a pupil of Merle E. Curti examines the part played by the idea of American democracy in the strenuous class struggle in which the whole of British society was involved during the central four decades of the 19th century. Radical opinion is gleaned from newspapers, and middle-class liberal and conservative opinion from books, and from reviews such as the Westminster and the Quarterly. In the latter part of the period, radicals accepted the liberal leadership of John Bright and Richard Cobden, frequently called by their opponents "the two members for the United States." The author draws the moral that a nation's democratic idea is more readily exportable than its "Democratic movement," conceived as "attitudes, behaviors, institutions, and techniques."

Italy

3779. Torrielli, Andrew J. Italian opinion on America as revealed by Italian travelers, 1850–1900. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1941. 330 p. (Harvard studies in Romance languages, v. 15) A41–3270 E169.1.T66 1941

Based on thesis (Ph. D.)—Harvard University, 1940.

Exploits a considerable, and otherwise practically unused, body of publications, in order to present "not merely another work on American social history, but rather an examination of average Italian sentiment on problems of continuous moment." These problems, as illustrated by the American example, are the Negro question, democracy, education, the press, and the status of women, and of the arts. The author does very little summarizing, but gives his opinion that the Italian travelers in America had fewer axes to grind than many others.

Japan

3780. Schwantes, Robert S. Japanese and Americans; a century of cultural relations. New York, Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper, 1955. 380 p. 55–7220 E183.8.J3S35

"Bibliographical essay": p. 333–372.

By culture, Mr. Schwantes means "the whole pattern of life," and by cultural relations "all the ways in which peoples learn about each other." Those here described have been "unbalanced": "Americans have played a much greater part in the changes that have occurred in Japan over the past century than Japanese have in the equally great changes here. Japanese have been, on the whole, more interested in America than Americans have been in them." This largely one-way influence is traced in Japanese economic development, in political institutions and thought, and in education. Channels of communication are identified in the exchange of teachers, students, and cultural materials, and in the influence of American missionaries. Since the author is seeking lessons of value for present-day American foreign policy, broadly conceived, he naturally emphasizes the most recent period.

677676 O–63–31

XII

Local History: Regions, States, and Cities

A.	General Works, including series	3781–4025
B.	New England: General	4026–4031
C.	New England: Local	4032–4042
D.	The Middle Atlantic States	4043–4065
E.	The South: General	4066–4084
F.	The South Atlantic States: Local	4085–4096
G.	The Old Southwest: General	4097–4098
H.	The Old Southwest: Local	4099–4108
I.	The Old Northwest: General	4109–4117
J.	The Old Northwest: Local	4118–4144
K.	The Far West	4145–4150
L.	The Great Plains: General	4151–4164
M.	The Great Plains: Local	4165–4171
N.	The Rocky Mountain Region: General	4172–4177
O.	The Rocky Mountain Region: Local	4178–4185
P.	The Far Southwest: General	4186–4191
Q.	The Far Southwest: Local	4192–4199
R.	California	4200–4211
S.	The Pacific Northwest: General	4212–4214
T.	The Pacific Northwest: Local	4215–4217
U.	Overseas Possessions	4218–4222

THE concern of the present Guide is American civilization of today and the three and a half centuries of history which have led to it. From such a work local history and description, the literature concerned with the lesser units into which the nation is divided, and most of which preserve a degree of autonomy and spontaneity within it, could hardly be excluded. But obviously the problem of selecting, from a local literature which has been multiplying along with its subject matter, some 440 titles as best representative of the whole for the generalized purpose of the Guide, presents special difficulties. The result is a compromise which may please few, but, we trust, will not offend many.

The subtitle of the chapter indicates the three principal types of book which compose it, and points to two large classes deliberately excluded. County histories are legion and were an article of systematic manufacture in the last decades of the 19th century. But the county is in origin an artificial unit, and while it bulked large in the older, rural America, it has receded in importance to the average American of today. There are, furthermore, no fewer than 3,049 counties in the United States, and the choice of a handful could easily seem invidious. Town histories are equally missing, save for one of a New England community both unique and representative, Concord (no. 4037), and for the same reasons of multiplicity and diminishing significance. On the other hand, we have included individual treatments of some national parks and monuments which nearly everybody wants to visit, and very many do.

The subdivision of the chapter in the above table takes account of historical as well as geographical factors, and is merely for convenience in the arrangement of titles. States are placed following the region to which they are assigned, in a geographical order, and cities or other units are placed following their states, in an alphabetical order. Some states are variously allied, and we have assigned them to regions quite arbitrarily and without prejudice—Oklahoma to the Great Plains rather than to the Far Southwest, Idaho to the Pacific Northwest rather than to the Mountain States, and so forth. Here is one anomaly: the regional books in Section E, The South, usually span Sections F, G, H, and part of P and Q, where we have put Texas.

We have meant to slight no region, state, or city. However, very few writers have dealt with the Middle Atlantic States as a past or present unity, and the one small volume below that does so, appears principally for the reason that it does. Nor do we have 48 state histories to match the 48 states, or a volume for each of the Nation's largest cities. This is because we have been looking for books which will have significance, not merely for the local patriot or antiquary, or for the historian looking for raw material, but for people who want to fit the area into their general picture of the United States, and are interested both in what gives it its distinctive character, and in what it has contributed to the character of the Nation as a whole.

The older state and local histories were usually guided by an antiquarian interest which led to large enumerations of persons, sites, and discrete events. They tended to concentrate upon origins and crucial episodes, and passed up the problem of representing latter-day complexities of development. With some distinguished exceptions, our selections are works of comparatively recent date.

Many of them are works of original research by professional historians, who have learned that sound local history requires just as great an intellectual effort as do other varieties, and aim to make their work significant by disclosing the larger historical currents as they assume a concrete shape in a particular community. Some states emphasize their own history in their schools and universities, which may result in compact and well-ordered textbooks whose usefulness is not limited to the classroom. Many of our titles, however, are of non-academic origin and consist of attempts to arrive at the genius loci by general writers or journalists. Some are products of the wave of "regional writing" which began rolling in the 1930's. They may lack the precision of scholarly history and geography, and some of their materials may require to be taken with a grain of salt, but when honestly done they make a distinct contribution which the others usually do not attempt, and they are regularly written to be read, while the academic product sometimes seems to be meant to discourage readers. Areas differ conspicuously in their productivity of modern works of either type. Why, for example, should Oklahoma be a veritable cornucopia of books of State and regional interest, while Missouri, immediately to the northwest, turns out practically nothing?

The greatest tide in recent America, which has run for over a century but seems only to grow in strength, is the tide of urbanization. It can hardly be said that historians and geographers, as distinct from the sociologists who view it as material for abstractions, have kept abreast of it. In America there are many great urban universities whose graduate schools produce learned monographs on ancient Greek pottery or the foreign policy of Bismarck, but never dream of searching for order and significance in the prodigious developments which have been going on under their noses. And there are many great cities unrepresented here by any history or even any title, because there is no up-to-date and comprehensive history to be had.

General works on the Westward movement and the frontier are contained in Chapter VIII, General History, and the more local ones on our successive Wests in this one, but the separation cannot be entirely clear-cut. The same kind of separation has been attempted between works on the slavery system and the crisis of 1854–1876, assigned to Chapter VIII, and works on the South as a region, assigned here, but again it cannot be effected with completely satisfactory results.

A. General Works, Including Series

3781. Davidson, Donald. The attack on leviathan; regionalism and nationalism in the United States. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1938. 368 p. 38–9614 E169.1.D34

A collection of essays and studies, many of which appeared in periodicals from 1932 to 1937, reviewing the development of regionalism or sectionalism in the United States as interpreted by various authors. The greatest hindrance to regionalism, the author thinks, is increasingly powerful national government, the leviathan that attempts to impose a uniform pattern on the regions. The main thesis is discussed from the standpoints of history, geography, politics, culture, economics, and social conditions. Although Mr. Davidson defends the South as a region, upholding its interests and tradition, he recognizes that the hope of a democratic America lies in the fusion of regionalism with nationalism. "The recognition of sectional diversity," he says, "is the true safeguard of national unity. The danger to national unity comes when diversity is ignorantly or willfully put aside as a thing of no importance, or when it is assumed that no diversity exists."

3782. Look. Look at the U. S. A., by the editors of Look. With regional introductions by Mary Ellen Chase [and others] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1955. 522 p. 55–8101 E169.L842

An abridged and reworked version of a pictorial guide to the regions of the United States originally published in 9 volumes in 1946–48. The photographs, most of which occupy an entire page, are original, significant, and handsomely reproduced. The regional introductions are by well-known writers: Mary Ellen Chase on New England, Paul Horgan on the Southwest, Frederick L. Allen on New York City, Gerald W. Johnson on the Central Northeast, Louis Bromfield on the Midwest, David L. Cohn on the South, Wallace Stegner on the Central Northwest, and Joseph Henry Jackson. Many more fine photographs and vastly more detailed local information will be found in the original 9-volume edition, the sectional arrangement of which is the same as here.

3783. Odum, Howard W., and Harry Estill Moore. American regionalism; a cultural historical approach to national integration. New York, Holt, 1938. 693 p. illus. 38–15648 E179.5.O43

In contrast to sectionalism (see Turner below), "regionalism assumes . . . a great national unity and integrated culture in which each region exists . . . solely as a component unit in the whole." In Part I, the authors consider our natural regions, our cultural regions, and our service regions (governmental and non-governmental); in Part II, the historical and theoretical aspects of regionalism as they have been explored by social scientists, and in Part III the development of the six major regions—the Middle States, the Northeast, the Southeast, the Far West, the Northwest and the Southwest—into a great nation, "in whose continuity and unity of development, through a fine balance of historical, cultural, and geographic factors, must be found the hope of American democracy and, according to many observers, Western civilization." The authors support their thesis with quotations from numerous sources.

3784. Turner, Frederick Jackson. The significance of sections in American history; with an introd. by Max Farrand. New York, Holt, 1932. 347 p. 33–1864 E178.T96

Avery O. Craven and Max Farrand collected and edited these twelve scattered essays by the late Professor Turner relating to the sections of the United States: New England, the Middle States, the Southeast, the Southwest, the Middle West, the Great Plains, the Mountain States, and the Pacific Coast. He ascribes the individual characteristics of the sections to variations in physiography, the pressure of population, political attitudes towards industrial interests, and the economic, social, and religious aspirations of the people. He points out the necessity of shaping national action to "the fact of a vast and varied Union of unlike sections." "We have furnished to Europe," Professor Turner says, "the example of a continental federation of sections over an area equal to Europe itself, and by substituting discussion and concession and compromised legislation for force, we have shown the possibility of international political parties, international legislative bodies, and international peace."

3785. Wisconsin. University. Regionalism in America. Edited by Merrill Jensen; with a foreword by Felix Frankfurter. Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1951. xvi, 425 p. 51–6901 E179.5.W56

Includes bibliographies.

The papers in this volume were delivered at a symposium on American regionalism sponsored by the Committee on the Study of American Civilization of the University of Wisconsin and held in April 1949. Men from various academic fields and from public life, all interested in regionalism as a field of research or of administration, give their concepts of regions and regionalism. Merrill Jensen, Rupert B. Vance, William B. Hesseltine, John F. Kienitz, John M. Gaus, Merle Curti, and other distinguished scholars and administrators have contributed papers to discussions of the development of regionalism since the 18th century, three historic regions of the United States, the place of regionalism in American culture, and regionalism as a practical concept in the development and administration of Federal Government programs. Howard W. Odum says in the final paper: "It was in the regional quantity and quality of this continent that the first plantings and the later fruits of American democracy set the incidence of the American way of life as distinctive from that which had gone before."

AMERICAN GUIDE SERIES

3786. American guide series. [Compiled and written by the Federal Writers' Project and the Writers' Program] 1936–43. 153 v.
New editions and reprints, 1939–56.

The American Guide Series has been described as "our first real series of handbooks for the nation." It was begun soon after the organization of the Federal Writers' Project in the Works Progress Administration (later changed to Works Projects Administration) in the summer of 1935, to provide work-relief for several thousand writers throughout the 48 states. In the summer of 1939 the Federal Writers' Project was superseded by the Writers' Program with the initiative placed in the hands of public sponsoring bodies in each of the states. The following entries represent the latest available editions of each of the state, territorial, and town guides, with the date of the earliest edition and the latest printing given in a note whenever they differ from the imprint date of the latest issue for which a printed card is available. Each of the state guides is arranged according to the major highways, and contains descriptions of towns, waterways, recreational areas, and points of historical interest. All are illustrated with photographs and maps. The new editions, in most instances, bring up to date the maps and tours, population figures, college enrollment, and other developments in the states' economic and cultural progress. The Assistant Commissioner of the WPA in 1941 said that "the publication of the Writers' Program constitutes a unique example of cooperation between the community and the Nation with the aim of preserving the story of our American heritage in such form that it may become part of the consciousness of the widest possible number of Americans." The guides to several travel routes that cut across regional boundaries have been listed first. The series is here arranged by geographical regions, with the state guide first, and the city, town, or other area guides of that state following alphabetically, by locality.

TRAVEL ROUTES

3787. The Intracoastal Waterway, Norfolk to Key West. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1937. 143 p. 37–26563 TC623.4.F4

3788. The Ocean Highway; New Brunswick, New Jersey to Jacksonville, Florida. New York, Modern Age Books, 1938. xxix, 244 p. 38–12399 F106.F44

3789. The Oregon Trail; the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean. New York, Hastings House, 1939. 244 p. 39–27221 F880.F28
Bibliography: p. 228–230.

3790. U. S. One, Maine to Florida. New York, Modern Age Books, 1938. xxvii, 344 p. 38–27179 F106.F45 GV1024.F32

NEW ENGLAND

3791. Here's New England! A guide to vacationland. Sponsored by the New England Council, Boston. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1939. 122 p. 39–15700 F9.F44

3792. Maine, a guide 'down east.' Sponsored by the Maine Development Commission. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1937. xxvi, 476 p. illus. 38–30 F25.F44
"Selected reading list": p. [454]–458.

3793. Augusta-Hallowell on the Kennebec. Sponsored by the Augusta-Hallowell Chamber of Commerce. [Augusta] Kennebec Journal Print Shop, 1940. 123 p. 41–52359 F29.A9W8
Bibliography: p. [108]

3794. Maine's capitol. Sponsored by the Department of Education of the State of Maine. Augusta, Kennebec Journal Print Shop, 1939. 60 p. 43–5471 F29.A9F4

3795. Portland city guide. Sponsored by the city of Portland. [Portland] Forest City Print. Co., 1940. xiv, 337 p. 40–30610 F29.P9W8
"Selected reading list": p. [317]–318.

3796. New Hampshire, a guide to the Granite State. Francis P. Murphy, Governor of New Hampshire, co-operating sponsor. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1938. xxix, 559 p. illus. 36–6192 F39.F43
"Selected reading list": p. 539–540.

3797. Vermont; a guide to the Green Mountain State. Sponsored by the Vermont State Planning Board. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1937. xxi, 392 p. 37–28648 F54.F45
Bibliography: p. [372]–379.

3798. Massachusetts; a guide to its places and people. Frederick W. Cook, secretary of the Commonwealth, cooperating sponsor. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1937. xxxvi, 675 p.
37–28502 F70.F295
"Fifty books about Massachusetts": p. [637]–638.

3799. The Berkshire hills. Sponsored by the Berkshire Hills Conference. New York, Funk & Wagnalls, 1939. xiv, 368 p.
39–27644 F72.B5F37
"Berkshire sports, winter and summer": p. [277]–360.

3800. Boston looks seaward, the story of the port, 1630–1940. Sponsored by Boston Port Authority. Boston, B. Humphries, 1941. 316 p.
42–9007 F73.63.W8

3801. Cape Cod pilot, by Jeremiah Digges [pseud. of Josef Berger] Sponsored by Poor Richard Associates. Provincetown, Mass., Modern Pilgrim Press, 1937. 403 p. 37–12550 F72.C3B39
Bibliography: p. 390–391.

3802. Springfield, Massachusetts. Springfield [Mass.] 1941. 84 p.
41–8764 F74.S8W975

3803. State forests and parks of Massachusetts, a recreation guide. Boston, Dept. of Conservation, 1941. 58 p. 42–36810 SD428.A2M47

3804. Rhode Island, a guide to the smallest State. Sponsored by Louis W. Cappelli, secretary of state. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1937. xxvi, 500 p. 37–28463 F79.F38
Bibliography: p. [475]–479.

3805. Connecticut; a guide to its roads, lore, and people. Sponsored by Wilbur L. Cross. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1938. xxxiii, 593 p.
38–27339 F100.F45
"Selected reading list": p. [562]–565.

MIDDLE ATLANTIC STATES

3806. New York; a guide to the Empire State. Sponsored by New York State Historical Association. New York, Oxford University Press, 1946. xxxi, 782 (i. e. 798) p.
46–5765 F124.W89 1946
First published in 1940. Second printing, with corrections, 1946. Fourth printing, 1949.
Bibliography: p. 729–739.

3807. Albany—past and present. [Albany? 1938?] 27 p. 38–26487 F129.A3F43

3808. New York City guide. [Rev. ed.] New York, Random House, ©1939. xx, 680 p.
56–51521 F128.5.F376 1939b
First published in 1939.
Companion volume to New York Panorama.
"Books about New York": p. 627–635.

3809. New York panorama; a comprehensive view of the metropolis, presented in a series of articles. New York, Random House, 1938. 526 p.
38–27618 F128.5.F38
"The present volume, although complete in itself . . . constitutes in effect the general introduction to the New York City Guide."

3810. Rochester and Monroe County. Rochester, N. Y., Scrantom's, 1937. 460 p.
38–1950 F129.R7F43
Half-title: A history and guide.
Bibliography: p. 443–447.

3811. New Jersey, a guide to its present and past. Sponsored by the Public Library of Newark and the New Jersey Guild Associates. New York, Viking Press, 1939. xxxii, 735 p.
39–20654 F139.F45
Bibliography: p. 697–704.

3812. The story of Dunellen. [Dunellen, N. J., Art Color Print. Co.] 1937. 111 p.
38–26489 F144.D9F4
Bibliography: p. 108.

3813. Livingston; the story of a community. [Caldwell, N. J., Printed by the Progress Pub. Co.] 1939. 166 p. 41–2862 F144.L5W7

3814. Entertaining a nation; the career of Long Branch. [Bayonne, N. J., Jersey Print. Co.] 1940. xiv, 211 p. 40–27599 F144.L847
Bibliography: p. 198–200.

3815. Monroe Township, Middlesex County, New Jersey, 1838–1938. [New Brunswick, N. J.] 1938. 140 p. 39–16121 F144.M68F4
Bibliography: p. 134–135.

3816. Pennsylvania: a guide to the Keystone State. Co-sponsored by the Pennsylvania Historical Commission and the University of Pennsylvania. New York, Oxford University Press, 1940. xxxii, 660 p. 40–28760 F154.W94
Fourth printing, 1950.
"A guide to further reading": p. 623–629.

3817. Story of old Allegheny city, sponsored by Hon. Cornelius D. Scully. Pittsburgh, Pa., Allegheny Centennial Committee, 1941. xviii, 236 p. 41–16289 F159.A4W7
Bibliography: p. 227.
Has no map.

3818. Erie; a guide to the city and county. Sponsored by Charlie R. Barber, mayor of Erie. [Philadelphia] William Penn Association of Philadelphia, 1938. 133 p. 39–1898 F157.E6F4
Bibliography: p. 128.

3819. The Harmony Society in Pennsylvania. [Philadelphia] William Penn Association of Philadelphia, 1937. 38 p. 38–4970 HX656.N5F4
This is the "most complete and authentic" history to date of a practical experiment in communal living for a small group of people who settled in Butler County, Pennsylvania, 25 miles northwest of Pittsburgh, in 1804.

3820. The Horse-Shoe Trail, sponsored by Henry N. Woolman, president, Horse-Shoe Trail Club, Philadelphia, Pa. 2d ed. [Philadelphia] William Penn Association of Philadelphia, 1939. 32 p. 40–3617 F154.F45 1939
First published in 1938.

3821. Philadelphia, a guide to the Nation's birthplace. Sponsored by the Pennsylvania Historical Commission. [Philadelphia] William Penn Association of Philadelphia, 1937. xxxii, 704 p. 38–23204 F158.5.F35
Bibliography: p. 690–691.

3822. Delaware, a guide to the first State. New and rev. ed. by Jeannette Eckman; edited by Henry G. Alsberg. New York, Hastings House, 1955. xxvi, 562 p. 55–14794 F164.F45 1955
First published in 1938.
Bibliography: p. [530]–538.

3823. New Castle on the Delaware. 2d ed. Sponsored and published by the New Castle Historical Society. [Wilmington, Del., Press of W. N. Cann] 1937. 142 p. 39–5465 F174.N5F42
First published in 1936.
Bibliography: p. 139–142.

3824. Maryland, a guide to the old line State. Sponsored by Herbert R. O'Conor, Governor of Maryland. New York, Oxford University Press, 1940. xxviii, 561 p. 40–13919 F181.W75
Fifth printing, 1948.
Bibliography: p. 535–543.

3825. A guide to the United States Naval Academy. Sponsored by the United States Naval Academy. New York, Devin-Adair Co., 1941. 158 p. 41–14204 V415.L1W7
"Superintendents of the Academy": p. 53–74; "Outstanding graduates of the Academy": p. 75–92.

3826. Washington, D. C., a guide to the Nation's capital. Sponsored by the George Washington University. New York, Hastings House, 1942. xl, 528 p. 42–19931 F199.F38 1942
A revision and condensation of Washington: City and Capital, compiled by the Federal Writers' Project, 1937.
"Selected reading list": p. 505–512.
42–19931 F199.F38 1942

THE SOUTH ATLANTIC STATES

3827. Virginia; a guide to the Old Dominion. Sponsored by James H. Price, Governor of Virginia. New York, Oxford University Press, 1946. xxix, 710 p. 46–5684 F231.W88 1946
First published in 1940. Third printing with corrections, 1946. 1952 reprint listed in The Cumulative Book Index.
Bibliography: p. 647–667.

3828. Jefferson's Albemarle, a guide to Albemarle County and the city of Charlottesville, Virginia. Sponsored by the Charlottesville and Albemarle County Chamber of Commerce. [Charlottesville, Jarman's] 1941. 157 p. 42–1913 F232.A3W87

3829. Alexandria. Sponsored by the Young Women's Club of Alexandria. [Alexandria, Va., Williams Print. Co.] 1939. 27 p. 40–3986 F234.A3W8

3830. West Virginia, a guide to the Mountain State. Sponsored by the Conservation Commission of West Virginia. New York, Oxford University Press, 1948. 559 p. 53–23405 F241.W85 1948
First published in 1941.
Bibliography: p. 533–541.

3831. The North Carolina guide; edited by Blackwell P. Robinson. Sponsored by the North Carolina Department of Conservation and Development. [New ed.] Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1955. xxi, 649 p. 55–2216 F259.F44 1955
First published in 1939.

3832. Charlotte, a guide to the Queen City of North Carolina. Sponsored by Hornet's Nest Post, no. 9, American Legion. [Charlotte] News Print. House, 1939. 74 p. 40–13106 F264.C4W7
Bibliography: p. 68–69.

3833. Raleigh, capital of North Carolina. Sponsored by the Raleigh Sesquicentennial Commission. [New Bern, N. C., Printed by Owen G. Dunn Co., 1942] 170 p. 42–36985 F264.R1W7
"Books about Raleigh and North Carolina": p. [157]–158.

3834. South Carolina; a guide to the Palmetto State. Sponsored by Burnet R. Maybank, Governor of South Carolina. New York, Oxford University Press, 1941. xxvii, 514 p. 41–52304 F269.W7
Fourth printing, 1949.
Bibliography: p. 479–486.

3835. Beaufort and the Sea Islands. Sponsored and published by the Clover Club. Savannah, Ga., Review Print. Co., 1938. 47 p.
39–30829 F279.B3F44

3836. South Carolina State parks. Sponsored by the South Carolina State Commission of Forestry. [Columbia, South Carolina State Forest Service] 1940. 43 p.
41–52550 SB482.S6W7 1940

3837. Georgia, a guide to its towns and countryside. Rev. and extended by George G. Leckie. Atlanta, Tupper & Love, 1954. xxii, 457 p.
54–10344 F291.W94 1954
First published in 1940.
Bibliography: p. 439–440.

3838. Atlanta, capital of the South, edited by Paul W. Miller. New York, O. Durrell, 1949. xiv, 318 p. 49–10579 F294.A8W8 1949
First published in 1942 under title: Atlanta, a City of the Modern South.
Bibliography: p. 298–301.

3839. Augusta. Sponsored by City Council of Augusta. Augusta, Ga., Tidwell Print. Supply Co., 1938. 218 p. 38–15849 F294.A9F4
Bibliography: p. 205–208.

3840. The Macon guide and Ocmulgee National Monument. Sponsored by Macon Junior Chamber of Commerce. Macon, Ga., J. W. Burke, 1939. 127 p. 40–26510 F294.M2W75
Bibliography: p. 119–120.

3841. Savannah. Sponsored by Chamber of Commerce, Savannah. Savannah, Review Print. Co., 1937. xiv, 208 p. 37–36384 F294.S2F4
Bibliography: p. 196–199.

3842. The story of Washington-Wilkes. Sponsored by the Washington City Council. Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1941. xiv, 136 p.
41–7353 F294.W27W7
Bibliography: p. 127–129.
Has no map.

3843. Florida; a guide to the southernmost State. Sponsored by State of Florida Department of Public Instruction. New York, Oxford University Press, 1944. xxiv, 600 p.
45–2317 F316.F44 1944
First published in 1939. Third printing, 1944. Fifth printing, 1947.
Bibliography: p. 553–565.

3844. Seeing Fernandina; a guide to the city and its industries. Co-sponsored by the City Commission, Fernandina. [Fernandina] Fernandina News Pub. Co., 1940. 84 p.
41–52476 F319.F4W7
"Citations": p. 77–80.

3845. A guide to Key West. Sponsored by the Florida State Planning Board. Rev., 2d ed. New York, Hastings House, 1949. 122 p.
50–1226 F319.K4W7 1949
First published in 1941.
Bibliography: p. 113–116.

3846. Planning your vacation in Florida: Miami and Dade County, including Miami Beach and Coral Gables. Sponsored by the Florida State Planning Board. Northport, N. Y., Bacon, Percy & Daggett, 1941. xx, 202 p.
42–36652 F319.M6W7
Bibliography: p. 184–188.

3847. Seeing St. Augustine. Sponsored by City Commission of St. Augustine. [St. Augustine] The Record Co., 1937. 73 p.
38–12409 F319.S2F4
"Selected bibliography": p. 70–73.

OLD SOUTHWEST

3848. Alabama; a guide to the Deep South. Sponsored by the Alabama State Planning Commission. New York, Hastings House, 1949. xxii, 442 p. 52–3711 F326.W7 1949
First published in 1941.
Bibliography: p. 413–423.

3849. Mississippi; a guide to the Magnolia State. Sponsored by the Mississippi Agricultural and Industrial Board. New York, Hastings House, 1949. xxiv, 545 p. 49–5823 F341.F45 1949
First published in 1938.
Bibliography: p. [523]–530.

3850. Mississippi gulf coast, yesterday and today, 1699–1939. Sponsored by Woman's Club of Gulfport. Gulfport, Miss., Gulfport Print. Co., 1939. 162 p. 39–17552 F347.G9F5

3851. Louisiana; a guide to the State. Sponsored by the Louisiana Library Commission at Baton Rouge. New York, Hastings House, 1941. xxx, 746 p. 41–52389 F375.W8
Fifth printing, 1949.
Bibliography: p. 704–716.

3852. New Orleans city guide. Rev. by Robert Tallant. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1952. lx, 416 p. 52–14722 F379.N5F34 1952
First published in 1938.
Bibliography: p. [397]–401.

3853. Arkansas; a guide to the State. Sponsored by C. G. Hall, secretary of state, Arkansas. New York, Hastings House, 1941. xxvii, 447 p. 41–52931 F411.W8
Second printing, 1948.
Bibliography: p. 397–407.

3854. Guide to North Little Rock, industrial center of Arkansas. [North Little Rock, Ark., Times Print. & Pub. Co.] 1936. 20 p. 40–26499 F419.N67F45

3855. Tennessee; a guide to the State. Sponsored by Department of Conservation, Division of Information. New York, Hastings House, 1949. xxiv, 558 p. 49–5822 F436.F45 1949
First published in 1939.
"Selected bibliography": p. 529–535.

3856. Kentucky; a guide to the Bluegrass State. Sponsored by the University of Kentucky. [Rev. ed.] New York, Hastings House, 1954. xxix, 492 p. 54–1591 F456.F44 1954
First published in 1939.
Bibliography: p. 462–470.

3857. Old capitol and Frankfort guide. Sponsored by the Kentucky State Historical Society, Frankfort, Kentucky. [Frankfort, Ky.] H. McChesney, 1939. 98 p. 39–26382 F459.F8F45

3858. Henderson; a guide to Audubon's home town in Kentucky. Sponsored by Susan Starling Towles, librarian, Public Library, Henderson, Kentucky. Northport, Bacon, Percy & Daggett, 1941. 120 p. 42–12802 F459.H49W7

3859. Lexington and the Bluegrass country. Sponsored by the city of Lexington. Lexington [Ky.] E. M. Glass, 1938. 149 p. 39–8854 F459.L6F4

3860. Louisville; a guide to the Falls city. Sponsored by the University of Kentucky; cooperating sponsor, the Louisville Automobile Club. New York, M. Barrows, 1940. xv, 112 p. 40–9812 F459.L8W8

3861. Missouri, a guide to the "Show me" State. [Rev. ed.] Sponsored by the Missouri State Highway Dept. New York, Hastings House, 1954. 654 p. 55–3657 F466.W85 1954
First published in 1941.
Bibliography: p. 596–611.

OLD NORTHWEST

3862. The Ohio guide. Sponsored by the Ohio State Archaeological and Historical Society. New York, Oxford University Press, 1946. xxxi, 634 (i. e. 650) p. 46–5681 F496.W96 1946
First published in 1940. Third printing, with corrections, 1946. Sixth printing, 1952.
"Selected bibliography": p. 611–613.

3863. Bryan and Williams County. Sponsored by the city of Bryan. [Gallipolis, Ohio, Downtain Print. Co., 1941] 117 p. 43–2703 F497.W7W7
Bibliography: p. 116–117.

3864. Chillicothe and Ross County. Sponsored by the Ross County Territory Committee, 1938. [Columbus, Ohio, Heer Print. Co., 1938] 91 p. 39–19297 F499.C4F5
Bibliography: p. 88.

3865. Cincinnati; a guide to the queen city and its neighbors. Sponsored by the city of Cincinnati, Ohio. Cincinnati, Wiesen-Hart Press, 1943. xxiii, 570 p. 43–17162 F499.C5W93
"Selected bibliography": p. 547–549.

3866. Findlay and Hancock County. Reproduced in cooperation with Findlay College. [Findlay, Ohio, 1937?] 52 p. A40–1949 F499.F4F4
Bibliography: p. 51.

3867. Fremont and Sandusky County. Sponsored by the Ohio State Archaeological & Historical Society, Columbus. Co-sponsored by C. A. Hochenedel, safety-service director, city of Fremont. [Fremont? Ohio, 1940] 115 p.
40–10659 F499.F9W75
"For reference": p. 115.

3868. Lake Erie, vacationland in Ohio; a guide to the Sandusky Bay region. Sponsored by the city of Sandusky in cooperation with Ohio's Lake Erie Vacationland, Inc. . . . Sandusky, Ohio, Stephens Print. Co., 1941. 129 p.
41–18975 F497.E6W7
"References": p. 129.

3869. A guide to Lima and Allen County, Ohio. Sponsored by Lima Better Business Bureau, Inc. [Lima? Ohio, 1938] 64 p.
39–8859 F499.L73F4
Bibliography: p. 61.

3870. Springfield and Clark County, Ohio. Sponsored by the Springfield Chamber of Commerce. [Springfield] Printed by the Springfield Tribune Print. Co., 1941. 136 p.
41–26044 F499.S7W7
"References": p. 130–131.

3871. Urbana and Champaign County. Sponsored by the Urbana Lions Club. Urbana, Ohio, Gaumer Pub. Co., 1942. 147 p.
42–16468 F499.U7W7
"Selected bibliography": p. 144.

3872. Warren and Trumbull County. Sesquicentennial ed. Sponsored by Western Reserve Historical Celebration Committee. [Warren? Ohio] 1938. 60 p. 40–10660 F499.W2F45
Bibliography: p. 60.

3873. Zanesville and Muskingum County. Reproduced in cooperation with Zanesville Chamber of Commerce. [Zanesville? Ohio, 1937] 38 p. 40–10661 F499.Z2F45
Bibliography: p. 36.

3874. Indiana, a guide to the Hoosier State. Sponsored by the Department of Public Relations of Indiana State Teachers College. New York, Oxford University Press, 1945. xxvi, 548 (i. e. 564) p. 46–5683 F526.W93 1945
First published in 1941. Second printing, with corrections, 1945. Third printing, 1947.
Bibliography: p. 509–523.

3875. Illinois; a descriptive and historical guide. Rev., with addition, in 1946. Chicago, A. C. McClurg, 1947. xxii, 707 p.
47–30173 F546.F45 1947
First published in 1939.
"Fifty books about Illinois": p. 653–656.

3876. Cairo guide. Sponsored by Cairo Public Library. [Nappanee, Ind., E. V. Pub. House] 1938. 62 p. 39–33966 F549.C2F4
Bibliography: p. 61–62.

3877. Galena guide. Sponsored by the city of Galena. [Chicago?] 1937. 79 p.
39–8109 F549.G14F5
"Galena bibliography": p. 78–79.

3878. Hillsboro guide. [Hillsboro] Printed by the Montgomery News, 1940. 92 p.
43–4563 F549.H67W7
Bibliography: p. 92.

3879. Nauvoo guide. Sponsored by the Unity Club of Nauvoo. Chicago, A. C. McClurg, 1939. 49 p. 39–27124 F549.N37F5

3880. Princeton guide. Sponsored by the city of Princeton. [Princeton, Ill., Republican Print. Co.] 1939. 48 p. 40–32949 F549.P93F5

3881. Rockford. Sponsored by the city of Rockford, Illinois. Rockford, Ill., Graphic Arts Corp., 1941. 144 p. 42–18201 F549.R7W7
Has no map.

3882. Michigan, a guide to the Wolverine State. Sponsored by the Michigan State Administrative Board. New York, Oxford University Press, 1946. xxxvi, 696 (i. e. 712) p.
46–5682 F566.W9 1946
First published in 1941. Third printing, with corrections, 1946. Fifth printing, 1949.
Bibliography: p. 645–653.

3883. Wisconsin; a guide to the Badger State. Sponsored by the Wisconsin Library Association. New York, Hastings House, 1954. 651 p.
55–3162 F586.W97 1954
First published in 1941.
Bibliography: p. 578–590.

3884. Portage. Sponsored by Portage Chamber of Commerce. [Portage? Wis.] 1938. 85 p.
40–4748 F589.P76F45
Bibliography: p. 83–85.

3885. Shorewood [a residential suburb of Milwaukee] Sponsored by Village Board of Shorewood. [Shorewood, Wis., 1939] 109 p.
40–7055 F589.S58F5
Has no map.

3886. Minnesota, a State guide. Sponsored by the Executive Council, State of Minnesota. [Rev. ed.] New York, Hastings House, 1954. xxx, 545 p. 54–589 F606.F44 1954
First published in 1938.
Bibliography: p. [498]–511.

3887. The Minnesota arrowhead country. Sponsored by the Minnesota Arrowhead Association. Chicago, Ill., A. Whitman, 1941. xxi, 231 p.
41–52030 F606.W93
Bibliography: p. 211–216.

3888. St. Cloud guide. St. Cloud, Minn., Greater St. Cloud Committee of the Chamber of Commerce, 1936. 63 p. 39–29347 F614.S25F45

3889. Iowa, a guide to the Hawkeye State. Sponsored by the State Historical Society of Iowa. New York, Hastings House, 1949. xxviii, 583 p.
49–5480 F621.F45 1949
First published in 1938.
Bibliography: p. [557]–564.

3890. A guide to Burlington, Iowa. 2d ed. (rev.) Sponsored by Burlington City Council. Burlington, Iowa, Acres-Blackmar Co., 1939. 80 p.
43–8144 F629.B9F45 1939
First published in 1938.

3891. Guide to Cedar Rapids and northeast Iowa, sponsored by the Cedar Rapids Chamber of Commerce. Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Laurance Press, 1937. 79 p. 38–26504 F629.C3F5
Bibliography: p. 79.

3892. A guide to Dubuque. Sponsored by the city of Dubuque and the Dubuque Chamber of Commerce. Dubuque, Iowa, Hoermann Press, 1937. 32 p. 38–26488 F629.D8F4

3893. A guide to Estherville, Iowa, Emmet County, and Iowa great lakes region. Sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce, Estherville [Estherville, Iowa.] Estherville Enterprise Print, 1939. 36 p. 40–10663 F629.E7F45

3894. A guide to McGregor. Sponsored by the McGregor Service Club. McGregor, Iowa, J. F. Widman, 1940. 16 p.
40–10732 F629.M14W7
First published in 1938.

GREAT PLAINS

3895. North Dakota, a guide to the northern prairie State. Sponsored by the State Historical Society of North Dakota. [2d ed.] New York, Oxford University Press, 1950. xix, 352 p.
50–9076 F636.F45 1950
First published in 1938.
Bibliography: p. 327–340.

3896. South Dakota, a guide to the State. Sponsored by the State of South Dakota. 2d ed. completely rev. by M. Lisle Reese. New York, Hastings House, 1952. xxvii, 421 p.
52–7601 F656.F45 1952
First published in 1938 under title: South Dakota Guide.
Bibliography: p. 383–393.

3897. Aberdeen, a middle border city. University of South Dakota, official sponsor; Friends of Aberdeen Committee, co-operating sponsor. [Aberdeen? S.D., Prairie League Workshop, 1940] 94 p. 40–28669 F659.A14W7
Bibliography: p. [91]–94.
Has no map of Aberdeen.

3898. A vacation guide to Custer State Park in the Black Hills of South Dakota. Sponsored by the Custer State Park Board. [Pierre, S. D., State Pub. Co.] 1938. 32 p.
39–29346 F657.C92F4

3899. Mitchell, South Dakota; an industrial and recreational guide. Sponsored by the Mitchell Chamber of Commerce. [Mitchell? S. D.] 1938. 32 p. 40–5435 F659.M68F5

3900. Guide to Pierre, the capital city and its vicinity. Sponsored by the Pierre Chamber of Commerce and the city of Pierre. [Pierre, S. D., State Pub. Co., 1937] 20 p. 40–5436 F659.P6F45

3901. Nebraska, a guide to the Cornhusker State. Sponsored by the Nebraska State Historical Society. New York, Hastings House, 1947. xiii, 424 p. 48–1227 F666.F46 1947
First published in 1939.
Bibliography: p. 407–412.

3902. Old Bellevue. Sponsored by the Sarpy County Historical Society. Papillion, Neb., Papillion Times, 1937. 32 p.
39–8853 F674.B4F4
"Selected references": p. 30.

3903. Lincoln city guide. Sponsored by the Nebraska State Historical Society. Lincoln, Neb., Woodruff Print. Co., 1937. 87 p.
37–5002 F674.L7F4
Bibliography: p. 79–81.

3904. Kansas; a guide to the Sunflower State. Sponsored by the State Department of Education. New York, Hastings House, 1949. xviii, 538 p. 49–5821 F686.F45 1949
First published in 1939.
Bibliography: p. 523–529.

3905. The Larned city guide. Larned, Kan., Chamber of Commerce, 1938. 34 p.
39–8855 F689.L34F4
Bibliography: p. 34.

3906. A guide to Leavenworth, Kansas. Leavenworth, Kan., Leavenworth Chronicle, 1940. 67 p. 43–9107 F689.L5W7
Bibliography: p. 67.

3907. A guide to Salina, Kansas. Sponsored by Salina Public Library Association. Salina, Kan., Advertiser-Sun, 1939. 55 p.
40–10664 F689.S2F45
Bibliography: p. 54–55.

3908. Oklahoma, a guide to the Sooner State. Sponsored by the University of Oklahoma. [2d ed.] Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1947. xxvi, 445 p. 47–6373 F694.W85 1947
First published in 1941.
"Selected reading list": p. 422–427.

3909. Tulsa, a guide to the oil capital. Sponsored by the Tulsa Federation of Women's Clubs. Tulsa, Okla., Mid-West Print. Co., 1938. 79 p.
38–26703 F704.T92F5
Bibliography: p. 75.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN REGION

3910. Montana, a State guide book. Sponsored by Department of Agriculture, Labor and Industry, State of Montana. New York, Hastings House, 1949. xxiii, 430 p.
49–5522 F731.F44 1949
First published in 1939.
Bibliography: p. 425–429.

3911. Wyoming; a guide to its history, highways, and people. Sponsored by Dr. Lester C. Hunt, secretary of state. New York, Oxford University Press, 1941. xxvii, 490 p.
41–52444 F761.W58
Third printing, 1948.
Bibliography: p. 449–458.

3912. Colorado; a guide to the highest State. Sponsored by the Colorado State Planning Commission. New York, Hastings House, 1941. xxxiii, 511 p. 41–52312 F781.W9
Sixth printing, 1951.
"Selective reading list": p. 473–479.

3913. Ghost towns of Colorado. Sponsored by Ralph L. Carr, Governor of Colorado. New York, Hastings House, 1947. 114 p.
47–3230 F776.W7

3914. Utah; a guide to the State. Co-sponsored by the Utah State Institute of Fine Arts and the Salt Lake County Commission. New York, Hastings House, 1954. xxvi, 595 p.
54–1817 F826.W75 1954
First published in 1941.
Bibliography: p. 538–551.

3915. Provo, pioneer Mormon city. Sponsored by the Utah State Institute of Fine Arts. Co-sponsored by the Provo City Commission. Portland, Or., Binfords & Mort, 1942. 223 p.
43–1606 F834.P8W7
Bibliography: p. [202]–208.

3916. Nevada; a guide to the Silver State. Sponsored by Dr. Jeanne Elizabeth Wier, Nevada State Historical Society. Portland, Oreg., Binfords & Mort, 1940. xviii, 315 p. 41–71 F841.W77
"Supplementary reading list of Nevada books": p. 297–304.

FAR SOUTHWEST

3917. Texas; a guide to the Lone Star State. Sponsored by the Texas State Highway Commission. New York, Hastings House, 1940. xxxiii, 718 p. 40–27629 F391.W95
Fifth printing, 1949.
"A selected reading list of Texas books": p. 677–682.

3918. Beaumont; a guide to the city and its environs. Sponsored by Beaumont Post 1806, Veterans of Foreign Wars of U. S., Houston, Tex., Anson Jones Press, 1939. xiv, 167 p.
40–4250 F394.B3F4

3919. Corpus Christi, a history and guide. Sponsored by the Corpus Christi Chamber of Commerce. Corpus Christi, Corpus Christi Caller-Times, 1942. 245 p. 42–15129 F394.C78W7

"A selected reading list of books for Corpus Christi": p. 233–239.

3920. The Denison guide. Denison Chamber of Commerce, cooperating sponsor. Denison, Tex., Denison Chamber of Commerce, 1939. 29 p.
40–10658 F394.D3F45

3921. Houston, a history and guide. Sponsored by the Harris County Historical Society, Inc. Houston, Tex., Anson Jones Press, 1942. 363 p.
42–16471 F394.H8W7

3922. Port Arthur. Sponsored by Hamilton Smith Post No. 797, Inc., Veterans of Foreign Wars of U. S., Port Arthur. Houston, Tex., Anson Jones Press, 1940. xvii, 164 p. 41–12325 F394.P83W7

3923. San Antonio, a history and guide. Sponsored by the San Antonio Conservation Society. San Antonio, Clegg Co., 1941. 111 p.
42–6788 F394.S2W964 1941
First published in 1938.

3924. New Mexico; a guide to the colorful State. Sponsored by the Coronado Cuarto Centennial Commission and the University of New Mexico. New and rev. ed. by Joseph Miller; edited by Henry G. Alsberg. New York, Hastings House, 1953. xxxii, 471 p. 53–13543 F801.W76 1953
First published in 1940.
Bibliography: p. 436–440.

3925. Arizona, the Grand Canyon State; a State guide. Sponsored by the Arizona State College at Flagstaff. Completely rev. by Joseph Miller; edited by Henry G. Alsberg. New York, Hastings House, 1956. xxv, 532 p.
56–446 F811.W87 1956
First published in 1940 under title: Arizona; a State Guide.
Bibliography: p. 503–513.

3926. Mission San Xavier del Bac, Arizona; a descriptive and historical guide. Sponsored by Arizona Pioneers' Historical Society. New York, Hastings House, 1940. 57 p.
40–27588 NA5235.S25W7
Bibliography: p. 33–34.

CALIFORNIA

3927. California, a guide to the Golden State. Sponsored by Mabel R. Gillis, California state librarian. [Rev. ed.] New York, Hastings House, 1954. xxxi, 716 p.
55–4472 F866.2.E4 1954
First published in 1939.
Bibliography: p. 694–698.

3928. Death Valley; a guide. Sponsored by the Bret Harte Associates. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1939. xv, 75 p. 39–2776 F868.D2F4
Bibliography: p. [71]

3929. Los Angeles; a guide to the city and its environs. Sponsored by the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors. Completely rev., 2d ed. New York, Hastings House, 1951. liv, 441 p.
51–11827 F869.L8W85 1951
First published in 1941.
Bibliography: p. 421–427.

3930. Monterey Peninsula. Sponsored by California State Department of Education. Stanford University, Calif., J. L. Delkin, 1941. 207 p. 41–51883 F869.M7W75
Bibliography: p. 194–198.

3931. San Diego, a California city. Sponsored and published by the San Diego Historical Society. [San Diego, 1937] 138 p.
38–27088 F869.S22F4
Bibliography: p. 127–130.

3932. Balboa Park, San Diego, California; a comprehensive guide to the city's cultural and recreational center. Sponsored and published by the Association of Balboa Park Institutions. [San Diego, Neyenesch Printers] 1941. 83 p.
41–9477 F869.S22W7

3933. San Francisco, the Bay and its cities. Sponsored by the City and County of San Francisco. [Rev. 2d ed.] New York, Hastings House, 1947. xvii, 531 p. 47–11536 F869.S3W95 1947
First published in 1940.
"A selected reading list": p. 501–504.

3934. Santa Barbara; a guide to the Channel city and its environs. Sponsored by Santa Barbara State College. New York, Hastings House, 1941. xvii, 206 p. 41–46110 F869.S45W86
Bibliography: p. 194–197.

PACIFIC NORTHWEST

3935. Idaho, a guide in word and picture. Sponsored by the secretary of state of Idaho. [2d ed. rev.] New York, Oxford University Press, 1950. xiv, 300 p. 50–13175 F746.F453
First published in 1937.
Bibliography: p. 287–289.

3936. Tours in eastern Idaho. [Boise? 1939?] 36 p. 39–26296 F745.F47

3937. Oregon, end of the trail. Sponsored by the Oregon State Board of Control. Rev. ed. with added material, by Howard McKinley Corning. Portland, Oreg., Binfords & Mort, 1951. xxxii, 549 p. 52–11474 F881.W76 1951
First published in 1940.
Bibliography: p. 529–535.

3938. Mount Hood; a guide. Sponsored by the Oregon State Board of Control; cooperating sponsor, the Mount Hood Development Association. [New York] Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1940. xxvii, 132 p. 40–27505 F882.H85W7
Bibliography: p. 125.

3939. The new Washington; a guide to the Evergreen State. Sponsored by the Washington State Historical Society. Rev. ed. with added material, by Howard McKinley Corning. Portland, Or., Binfords & Mort, 1950. xxx, 687 p. 51–3893 F891.W9 1950
First published in 1941 under title: Washington, a Guide to the Evergreen State.
Bibliography: p. [644]–653.

OVERSEAS POSSESSIONS

3940. A guide to Alaska, last American frontier, by Merle Colby. New York, Macmillan, 1939. lxv, 427 p. 39–27616 F909.F45
"Books about Alaska": p. 405–410.

3941. U. S. Puerto Rico Reconstruction Administration. Puerto Rico; a guide to the island of Boriquén, compiled and written by the Puerto Rico Reconstruction Administration in cooperation with the Writers' Program of the Work Projects Administration. Sponsored by the Puerto Rico Department of Education. New York, University Society, 1940. xli, 409 p. 40–35620 F1958.U55
"Books about Puerto Rico": p. 392–402.

AMERICAN FOLKWAYS SERIES

3942. American folkways, edited by Erskine Caldwell. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1941–55. 26 v.
The American Guide Series created in the minds of many Americans a new consciousness of our history, historic sites, recreational spots, and folklore, and the literature of regionalism had been aborning since Frederick J. Turner discovered the place of sections in American history. In the summer of 1941, Duell, Sloan and Pearce, New York, began publication of the American Folkways Series, "designed to reflect the living features, the atmosphere and background of the various American regions—those qualities which have inspired the great American novels and are not to be found in histories or in textbooks." The series is under the general editorship of Erskine Caldwell, whose intimate knowledge of the region and people he portrays in his novels fits him to guide such a project. The authors, from Edwin Corle whose Desert Country (1941) launched the series, to Oscar Lewis whose High Sierra Country (1955) is the most recent, are by birth, adoption, or, at least, admiration for the manners and customs of the people, "natives" of the regions about which they write with instinctive feeling and knowledge. The titles of some of the volumes need geographical clarification, and we have borrowed freely from the authors' own descriptions.

3943. Atherton, Gertrude Franklin (Horn) Golden Gate country, by Gertrude Atherton. 1945. 256 p. 45–2766 F861.A87

3944. Bracke, William B. Wheat country. 1950. 309 p. 50–6934 F591.B78
"If one were to describe a large circle with a radius of roughly two hundred miles from the center of Kansas . . . he would have put a perimeter around the Wheat Country." The area extends to the east and west boundaries of Kansas, to the south central section of the State, and in an arc into southern Nebraska.

3945. Callahan, North. Smoky Mountain country. 1952. 257 p. 52–6783 F443.G7C3
The "Smoky Mountain country" extends from the Kentucky and Virginia State lines southward through East Tennessee and western North Carolina to Georgia.

3946. Carter, Hodding, and Anthony Ragusin. Gulf Coast country. 1951. 247 p. 51–10125 F296.C3
The "Gulf Coast" extends about one hundred fifty miles from east to west along the Gulf of Mexico and penetrates no more than five miles inland from the sea. "The Coast is still a nation in itself, bearing no resemblance to the interior of Mississippi or Alabama along whose southern borders it skirts."

3947. Corle, Edwin. Desert country. 1941. 357 p. 41–51799 F786.C8 1941
This is a book about the arid regions of the American Southwest—the area between the Pacific Coast Range and the Rocky Mountains which includes such deserts as the Mojave, the Colorado, the Amargosa, and Arizona's western slope.

3948. Croy, Homer. Corn country. 1947. 325 p. 47–3772 F595.C963

The "Corn country," in the center of the United States, stretches from western Ohio to the eastern part of Kansas, and from the southern part of Minnesota to central Missouri, and includes at least parts of Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, Wisconsin, and South Dakota.

3949. Day, Donald. Big country: Texas. 1947. 326 p. 47–4831 F386.D3

3950. Graham, Lloyd. Niagara country. 1949. 321 p. 49–9928 F127.N6G7

To Canadians, Bostonians, New Yorkers, and Americans in general, the "Niagara Country" means different things. "If you pinpoint Niagara Falls and draw a circle with a radius of fifty miles and the Falls as the center, you will probably have the most common concept of Niagara Country."

3951. [Henry, Ralph Chester] High border country, by Eric Thane [pseud.] 1942. 335 p. 42–36241 F597.H4

Montana, Wyoming, the Dakotas, and the northern tongue of Idaho form the "High Border Country," which takes its name from the high plains and the high mountains, and forms the northern boundary of the United States, as opposed to the "low border" fronting Mexico.

3952. Kane, Harnett T. Deep Delta country. 1944. xx, 283 p. 44–40211 F377.D4K3

"Selected bibliography": p. 273–280.

The hundred and fifteen miles or so from New Orleans to the Gulf of Mexico forms the Deep Delta of the Mississippi River, "a region in some ways like no other in the world."

3953. Kennedy, Stetson. Palmetto country. 1942. 340 p. 42–36426 F316.K38

The Palmetto country lies in the deepest South—Florida and the southern portions of Georgia and Alabama. The word palmetto is derived from the Spanish palmito, a diminutive palm tree.

3954. Le Sueur, Meridel. North Star country. 1945. 327 p. 45–37888 F606.L56

"The North Star Country, with Minnesota as its center, occupies almost the exact geographical center of North America and has three great drainage systems flowing in divergent directions through wide valleys of glacial loess." Here the Mississippi Valley "extends north to south through the elbow of the Minnesota River, a rich basin left by glacial invasion and occupied before the white man's coming by the great Sioux nation. The surface then tilts down northward, to the beaches of the dead Lake Agassiz whose dry basin makes the Red River Valley, the winter wheat area of North Dakota."

3955. Lewis, Oscar. High Sierra country. 1955. 291 p. 55–9834 F868.S5L64

The Sierra Nevada range in east central California, with some attention to the Nevada towns just beyond it.

3956. Long, Haniel. Piñon country. 1941. 327 p. 41–51810 F786.L8

The land of the dwarf piñon trees which produce the piñon nut, an important food of the natives, embraces New Mexico, northern Arizona, southern Utah and Colorado, west Texas, and northern Mexico.

3957. McWilliams, Carey. Southern California country, an island on the land. 1946. 387 p. 46–25084 F867.M25

Southern California is a coastal strip of land where the mountain ranges, the ocean, and the semi-desert terrain meet. It includes part of Santa Barbara County, all of Ventura, Los Angeles, and Orange Counties, and those portions of San Bernadino, Riverside, and San Diego Counties "west of the mountains." The offshore Channel Islands are a part of the region although traditionally detached from its social life.

3958. Nixon, Herman C. Lower Piedmont country. 1946. xxiii, 244 p. 46–83330 F210.N5

Book notes: p. 234–238.

"This country is borderland between mountains and lowland plains, between mountaineers and cotton planters. It is land where the Appalachians, in their southwestward extension, fade away into small ridges and rolling hills. As the mountains disappear, the Piedmont Plateau on the east joins the Great Appalachian Valley, or series of valleys, on the west around the end of the Blue Ridge."

3959. Powers, Alfred. Redwood country; the lava region and the redwoods. 1949. xviii, 292 p. 49–5224 F861.P69

"Altogether, the volume's immense locale extends south and north along the [Pacific] coast—from Russian River [in California] to the Siuslaw River [in Oregon]." It is continued in the interior valleys, and east of the Sierras and Cascades it includes large areas of Nevada, Oregon, and Idaho.

3960. Rayburn, Otto Ernest. Ozark country. 1941. 351 p. 41–52073 F417.O9R3

"The Ozark Country is an egg-shaped uplift sprawling in the mammoth bed of the Mississippi Valley." Unlike some geographers, the author restricts the region to the southern half of Missouri, the northwestern part of Arkansas, and a few counties in eastern Oklahoma.

3961. Stegner, Wallace E. Mormon country. 1942. 362 p. 42–22811 F826.S75

The Mormon country includes all of Utah, most of southern Idaho, the southwestern corner of Wyoming, a strip of western Colorado, the northwestern corner of New Mexico, much of northern and central Arizona, and the eastern third of Nevada; however, Utah is the center of its religious and cultural life.

3962. Swetnam, George. Pittsylvania country. 1951. 315 p. 51–9280 F159.P6S85

The "Pittsylvania Country" is an irregular area centering about Pittsburgh, extending up the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers and down the Ohio for some seventy-five miles or more. "It is bounded on the east by the middle ridges of the Allegheny Mountains and the Pennsylvania Dutch Country, on the north by the Erie Country, on the west by the flat Buckeye Country beyond the Steubenville Hills, and on the south by the Hill Country of West Virginia."

3963. Thomas, Jeannette (Bell) Blue Ridge country, by Jean Thomas. 1942. 338 p. 42–36174 F217.B6T5

The Blue Ridge country here described comprises the southern portion of the Appalachian Mountain range that runs from West Virginia through portions of Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, North and South Carolina to Georgia and Alabama.

3964. Vestal, Stanley. Short grass country. 1941. 304 p. 41–52003 F591.V48

"From the Saskatchewan River in Canada southward for 1,500 miles, a strip of country averaging some 500 miles in width extends almost to Old Mexico—country once covered with an unbroken mat of buffalo grass, grama, mesquite . . . all short grasses—rarely even six inches high." By the "Short Grass Country" the author means only the southern section of this region, the High Plains. It includes the western half of Oklahoma and Kansas, Northwest Texas, and the plains of eastern New Mexico and Colorado.

3965. Webster, Clarence M. Town meeting country. 1945. 246 p. 45–2984 F4.W4

Mr. Webster's "Town Meeting Country" is an area of some 3,000 square miles in southern New England, comprising most of Connecticut east of the Connecticut River, a slice of south central Massachusetts, and most of Rhode Island west of Narragansett Bay. Here the small mill cities are still dominated by the annual or semi-annual Town Meeting.

3966. White, William Chapman. Adirondack country. 1954. 315 p. 52–12652 F127.A2W5 1954

Northeastern New York State, and particularly Adirondack State Park established in 1892—the largest of our state parks, with over two million acres in public ownership.

3967. Williams, Albert N. Rocky Mountain country. 1950. xxv, 289 p. 50–6038 F721.W68

Neither the residents nor topographers agree about the area described as the Rocky Mountain country. The author advises the reader to ignore the atlas, and believe this: Rocky Mountain country is mostly the mountains in Colorado, plus the fringe along the southern border of Wyoming and the few fingers that jut down into New Mexico.

3968. Williamson, Thames R. Far north country. 1944. 236 p. 44–4015 F904.W68

THE RIVERS OF AMERICA SERIES

3969. The Rivers of America, as planned and started by Constance Lindsay Skinner [various editors] New York, Rinehart, 1937–56. 50 v.

The idea of telling the American saga through the story of its rivers originated with Canadian-born Constance Lindsay Skinner (1882–1939) who began her career as a teen-age newspaper correspondent and rose to distinction as a novelist, poet, and historian of America. About 1935 Miss Skinner selected the rivers and outlined the special folk stories for the original 24 volumes to be written by "novelists and poets," and published by Farrar and Rinehart (now Rinehart and Company, Inc.) New York. At the time of her death four years later six of the seven volumes which Miss Skinner edited had already appeared. In successive years the series has been greatly expanded, and edited, except for a brief period, by Carl Carmer, the well-known regional writer and collector of American folk songs, legends, and ballads, in collaboration, until their deaths, with the distinguished authors Stephen Vincent Benét and Hervey Allen. The stories of the lives of the people who held "civil rights, God, and the primer . . . in honor on the banks of the rivers," their industries and architectural fads, and the "characteristic expression of the Folk mind" in religion, arts, crafts, and folklore, make up these volumes. The most recent, Henry Savage's River of the Carolinas: The Santee (1956), appropriately reminds us that our rivers will continue to witness future changes in our civilization, which will be as varied as the scenes they remember from time long past.

3970. SKINNER, CONSTANCE LINDSAY, ed.

All of the volumes originally edited by Miss Skinner, except Coffin's, contain her essay "Rivers and American Folk," in 13 pages at the end. It has been omitted from the revised editions of Havighurst and Niles, and from the reprint of Matschat's.

3971. Burt, Maxwell Struthers. Powder River; let'er buck; illustrated by Ross Santee. 1938. 389 p. 38–28939 F767.P6B8
Bibliography: p. 377–380.

3972. Carmer, Carl L. The Hudson; illustrated by Stow Wengenroth. 1939. 434 p. 39–27579 F127.H8C3
Bibliography: p. 408–421.

3973. Coffin, Robert P. Tristram. Kennebec, cradle of Americans; illustrated by Maitland de Gogorza. 1937. 292 p. 37–27396 F27.K32C6

3974. Dana, Julian. The Sacramento, river of gold; illustrated by J. O'H. Cosgrave II. 1939. 294 p. 39–27898 F868.S13D27

3975. Havighurst, Walter. Upper Mississippi: a wilderness saga; illustrated by David and Lolitha Granahan. 1937. 258 p. 37–37568 F597.H35
"Source streams": p. 245–250.
A revised edition, including only an account of the river itself, and omitting materials on the Scandinavian settlement and lumber industry of the upper Mississippi Valley, was edited by Stephen Vincent Benét and Carl Carmer, and published in 1944 (F597.H352).

3976. Matschat, Cecile (Hulse). Suwannee River; strange green land; illustrated by Alexander Key. 1938. 296 p. 38–19573 F317.S8M3
Bibliography: p. 283–288.
Reprinted: London, W. Hodge, 1951. 256 p. F317.S8M3

3977. Niles, Blair. The James; illustrated by Edward Shenton. 1939. 359, [13] p. 39–27044 F232.J2N5
"Sources": p. 343–349.
A revised and enlarged edition was edited by Hervey Allen, and published in 1945 under the title: The James from Iron Gate to the Sea (335 p. F232.J2N5 1945).

3978. BENÉT, STEPHEN VINCENT, and CARL L. CARMER, eds.

3979. Beston, Henry. The St. Lawrence; illustrated by A. Y. Jackson. 1942. 274 p. 42–24091 F1050.B47

3980. Cabell, James Branch, and Alfred J. Hanna. The St. Johns, a parade of diversities; illustrated by Doris Lee. 1943. 324 p. 43–11511 F317.S2C3
Bibliography: p. 309–318.

3981. Canby, Henry Seidel. The Brandywine; illustrated by Andrew Wyeth. 1941. 285 p. 41–5328 F157.C4C23
"A selected bibliography": p. 269–271.

3982. Carter, Hodding. Lower Mississippi; illustrated by John McCrady. 1942. 467 p. 42–23785 F396.C3
"Selected bibliography": p. 443–451.

3983. Clark, Thomas D. The Kentucky; illustrated by John A. Spelman, III. 1942. 431 p. 42–36052 F457.K3C6
Bibliography: p. 411–420.

3984. Davis, Clyde Brion. The Arkansas; illustrated by Donald McKay. 1940. 340 p. 40–27483 F417.A7D37
"Acknowledgements": p. 328–330.

3985. Derleth, August W. The Wisconsin, river of a thousand isles; illustrated by John Steuart Curry. 1942. 366 p. 42–23237 F587.W8D4
Bibliography: p. 339–345.

3986. Gray, James. The Illinois; illustrated by Aaron Bohrod. 1940. 355 p. 40–34654 F547.I2G7
Bibliography: p. 337–344.

3987. Hansen, Harry. The Chicago; illustrated by Harry Timmins. 1942. 362 p. 42–25855 F547.C45H3
"Sources": p. 349–354.

3988. Masters, Edgar Lee. The Sangamon; illustrated by Lynd Ward. 1942. 258 p.
42–15541 F547.S3M3

3989. Morgan, Dale L. The Humboldt, highroad of the West; illustrated by Arnold Blanch. 1943. 374 p. 43–7564 F847.H85M6
Bibliography: p. 355–365.

3990. Streeter, Floyd Benjamin. The Kaw, the heart of a nation; illustrated by Isabel Bate and Harold Black. 1941. 371 p.
41–3357 F681.S8
Bibliography: p. 353–359.

3991. Tourtellot, Arthur Bernon. The Charles; illustrated by Ernest J. Donnelly. 1941. 356 p. 41–52052 F72.C46T7
Bibliography: p. 343–348.

3992. Way, Frederick. The Allegheny; illustrated by Henry Pitz. 1942. 280 p.
42–15895 F157.A5W3
Bibliographical references included in "Acknowledgements": p. 219–222.

3993. Wildes, Harry Emerson. The Delaware; illustrated by Irwin D. Hoffman. 1940. 398 p. 40–14246 F106.W65
"Acknowledgments and bibliography": p. 369–381.

3994. Wildes, Harry Emerson. Twin rivers, the Raritan and the Passaic; illustrated by Angelo di Benedetto. 1943. 390 p. 43–2434 F142.R2W5
Bibliography: p. 371–383.

3995. Wilson, William E. The Wabash; illustrated by John De Martelly. 1940. 339 p.
40–27193 F532.W2W6
Bibliography: p. 325–332.

3996. ALLEN, HERVEY, ed.

3997. Davis, Julia. The Shenandoah; illustrated by Frederic Taubes. 1945. 374 p.
45–8434 F232.S5D3
Bibliography: p. 363–369.

3998. Fisher, Anne (Benson) The Salinas, upside-down river; illustrated by Walter K. Fisher. 1945. xviii, 316 p. 45–1095 F868.S133F5
Bibliography: p. 305–308.

3999. Footner, Hulbert. Rivers of the Eastern Shore, seventeen Maryland rivers; illustrated by Aaron Sopher. 1944. 375 p.
44–8257 F187.F2F6
"Sources": p. 362–368.

4000. Smith, Chard Powers. The Housatonic, Puritan river; illustrated by Armin Landeck. 1946. 532 p. 46–4413 F102.H7S5
Bibliography: p. 515–522.

4001. Vestal, Stanley. The Missouri; illustrated by Getlar Smith, maps by George Annand. 1945. 368 p. 44–51595 F598.V47
Bibliography: p. 349–354.

4002. ALLEN, HERVEY, and CARL L. CARMER, eds.

4003. Banta, Richard E. The Ohio; illustrated by Edward Shenton. 1949. 592 p.
49–11115 F516.B18
Bibliography: p. 561–577.

4004. Campbell, Marjorie E. The Saskatchewan; illustrated by Illingworth H. Kerr. 1950. 400 p. 50–6401 F1076.C18
Bibliography: p. 375–380.

4005. Corle, Edwin. The Gila, river of the Southwest; illustrated by Ross Santee. 1951. 402 p. 51–6152 F817.G52C6
Bibliography: p. 377–386.

4006. Davidson, Donald. The Tennessee; illustrated by Theresa Sherrer Davidson. 1946–48. 2 v. 46–11901 F217.T3D3
"A selected bibliography": v. 1, p. 327–333; v. 2, p. 364–370.
CONTENTS.—v. 1. The old river, frontier to secession.—v. 2. The new river, Civil War to TVA.

4007. Douglas, Marjory (Stoneman). The Everglades, river of grass; illustrated by Robert Fink. 1947. 406 p. 47–11064 F317.E9D6
Bibliography: p. 391–398.

4008. Gutheim, Frederick A. The Potomac; illustrated by Mitchell Jamieson. 1949. 436 p.
49–11856 F187.P8G8
"Bibliographical notes": p. 399–413.

4009. Hard, Walter R. The Connecticut; illustrated by Douglas W. Gorsline. 1947. 310 p. 47–3553 F12.C7H3
Bibliography: p. 299–301.

4010. Hill, Ralph Nading. The Winooski, heartway of Vermont; illustrated by George Daly. 1949. 304 p. 49–8844 F57.W63H55
Bibliography: p. 283–293.

4011. Hislop, Codman. The Mohawk; illustrated by Letterio Calapai. 1948. xv, 367 p. 48–9184 F127.M55H57
Bibliography: p. 339–350.

4012. Howe, Henry F. Salt rivers of the Massachusetts shore; illustrated by John O'Hara Cosgrace II. xiv, 370 p. 51–14004 F64.H70
Bibliography: p. 351–358.

4013. Hutchison, Bruce. The Fraser; illustrated by Richard Bennett. 1950. 368 p. 50–10549 F1089.F7H8
Bibliography: p. 351–355.

4014. Minter, John Easter. The Chagres, river of westward passage; illustrated by William Wellons. 1948. xiv, 418 p. 48–7786 F1569.C4M5
Bibliography: p. 393–403.

4015. Roberts, Leslie. The Mackenzie; illustrated by Thoreau MacDonald. 1949. 276 p. 49–8302 F1060.9.M26R6
Bibliography: p. 255–256.

4016. Stokes, Thomas L. The Savannah; illustrated by Lamar Dodd. 1951. 401 p. 51–9387 F277.S3S8
Bibliography: p. 382–388.

4017. Waters, Frank. The Colorado; illustrated by Nicolai Fechin, maps by George Annand. 1946. 400 p. 46–6192 F788.W3
Bibliography: p. 389–393.

4018. CARMER, CARL L., ed.

4019. Bissell, Richard P. The Monongahela; illustrated by John O'Hara Cosgrave II. 1952. 239 p. 52–5562 F157.M58B5
Bibliography: p. 231–233.

4020. Carmer, Carl L. The Susquehanna; illustrated by Stow Wengenroth. 1955. 493 p. 53–8227 F157.S8C3
Bibliography: p. 457–465.

4021. Dykeman, Wilma. The French Broad; illustrated by Douglas Gorsline. 1955. 371 p. 54–9349 F443.F8D9
Bibliography: p. 349–356.

4022. Holbrook, Stewart H. The Columbia; illustrated by Ernest Richardson. 1956. 393 p. 55–10527 F853.H6

4023. Savage, Henry. River of the Carolinas, the Santee; illustrated by Lamar Dodd. 1956. 435 p. 56–6469 F277.S28S3
Bibliography: p. 411–415.

4024. Smith, Frank E. The Yazoo River; illustrated by Janet E. Turner. 1954. 362 p. 53–9242 F347.Y3S6 1954
"Acknowledgments and bibliography": p. 347–350.

4025. Songs of the rivers of America; music arranged by Dr. Albert Sirmay. 1942. xi, 196 p. 43–2356 M1629.S225S6
To accompany the series The Rivers of America.

B. New England: General

4026. Brewer, Daniel Chauncey. The conquest of New England by the immigrant. New York, Putnam, 1926. 369 p. 26–12327 F9.B83
With all the fervor of his Puritan ancestry, the author laments the expansion of industrialism that brought increasing numbers of non-English speaking immigrants to New England after 1880. His book, however, supplies a view, hardly to be found elsewhere, of the replacement of the old New Englanders by a foreign-born population. The author, however, did not "despair of the Yankee as a potent force in the community," although he wrote too soon to record how completely the newcomers have absorbed the old New England ideals of education, industriousness, and sobriety.

4027. Fox, Dixon Ryan. Yankees and Yorkers. New York, University Press, 1940. 237 p. (Anson G. Phelps lectureship on early American history, New York University) 40–13441 F122.F78
The occupation of New York lands by the people of New England during the colonial period and the "Great Migration" following the Revolution is the theme of these lectures, in which the similarities and differences of the Yankees and the "Yorkers" are brought out. Special attention is given to the clash of the two elements in the border area of uncertain ownership which became Vermont, and there is a very original chapter characterizing "Yankee Culture in New York." The author concludes: "There are characteristic differences which are creditable to each section, and each has found a benefit in the neighborly presence of the other."

4028. Holbrook, Stewart H. The Yankee exodus, an account of migration from New England. New York, Macmillan, 1950. xii, 398 p. 50–7972 E179.5.H65

Bibliography: p. 364–371.

This book pursues in an episodic and anecdotal manner the thesis explored by Mrs. Rosenberry (q. v.). The author follows his emigrants west of the Mississippi, and, in diminishing degree, the fortunes of their communities as far as the close of the 19th century.

4029. Mussey, June Barrows, ed. Yankee life by those who lived it, by Barrows Mussey. [1st Borzoi ed., rev.] New York, Knopf, 1947. 543 p. 47–11791 F3.M87 1947

First published in 1937 under title: We Were New England.

In order to check as well as supplement the image of New England gathered from histories and novels, the author has "taken from the autobiographies of New Englanders those passages which show what it felt like to live in the cradle of the nation." Extracts from 48 writers, ranging from the famous to the humble and obscure, and arranged under 19 topical headings, cover the three centuries before the Civil War. An alphabetical list of the persons who have been selected and their pertinent writings, with brief biographical comment, is brought together in "Yankee Lives:" p. 535–543.

4030. Rosenberry, Lois (Kimball) Mathews. The expansion of New England; the spread of New England settlement and institutions to the Mississippi River, 1620–1865, by Lois Kimball Mathews. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1909. xiv, 303 p. 9–29148 F4.R81

"Bibliographical notes" at end of each chapter except 1 and 10.

Mrs. Rosenberry's enlargement of her Radcliffe College dissertation first traces the history of the New England frontier from the settlement to the Revolution, describes the institutions by which its advance was effected, and estimates the effect upon it of warfare with the Indians, later joined and supported by the French in Canada. The second half of the book is concerned with the "Great Migrations from New England toward the West" which began immediately after Yorktown and continued more or less steadily until the Civil War, creating a belt centering along the 43rd parallel and extending west to the Mississippi. From 1787 "a second New England" was built up in Ohio, around Marietta and in the Western Reserve, and throughout the belt these "State builders" took with them their moral and intellectual ideals and institutions. "The history of New England," according to Mrs. Rosenberry, "is not confined to six states; it is contained in a greater and broader New England wherever the children of the Puritans are found."

4031. Wilson, Harold Fisher. The hill country of northern New England; its social and economic history, 1790–1930. New York, Columbia University Press, 1936. xiv, 455 p. (Columbia University studies in the history of American agriculture, 3) 37–755 HD1773.A2W5

Bibliography: p. [403]–437.

The region which the writer has singled out for study comprises most of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont, an area of scant population dependent upon farming. The author describes the impact of economic changes in the United States as a whole on northern New England: they terminated its self-sufficiency as early as 1830, and precipitated a complete readjustment of its economic and social life. The author describes the transition from a "meat-wool-grain region" to "a dairy-fruit-potato-poultry-and-garden-truck crop territory," with closer contacts with the outside world, and a developing summer recreation trade. "This wide-spread adjustment in the agriculture of the hill country, with its accompanying abandonment of sub-marginal farms, was called 'a triumph of selection, increased efficiency, and specialization,' in a report issued by the Department of Commerce in 1930." By that date the "deserted farm, instead of being thought wantonly abandoned, was regarded as the inevitable result of a readjustment to modern conditions."

C. New England: Local

NEW HAMPSHIRE

4032. Bowles, Ella (Shannon) Let me show you New Hampshire. New York, Knopf, 1938. 368 p. illus. 38–27408 F34.B69

A native of New Hampshire, the author has long been identified with its cultural life. This book is a series of Mrs. Bowles' "impressions, supplemented by personal research in historical background, by information furnished by certain state departments," and other sources. The result is an unsystematic volume of pleasant and unpretentious topical sketches, all informed by a quiet but sincere love of the State.

VERMONT

4033. Newton, Earle W. The Vermont story; a history of the people of the Green Mountain State, 1749–1949. With a foreword by Allan Nevins and an introduction by Dorothy Canfield Fisher. Montpelier, Vermont Historical Society, 1949. x, 281 p. (The American States) 49–9803 F49.N49
Bibliography: p. 272–274.

The director of the Vermont Historical Society has written, according to Dorothy Canfield Fisher, a "well-balanced, accurate and detailed account" of Vermont since its beginning. An initial chapter describes the land and the natural resources which have determined the development of the Green Mountain State. Part II chronicles events from the Bennington charter in 1749 to 1849, when frustrations from a lag in industrial growth, poor transportation, and a discouraging outlook for agriculture made migration to the West attractive. Part III deals with economic progress, cultural growth, and local government during the century 1849 to 1949. The book fills an immediate need for a readable one-volume history of the State and is lavishly provided with illustrations, many of them in color.

MASSACHUSETTS

4034. Hart, Albert Bushnell, ed. Commonwealth history of Massachusetts, Colony, Province and State; edited by Albert Bushnell Hart, with the cooperation of an advisory board of forty-two learned bodies. New York, States History Co., 1927–30. 5 v. 27–18867 F64.H32
Bibliography at end of each chapter.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Colony of Massachusetts Bay, 1605–1689.—v. 2. Province of Massachusetts, 1689–1775.—v. 3. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 1775–1820.—v. 4. Nineteenth century Massachusetts, 1820–1889.—v. 5. Twentieth century Massachusetts, 1889–1930.

Veteran American historian, Albert Bushnell Hart (1854–1943) performed a labor of love in bringing together the group of scholars who produced, in many instances from unpublished sources, this cooperative history of Massachusetts, and who maintained, under his experienced direction, a certain uniformity of style and treatment. All phases of public and private life—social, economic, cultural, religious, and political—have been treated in the successive epochs of the State's history from 1605 to the time of publication. In each volume the biography of a representative man of his community is presented to illustrate the character and ambitions of his fellow citizens: the elder John Winthrop, Cotton Mather, John Adams, Daniel Webster, and Charles William Eliot are the men thus singled out. The Commonwealth History has set the pattern for some, but unfortunately only a few, cooperative and scholarly histories of other states.

4035. Amory, Cleveland. The proper Bostonians. New York, Dutton, 1947. 381 p. ([Society in America series]) 47–11061 F73.37.A5
"Acknowledgments and bibliography": p. 361–367.

"Manufactured from interviews with Bostonians," this is a collective profile of the family-conscious, provincial, cultured, charitable, and yet frugal men and women who make up "the First Family Society of the Proper Bostonian." Far smaller than the Boston Social Register's 8,000 listees, it has yet "set its stamp on the country's fifth largest city [1940] so indelibly that when an outsider thinks of a Bostonian he thinks only of the Proper Bostonian." It is narrated in an informal, anecdotal style, with a sympathetic understanding of these sheltered beneficiaries of the great family trusts, and at the same time with a prying humor that penetrates rock-bound custom for a glimpse of modernity.

4036. Winsor, Justin, ed. The memorial history of Boston, including Suffolk County, Massachusetts. 1630–1880. Issued under the business superintendence of the projector, Clarence F. Jewett. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1880–81. 4 v.
1–12246 F73.3.W76

CONTENTS.—v. 1. The early and colonial periods.—v. 2. The provincial period.—v. 3. The revolutionary period. The last hundred years, pt. i.—v. 4. The last hundred years, pt. 2. Special topics.

The plan of this history originated with Clarence F. Jewett, "projector" of a number of large-scale coöperative histories during the 1870's and 80's, who in December 1879 turned over its development to the distinguished Harvard historian and librarian, Justin Winsor. The subjects of the chapters were assigned to more than sixty writers competent in their special fields, and the editor added notes only as needed "to give coherency to the plan." The contributors included such notables as Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Henry M. Dexter, Francis S. Drake, George C. Ellis, Asa Gray, Edward Everett Hale, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Henry Cabot Lodge, John Davis Long, Horace E. Scudder, Nathaniel S. Shaler, John Greenleaf Whittier (an 8-page poem), and Robert C. Winthrop. It has remained a classic among American city histories, and fifty years later "the fifth volume to this enduring quartet" was published by the Boston Tercentenary Committee: Fifty Years of Boston, a Memorial Volume Issued in Commemoration of the Tercentenary of 1930, Elisabeth M. Herlihy, chairman and editor (Boston, 1932. 799 p.). John T. Morse, Jr., a nonagenarian and the only surviving contributor to the Memorial History, contributed a review of it as a "Greeting" in this "fifth" volume.

4037. Scudder, Townsend. Concord: American town. Boston, Little, Brown, 1947. 421 p. 47–2755 F74.C8S35

"Bibliographical notes and acknowledgments": p. 391–395.

The site of the Massachusetts Provincial Congress in 1774–75, a battleground during the American Revolution, a community ruled by all its citizens in town meeting through three centuries, and the home of Emerson, Hawthorne, Alcott, and Thoreau, Concord has been chosen by the author as a typical American town in whose life the larger story of America is reflected. From its first settlement in 1635 through World War II the narrative unfolds in the lives, actions, and words of its people, resurrected by the author from minutes of town meetings, which sometimes report debates, church records, journals, and newspapers (since 1817), and placed in their regional and national setting through standard works of history and reference.

4038. Blanchard, Dorothy C. A. Nantucket landfall. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1956. 241 p. 56–6648 F72.N2B55

Nantucket is situated about 25 miles south of the Cape Cod peninsula across Nantucket Sound, and its island history has been shaped since the early 17th century by the wind and the sea. Its isolation offered refuge to liberty-loving settlers, its waters made it a famous whaling port, and its winds now fill the sails of a popular summer resort. The bibliography (p. 236–241) indicates the numerous sources drawn upon by the author to tell the story of the island's transformation from a sheep-raising colony, its unique part in the American Revolution and the War of 1812, the partial destruction of the town by fire in 1846, the California Gold Rush which drained its young men, the discovery of "coal-oil" which brought an end to whaling, and the summer-resort "boom" which brought the railroad and ultimately the automobile and airplane. The Indians, the Quakers, the men of action—Mayhews, Folgers, Macys, Coffins—and the tales of mutiny and shipwreck, are all part of the history of Nantucket, where a few handsome mansions, an old candle factory that houses whaling relics, and a Quaker meeting house turned museum, are reminders of its unique and colorful past.

RHODE ISLAND

4039. Richman, Irving Berdine. Rhode Island, a study in separatism. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1905. 395 p. (American commonwealths) 5–34187 F79.R53

Bibliography: p. [353]–385.

The author's principal object is "to point out the influence of Separatism in determining the course of events in Rhode Island during the 18th and 19th centuries." Part I, covering 1636–1689, summarizes the author's earlier and fuller work Rhode Island, Its Making and Its Meaning (New York, Putnam, 1902. 2 v.). The greater part of the volume is concerned with the century from 1690 to Rhode Island's ratification of the Constitution in 1790 (p. [65]–257). There is a substantial chapter on "The Son Rebellion" of 1842 (p. [285]–307) which finally brought Jacksonian Democracy to Rhode Island.

4040. Elliott, Maud (Howe) This was my Newport. Cambridge, Mass., Mythology Co., A. M. Jones, 1944. xxiv, 279 p. 44–9074 F89.N5E4

This daughter of Julia Ward Howe won a Pulitzer prize, with Laura E. Richards, for the biography of her mother published in 1917. Here she reminisces about the Newport which has been the home of her people from the beginning, and which "has been called, not without reason, the nation's social capital." The mecca of Southerners after the American Revolution, it became the gathering place of Boston intellectuals and New York socialites following the Civil War. Mrs. Elliott quotes freely from family letters to illustrate the growth of literary and artistic traditions, and the social life and sports of the personalities that made up Newport society. In the concluding "Part Five—Naval and Military," the author gathers together "both personal memories, and recollections which have been handed down from preceding generations, of distinguished officers who . . . have been connected with this little town where so much of our naval history has been made."

CONNECTICUT

4041. Shepard, Odell. Connecticut, past and present. New York, Knopf, 1939. xix, 316, xi p. 39–27511 F94.S48

With the enthusiasm of a "native son," and the impartiality of one "foreign-born" (Illinois in this instance), a professor of English at Trinity College, Hartford (1917–46), who is an author of note and a Pulitzer prize winner, sets down his interpretation of Connecticut. He describes the land and the landscape, significant historical episodes, old graveyards, farm and town life, and the trend of recent changes, and he discriminates the individuality of communities that, to a casual observer, look just alike. Dr. Shepard's observations are based on 20 years of traveling the highways and byways, and talking with the men, women, and children—Yankee born or immigrant—who make up the State. Those who still crave a heavier ration of historical and topographical fact he refers to Florence S. M. Crofut's Guide to the History and the Historic Sites of Connecticut (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1937. 2 v.).

4042. Osterweis, Rollin G. Three centuries of New Haven, 1638–1938. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1953. xv, 541 p.
52–12064 F104.N6O83

Provided with funds left by the New Haven Tercentenary Committee of 1938, the New Haven Colony Historical Society commissioned the author "to prepare a history of New Haven, which will be of interest to the general reader and of value to the historical scholar." This official Tercentenary History of the town from the landing at Quinnipiack on April 24, 1638, to 1938 is the result. It exemplifies the best canons of present-day social history by tracing in all aspects of community life the evolution of a semi-rural college town into a diversified modern city with a large immigrant population. The extensive bibliography (p. 437–479), chronology, and glossary at the end are of special interest to the scholar.

D. The Middle Atlantic States

4043. Thompson, Daniel G. Brinton. Gateway to a nation; the Middle Atlantic States and their influence on the development of the Nation. Rindge, N. H., R. R. Smith, 1956. 274 p.
55–11153 F106.T42

Bibliography: p. 252–260.

Unlike New England, the South, and the Southwest, the Middle Atlantic area "has seldom been regarded as a unit," so that this book is "in a sense an adventure in sectional history." Recognizing the similarities in spite of the different customs and cultures among the inhabitants of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, the author has explored the influence of the region on the political, industrial, and cultural growth of the Nation, especially during the colonial and early republican periods. The prevailing thought of the section has been "cosmopolitan and sophisticated," and no other has "maintained over the years such strong financial, commercial, and personal ties with all sections." The result is only a sketch, but the author hopes to stimulate others to study more intensely these states, that "have always been the nation's Atlantic gateway and have always been aware of our close ties to Western Europe."

NEW YORK

4044. New York State Historical Association. History of the State of New York. New York, Columbia University Press, 1933–37. 10 v.
33–11644 F119.N65

"Select bibliography" at end of most of the chapters.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Wigwam and bouwerie.—v. 2. Under duke and king.—v. 3. Whig and Tory.—v. 4. The new State.—v. 5. Conquering the wilderness.—v. 6. The age of reform.—v. 7. Modern party battles.—v. 8. Wealth and commonwealth.—v. 9. Mind and spirit.—v. 10. The Empire State.

The New York State Historical Association undertook the preparation and publication of this history at the suggestion of the State Executive Committee on the One Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary of the American Revolution in 1925, which had been endorsed by the Regents of the University of the State of New York. The cooperative product of the "best qualified specialists" under the direction of a single editor, Alexander C. Flick, State Historian, it is similar in concept to the Commonwealth History of Massachusetts (q. v.). This is the first history of New York to cover the whole stretch of time from its geological beginnings, and at the same time "the whole range of human interests."

4045. Kouwenhoven, John Atlee. The Columbia historical portrait of New York; an essay in graphic history in honor of the tricentennial of New York City and the bicentennial of Columbia University. With a foreword by Grayson L. Kirk. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1953. 550 p.
53–8181 F128.3.K6

PARTIAL CONTENTS.—Plans and prospects, 1614–1800.—The people get in the picture, 1800–1845.—

Mid-century panorama, 1845–1855.—Documents of change, 1855–1870.—The city in motion, 1870–1890.—Transit to the Greater City, 1890–1910.—"The Shapes Arise," 1910–1953.

Dating from 1626 to 1953, the 900 reproductions of maps, drawings, prints, watercolors, paintings, and photographs that have been selected for this book are arranged in seven groups "representing successive phases in the evolution of the city and of man's consciousness of it." Brief essays and separate captions describe the pictures, and make of them an intelligible sequence unfolding the greatest urban development of the New World.

4046. Weld, Ralph Foster. Brooklyn is America. New York, Columbia University Press, 1950. 266 p. illus. 50–8082 F129.B7W42 1950

Bibliography: p. [249]–254.

Brooklyn has been a familiar subject to the author since his doctoral dissertation (Brooklyn Village, 1816–1834) appeared in 1938. This is a revision and expansion of a series of feature articles which he contributed to the Brooklyn Eagle in 1948. It deals sympathetically with all the ethnic groups that have entered into the city's population from the Dutch pioneers of the 17th century to the Puerto Ricans of the 20th century. The Dutch, English, Irish, Germans, Negroes, Jews, Italians, Scandinavians, and lesser groups have all contributed characteristics to the American society which is Brooklyn. The city not only illustrates the necessity for practical cooperation and tolerance but practices them sufficiently to make them work—which is a hint, perhaps, that "Brooklyn can pass on to the apprehensive peoples of the world."

4047. Nevins, Allan, and John A. Krout, eds. The greater city: New York, 1898–1948. New York, Columbia University Press, 1948. 260 p. 48–8678 F128.5.N4

Contents.—Past, present and future, by Allan Nevins.—Framing the Charter, by J. A. Krout.—From Van Wyck to O'Dwyer, by Carl Carmer.—The city's business, by Thomas C. Cochran.—The social and cultural scene, by Margaret Clapp.

The distinguished editors join with three other contributors to portray the progress of Greater New York since the consolidation of the five boroughs of Manhattan, Brooklyn, the Bronx, Queens, and Richmond in 1898. During that eventful half-century the metropolis has achieved a real unity, originally lacking but now felt by its citizens amid all their diversity; it has controlled its growth and that of its region by zoning and other plans; it has created, or greatly strengthened, a group of outstanding institutions of higher culture; it has given women an unprecedented place in civic affairs; and it has adopted an entirely new social outlook giving rise to practical institutions and measures of social justice and social welfare.

4048. Still, Bayrd. Mirror for Gotham: New York as seen by contemporaries from Dutch days to the present. New York, University Press, 1956. 417 p. illus. 56–11979 F128.3.S85

From books, articles, letters, and diaries the author has brought together contemporary commentaries on the New York scene, from the Florentine Giovanni da Verrazano's observations concerning his visit to New York Harbor in 1524, to Beverly Nichols impressions of the "international flavor of the metropolis" in the late 1940's. These commentaries by Americans, British, French, Italians, Germans, and Austrians describe the physical appearance of the city, its commercial activities, "the standard of living, attitudes, and day-to-day behavior of its varied population; and the ways in which the city exerted its ever widening influence in the national life." The extensive "Notes" (p. 341–372) and "Bibliography" (p. 373–399) indicate the research that underlies the selection of the excerpts as well as the introductory passages to each selection, and the more general descriptions with which the author opens each of his ten chronological chapters. A social history of New York from 1850 to 1950, Lloyd Morris' Incredible New York, High Life and Low Life of the Last Hundred Years (New York, Random House, 1951. 370 p.), emphasizes the city's habitually spectacular modes of enjoying itself, by day and by night, indoors and out.

4049. Wilson, James Grant, ed. The memorial history of the City of New York, from its first settlement to the year 1892. [New York] New-York History Co., 1892–93. 4 v. illus., maps (part fold.), facsims. (part fold.) 1–14318 F128.3.W74

The editor of this history is widely known for his more extensive work: Appleton's Cyclopedia of American Biography, publication of which was completed in 1889. In 1888 the venerable George Bancroft suggested to the editor that he prepare "an equally trustworthy history of the city of New-York of the same character as the one that has recently appeared concerning Boston" (no. 4036). Four years later the first volume of this comprehensive four volume history appeared. It is composed of contributions by well-known writers including, in addition to the editor, Marcus L. Benjamin, Moncure D. Conway, Berthold Fernow, Charles R. Hildeburn, Henry Phelps Johnston, John Austin Stevens, and William L. Stone. The chronological sequence begins with the "Exploration of the North American Coast Previous to the Voyage of Henry Hudson," and ends in the third volume with a review of the "Constitutional and Legal History of New-York in the Nineteenth Century." The fourth volume consists of chapters on special topics such as suburban areas, authors, libraries, newspapers and magazines, music, churches, statues and monuments, medicine, science, etc.

4050. McKelvey, Blake. Rochester, the water-power city, 1812–1854. Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1945. xvi, 383 p.
A45–4785 F129.R7M24

4051. McKelvey, Blake. Rochester, the flower city, 1855–1890. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1949. xvii, 407 p. 49–10783 F129.R7M23

4052. McKelvey, Blake. Rochester: the quest for quality, 1890–1925. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1956. xiv, 432 p.
56–11284 F129.R7M238
Bibliography: p. [395]–404.

Written by the city historian, and supported by the municipal Kate Gleason Fund in the Rochester Public Library, these volumes represent a striking civic achievement. Each volume deals with a distinct period in Rochester's history. Its initial growth was the result of its location on the Genesee River, which early supplied the water power for the milling industry and served as an important local trade route. Its proximity to Lake Ontario encouraged commerce with Canada, and the opening of the Erie Canal in 1825 so increased economic activity that Rochester became within a few years "the boom town in America." With the potentialities of water power exploited by the mid-fifties, the citizens of the "Flower City" manifested an awakening civic and cultural pride. The emergence of individual and institutional leadership led to a period of growing civic achievement in the 70's and 80's, and culminated in "The Quest for Quality" from 1890 to 1925. The history of Rochester in those 35 years is typical of many other communities, and the author says that this volume "may be read as a case history of urban advance in the period of American history which saw the most intense campaigns for civic reform, the most conscientious application of Christianity to social problems, the most rapid consolidation of corporate enterprise, and the weaving of old-American and immigrant social and cultural traditions into the fabric which still underlies contemporary American civilization."

NEW JERSEY

4053. Cunningham, John T. This is New Jersey, from High Point to Cape May. Maps by William M. Canfield. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1953. 229 p.
53–11051 F134.C87

Most of the material in these pages appeared originally in The Newark News, which has been cited by the State of New Jersey and the American Association for State and Local History for successive series of articles which have aroused renewed interest, both in New Jersey's history and in its contemporary scene. The 166 miles from High Point to Cape May include mountains, cities, farms, and beaches, and the author has appropriately grouped the 21 county sketches that comprise this book into sections on "The Hill Country," "The City Belt," "The Garden Spot," and "The Jersey Shore." There are brief lists of references at the end of each of the sketches. There is a pictorial map of the State and of each county by a News staff artist, and the numerous fine photographs are well reproduced.

PENNSYLVANIA

4054. Buck, Solon J., and Elizabeth Hawthorn Buck. The planting of civilization in western Pennsylvania. Illustrated from the drawings of Clarence McWilliams & from photographs, contemporary pictures, & maps. [Pittsburgh] University of Pittsburgh Press, 1939. xiv, 565 p.
39–25307 F149.B83

This book is one of a series relating western Pennsylvania history, written under the direction of the Western Pennsylvania Historical Survey sponsored by the Buhl Foundation, the Historical Society of Western Pennsylvania and the University of Pittsburgh.

The authors, an outstanding archivist and his wife, survey the history of western Pennsylvania in all aspects from the coming of the settlers to the War of 1812—the economy, agriculture, and industry, social and intellectual life, and religion and politics. They analyze the natural environment, Indian culture, the French and British colonial systems, and the European background of the settlers in order to assess their impact on the civilization that developed on this new frontier, and laid the foundations for a vast industrial development. The book is written for the general reader, but "The Bibliographical Essay" (p. 496–537), indicating the large body of material which the authors have consulted, will particularly interest the scholar.

4055. Dunaway, Wayland F. A history of Pennsylvania. 2d ed. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1948. xviii, 724 p. (Prentice-Hall history series)
48–5945 F149.D85 1948

Dr. Dunaway, professor emeritus of American history in the Pennsylvania State College, originally published this college textbook in 1935, and in the second edition added a chapter on events through World War II and revised the chapters on the economic and social history of the later period to incorporate recent developments. The volume is in two parts breaking at 1790; in each the earlier chapters form a chronological sequence largely concerned with political events, and the later ones deal first with economic topics and then with social ones such as religion and education. A chapter in Part I on "Social Life and Customs" has no counterpart in Part II, and a chapter in Part II on "Mineral Industries" has no predecessor in Part I. The author's method consists largely in the piling up of details, which makes some of the economic chapters in particular somewhat forbidding, but the volume covers its subject in a conscientious if rather unimaginative fashion, and the selected bibliographies at the end of each chapter afford a guide to the very extensive literature of Pennsylvania history.

4056. Martin, Asa Earl, and Hiram Herr Shenk, eds. Pennsylvania history told by contemporaries. New York, Macmillan, 1925. xxi, 621 p. 25–4695 F149.M37

241 extracts from carefully selected sources in Pennsylvania history have been brought together and arranged under 15 topical headings, "to illustrate Pennsylvania's relation to all the important national events. Thus the book is designed as a supplementary text, to be used in connection with any standard history of the United States in order to coördinate the history of Pennsylvania with that of the country as a whole."

4057. Stevens, Sylvester K., Ralph W. Cordier, and Florence O. Benjamin. Exploring Pennsylvania: its geography, history, and government. Maps by Harold Faye. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1957. 624 p. 57–1473 F149.S76 1957

The Pennsylvania state historian collaborates with two educators in this textbook for secondary schools, which is so comprehensive and so attractively produced as to be considerably more suitable for the general reader than most publications of its kind. In addition to a geographical first chapter, a considerable historical survey which covers all aspects of life in Province and State, and descriptions of local, State, and national government at work, there are substantial treatments of conservation, community development, and of "How Pennsylvanians Make a Living." Besides other "teaching aids" which the general reader will probably ignore, there are lists of books and pamphlets, emphasizing State documents, and of audio-visual aids when available, at the end of each chapter.

4058. Rice, Charles S., and Rollin C. Steinmetz. The Amish year. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1956. 224 p. illus. 56–10989 BX8117.P4R45

This book contains an unusual body of photographs, for the Amish disapprove of "today's hasty civilization" which includes cameras, radios, and television sets along with vehicles run by gasoline and motors run by electricity. It aims to tell how the Amish of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, really live. The chapters are arranged by months, illustrating their characteristic activities from farm sales in January to the "simple and unadorned" Christmas celebration in December. The simplicity of Amish clothes, the tradition of barn-raising, the cultivation and curing of tobacco, the making of carriages, the "rare dignity" of their funerals and weddings, and the occasional unchaperoned barn dance and rodeo of the young are described in detail, so to "bring them back in focus as people instead of dolls on a gift-shop shelf or stylized figures on wall-paper." The Amish are typical of various groups in the United States who maintain a traditional way of life in the midst of 20th-century change.

4059. American Philosophical Society, Philadelphia. Historic Philadelphia, from the founding until the early nineteenth century; papers dealing with its people and buildings. Philadelphia, 1953. 331 p. (Its Transactions, new ser., v. 43, pt. 1) 53–7540 Q11.P6, n. s., v. 43, pt. 1

"Part of old Philadelphia, a map showing historic buildings & sites from the founding until the early nineteenth century, compiled by Grant Miles Simon," fold., in pocket.

In this volume the oldest learned and scientific society in America displays the interest of its members and that of other civic and patriotic organizations in the buildings of Philadelphia that have become a part of our national heritage. Luther P. Eisenhart, the editor of the Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, with the assistance of William E. Lingelbach, librarian of the Society, and two members of the National Park Service staff, chose the subjects and the authors of the papers. Philadelphia was the most community-minded of our colonial cities, embodying civic institutions in architectural forms, and it became the early capital of the United States, culturally as well as politically. This volume, copiously illustrated with plans and halftones, describes the surviving buildings and reconstructs the destroyed ones, either prominent in themselves, like Independence Hall or the First Bank of the United States or representative of the days when the Quaker City was the natural center of national life.

4060. Pennell, Elizabeth (Robins) Our Philadelphia; illustrated with one hundred & five lithographs by Joseph Pennell. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1914. xiv, 552 p. 14–20572 F158.5.P372

Returning to their native Philadelphia after an absence of a quarter of a century, Mr. and Mrs. Pennell produced this superb volume made up of Elizabeth's memories of her youth and the social scene in which it was passed, and of Joseph's masterly drawings with the lithographic crayon—"his record of the old Philadelphia that has passed and the new Philadelphia that is passing." Mrs. Pennell found the new city altered in appearance, population, and culture, chaotic and distasteful, and utterly "unlike my old Philadelphia, the beautiful, peaceful town where roses bloomed in the sunny back-yards and people lived in dignity behind the plain red brick fronts of the long narrow streets."

4061. Baldwin, Leland D. Pittsburgh; the story of a city. Illustrations by Ward Hunter. Pittsburgh, University of Pittsburgh Press, 1937. xiii, 387 p. 37–21620 F159.P6B2

This book is another in a series relating western Pennsylvania history written under the direction of the Western Pennsylvania Historical Survey sponsored jointly by the Buhl Foundation, the Historical Society of Western Pennsylvania, and the University of Pittsburgh.

"An impressionistic picture of the city's development" which covers the whole span of Pittsburgh's history but deals preponderantly with the more colorful period prior to the Civil War. The industrial and cultural development of the city since that time is confined to three chapters at the end. By 1860 "The Gateway to the West" had become an important manufacturing center and, with its 16 foundries and 25 rolling mills, was already specializing in iron and steel, but "the great age of the monopolies was still in the future." The cultural, social, and political accompaniments of this basic development, resulting in a "city of quaint and amusing contrasts," are concisely sketched.

MARYLAND

4062. Beirne, Francis F. The amiable Baltimoreans. New York, Dutton, 1951. 400 p. (Society in America series)

51–7387 F189.B1B543

Bibliography: p. 380–382.

Distinguished for its port, monuments, medical center, row houses, and its "Belles and Beauties," Baltimore is portrayed in its social life, personalties, and institutions against a background of history since it was chartered in 1729. The author's description of religious customs, the sports, the Cotillion, the Assembly, and the Supper Club contribute to build up a picture of Baltimore high society, which is "informal" and "at the same time both subtle and complex." Other chapters deal with Baltimore's Germans, Jews, and Negroes, and one of "Gastronomical Reflections" describes the flourishing and the latter-day decline of the famous Maryland cuisine.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

4063. Brown, George Rothwell. Washington, a not too serious history. Baltimore, Norman Pub. Co., 1930. 481 p. 31–3698 F194.B87

Bibliography: p. [446]–450.

A well-known newspaper columnist, and writer on political, labor, economic, and governmental questions, has written an entertaining history of Washington, which reveals more of its social life than can be derived from any other single volume. He gives much attention to the rise and fall of newspapers, to racetracks, lotteries, and the slave trade, to the rending effects of the Peggy Eaton affair, and to the sociable gathering places which have since vanished from Pennsylvania Avenue. The leisured way of life which prevailed in central Washington before 1917, and which is here described with nostalgic charm, has vanished beyond recall.

4064. Bryan, Wilhelmus Bogart. A history of the National Capital from its foundation through the period of the adoption of the organic act. New York, Macmillan, 1914–16. 2 v.

14–7093 F194.B9

Contents.—1. 1790–1814.—2. 1815–1878.

Based mainly on original sources, this is a detailed history of Washington from the selection of the site, in 1790–91, to the adoption, in 1878, of the commission form of government which has been in operation ever since. Although old-fashioned in approach, and often desultory in exposition, it is honest, careful, and thorough, and still remains the principal authority for Washington history during the period which it embraces.

4065. Kiplinger, Willard M. Washington is like that. [6th ed.] New York, Harper, 1942. 522 p. 51–4631 F196.K5 1942a

Bibliography: p. 493–499.

A staff of newsgatherers, magazine writers, and authors of books helped the author, who as a journalist had been cognizant of the Washington scene since 1916, to write a handbook on the "basic phases of Washington in the transition from war to peace and in the first stages of war." Since that time the men and details have changed, but the "machine as a whole runs on." It describes the workings of the Federal Government, and the functioning of the city which is host to the Nation and at the same time has "the earmarks of the average municipality of its size." It spells out the advantages and disadvantages of government service and living in Washington. Chapters on minority groups, the press, politics and lobbying, women's influence, and the "society swirl" with a yardstick for the social climbers, round out a comprehensive guide to the Nation's capital. While much of its information is now obsolete, no more comprehensive and realistic view has appeared since.

E. The South: General

4066. Cash, Wilbur J. The mind of the South. New York, Knopf, 1941. vii–xi, 429, xv p.
41–1848 F209.C3

The facts of history are analyzed to show that they fail to support the popular conception of civilization in the Old South as being divided between a ruling class of aristocracy and a "vague race" of poor whites. The author points to the emergence from frontier conditions of a "simple rustic figure," of intense individualism, romanticism, and puritanism, as the basic Southerner or "man at the center." The development of Southern society from the antebellum period to the late 1930's, and the psychological adjustments of Southerners to the economic, political, and social changes during those years, are traced to demonstrate that there is in the region as a whole "a complex of established relationships and habits of thought, sentiment, prejudices, standards and values, and association of ideas, which, if it is not common strictly to every group of white people in the South, is still common . . . to all but relatively negligible ones." A paperback reprint appeared in 1955 (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday. 444 p. Doubleday anchor book, A27).

4067. Cotterill, Robert S. The Old South; the geographic, economic, social, political, and cultural expansion, institutions, and nationalism of the ante-bellum South. 2d ed., rev. Glendale, Calif., Arthur H. Clark, 1939. 354 p.
39–12977 F213.C72 1939
Bibliography: p. [333]–344.

An attempt to summarize the work of the generation of writers who followed Ulrich B. Phillips (q. v.) and produce a pioneer synthesis of Southern history, with the development of Southern nationalism providing as much of a central theme as the story affords. Before 1820 the South expanded rapidly, especially during the Great Migration of 1815–19, into the cotton lands of Alabama and Mississippi, but it remained a heterogeneous mass, divided by a multitude of conflicting interests. Southern nationalism, based on sentiment rather than interest, was suddenly crystallized by the Missouri controversy of 1820, after which Southerners felt themselves to be a separate people, and all other Americans to be aliens. The basic cause of secession "was a love for the South so intense that it may be called patriotism"; the Civil War was lost through State rights, which kept the Confederate armies undermanned and undersupplied, but the Southern people were further unified and their spirit of nationalism intensified. The bibliography (p. [333]–344) is limited to the titles which the author has found most useful in teaching the subject.

4068. Couch, William T., ed. Culture in the South. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1934. xiv, 711 p.
34–1154 F215.C84

The director of the University of North Carolina Press (1932–45) brought together in this symposium the varying viewpoints of 31 contributors, who, as observers or participants, had long been familiar with the history of Southern culture broadly conceived, the political patterns, agrarian and industrial problems, and social conditions. This is no nostalgic retrospect of plantation aristocracy, slavery, and the Confederacy, but a "picture of the more important aspects of life in the present South and their historic background," which takes soundings as "the broad stream of southern life, muddy and turbulent and torrential at times and places, goes on its way." The contributors include, in addition to the editor, Benjamin A. Botkin, Donald Davidson, Jay B. Hubbell, George Fort Milton, Broadus Mitchell, Herman Clarence Nixon, Edd Winfield Parks, Josephine Pinckney, Charles W. Ramsdell, Rupert B. Vance, and John Donald Wade.

4069. Dodd, William E. The Old South; struggles for democracy. New York, Macmillan, 1937. 312 p.
37–31240 F212.D6

Only one of the projected four-volume history of the Old South by the distinguished historian and educator, William E. Dodd (1869–1940), was completed. The leading subjects of this volume are the "free homesteads, freedom of religion, self government and free trade" that attracted Europeans to Virginia, Maryland, and the Carolinas in the 17th century, and the struggles to maintain those freedoms, particularly against the agents of "Stuart economic nationalism," that laid the foundations of democratic government in the Old South.

4070. Eaton, Clement. A history of the Old South. New York, Macmillan, 1949. 636 p. 49–50281 F213.E2

Bibliography: p. 595–619.

A general history of the section down to 1860, which selects its details so as to focus attention on the way of life of the people, and emphasizes "those characteristics which are peculiarly 'Southern' and the historic processes which produce them." Its integrating theme is "the emergence of a regional culture, created by all classes of Southern society rather than by an elite, aristocratic group." The author's realistic outlook, in which sympathy and criticism are nicely balanced, is particularly in evidence in the three chapters (XIX–XXI) which survey Southern society during the ante-bellum decade: "The Social Pyramid, in 1850–60," "Molding the Southern Mind," and "The Chrysalis Stage of Southern Culture." The "citations" at the end of each chapter include articles in periodicals, which do not appear in the bibliography.

4071. Hesseltine, William B. The South in American history. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1943. xiv, 691 p. (Prentice-Hall history series, edited by Carl Wittke) 43–4910 F209.H48 1943

"Selected bibliography" at end of each chapter.

This revision of the author's A History of the South (1936) is a college textbook which extends chronologically from the founding of Jamestown to the domestic and foreign problems of the late 1930's. It presents the main current of political developments, and other aspects of history in strict subordination to this, in a detached, impartial, and unemotional if also somewhat colorless, manner. Its thesis, according to the author, "is that the South is American: its problems have been the nation's," and its "history is a vital part of the American story." Therefore, the book's "viewpoint is national rather than Southern, and it makes no attempt to meet the oft-uttered plea for 'the truth of history from the Southern standpoint.'"

4072. A History of the South. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1947–53. 6 v.

Major George Washington Littlefield, C. S. A. (1842–1920), an "empire-building cattleman" and banker of Austin, Texas, who had a deep interest in the welfare of the South, and was convinced that no available histories adequately portrayed the Confederacy, established the Littlefield Fund for Southern History at the University of Texas in 1914. Preparations for writing a ten-volume history of the South took shape in 1937. Meanwhile a similar project had been conceived at Louisiana State University, and the planning groups united to sponsor jointly A History of the South in ten volumes, to be edited by Wendell Holmes Stephenson and E. Merton Coulter. Four volumes are still unpublished, but as presently projected they are: Vol. 2, The Southern Colonies in the Eighteenth Century, 1689–1763, by Clarence Ver Steeg; Vol. 3, The Revolution in the South, 1763–1789, by John Richard Alden; Vol. 4, The South in the New Nation, 1789–1819, by Thomas P. Abernethy; and Vol. 10, The Present South, 1913–1946, by George Tindall.

4073. (Vol. 1) Craven, Wesley Frank. The Southern colonies in the seventeenth century, 1607–1689. 1949. xv, 451 p. 49–3595 F212.C7

"Critical essay on authorities": p. 417–433.

The influence of England on the economic and political development of Virginia, Maryland, and Carolina is emphasized as the author traces the beginnings of the "peculiar qualities" which characterize Southern society.

4074. (Vol. 5) Sydnor, Charles S. The development of Southern sectionalism, 1819–1848. 1948. 400 p. 48–7627 F213.S92

"Critical essay on authorities": p. 346–381.

The course of events that changed the South "from a position of great power in national affairs to the position of a conscious minority" is traced here.

4075. (Vol. 6) Craven, Avery O. The growth of Southern nationalism, 1848–1861. 1953. 433 p. 53–11470 F213.C75

"Critical essay on authorities": p. 402–419.

The story of the breach that developed between the North and the South "as seen through the evolution of Southern attitudes towards national events." It is "an effort to explain how the American states drifted into civil war through the breakdown of the democratic process in government."

4076. (Vol. 7) Coulter, Ellis Merton. The Confederate States of America, 1861–1865. 1950. 644 p. 50–6319 E487.C83

"Critical essay on authorities": p. 569–612.

Unlike most histories of this period, this volume does not center attention on the campaigns of the Civil War, but on secession and the problems faced by the Confederacy in maintaining a government and supplying an army, on the reactions of Southern society to the increasing stress of war, and on the internal dissensions of the Confederacy and its attempts to arrive at a negotiated peace.

4077. (Vol. 8) Coulter, Ellis Merton. The South during reconstruction, 1865–1877. 1947. xii, 426 p. 48–5161 F216.C6

"Critical essay on authorities": p. 392–407.

This, the first volume of the series to be published, pictures the South as it was at the end of the Civil War with its economy disrupted and its government carried on by an army of occupation. The author describes "the ordinary activities of the people, as they sowed and reaped, went to church, visited their neighbors, sang their songs, and sought in a thousand ways to amuse themselves. The point of view . . . is the South during Reconstruction—not Reconstruction in the South." Many direct quotations have been used to describe Southern reactions and desires during the period. The withdrawal of Federal troops in 1877 left the South, "within reasonable limits," to reconstruct itself.

4078. (Vol. 9) Woodward, Comer Vann. Origins of the new South, 1877–1913. 1951. 542 p. 51–14582 F215.W85

"Critical essay on authorities": p. 482–515.

Against a background of the social conditions that prevailed in the South after reconstruction, the author describes the South's progress on the road back to the political prestige which it had enjoyed during the ante bellum days.

4079. Odum, Howard W. Southern regions of the United States. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1936. 664 p. illus. (maps) tables, diagrs. 36–10075 F215.O28

Bibliography and source materials: p. 605–620.

As part of a general regional survey under the sponsorship of the Southern Regional Committee of the Social Research Council, Dr. Odum's study is limited "primarily to the eleven Southeastern States corresponding more nearly to the 'Old South,' beginning with Virginia and comprising the five pairs of states: North and South Carolina, Kentucky and Tennessee, Georgia and Florida, Alabama and Mississippi, Louisiana and Arkansas." It analyzes the natural resources, the technological development, the agricultural and industrial economy, and the institutions and folkways of these regions in terms of accomplishments and potentialities, and, graphically illustrating comparisons with other regions, indicates the adjustments necessary for "more effective reintegration of the southern regions into the national picture and thereby toward a larger regional contribution to national culture and unity." Eleven years later, in his The Way of the South; Toward the Regional Balance of America (New York, Macmillan, 1947. 350 p.), Dr. Odum has "tried to continue the spirit, methods, and purposes of the Southern Regional Study." The South, he is convinced, "affords the best testing ground for regional planning in the United States," since "regional imbalance is more marked" there than elsewhere. "The South lacks balance between agriculture and industry, as well as in agriculture . . . Particularly, the South is out of balance in its ratio of Negro to white and in its power to give equal opportunity to both."

4080. Osterweis, Rollin G. Romanticism and nationalism in the Old South. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1949. 275 p. (Yale historical publications. Miscellany, 49) 49–7620 F213.O8

"Bibliographical note": p. [240]–260.

The "cult of chivalry" was a major element in the romanticism which characterized the Southern States and contributed to differentiate them from the other regions of the United States. The author traces the origin, nature, accompaniments and significance of that cult as it was manifested in such centers as Richmond, Charleston, New Orleans, and the Southwest between the War of 1812 and 1861. "It provided the very essence" of Southern nationalism, which brought on the Civil War, and surviving slavery and the plantation system is today "the surviving atavism of antebellum civilization."

4081. Owsley, Frank Lawrence. Plain folk of the Old South. [Baton Rouge] Louisiana State University Press, 1949. xxi, 235 p. (The Walter Lynwood Fleming lectures in Southern history, Louisiana State University) 49–11743 F213.O94

Church and county records, unpublished census reports and population schedules, the older town and county histories, and the biographies, autobiographies, and recollections of locally prominent citizens have been analyzed to recreate this picture of the plain country folk of the South who were neither rich planters nor poor whites. The group includes the small slave-holding farmers, the nonslaveholders who owned land which they cultivated, the herdsmen on the frontier, pine barrens, and mountains, and the tenant families whose agricultural production indicated thrift, energy, and self-respect. In addition to maps of six precincts in the Alabama black belt, the book contains 91 tables which illustrate the author's "sampling method" in arriving at his conclusion that these "Southern folk" were a closely knit people whose balanced economy helped to sustain the South during the Civil War and reconstruction, and who contributed leadership in local politics, and a large number of individuals to the professions. They were a "vital element of the social and economic structure of the Old South."

4082. Simkins, Francis Butler. A history of the South. [2d ed., rev., enl.] New York, Knopf, 1953. xiii, 655, xxiii p.
52–8516 F209.S5 1953

Bibliography: p. 617–655.

The first edition of this book was published in 1947 under the title: The South Old and New; a History, 1820–1947; the new edition is considerably expanded, but remains, like the first, a frank presentation of the Southern conservative's outlook on the past. It contains five new chapters (II–VI) covering the colonial period and the Revolution, which depart from the view put forward in the original edition that the region did not acquire its true sectional character until about 1820, when the Negro question first appeared as a political issue. More than half of the book deals with the period relatively neglected in general treatments—the New South from the Civil War to 1952. Although the South has made remarkable strides since World War II, the author points out that it has still not caught up with industrial and economic advances in the Nation as a whole, and retains many characteristics from the past which make it a region apart.

4083. Thorp, Willard, ed. A Southern reader. New York, Knopf, 1955. 760 p. illus.
53–9473 F209.T48

An upstate New Yorker, who since childhood has found the South to be "the most exotic and exciting region in America," has brought together selections from the writings of more than a hundred Southerners or visitors to the South and arranged them in sections concerned with the land, the rivers, the people, agriculture, education, sports and pastimes, military achievements, the Negro, violence, politics, religion, cities and towns, business and industry, and the arts. There is an essay at the beginning of each section and a commentary upon the author or his work at the head of each extract. The Preface concludes with a table of cross-references between sections (p. ix–x). An index of the authors drawn upon, with the publications from which their selections have been taken, appears at the end.

4084. Vance, Rupert B. Human geography of the South; a study in regional resources and human adequacy. 2d ed. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1935. xviii, 596 p. (The University of North Carolina social study series)
Agr36–577 HC107.A13V3 1935

Bibliography: p. 512–579.

"This volume attempts to give a synthetic treatment of the interaction of men and nature in the American South." It deals with the physical and cultural backgrounds of the region; with soils, forests, livestock, cotton and other staple crops, and industry; with the highland, delta, and piedmont sections as special cases; and with the influence of climate and diet on health, energy, and human adequacy. The analysis of statistical indexes of wealth, education, cultural achievement, health, law, and order gives the Southern states the lowest rankings in the Nation. The author pointed to regional planning as the means of reconstructing the South and bringing it up to the national level. In 1949 Dr. Vance and others connected with the Division of Research Interpretation of the Institute for Research in Social Science of the University of North Carolina prepared, for the Committee on Southern Regional Studies and Education of the American Council on Education, a volume for the use of secondary schools: Exploring the South (Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1949. 404 p.) which reviews the natural and industrial resources of the South, in a much simpler manner, and recommends the development of resources through planning and cooperation on the part of communities large and small.

F. The South Atlantic States: Local

VIRGINIA

4085. Gottmann, Jean. Virginia at mid-century. New York, Holt, 1955. 584 p.
55–8141 F231.2.G6

Bibliographical footnotes. "Bibliographical suggestions and acknowledgments": p. 562–570.

A French geographer, attached to the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton, began 18 months of fieldwork in July 1953, and visited every county and city in the State. The result is this volume, copiously illustrated with photographs, maps, and graphs, "which attempts to describe the Commonwealth of Virginia as it is today and to examine objectively its resources, its problems, and its potentialities." The first part deals with demography, historical development, and regional divisions. The second analyzes the use of forests, farmland, and "the underground," manufacturing, and the phenomena of location. The third part presents the problems of metropolitan growth and its effects in migrations, highways, and schools in a tone of qualified optimism. There is a final assessment of "the personality of Virginia." The whole constitutes the most systematic, thorough-going, and up-to-date survey of any state of the Union.

4086. Kocher, Alfred Lawrence, and Howard Dearstyne. Shadows in silver; a record of Virginia, 1850–1900, in contemporary photographs taken by George and Huestis Cook, with additions from the Cook collection. New York, Scribner, 1954. xxiv, 264 p. 54–5917 F231.K75

The major part of the photographs used here were made in Virginia between 1865 and 1900 by George S. Cook, "the dean of Virginia cameramen," and his younger son Huestis, but some are by other Virginia photographers whose plates were purchased by the Cooks. The compilers have grouped the photographs to illustrate the towns, taverns, and the country store; the plantation and countryside; and the social life of the people of Virginia during the last half of the 19th century. Each group of photographs is provided with an introductory essay, and each photograph is accompanied by an identifying caption. The whole provides a remarkable graphic record of Virginia in an age of transition and readjustment.

4087. Rothery, Agnes Edwards. Virginia, the new dominion, illustrated by E. H. Suydam. New York, Appleton-Century, 1940. xiii, 368 p. 40–27455 F231.R85

A personal and impressionistic presentation, which combines a geographical with a topical approach and passes lightly from past to present, finding much to approve in each. This smoothly written volume maintains a quiet dignity of tone and imparts a quantity of various information in painless manner. "The lordly quality of independence" developed by the old Virginia planter has been inherited by the modern community—"there is no place in the United States where the people are more free from timorousness and arbitrary restrictions." The attractiveness of the volume is enhanced by Mr. Suydam's graceful drawings, although some should have been reproduced on a larger scale than they are here.

4088. Wertenbaker, Thomas J. Norfolk; historic southern port. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1931. 378 p. (Duke University publications) 31–31634 F234.N8W4

The well-known Princeton professor of history wrote this volume under contract with the city government of Norfolk. Emphasis is placed on the first two centuries of Norfolk's history, with the period from 1880 to 1930 treated in outline, "more as a sequel to the main body of the story, than as an integral part of the history itself." Norfolk's failure to develop into a port of the first importance is ascribed to "the short-sighted policy of the Virginia legislature" after 1835, which denied her adequate railway connections.

WEST VIRGINIA

4089. Ambler, Charles Henry. West Virginia, the mountain state. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1940. xviii, 660 p. (Prentice-Hall books on history, edited by C. Wittke) 40–5238 F241.A523

A History of West Virginia, published in 1933, is here rewritten to include supplementary data and new chapters on the Revolutionary and Civil War periods. Of its two parts, Part I deals with topography, early settlements, institutional beginnings, warfare, social conditions, education, and politics in western Virginia down to 1860. The inhabitants of this area disapproved of Virginia's secession from the Union, and it was admitted as a separate State in 1862. West Virginia's political beginnings and industrial, cultural, and economic development to 1940 are described in Part II. A "Roster of West Virginia State Elective Officers and her Senators and Representatives in Congress," and a list of "West Virginia Counties" appear in the appendixes. The author was a professor of history at West Virginia University from 1917 to 1947.

NORTH CAROLINA

4090. Lefler, Hugh Talmage, and Albert Ray Newsome. North Carolina; the history of a southern State. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1954. xii, 676 p. 54–7904 F254.L39

Bibliography: p. [611]–639.

"This volume was designed to meet the requirements of the general reader who desires a comprehensive view of the state's history within reasonable compass," and "to serve as a text for college courses in North Carolina history." To fulfill that objective the authors have presented a narrative that deals with developments and leaders in the fields of agriculture, industry, transportation, trade, education, religion, literature, and social life, as well as with military and political history. The last six chapters deal with progress during the 20th century, and the impact of outside forces such as two world wars, the depression of 1929, and the policies of the New Deal on the State's development. Lists of the "Chief Executives of North Carolina," "North Carolina Counties," and "Significant Dates," appear in the appendixes. Professor Newsome died in 1951 leaving approximately half of the manuscript completed. The task was finished by Dr. Lefler, who, in 1956, published the third edition of his North Carolina History Told by Contemporaries (Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press. 502 p.), a collection of contemporary accounts illustrating the political, social, and economic development of North Carolina from its colonial beginnings, to be used as a supplementary text for either high school or college courses.

SOUTH CAROLINA

4091. Taylor, Rosser H. Ante-bellum South Carolina: a social and cultural history. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1942. 201 p. (The James Sprunt studies in history and political science, v. 25, no. 2)

42–37311 F251.J28, v. 25, no. 2

Bibliography: p. [187]–198.

In this study subsidized by the Southern Regional Committee of the Social Science Research Council, the author has used manuscript diaries, letters, and other records of South Carolinians in both private and public libraries, as well as printed sources, to reconstruct a picture of society as it appeared in the decades preceding the Civil War. There are substantial chapters on the life of women, medical practice, education, and religious life; but the author's main emphasis is upon the determination of the majority to resist social change, and to maintain special safeguards for a social system based upon Negro slavery.

4092. Wallace, David Duncan. South Carolina, a short history, 1520–1948. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1951. 753 p.

51–13847 F269.W26

Bibliography: p. [715]–721.

The author, of Wofford College at Spartansburg, S. C., died after completing this reduction of his three-volume History of South Carolina, published by the American Historical Company in 1934, and the work of seeing it through the press was completed by his son. Readers are referred to the larger work for citations of sources. Political developments receive the greatest space, but from time to time separate chapters are allotted to economic, social, intellectual, legal, and ecclesiastical affairs. The writer strove with much success to be "an impartial friend of the truth": "From 1832 to 1860 South Carolina was in effect not so much a part of the country as a dissatisfied ally, for the last thirteen years of the period only awaiting a favorable opportunity to dissolve the alliance." Less than a quarter of the book (p. 556–700) is devoted to the period since 1865. Among the appendixes are a list of the governors since 1669, population tables, by counties since 1790, and a list of existing counties with the dates of their creation.

4093. Molloy, Robert. Charleston, a gracious heritage; illus. by E. H. Suydam. New York, Appleton-Century, 1947. xiii, 311 p. plates. (Century city series) 47–11944 F279.C4M6

Bibliography: p. 293–297.

With "its reputation for aristocratic appearances, punctilious manners, and an atmosphere of unforgettable individuality," and a history that goes back to the 1670's, the charm of Charleston as the center of culture and social life in South Carolina is evoked in this description of its old streets and homes, churches and historic sites, and the world-famous gardens of its environs. The author describes the leisurely life, the affability, and the characteristic speech of a people who have withstood wars, fires, and hurricanes to maintain, in the face of modernity, the distinction and personality that are Charleston. The effectiveness of the text is enhanced by the "rich and perceptive drawings" of the late Edward H. Suydam, who died seven years before the book appeared; the Century city series includes this and 13 other volumes which he illustrated.

GEORGIA

4094. Coulter, Ellis Merton. Georgia, a short history. Rev. and enl. ed. of A Short History of Georgia. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1947. 510 p.

47–2917 F286.C78 1947

"Select bibliography": p. [456]–474.

A southerner by birth, the author has been a member of the history faculty of the University of Georgia since 1919 and has written many contributions to Southern history. The first edition of this book appeared in 1933 to supply the need for a short history of the State. To the revised edition have been added "a great many short bits of information, and here and there longer passages, in addition to remaking the last chapter entirely, to bring the narrative up to the present." The volume covers the whole span of Georgia's history from its foundation as an "experiment in philanthropy" to the revision of the State constitution in 1945, but only a quarter of it is devoted to the years since 1865.

4095. Meadows, John C. Modern Georgia. Rev. Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1954. 352 p. 55-15747 F291.M4 1954
"Supplementary readings": p. 347.

First published in 1946 following a request from the chancellor of the University of Georgia that "a volume be prepared describing the physical and human resources of the state," this book was also revised in 1948 and 1951. It includes much information about the composition of the population, the public schools and other educational facilities, the health and public welfare services, and the industries and government of the State. Some comparable data for the Southeast and for the United States have been given to illustrate Georgia's place in the region and in the Nation as a whole. The author, a professor of sociology at the University of Georgia, has written especially for college students, but believes that the book will interest the general reader who wants to know more about the problems of the State.

FLORIDA

4096. Hanna, Kathryn T. (Abbey) Florida, land of change. [2d ed., rev. and enl.] Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1948. 455 p. 48-9796 F311.H3 1948
Bibliography: p. 410-435.

A colony first of Spain, of Britain from 1763 to 1784, and then of Spain again, Florida played an important part in the early "international maneuverings" of the United States. The author emphasizes the influences of foreign domination that have persisted in the history of Florida. The last quarter of the book deals with the period since 1865 and includes a chapter on the Northern "developers" who gave Florida its modern character: Hamilton Disston of Philadelphia, Henry B. Plant, and Henry M. Flagler of Cleveland. The first edition appeared in 1941; this revision contains additional information on the development of the State in the 20th century.

G. The Old Southwest: General

4097. Clark, Thomas D. The rampaging frontier; manners and humors of pioneer days in the South and the Middle West. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1939. 350 p. 39-10115 E161.C57
Bibliography: p. [341]-350.

The author, a native of Mississippi, has been head of the history department of the University of Kentucky since 1945. He has departed from conventional methodology and selected humorous stories to present a "well-rounded picture of the life of the common man," phrased, in part, in the vernacular of the backwoods frontier. The principal source for his stories is the general sporting magazine, the Spirit of the Times, edited by William T. Porter from 1835 until his death in 1858. The book covers the period from 1775 to 1850 and is confined generally to the region "west of the Allegheny Mountains, and within the boundaries of Tennessee and south of the Yankee line in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois . . . as far west as the ends of Missouri and Arkansas." It is "highly flavored by the Kentucky influence, but so was frontier society."

4098. Dick, Everett N. The Dixie frontier, a social history of the Southern frontier from the first transmontane beginnings to the Civil War. New York, Knopf, 1948. xix, 374, xxv p. 48-5379 F396.D5
Bibliography: p. 341-374.

Not merely the Old Southwest and its trans-Mississippi extensions in Arkansas and Missouri, but also the southern two-fifths of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois were settled by a great migration of the Southern people which began flowing into Kentucky about 1775, and did not end until the Civil War. In this whole vast area they created an essentially unitary, distinctively Southern frontier culture, which in many places persisted until and even after the Civil War. This culture Professor Dick of Union College, Lincoln, Neb., describes in a colorful series of topical chapters, without attempting to discriminate regional variations or temporal successions. They include, among the more usual subjects, "The Slave as Pioneer," "Going to Market," "Good Times," "Sports," "The Frontier Town," "Professional Amusement," "The Great Revival," "Frontier Justice," "Frontier Manufactures," "The Frontier Woman," "Border Food," "Pioneer Dress," and "Frontier Speech." Two final chapters on "Frontier Characteristics" attempt to strike no balance between the prevailing qualities of self-reliance, versatility, native intelligence, and hospitality, on the one hand, and the evidences of ferocity, shiftlessness, chicanery, and contempt for education which were inextricably mingled with them.

H. The Old Southwest: Local

ALABAMA

4099. Moore, Albert Burton. History of Alabama. University, Ala., University Supply Store, 1934. 834 p. 36–5627 F326.M823

Bibliographies at end of most of the chapters.

A topical history of Alabama, by a professor of history at the University of Alabama since 1923, this volume is a revision of the author's three-volume History of Alabama and Its People published in 1927. After a brief review of the local Indians and of the colonial regimes, the detailed narrative begins with "The Coming of American Pioneers" in the first decade of the 19th century, and continues to the election of 1934. The point of view is honestly and vigorously "Dixiecrat." A final chapter summarizes 20th-century trends in political reform, local government, child welfare, education, prison reform, public health, and the conservation of natural resources.

LOUISIANA

4100. Louisiana. Legislative Council. Louisiana; its history, people, government and economy. Baton Rouge, 1955. 285 p. (Its Research study no. 7) 56–62531 JK4771.A32, no. 7

"This book presents information concerning the history, the people, the government, and the economy of Louisiana in brief, narrative form supplemented by valuable statistical data, thus making available in one place the highlights of the development of Louisiana." Originating in an idea of Senator Robert A. Ainsworth, chairman of the Legislative Council, and compiled by the Council staff under the direction of Emmett Asseff, it incorporates information provided by twelve departments of the Louisiana Government. Among the subjects treated by the 23 chapters are "Elections," "Louisiana Local Government," "Fairs and Festivals," "Highways," and "State Revenues and Expenditures." The introduction notes seven specific State trends by comparing figures of 1939 with those of 1953.

4101. Tinker, Edward Larocque. Creole city: its past and its people. New York, Longmans, Green, 1953. 359 p. illus. 53–5615 F379.N5T53

Born in New York City, the author, after his marriage to Frances McKee of New Orleans in 1916, became interested in his wife's hometown, took up writing as a career, and has become an outstanding collector and authority on the French period and the French language in Louisiana and old New Orleans. Mr. Tinker has twice received the French Academy's Gold Medal for his writings in this field. In this book materials that have appeared in various periodicals are brought together to illustrate the amalgamation of the native population and the American influx which took place after 1803 and "the way in which each has modified the thoughts and habits of the other" so as to develop a new manner of life and to settle down into "a perfect union." With infectious enthusiasm for his subject, the author describes the picturesque characters of the port city—the French, the Cajuns, the free men and women of color—the succulence of Creole dishes, and the gaiety of the Mardi Gras in an informal history of "the City that care forgot."

ARKANSAS

4102. Fletcher, John Gould. Arkansas. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1947. 421 p. 47–30331 F411.F5

"Acknowledgement": p. 403–405.

In 1936 the author, a Pulitzer prize winning poet, was commissioned by the leading newspaper of Little Rock to write The Epic of Arkansas in honor of the centenary of his native State. With a passionate interest in the cultural development of his people, he wrote this book about Arkansas ten years later. In it he combines an anecdotal history with a description of the two distinct types of population, one found in the Ozark Mountain region of the northwestern half of the State, and the other in the lowlands of the southeastern half. He describes the economic worlds of those types, mountaineers and sharecroppers, and analyzes the combination of Southern and frontier characteristics which has produced the "Arkansawyer." He looks askance at the development of industry in the State by outside interests, and at the influence of Northern attitudes on racial relationships, and insists that any human progress in Arkansas must come from within.

TENNESSEE

4103. Abernethy, Thomas Perkins. From frontier to plantation in Tennessee; a study in frontier democracy. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1932. 392 p. 32–12393 F436.A17
Bibliography: p. [365]–376.

Believing that the study of a single state with emphasis on its development as a community should throw new light on the growth of American democracy, the author selected Tennessee which is unique as the first state to undergo the territorial status, and as the site of the earliest "organized transmontane settlements." He traces the State's growth from the Wautauga settlement in 1768 to the Civil War and throws new light on the conflict between the interests of land speculators and the welfare of the people. "The first offspring of the West was not democracy but arrant opportunism." However, the popular interest finally triumphed under the leadership of such men as William Carroll, Governor from 1821–35, and Andrew Johnson, Governor from 1853–57, who "never erred from his purpose of improving the condition of the masses, politically, economically, and intellectually," and was, in fact, "the only true and outstanding democrat produced by the Old South."

4104. Govan, Gilbert E., and James W. Livingood. The Chattanooga country, 1540–1951: from tomahawks to TVA. New York, Dutton, 1952. 509 p. 52–5307 F444.C4G6
Bibliography: p. [469]–488.

From its domination by the Cherokee Indians, which lasted until 1838, to the development of its natural resources by the Tennessee Valley Authority, the economic and social life of the Chattanooga region is analyzed "in the light of local, state and national events . . . to see how they were influenced by or contributed to the greater stream of history." The "Chattanooga country" is taken to include much of northern Georgia and Alabama and of western North Carolina as well as of southeastern Tennessee, and this work therefore escapes the cramping effects which artificial boundaries often exert upon local histories. Economic and social developments are given considerably more attention than political ones.

4105. Capers, Gerald M., Jr. The biography of a river town; Memphis: its heroic age. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1939. 292 p. 39–27481 F444.M5C3
"Bibliographical statement": p. [269]–279.

This "comprehensive outline of the history of Memphis before 1900" was submitted to Yale University in 1936 as a doctoral dissertation. The author chose his subject because of his conviction that cities have been neglected as approaches to the study of regions, and "are often more representative of fundamental economic interests than artificial political divisions like the state." Connected with the upper valley by the Mississippi River trade, and with the South by the local agriculture, Memphis was "born in 1819 of the westward movement and of cotton" and had its boom years in the 1840's and 50's. "Figuratively and literally, the South met the West in Memphis." Memphis neglected public sanitation and so lost its relative position among American cities through the terrible yellow fever epidemics of the 1870's.

KENTUCKY

4106. Clark, Thomas D. A history of Kentucky. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1937. xv, 702 p. (Prentice-Hall history series, C. Wittke, editor) 37–16054 F451.C63
Bibliography: p. 625–666.

"Kentucky has been viewed as an important factor in the settlement of both the South and the trans-Mississippi West." Its history, from the conflict between English and French for the control of the western lands which later became Kentucky to the middle 1930's, is traced in this college textbook, which attempts to set forth "the salient points of Kentucky's social, economic, and political growth." The Appendix includes a list of "The Governors of Kentucky."

4107. Davenport, Francis Garvin. Ante-bellum Kentucky, a social history, 1800–1860. Oxford, Ohio, Mississippi Valley Press, 1943. xviii, 238 p. (Annals of America, v. 5) 43–17548 F455.D36
"Bibliography of manuscript sources": p. [227]–228.

The first sixty years of the 19th century witnessed a rapid development of education, medicine, science, religion, the arts, and literature in Kentucky—an important outpost of civilization. The author adds a caution that this cultural progress was not evenly distributed in an area which contained both rich and poor, the ignorant and the learned, the conservative and the liberal, and the religious and the irreligious. He examines the elements of culture among the country folk, the townspeople, and in the colleges. In education he notes Kentucky's emphasis on the fields of medicine, surgery, botany, geology, and chemistry, and the activity of distinguished physicians, teachers, and naturalists. Social reform found expression in new legislation and state-controlled institutions for the less fortunate members of society. Cultural progress became articulate in a small group of artists and a much larger number of essayists, poets, journalists, and historians. All gave distinction to this period in Kentucky history, which "resembled the life of the growing nation and was part of it."

MISSOURI

4108. Gist, Noel P., and others, eds. Missouri, its resources, people, and institutions. Columbia, Curators of the University of Missouri, 1950. 605 p. 50–62749 F466.G4

Includes bibliographies.

This book, prepared by the University of Missouri, "and presented to the people of Missouri as a public service," is the joint work of a number of specialists, writing in their respective fields of competence, to "describe and interpret Missouri's natural and human resources, to indicate significant changes that are occurring in various fields, and to appraise realistically the trends and situations which should be of concern to the people of the State." Its 28 chapters deal with such topics as water resources, mines and minerals, population, cities and towns, agriculture, manufacturing, public utilities, courts and administrative tribunals, social services, libraries, and the arts.

I. The Old Northwest: General

4109. Atherton, Lewis Eldon. Main Street on the Middle Border. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1954. xix, 423 p. 54–7970 F354.A8

Recalling the social activities of the rural and village life to which he was born, and the stories, historical and otherwise, exchanged around the country store stove, the author writes with affection a cultural and economic history of midwestern country towns, limited for the most part to less than 5,000 population, during the years from 1865 to 1950. The Middle Border is defined as the region embracing the states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Iowa and the eastern farming fringe of Kansas, Nebraska, and the Dakotas. A professor of history at the University of Missouri since 1946, the author has drawn upon country newspapers, reminiscences, autobiographies, and some manuscript sources, as well as representative fiction, to produce a solidly based regional synthesis. The prevalent sentiment of decline and decay, the author holds, is a consequence of false values and a materialistic doctrine of progress viewed as growth in numbers and real-estate prices; the amenities and possibilities of life in small, semi-rural communities have been allowed to lapse through disillusionment and lethargy.

4110. Baldwin, Leland D. The keelboat age on western waters. With chapter decorations by Harvey B. Cushman. Pittsburgh, University of Pittsburgh Press, 1941. xiv, 268 p. 41–10342 F351.B18

Bibliography: p. [235]–252.

One of a series from the Western Pennsylvania Historical Survey sponsored jointly by the Buhl Foundation, the Historical Society of Western Pennsylvania and the University of Pittsburgh, this book, in its original form, was a dissertation submitted to the University of Michigan in 1932. It deals, for the most part, with the three decades before the coming of the steamboat (1783–1815) when keelboats, barges, and other varieties of watercraft were used on the Mississippi, the Ohio, and their tributaries to transport goods from the Great Valley to eastern markets via New Orleans, and immigrants in their search for new homes. Chapters are devoted to the "Art of Navigation" in shallow, winding, and snag-infested waters, the "River Pirates" who were largely eliminated by 1812, and "Shipbuilding" for oceanic commerce. The boatmen, a robust and colorful tribe, "brought from New Orleans and Pittsburgh to the crude villages of the West some of the comforts and fashions of life, as well as the necessities," and the old "Mrs. Sippi" with her thousand tentacles "bound the nation into an indissoluble union."

4111. Bond, Beverley W. The civilization of the Old Northwest; a study of political, social, and economic development, 1788–1812. New York, Macmillan, 1934. 543 p. 34–1805 F479.B69

Following the American Revolution the necessity of attracting settlers to the area between the Ohio, the Mississippi, and the Great Lakes to protect it from Indian and foreign depredation became apparent. Once the lands were ceded to the Nation by Virginia, Connecticut, New York, and Massachusetts, Congress recognized the opportunity to work out a policy of land distribution on a democratic basis with like terms to all applicants, and an ultimate "position of equality with the original states." The Land Ordinance of 1785 and the Government Ordinance of 1787 implemented that policy, and the blending of settlers from New England, the Middle States, and the South with other racial elements created a "hard-headed, democratic, and aggressive population" in the Territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio. The central theme of this book is "the development, institutional, social, and economic, of the civilization of the Old Northwest" in the period between 1788 and 1812, during which the Northwest Territory was divided into the state of Ohio, and the territories of Indiana, Michigan, and Illinois.

4112. Buley, Roscoe Carlyle. The Old Northwest; pioneer period, 1815–1840. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1951 [°1950] 2 v. 52–6466 F484.3.B94 1951

"Bibliographical essay": v. 2, p. [627]–646.

Published by the Indiana Historical Society as a contribution to the Sesquicentennial of Indiana Territory in 1950, this history brought honor to the author, and to the society as "the first historical society ever to publish a Pulitzer Prize winner." A native of Indiana, steeped in its tradition and lore, the author has written a detailed and documented account of the quarter-century that witnessed the flow of settlers into the Old Northwest following the War of 1812, the admission of Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan to statehood, and the organization of the new Territory of Wisconsin. The progress of settlement, economic development, and politics is recorded in chronological chapters, while large topical ones deal with pioneer life, medicine, transportation, education, religion, and literature and science. The author has freely used the words of contemporaries and has employed colloquialisms and expressions of the period in his own text, in order "to capture something of the attitudes and beliefs, struggles and way of life of the time and place," in this "balanced summary of the record."

4113. Garland, John H., ed. The North American Midwest, a regional geography. New York, Wiley, 1955. 252 p. 55–9845 F354.G3

"Selected bibliography": 243–245.

Fifteen topical and regional specialists have contributed to this enthusiastic book. The Midwest is described as an inner zone including the West-Central Lowland, the East-Central Lowland, the Eastern Lower Great Lakes, and the Upper Mississippi Valley, encircled by a periphery comprising the Upper and Lower Great Lakes, the Ohio Valley, the Ozark Upland, and the Lower and Upper Missouri Valley. The region is uniquely distinguished among continental interiors by its distance from the ocean, its diversity of transportation routes, its large metropolitan centers, its materials and markets for manufacturing, the productive capacity of its soils, its abundance of coal, iron, and other minerals, its unequaled water resources in the Great Lakes and the Mississippi, uniformly favorable climate for the production of high-yielding crops, and "the most optimistic people in the world."

4114. Hatcher, Harlan H. The Great Lakes. New York, Oxford University Press, 1944. 384 p. 44–9419 F551.H36

Bibliography: p. 371–374.

A native Ohioan, the author rose from instructor to vice-president of the University of Ohio (1922–51), and has written several books focused on the region of the Great Lakes. Forming the boundary between the United States and Canada, the Great Lakes are spanned by eight international bridges and a tunnel, which link the countries "in amity at the key points on the Lakes." The subject of this book is "the story of this mighty region—its formation, its discovery, the struggle for its possession, its exploitation, the rise of its cities, the history and romance of its ships." Part I is concerned with the discoverers from Cartier to La Salle; Part II with international conflict from de la Mothe-Cadillac's foundation of Detroit to the Peace of Ghent; Part III with settlement and the spread of navigation; and Part IV with the rise of the mineral industries which have given the Lakes their modern economic character.

4115. Hubbart, Henry Clyde. The older Middle West, 1840–1880, its social, economic and political life and sectional tendencies before, during and after the Civil War. New York, Appleton-Century, 1936. 305 p. 36–11022 F484.3.H885

Bibliography: p. 278–292.

By the older Middle West the author means the southern portions of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, "the region of the river valleys," the settlement of which, primarily by upland southerners and secondarily by Pennsylvanians, was complete by 1840. Despite the book's comprehensive title, there are only four chapters on the social, cultural, and economic characteristics of the area, and the main theme is the reaction of the "Progressive Western Democracy" of the region to the sectional struggle inaugurated by the Mexican cessions of 1848. "Here was the zone of doubtful states for whose control" the Southern masters of the Democratic Party contended with the new Republicanism which arose in the Lake Region; here arose "copperheadism," not a pro-Southern movement but one in which "thwarted westerners showed their sectional discontent;" and here protests against triumphant Republicanism went on continuously throughout the Gilded Age. The volume was published from a fund contributed to the American Historical Association by the Carnegie Corporation of New York.

4116. Hutton, David Graham. Midwest at noon. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1946. xv, 350 p. A46–1352 F354.H8

Mr. Hutton, who was on an official mission in the United States during World War II, has produced one of the few books by an Englishman on an American region. Fascinated by the Midwest and its people, and finding few books "that told all about the region, its history, and its way of life," he has set down his "own impressions of the Midwest as it was, as it is, and as it yet may be." He leaves the reader to decide how much of what he records is peculiar to the region and how much is "just plain American." His exposition combines historical perspectives, economic analyses, personal observations, psychological characterizations, and social interpretations in about equal measure to make a rich and sympathetic volume which resists summary. So, the author finds, does the maturing Midwest itself: "its distinctive characteristics are those of its richly varied peoples, their neighborliness, their tolerance and conformity to one broad way of life, whatever they do for a living."

4117. Power, Richard Lyle. Planning Corn Belt culture; the impress of the upland southerner and Yankee in the Old Northwest. Indianapolis, Indiana Historical Society, 1953. xvi, 196 p. (Indiana Historical Society, Publications, v. 17)
54–618 F484.3.P6
F521.I41, v. 17

An original interpretative study which regards the settlement of the Old Northwest as a kind of culture conflict between upland southerners and Yankees from New England and New York. "The Southerners got there first"—indeed, had a forty years start, but after 1830 came the "Yankee invasion" with its cultural imperialism mingling religious, economic, and political motives. The author has drawn upon the papers of the American Home Missionary Society in the Chicago Theological Seminary, "a sort of Puritan equivalent of the Jesuit Relations," for interesting expressions of the viewpoint of the self-conscious New Englanders. Chapter IV assembles some of the consequences of "Living Side by Side," in farmways, shelter, cookery, language, and preaching. The author concludes that while by 1865 the Yankee felt that he had swept everything before him, and had indeed gained a tempered victory, in fact "neither strain won out by subordination of the other, but both were conquered as it were by the region itself, were taken in hand by a process of blending, in which the final outcome was neither Yankee nor Southern, but 'Western.' "

J. The Old Northwest: Local

OHIO

4118. Hatcher, Harlan H. The Western Reserve; the story of New Connecticut in Ohio. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1949. 365 p.
49–9476 F497.W5H27

"Acknowledgments and bibliographical note": p. 345–347.

The author's subject is the part of northeastern Ohio on Lake Erie which was "reserved" by Connecticut in 1786 when she ceded her other claims to western land, and retained until 1800 when, by agreement with the United States Government, jurisdiction was transferred to the Nation. It comprised some 5000 square miles. The author traces the history of the Western Reserve from its first settlement by a group from Connecticut under the leadership of Moses Cleaveland in 1796 to the mid-20th century. He points out that the New England influence is still found in the architecture and in the names of the older towns and villages, although it has been tempered by the assimilation of a foreign population attracted by the growth of the great industries which have given the region a strategic position at the heart of America. The publication of this volume coincided with the centennial of the Western Reserve Historical Society, which owns much of the source material used in its compilation.

4119. Ohio. Development and Publicity Commission. Ohio, an empire within an empire. 2d ed. Columbus, 1950. 214 p.
51–62008 F496.O35 1950

"References and additional sources of information:" p. 213–214.

"The Ohio Development and Publicity Commission was created to develop and to disseminate information concerning the agricultural, historical, industrial and recreational advantages and attractions of the State of Ohio." This book, the first edition of which appeared in 1944, was sponsored by the Commission for those purposes. A group of specialists in their fields have contributed to the volume with Guy-Harold Smith, chairman of the Department of Geography at Ohio State University, as editor-in-chief. The full-page maps are used to illustrate distribution among the counties of population, agricultural products, manufactures, natural resources, transportation, cultural institutions, and various public services. A final chapter summarizes the characteristics of Ohio that are representative of the Nation as a whole, and concludes that "every phase of the State's life displays a legacy or benefaction from other parts of the country and of the world." The end matter includes a list of "Museums and Historical Points" (p. 187–90) and an "Organization Chart, State Government."

4120. Roseboom, Eugene H., and Francis P. Weisenburger. A history of Ohio. Edited and illustrated by James H. Rodabaugh. [New ed.] Columbus, Ohio State Archaeological and Historical Society, 1953. 412 p. 54–265 F491.R76 1953

Bibliography: p. 385–402.

The first edition of this history was published in 1934 in the Prentice-Hall history series, edited by Carl F. Wittke. Published for the Sesquicentennial of Ohio, this revision gives greater emphasis to social and cultural history, covers the period since 1934, and adds "to the knowledge of the State's intrinsic importance and of its significant role as one of the states of the American Union." The bibliographies have been expanded and the work provided with a remarkable body of illustrations—so many, in fact, that the new edition has been printed on slick paper and in larger format.

4121. Wittke, Carl F., ed. The history of the state of Ohio. Published under the auspices of the Ohio State Archaeological and Historical Society. Columbus, Ohio, 1941–44. 6 v.

41–7471 F491.W78

CONTENTS.—1. The foundations of Ohio, by Beverley W. Bond, Jr. 1941.—2. The frontier state, 1803–1825, by William T. Utter. 1942.—3. The passing of the frontier, 1825–1850, by Francis P. Weisenburger. 1941.—4. The Civil War era, 1850–1873, by Eugene H. Roseboom. 1944.—5. Ohio comes of age, 1873–1900, by Philip D. Jordan. 1943.—6. Ohio in the twentieth century, 1900–1938, planned and compiled by Harlow Lindley. 1942.

This definitive history was published with the financial assistance of the General Assembly of Ohio, "in connection with Ohio's observance of the 150th anniversary of the organization of the Northwest Territory and the establishment of civil government within its limits under the Ordinance of 1787." It is the result of the cooperative efforts of a group of outstanding scholars under the editorship of the well-known head of the Department of History at Ohio State University (1925–37), later professor of history at Oberlin College (1937–48). "Attention has been given in each volume to the more or less familiar aspects of Ohio's political history, but in addition, a real effort has been made to stress the economic, social, cultural and intellectual progress of the State. Art, architecture, religion, journalism, amusements, the theater and other phases of cultural and intellectual activities have received their fair share of emphasis." In volume V, in fact, only four of the 13 chapters are concerned with politics, and of these two, on "Politics and Big Business" and "Bosses and Boodle," are concerned with its social-history connections. Volume VI comprises 17 chapters by 15 specialists, the last, appropriately enough, being one by Dr. Lindley on "The Sesquicentennial Celebration." Each volume is separately indexed, and, while there are footnote references, there are no bibliographies.

4122. Harlow, Alvin F. The serene Cincinnatians. New York, Dutton, 1950. 442 p. (Society in America series)

50–10456 F499.C5H35

Bibliography: p. 422–428.

A city of firsts in many of its cultural achievements and of superlatives in some of its public services and industrial performance, Cincinnati was known as the "Queen City of the West" by 1834. The author thinks that the serenity found in Cincinnati is born of "the experience and philosophical composure of age, informed by historical consciousness, and with a strong blend of German imperturbability." Jolted occasionally by the discovery of graft and dishonesty in government and the slackening of public morals, Cincinnatians still face and solve their problems in a spirit of tranquility which, the author suggests, may become a casualty of the near future, since "poise is increasingly difficult to maintain in a global scientific arena." Much of the material for this book has been "garnered from Cincinnati newspapers of the past."

INDIANA

4123. Esarey, Logan. A history of Indiana. Indianapolis, B. F. Bowen, 1918. 2 v. (1148 p.) 19–1811 F526.E742

CONTENTS.—1. From its exploration to 1850.—2. From 1850 to the present.

A native of Indiana, Logan Esarey (1873–1942)

grew up in its southern hills at a period when many of the people who had contributed to the State's early history were still alive. As a teacher he was noted for his classes in Indiana and Middle West history, and for the outstanding collection of public documents, newspapers, diaries, letters, and other materials which he collected for the Indiana University Library. This scholarly history (1st edition 1914) is based, for the most part, on primary sources, but the author complained that documentary material for Indiana had not been published by the State. No substantial changes were made in the second edition. From Chapter XI on, chapters of political narrative are interspersed with others on economic or social matters, and the organization of the book becomes rather desultory after 1865 is reached. Esarey's love for his native State found expression in a group of penetrating essays about pioneer life, five of which were published after his death, and have been much appreciated. Some ten years later another and very handsome edition of The Indiana Home (Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1953. 121 p.) was designed and illustrated by Bruce Rogers.

4124. Martin, John Bartlow. Indiana, an interpretation. New York, Knopf, 1947. xii, 300, xvii p. 47–11581 F526.M25

Bibliography: p. 291–300.

A well-known crime reporter, whose first book was on the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, has set down here his interpretation of "the Hoosier character, the Hoosier thought, the Hoosier way of living." His data are in part gleaned from interviews with newspapermen, laborers, manufacturers, undertakers, retired madames, and a great variety of run-of-the-mill citizens, and his book, he says is journalism—but if so, it is assuredly journalism of a superior stamp. He opens with an original device: "Indiana, as a whole, viewed within the framework of a Hoosier institution, the State Fair." Three historical sections culminate in "The Golden Age" when, with James Whitcomb Riley, Booth Tarkington, and others, Indiana had a literature of its own. Recent tendencies are presented through the diverse personalities of four representative "Gentlemen from Indiana." Indiana is found to be "a place where the American kind of capitalistic democracy grew up in its native form," while "America is a larger Indiana."

4125. Thornbrough, Gayle, and Dorothy Riker, comps. Readings in Indiana history. Indianapolis, Indiana Historical Bureau, 1956. 625 p. (Indiana historical collections, v. 36)

57–62616 F521.T4
F521.I38, v. 36

This anthology is based upon an earlier Readings in Indiana History compiled by a committee of the Historical Section of the Indiana State Teachers' Association and published by Indiana University in 1914. The selections are relatively short and include extracts not only from original sources but also, in lesser part, from recent scholarly writings including magazine articles. The extracts are grouped in 32 chronological or topical chapters, and many of them are preceded by brief introductions. The compilers regret the lack of "a good one-volume history of Indiana which can be read in conjunction with the Readings." They also find a dearth of suitable material for the later history of the State, and have in fact only 40 very miscellaneous pages on the years since 1865.

ILLINOIS

4126. Illinois. Centennial Commission. The centennial history of Illinois, Clarence Walworth Alvord, editor-in-chief. Springfield, Ill., 1917–20. 6 v. (Its Publications, Introductory vol. and vol. 1–5) F541.I25

CONTENTS:

4127. (Introductory vol.) Illinois in 1818, by Solon Justus Buck. 1917. 362 p.
17–17320 F545.B92

4128. (Vol. 1) The Illinois country, 1673–1818, by Clarence Walworth Alvord. 1920. 524 p.
20–27288 F541.A47

4129. (Vol. 2) The frontier State, 1818–1848, by Theodore Calvin Pease. 1918. 475 p.
19–27083 F545.P34

4130. (Vol. 3) The era of the Civil War, 1848–1870, by Arthur Charles Cole. 1919. 499 p.
19–7332 F545.C68

4131. (Vol. 4) The industrial State, 1870–1893, by Ernest Ludlow Bogart and Charles Manfred Thompson. 1920. 553 p.
20–27316 HC107.I3B6

4132. (Vol. 5) The modern Commonwealth, 1893–1918, by Ernest Ludlow Bogart and John Mabry Mathews. 1920. 544 p.
20–27159 F546.B67

These volumes on the history of Illinois from the coming of the first Europeans to the close of World War I were published in observance of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of Illinois into the Union. The authors, a distinguished group, were all members of the faculty of the University of Illinois at the time the project was initiated. Dr. Buck's introductory volume presents a survey of the social, economic, and political life of Illinois at the close of the territorial period, followed by a detailed history of the process of admission. In the last two volumes the chapters of economic history and description are written by Prof. Bogart, and the political ones by his collaborators. Each volume has a substantial bibliography, and the latter ones have appendixes with tables of economic statistics. This was the first of the cooperative and scholarly multivolume state histories; the example of Illinois has since been followed by Massachusetts, New York, and Ohio, and, in a project as yet only very partially completed, by New Jersey.

4133. Pease, Theodore Calvin. The story of Illinois. [Rev. ed.] Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1949. xviii, 284 p.
49–11105 F541.P36 1949

"This volume is an attempt to present a short, readable history of the state of Illinois, embodying the results of the latest research." The first edition which appeared in 1925 was based "to a considerable extent on the five-volume Centennial History of Illinois." This new edition was published as a contribution to the golden anniversary of the founding of the Illinois State Historical Society of which the author, who died in 1948, was a director for many years and president from 1946–47. Additions in the fields of British and French relations with the Illinois country have been made in this revision and the final chapter, completed by Mrs. Pease, covers another quarter century in Illinois' development.

4134. Dedmon, Emmett. Fabulous Chicago. New York, Random House, 1953. 359 p.
53–6921 F548.5.D4

Based on source materials found in the Chicago Historical Society, and in the files of certain Chicago newspapers, this narrative of social life in Chicago from 1835 to 1930, with an "Epilogue" that summarizes to the date of publication, also contains in its acknowledgments the names of some of the city's first families. Here are lively descriptions of such matters as the social dictatorship of Mrs. Potter Palmer, invitations to whose New Year's Day receptions determined the makeup of high society; of the social accompaniments of the unforgettable World's Fair of 1893, when the Infanta Eulalia of Spain and 28 million others invaded the White City; and the low life along the Levee, where were to be found the Everleigh Club and, until they were transferred to the Coliseum, the First Ward Balls of Aldermen Coughlin and Kenna. Educated in Chicago, the author has been associated with Chicago newspapers since 1940 as columnist, critic, and editor, and he writes with an obvious zest for his subject. The many interesting illustrations are obtained from the Chicago Historical Society and the Newberry Library.

4135. Lewis, Lloyd, and Henry Justin Smith. Chicago, the history of its reputation. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1929. xii, 508 p.
29–17674 F548.3.L67

"Sources": p. 495–497.

The lethal gangster wars of the 1920's gave Chicago a worldwide notoriety which troubled many of its more sensitive citizens, and which was evidently responsible for the sub-title of this briskly anecdotal sketch of municipal history by two prominent local journalists. To them the city's vitality and joy in life, its absorption in the future, its incessant rebuilding of itself, and its herculean business enterprise are the essential Chicago, while political corruption and unpunished crime are only superficial and transient phenomena. "Four and a half million people, counting themselves part of metropolitan Chicago, were going somewhere and intended to get there." Mr. Lewis takes the story to the World's Fair of 1893, and Mr. Smith carries it on to the municipal election of 1928.

4136. Pierce, Bessie Louise. A history of Chicago. New York, Knopf, 1937–57. 3 v.
37–8801 F548.3.P54

Bibliography: v. 1, p. [429]–455; v. 2, p. 515–547; v. 3, p. [547]–575.

This history is related to a wide range of studies in the sociology, economics, and politics of the Chicago metropolitan area conducted by the Social Science Research Committee of the University of Chicago, but only three of its projected four volumes have appeared. The author has served as a professor of American history at the University of Chicago since 1929. The first volume is the story of a frontier community from 1673 to 1848, and "typifies the life of the Middle West before 1850." The second begins with the construction of Chicago's first railroads and ends just before the Great Fire of 1871. The third proceeds from the fire, which resulted in a material loss estimated at $196,000,000, and the amazing rebuilding which followed it, to the World's Fair of 1893, which marked "a new epoch in the aesthetic growth not only of Chicago but of the nation." Each volume has valuable tabular appendixes. Focusing trends on national affairs as they affected Chicago, these volumes are also a well-documented contribution to the history of the United States. At the time of the Century of Progress Fair in Chicago, Professor Pierce edited a volume containing impressions of Chicago by 47 travelers, foreign and domestic, from Père Marquette to Morris Markey: As Others See Chicago, Impressions of Visitors, 1673–1933 (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1933. 540 p.). A brief sketch of the author precedes each selection.

MICHIGAN

4137. Bald, Frederick Clever. Michigan in four centuries. New York, Harper, 1954. xiii, 498 p. 54–8934 F566.B2

"A selected list of books on Michigan history:" p. 477–481.

Long the site of a fur trade between the Indians and the French or British, the territory that became the State of Michigan in 1837 was populated by settlers from New York, New England, and Europe. This book resulted from the interest of the son of a Swedish immigrant in the history of his State. Rising from poverty to the presidency of the State Normal College, and deploring the neglect of state history in the schools, Dr. John M. Munson left his estate for the publication of a history of Michigan, and a history of education there. Published under the direction of the Michigan Historical Commission, this book incorporates 21 years of research by the author, a member of the Department of History at the University of Michigan. "An essential for good citizenship" in a state with so large a population born elsewhere, this history "is directed to the adult as well as to the youthful resident of the state." Six years prior to the publication of this book Dr. Milo Milton Quaife, described by Dr. Bald as the "dean of historians of Michigan and the Old Northwest," cooperated with Dr. Sidney Glazer in writing "a comprehensive history of Michigan suited to the needs of class room students and of mature readers generally": Michigan: from Primitive Wilderness to Industrial Commonwealth (New York, Prentice-Hall, 1948. 374 p. Prentice-Hall history series).

4138. Pound, Arthur. Detroit, dynamic city; illustrated by E. H. Suydam. New York, Appleton-Century, 1940. 397 p. 40–27234 F574.D4P7

Bibliography: p. 373–[378]

A native of Michigan, an experienced journalist, and the author of several studies of industrial America, Mr. Pound was well-equipped to write this narrative sketch of the rise of Detroit from a fur-trading outpost in the early 18th century to the position of automobile capital of the world in the mid-20th. The city has been fortunate in its location at a strategic point by Antoine de la Mothe Cadillac in 1701, and in the leadership of men such as Judge Augustus B. Woodward, the "driving spirit" in rebuilding the city after the devastating fire of 1805; in the foresight of Governor Lewis Cass who "gave courage to the territory and tone to society;" and in Henry Ford's determination to supply "cheap highway transportation for the common man." The citizens, throughout the history of Detroit, have faced consuming disasters, economic depressions, and labor disturbances with the energy and effectiveness characteristic of a vigorous people.

WISCONSIN

4139. Raney, William Francis. Wisconsin; a story of progress. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1940. xvii, 554 p. (Prentice-Hall books on history, edited by Carl Wittke) 40–7607 F581.R32

"Selected bibliography" at end of each chapter.

Long associated with education in Wisconsin, the author has been chairman of the Department of History and Government at Lawrence College, Appleton, since 1946. This history is designed "to provide a readable and up-to-date summary of the growth of Wisconsin from the arrival of the first European visitor in 1634 down to the present." After the organization of the Northwest Territory, nearly fifty years passed before settlers from the northern states, with a scattering from the South, reached the frontier that became the State of Wisconsin in 1848. The next fifty years witnessed the flow of immigrants into the State from Germany, Norway, Sweden, Ireland, and other countries, the building of a network of railroads, and the exploitation of the lumber resources. While wheat production declined after 1870, Wisconsin took the leadership of the Nation in dairying. Enlarging the functions of government in the interest of all its citizens, Wisconsin has become synonymous with progressive social experiments in government. The appendixes include a list of "Governors of Wisconsin," "Wisconsin Votes in Presidential Elections," and statistics of the "Population of Wisconsin" from 1830 to 1930.

4140. Still, Bayrd. Milwaukee, the history of a city. Madison, State Historical Society of Wisconsin, 1948. xvi, 638 p. 49–7868 F589.M6S8

"Bibliographical note": p. 601–610.

The founder of Milwaukee was Solomon Juneau, a young French-Canadian fur-trader who began his residence there in 1818, and turned town-promoter in 1833. Milwaukee was incorporated as a village in 1838, had grown into a town within a decade, and was a city by 1870. Situated some 80 miles north of Chicago on the shore of Lake Michigan, and famous for its breweries even before the Civil War, it is now one of the chief ports on the Great Lakes and one of the world's leading centers for the manufacture of heavy machinery. In 1837 the first issue of the Milwaukee Sentinel asserted that "rigid enforcement of and prompt obedience to the popular will" was "the most vital principle of Representative Government." This philosophy has persisted and has made of Milwaukee, with its large foreign population, a laboratory for liberal social and political movements. Dr. Still, a professor of history at Wisconsin State College from 1932 to 1938, published in the State's centennial year this full-scale history covering all aspects of the city's development. Since monographic material was lacking, it represents a noteworthy work of compressing voluminous primary sources. Milwaukee's century of city building, he concludes, "bore witness to the contribution of the sovereign citizen in underwriting urban growth." Population tables and a series of sketch maps illustrating that growth appear in the Appendix.

MINNESOTA

4141. Blegen, Theodore C. Building Minnesota. Boston, Heath, 1938. xii, 450, xvi p. illus. 38–29043 F606.B66

"Materials for further reading and study": p. i–iv at end.

4142. Blegen, Theodore C. The land lies open. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1949. 246 p. 49–48266 F606.B674

Dr. Blegen, the historian of Norwegian immigration (q. v.), has long been a professor of history at the University of Minnesota and was superintendent of the Minnesota Historical Society from 1931–39. Nearly 20 years ago he prepared Building Minnesota for use in the secondary schools of the State. Apart from its being written in rather simple sentences, from its chapters being grouped in "units" which are hardly different from other authors' "parts" or "books," and from the questions, problems, and projects added at the ends of chapters by Prof. Edgar B. Wesley, it differs little from a work for older students or readers. Half the volume is allotted to the period since the Civil War, and there are chapters on wheat raising, lumbering, flour milling, and iron mining. The Land Lies Open is a small volume presenting episodes of Minnesota history so as to give significant place "to the changing and developing life of the people at the grass roots of their existence." Six of the chapters have been rewritten from articles published in Minnesota History and other periodicals. Part I, "Channels to the Land," is concerned with explorers from De Soto to Henry R. Schoolcraft; Part II, "People on the Land," with aspects of settlement and culture. All writers on Minnesota history acknowledge their indebtedness to William Watts Folwell (1833–1929), first president of the University of Minnesota, who began to write his magnum opus after his retirement at the age of 74, and completed it before his death at 96! A History of Minnesota (St. Paul, Minnesota Historical Society, 1921–30. 4 v. [The Society issued v. 1 of a new edition in 1956]) is eminently thorough and fair-minded, but it treats episodes in the early history of the State at such length as to make it unsuitable for a main entry here.

4143. Blegen, Theodore C., and Philip D. Jordan, eds. With various voices, recordings of North Star life. Saint Paul, Itasca Press, 1949. xxiv, 380 p. 49–11623 F606.B675

A source book of Minnesota history from the days of the French explorers, Radisson and Hennepin, to the close of the 19th century. Its editors have aimed "to relate the history of the North Star State in the words of those who actually took part in the making of that history," to be both accurate and colorful, and to include the words "of explorers, schoolteachers, missionaries, and just plain common folks—the basic builders of the state," as well as public documents. The 54 extracts are arranged in eleven topical sections and close with Governor John Lind's message to the legislature in 1899, "in reality an inventory of Minnesota life and problems at the turn of the century."

IOWA

4144. Cole, Cyrenus. A history of the people of Iowa. Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Torch Press, 1921. xiv, 572 p. maps. 21–2103 F621.C68

Cyrenus Cole (1863–1939) was born on an Iowa farm and became a leading newspaperman of Cedar Rapids; in the year this book was published he began 12 years of service as a Republican in the U. S. House of Representatives. His book is of a description surprisingly rare: a one-volume state history, inspired by John Richard Green and written in a dignified Victorian prose, which is yet comprehensive, well-informed, and thoroughly digested. The writer was well acquainted with the leading Iowa political figures of his maturity, and perhaps gives more space to elections and officeholders than would a present-day historian of the people of Iowa; but he is never unmindful of developments in other spheres. His basic Republicanism does not lead him into any unfairness to Populists or Democrats; he limits himself to the opinion that, in the post-Civil War doldrums of Iowa, "Political doctors were not needed so much as industrial ones. But it took the people a long time to find this out."

K. The Far West

4145. Baumhoff, Richard G. The dammed Missouri Valley, one sixth of our Nation. New York, Knopf, 1951. 291 p. illus.
51–11082 F598.B3

"The Missouri basin is a continental funnel draining into the Mississippi River, a terrain that measures 529,350 square miles. It is roughly 1,300 miles long, and has extreme width of about 700 miles." Its major problems have been irregular water supply, floods, and erosion, and in 1945 the Missouri Basin Interagency Committee was set up to plan and administer a "federal program, with state cooperation, for protection, control, and development of the water and land resources." In the same year the St. Louis Post Dispatch which has consistently supported an eventual Missouri Valley Authority, assigned Mr. Baumhoff to cover the program and related topics. His book is, as he says, a journalistic report, but it presents the basic facts of geography and economics in an objective manner, and predicts that the outcome will be a Federal authority for the basin which will disappoint extremists, and "will not be greatly different in essence from an MVA shorn of some dubious elements," or a "Missouri Valley Anti-Authority Authority."

4146. Billington, Ray Allen. The Far Western frontier, 1830–1860. New York, Harper, 1956. 324 p. illus. (The New American nation series) 56–9665 F591.B55

Bibliography: p. 293–311.

A well-informed, significantly selective, and skillfully organized general treatment of the three critical decades which saw the American occupation of the Far West prepared for, carried out, and consolidated. The author limits himself to describing those aspects of diplomacy and war "which immediately affected the settlement process." Professor Billington's volume is noteworthy for its objective presentation of the aspects of ruthlessness and decivilization which marked this great wave of expansion, and for its emphasis on the variety of Wests, each with its distinguishable frontier characteristics, which was the initial result. Since the settlement pattern was shaped by the accidental location of mineral wealth, the frontier of farms and villages in the Mississippi Valley was separated by nearly 1,000 miles of prairie from the islands of settlement in the Inland Empire of the Pacific Northwest, the Great Salt Lake Country, Arizona, New Mexico, the Washoe region, California, and Oregon. The great work of the 1850's was that of the overland freighters and stage coachers, who linked this "galaxy of empires" with each other and with the East, and made possible the resumption of normal civilizing processes.

4147. Briggs, Harold E. Frontiers of the Northwest; a history of the upper Missouri Valley. New York, Appleton-Century, 1940. xiv, 629 p.
40–12572 F598.B84

Bibliography: p. 595–612.

The Upper Missouri Valley of this volume comprises the Dakotas, Montana, and Wyoming, "overlapping into Idaho and northern Colorado." Its history is here reconstructed, mostly within the three decades 1860–90, with an abundance of detail and documentation, and an academic dryness of manner which seldom ventures into commentary. The arrangement is largely topical, under six principal heads. "The Frontier of the Miner" is concerned with the strikes and rushes that went on at irregular intervals from 1859 to about 1877, and incidentally disposes of "The Myth of Calamity Jane" (Martha Jane Canary, 1852–1903), whose "only claim to fame was her absolute lack of respectability." "The Frontier of the Buffalo" is concerned with the fate of the northern herd, which survived the southern herd but not the coming of the Northern Pacific, and disappeared after the winter of 1883–84. "The Frontier of Settlement" describes the attempts of the territorial governments to encourage immigration, and the projects of group colonization organized in the East and in Europe. The frontiers of the cattle rancher, of the sheepherder, and of agriculture are treated in comparable detail. Much the same area, but with Wyoming omitted, is handled in a radically different style in Bruce O. Nelson's Land of the Dacotahs (Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1946. 354 p.). Resulting from a University of Minnesota Fellowship in Regional Writing, it presents its material in a series of episodes whose dramatic aspects are emphasized. Folklore is drawn upon, and two of the episodes are cast in semifictional form. The author continues to a more recent period, telling the story of Arthur Townley and the Nonpartisan League, of Governor William Langer's moratorium upon farm foreclosures and evictions in 1933, and of the plans for flood control which led to the proposal of a Missouri Valley Authority.

4148. Chittenden, Hiram Martin. The American fur trade of the Far West; a history of the pioneer trading posts and early fur companies of the Missouri Valley and the Rocky Mountains and of the overland commerce with Santa Fe. Standard, Calif., Academic Reprints, 1954. 2 v. (xl, 1029 p.) (American culture and economics series, no. 1)

54–7095 HD9944.U45C5 1954

General Chittenden (1858–1917) was an Army engineer with a variety of practical achievements to his credit, such as laying out the roads of Yellowstone National Park and planning the Lake Washington Canal. He nevertheless found time to publish four books on Western history between 1895 and 1905, all of which have stood the test of time to a remarkable degree, subsequent research having filled in detail rather than rendered their conceptions and structure obsolete. The present work was originally published in three volumes in 1902 and has remained the basic work covering its subject during the period 1807–43; it required only to be supplemented by a detailed account of the trade in the Southwest, eventually supplied by Robert G. Cleland (no. 4186). Mr. Stallo Vinton's contribution to his edition, originally published in 1935, chiefly consists of additional notes which are added to most chapters after those of the author. General Chittenden divided his text into five parts, of which Part II, "Historical," is the longest and most essential. Its principal subjects are the Missouri Fur Company, Astoria, the Rocky Mountain Fur Company, the American Fur Company, and the Santa Fe Trade. Part I describes the operations and characteristics of the fur trade; Parts III–V are concerned with contemporary events in their relation to the trade, colorful incidents during its course, and a general geographical description of the West, including the native tribes. Eight appendixes of original documents run to nearly one hundred pages. General Chittenden was ahead of his time in making a thorough use of all business records of the fur companies that he was able to discover.

4149. Coman, Katharine. Economic beginnings of the Far West, how we won the land beyond the Mississippi. New York, Macmillan, 1925. 2 v. in 1. 27–3060 HC107.A17C7 1925

Bibliography at end of each volume.

CONTENTS.—1. The Spanish occupation. Exploration and the fur trade.—2. The advance of the settlers. The transcontinental migration. Free land and free labor.

The general pattern of historiography has changed so greatly since 1912, when this work was originally issued (Miss Coman died in 1915, and the one-volume edition is an otherwise unaltered reprint) that what the author then described as an economic history would now be regarded as a general survey of Western history down to the Civil War, with perhaps less than average space allotted to diplomatic and military factors. It was largely a pioneer undertaking, and while of course it takes no account of the mass of detailed studies which have appeared since, it remains a clear outline of the essential developments in discovery, settlement, and trade from a clearly defined point of view. Miss Coman thought that the European colonial regimes stifled the normal development of the region, and were of necessity eliminated by the superior industrial efficiency of the advancing tide of American settlers. "The self-employed and self-supporting farmer took possession of the land in a sense not to be disputed." The outcome of the Civil War was only the concluding victory of "the ideal American type—the homestead farmer" in the long struggle between forced and free labor.

4150. Quiett, Glenn Chesney. They built the West; an epic of rails and cities. New York, Appleton-Century, 1934. xx, 569 p.

34–35461 F591.Q85

Bibliography: p. 543–549.

The West lost its frontier isolation and began to acquire its mature characteristics with the coming of the transcontinental railroads, usually dated from May 10, 1869, when the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific joined their tracks at Promontory Point, Utah. The large government subsidies received by the western lines gave their backers a great advantage in schemes of western development demanding capital. "One important source of revenue that was open to the backers of the early Western railroads was the building of cities." In this imposing volume Mr. Quiett reexamines the standard sources of railroad and municipal history for evidences of their interaction, and has no difficulty in demonstrating the importance of the railroads and their builders in the rise of Denver, San Francisco, Los Angeles, San Diego, Portland, Seattle, and Spokane. Takoma, Washington, is labeled "a railroad creation": the decision of the Northern Pacific in 1873 to locate its western terminus there in an instant "converted a raw sawmill village on the frontier of civilization into a potential city of importance." The author's favorite city-builder is evidently General William J. Palmer (1836–1909) of the unsubsidized Denver and Rio Grande. "No one had a keener eye for the scenic and commercial possibilities of a site," and he built cities that were permanent, such as Colorado Springs, which he added to the map in 1871.

L. The Great Plains: General

4151. Brown, Mark H., and William R. Felton. The frontier years; L. A. Huffman, photographer of the plains. New York, Holt, 1955. 272 p. 55–9876 F595.H87B7

Bibliography: p. 259–261.

4152. Brown, Mark H., and William R. Felton. Before barbed wire. L. A. Huffman, photographer on horseback. New York, Holt, 1956. 256 p. 56–10507 F596.B87

Bibliography: p. 237–243.

4153. Smith, Erwin E. Life on the Texas range. Photographs by Erwin E. Smith; text by J. Evetts Haley. Austin, University of Texas Press, 1952. 112 p. 52–13181 SF85.S57

The two finest photographic records of the West of the Open Range seem to have been made at its northern and southern extremes. Laton A. Huffman (1854–1931) learned photography in his father's shop in Iowa, and in 1878 came to Fort Keogh on the Yellowstone River in southeastern Montana to fill the unofficial position of post photographer, the remuneration being what he could make out of it. Save for a six-year exodus caused by hard times, Huffman spent the rest of his life as a professional photographer in Montana, and after 1905 lived by the sale of prints from his early negatives. Mr. Felton, Huffman's son-in-law, has drawn upon the family collection of glass plates, letters, and memoranda, and in both volumes the documentation of the photographs is careful and thorough. The Frontier Years illustrates the finale of buffalo hunting, the last Indian wars, Miles City and other frontier towns, and the transition from wagon train to railroad. Before Barbed Wire illustrates sheep as well as cattle herding and has fine pictures of early cow camps and ranch houses. The authors very properly underline Huffman's achievement in his early pictures taken on horseback with a 50-pound, slow-shutter, wet-plate camera. Erwin E. Smith (1886–1947) was a later comer than Huffman, and never established himself as a professional photographer. But he was a cowboy who knew the work and its problems thoroughly, and while the Open Range was gone by the time he began taking his pictures on Texas ranches in the early years of the present century, "he spent much of his time on the larger outfits because their work with cattle closely approximated that of the open range." The 80 photographs reproduced here were all chosen for permanent display in the Texas Memorial Museum, are nearly all outstanding for composition and contrast, and have the further advantage of better reproduction than Huffman's. Mr. Haley contributes a 15-page introduction on Smith's saddeningly unsuccessful life. The American West; the Pictorial Epic of a Continent, by Lucius M. Beebe and Charles Clegg (New York, Dutton, 1955. 511 p.), is a vast collectanea of pictures from private and public collections, which depict "as many aspects of the West in the nineteenth century as its authors could come by." Many of them are wood engravings which appeared in the illustrated weeklies, and the presentation is sensational rather than systematic.

4154. Dale, Edward Everett. Cow country. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1942. 265 p. 42–15483 F596.D25

Professor Dale was himself a cowboy and rancher in his youth at the turn of the century, partner in "our old ranching firm of Dale Brothers" with his brother George, to whom he dedicates this volume. In addition to his well-known study of The Range Cattle Industry (q. v.) he has contributed a number of related articles to periodicals, including the American Hereford Journal and the Cattleman as well as historical journals. These he has assembled here and eliminated repetitive matter so as to form "a fairly consecutive story of ranching in the Great Plains." There are chapters on the antipathy between Texas trail-drivers and "Kansas Jayhawkers," on the contributions of Scots and Scottish capital to the range cattle industry, on cowboy humor, on ranching in Indian reservations, and on "The Passing of the Cow Country" as a distinct entity and way of life.

4155. Dick, Everett N. Vanguards of the frontier, a social history of the northern plains and Rocky Mountains from the earliest white contacts to the coming of the homemaker. New York, Appleton-Century, 1941. xvi, 574 p. 41–6157 F591.D545

Bibliography: p. 519–545.

4156. Dick, Everett N. The sod-house frontier, 1854–1890; a social history of the northern plains from the creation of Kansas & Nebraska to the admission of the Dakotas. New York, Appleton-Century, 1937. xviii, 550 p.
37–19335 F591.D54
Bibliography: p. 519–528.

Of these companion volumes the sequel appeared first by some four years. Vanguards of the Frontier covers much the same ground as a number of other works on the general history of the West, from the fur companies and the mountain men to the cattle ranchers of the Open Range and the migratory sheep herders of the northern Rockies. It obtains its special character from telling the story, so far as possible, from the viewpoint of the ordinary participant in these historic processes: the author is less concerned, for instance, with the organization and economics of the stage-coach companies, than with typical scenes and incidents encountered by stage-coach drivers and passengers. The Sod-House Frontier, on the other hand, was throughout a quite original synthesis, bringing for the first time within one pair of covers a view of the entire process of settlement which was more or less uniform throughout Kansas, Nebraska, and the Dakotas. Prof. Dick interviewed seven survivors from the days of settlement, and utilized reminiscences preserved in manuscript by historical societies or printed in local newspapers. The author gives a symbolic quality to the sod house, the expedient devised by pioneer settlers to provide shelter in a largely treeless land. The prairie sod was cut with a spade into bricks about three feet long, which could be built into houses as large as 20 by 16 feet, which usually leaked and might collapse, but could not burn or blow down, and had an average life of six or seven years. The life of these homesteaders is sympathetically and realistically described in all its characteristic aspects, from the use of buffalo chips as fuel to the "play parties" held in communities where dancing was taboo, and there are chapters on the "Beginning of Machine Farming," "The Grange," and the coming of the railroad, regarded in each community as a cause for celebration and sometimes "ardent wide-spread and all prevailing inebriety."

4157. Gard, Wayne, The Chisholm Trail. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1954. 296 p.
54–6204 F596.G3
Bibliography: p. 265–280.

4158. Wellman, Paul I. The trampling herd. New York, Carrick & Evans, 1939. 433 p.
39–24712 F591.W42

At head of title: The story of the cattle range in America.

"Some books to read": p. 417–419.

The most conspicuous events of Open Range days were the great cattle drives, in which herds of thousands of steers were conducted north from Texas by the trail bosses and their cowhands, running the hazards of Indians, rustlers, river crossings, and stampedes. The earliest recorded drive goes back to 1846, but after the Civil War the practice was resumed on a larger scale and received its characteristic organization in 1867, when Joseph G. McCoy, an Illinois cattle dealer, set up a stockyard at Abilene, Kansas, on the Union Pacific Railroad. The most important route followed by the drivers for a dozen years after 1867 got its name from an old Indian trader, Jesse Chisholm (1806–68), who had a post on the Arkansas River and made regular journeys south to the North Canadian—a rather small portion of the whole trail named after him. Mr. Wellman and Mr. Gard tell much the same story but in antithetical manners: the former speaks in general terms and offers a multitude of anecdotes; the latter is concerned to date and document every circumstance. But Mr. Wellman is not inaccurate, and Mr. Gard is anything but dull. Both describe the gunplay which went on in Abilene and the other northern centers of the trade, and which has acquired a whole literature of its own. Dee Brown and Martin F. Schmitt's Trail Driving Days (New York, Scribner, 1952. xxii, 264 p.) is a picture book containing a good selection of contemporary photographs supplemented by prints of various kinds; the reproductions are often much too dark, and the text is decidedly thin.

4159. Kraenzel, Carl Frederick. The Great Plains in transition. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1955. xiv, 428 p. maps, diagrs., tables.
55–9628 F591.K7
Bibliography: p. 391–418.

By the Great Plains Mr. Kraenzel means the semiarid belt from the 98th meridian to the Rockies, often referred to as the High Plains. His own emphasis is largely sociological, but since most people have at their disposal only fragmentary information about the region, he has attempted to fill in "all other operative factors affecting the Plains—geographical, psychological, economic, historical, technological, and social," in a book "written in the Plains, about them, by one who is a part of them." The region has long been an exploited hinterland, and its people, whether rural or urban, belong to one or another minority group, whose objectives cannot be realized and who exist in a state of chronic frustration and irritation. They must all "adapt or get out": the adaptation to conditions, which has gone some way in agriculture, must be extended to all phases of life. The only solution lies in a regionalism whereby "the area can become a unity once again," and its keys for survival are the development of three basic traits: "the creation of necessary reserves, the introduction of flexibility into certain social operations, and the acquisition of mobility in still other aspects of the social order." The author goes on to give more concrete meaning to these somewhat abstract conceptions in various realms of living.

4160. Rister, Carl Coke. Southern plainsmen. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1938. xviii, 289 p. 38–32983 F596.R58
Bibliography: p. 263–279.

As here defined, the Southern Plains are divided from the Northern by the South Platte River, which runs through northern Colorado and southern Nebraska. They have a character of their own derived from their higher average temperature, longer growing season, and faster rate of evaporation. Prof. Rister here describes the life lived upon them from the early 19th century, when only a few white hunters ventured into this preserve of the Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Kiowas, and Comanches, down to the opening of the Oklahoma lands to settlement on April 22, 1889. He divides the subject into topical chapters and at times fails to make chronological progressions as clear as could be wished. His concern is with agricultural settlement rather than with grazing use, and he allots only one 15-page chapter to the "Life of the Range Rider," whom he finds neither romantic nor admirable. There are descriptions of the nocturnal raids of the Indians which went on until the mid-70's, of the great grasshopper plagues of 1868–69 and 1874–75 as well as of less spectacular hindrances to agriculture, and of the "breakdowns" or square dances in which the settlers relaxed from their harsh toil. Many settlers became discouraged and inscribed "Back to God's Country" on their wagon covers, but the majority held on by patience, cheerfulness, and reserving a surplus in good years to tide them over the lean ones.

4161. Rollins, Philip Ashton. The cowboy; an unconventional history of civilization on the old-time cattle range. Rev. and enl. ed. New York, Scribner, 1936. 402 p. 36–27318 F596.R75 1936

4162. Frantz, Joe B., and Julian Ernest Choate. The American cowboy: the myth & the reality. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1955. 232 p. 55–9629 F596.F75
Bibliography: p. 203–222.

4163. Sonnichsen, Charles L. Cowboys and cattle kings; life on the range today. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1950. xviii, 316 p. 50–14081 F596.S72

Mr. Rollins spent some years on the Open Range, in the late 80's and early 90's, and became a zealous collector of western Americana, eventually turning his collection over to Princeton University. His aim has been "to recount accurately the every-day life of the old-time Range," confining himself, with certain specified exceptions, to what he actually saw and heard. His book has been accused of taking too idealistic a view of cowboy character, but in matters of dress, equipment, and characteristic operations it receives the compliment of being frequently drawn upon by other writers on the subject. Messrs. Frantz and Choate are especially concerned with the vast proportions and wide range of the cowboy myth in American popular literature, entertainment, folklore, and life in general, and are moved thereby to many a quip. This heroic figure they set against the average cowboy of 1867–85—"merely a unique occupational type who was concerned with 'cow work' on the range, raising, rounding up, branding, trailing, haying, and mending." They are, however, compelled to concede that there is abundant historical basis for most of the standard ingredients of horse opera—with the exception of the marathon fist fights, for cowboys, untrained to use their fists, did their fighting with knife or revolver. The concluding four chapters review cowboy literature, both fiction and nonfiction. Mr. Sonnichsen's volume was commissioned by the Rockefeller Committee at the University of Oklahoma in consequence of the debate which broke out in 1947 over the cattlemen of today in relation to the conservation of natural resources. During the first half of 1949 the author "traveled from end to end of what was once the Cattle Kingdom and is still the heart of the cattle country, learning everything" he could. The result is a miscellaneous reportorial volume that mirrors the variety of enterprise, personnel, and occupation which now characterizes the industry. He finds that "the all-round cowpunchers of the past are becoming victims of specialization," and that, "as the farm has merged with the ranch, the cowboy has merged with the hired man"—but a hired man who still wears the uniform of a horseman of the Plains and thinks of himself as one.

4164. Webb, Walter Prescott. The Great Plains. [Boston] Ginn, 1931. xv, 525 p. illus. 31–20202 F591.W35
Bibliography at end of each chapter except the first.

An epoch-making work of synthesis and interpretation which has been fundamental to practically all subsequent treatments of the region with which it deals. The Great Plains, and especially the High Plains from the 98th meridian to the Rockies, are a level and treeless region where the rainfall is insufficient for normal agriculture. These characteristics have affected all historic processes involving the human beings who have ventured into the area. The Plains Indians obtained horses from the Spaniards and, as soon as they had done so, became so formidable as raiders that no further expansion of Spanish colonization was possible. The Texans were more successful because they seized upon Samuel Colt's invention of the six-shooting revolver, which the rest of the country had rejected, and so became able to defeat the Indians from horseback. Once the Indian and the buffalo had been eliminated, the High Plains became a cattle kingdom because the industrial revolution had not yet devised the means whereby the agricultural frontier could expand into them. In the mid-1870's a satisfactory barbed-wire fence was invented in Illinois and speedily produced a revolution on the Plains, effecting the transition from the open range to enclosed ranches, and permitting the advent of the homesteaders. The survival of both ranch and farm was made possible by the introduction of the windmill, which gave access to ground water and alleviated if it did not cure the dearth of water. This chronic dearth has led, in the eight dryest states, to a departure from the common law of water rights in favor of the arid-region doctrine of appropriation, or the Colorado system. In 1940 the Social Science Research Council devoted its Bulletin 46 to an assault upon Prof. Webb's conclusions by Fred A. Shannon, which has had small influence.

M. The Great Plains: Local

NORTH DAKOTA

4165. Kazeck, Melvin E. North Dakota; a human and economic geography. Fargo, North Dakota Institute for Regional Studies, North Dakota Agricultural College, 1956. 264 p.
56–13250 F636.K3

Includes bibliography.

"Can such of our problems as an obvious lack of industry, a decreasing or stationary population, a need for water conservation, a need for state planning, a need for better land use, and a lack of resources use be neglected and ignored any longer?" But North Dakota remains "one of the most exclusively agricultural States in the nation," and the three main chapters of this well-made geography deal with "The General Farming Area," a fringe along the eastern boundary, "The Cattle-Wheat Region," the large southwestern corner, and "The Wheat Region," the remainder including 32 out of the 53 counties. Industries are limited to flour milling, meat packing, potato processing, and some mineral use, especially since 1951, when oil was found in the west of the State, resulting in 601 producing wells by 1955. The industrial development so much wished for must depend upon conservation of resources and planning for their future use.

NEBRASKA

4166. Olson, James C. History of Nebraska. Line drawings by Franz Altschuler. Lincoln, University of Nebraska Press, 1955. 372 p.
54–8444 F666.O48

"Suggested reading" at end of each chapter.

The author has sought to supply the long-standing "need for a one-volume general survey of the history of Nebraska which might serve as an introduction to the history of the state for the college student and the general reader." He apologizes for the result, particularly since "much of the basic research upon which sound synthesis must be based still remains to be done." In fact no State has any comparable volume which is its superior in comprehensiveness, selection of material, organization, modernity of outlook, and lucidity of writing. The author has at his disposal a gentle irony to which he treats Prof. Samuel Aughey and other learned proponents of the doctrine that "rainfalls follow the plough," which was used to attract homesteaders to central Nebraska in the early 1880's. Some suggestive chapter headings are "The Eighties—Whose Prosperity?" "The Fading Frontier," and "Adapting Government to the Machine Age." There are excellent sketch maps for particular purposes, and occasional statistical tables highly pertinent to the argument. Mr. Altschuler's decorations are distinguished, as is the volume's entire format.

KANSAS

4167. Nichols, Alice. Bleeding Kansas. New York, Oxford University Press, 1954. 307 p.
54–5295 F685.N6

4168. Howes, Charles C. This place called Kansas. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1952. 236 p. 52–3380 F691.H68

The history of Kansas is unique among the 48 states in that its first six or seven years were a period of continuous turmoil and of frequent violence and bloodshed, whereas the succeeding century has been one of prevailing tranquillity and peaceful development, in which significant trends and events are usually a part of large national or regional movements. Miss Nichols tells the story of the turbulent years between the Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854 and the admission of Kansas to statehood in January 1861, in a highly dramatic narrative with a strong pro-Southern bias. Since she cheerfully admits this, and makes abolitionists instead of border ruffians the villains of her story, the reader may do his own discounting, or consult a work in the pro-Northern tradition such as Leverett Wilson Spring's volume in the American Commonwealths series, Kansas; the Prelude to the War for the Union, rev. ed. (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1907. 340 p.). Mr. Howes' volume is "developed" from newspaper and magazine articles and notes left by his father, Cecil Howes, who for over 40 years was the Kansas City Star's statehouse correspondent in Topeka. The first two parts consist of brief chapters on standard historical topics; the last two, "The Stuff It's Made Of" and "Yesterday and Today," have chapters on folkways and episodes of social history, such as "From Saloons to Bootleggers to Bottle Stores," "The Water-Witching Vogue," and "Traveling under Wind Power."

OKLAHOMA

4169. McReynolds, Edwin C. Oklahoma; a history of the Sooner State. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1954. 461 p. illus., maps. 54-10052 F694.M16

Bibliography: p. 434-445.

4170. Debo, Angie. Oklahoma, foot-loose and fancy-free. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1949. 258 p. 49-48798 F700.D4

4171. Debo, Angie. Prairie City, the story of an American community. New York, Knopf, 1944. xiv, 245, viii p. illus. 44-4798 F694.D4

Mr. McReynolds has been a resident of Oklahoma since 1892, and his book is a sober and systematic presentation of the early history of the area, and of the more formal elements in its economic and political development since the Civil War. It may be described as derivative, but only in the sense that it draws upon the detailed studies of such Oklahoma scholars as Foreman, Dale, Debo, and Gittinger in order to construct a unified narrative, from Coronado's expedition of 1540 to the gubernatorial election of 1950. Six chapters of some 165 pages cover the Indian regime from the removal of the Five Civilized Tribes to about 1875. The years since the acquisition of statehood in 1907 are covered as successive gubernatorial administrations, with some economic summaries in the penultimate chapter, and a final one on "The Culture of Oklahoma." Miss Debo's Oklahoma, on the other hand, is concerned with Oklahoma life and character, and incorporates only enough informal geography and history to serve as background for her social and psychological interpretations. The violence of Oklahoma politics is attributed to this basic cause: "a people agrarian in outlook and Jacksonian in politics had to cope with industrial problems developing with a speed never before attained in American history." Oklahomans are individualists without strong group loyalties of any kind, which makes on the one hand for originality and initiative, and on the other for bad politics, economic instability, "and other collective failures." In Prairie City Miss Debo displays true Oklahoman originality, for who before ever chose "to write of a typical, rather than an actual, community, a composite of numerous Oklahoma settlements, of which some are still in existence, and others have long been ghost towns"? The device was adopted for greater freedom of expression, but while the people are fictive, the chronology, statistics, and events are actual, and based upon the author's own home town of Marshall and its region; "even the conversations are recorded or remembered conversations." Readers may also compare the developments in Prairie City with those in Miss Debo's slender volume on Tulsa: From Creek Town to Oil Capital (Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1943. 123 p.). Three hundred years of American history—"Indian occupation, ranching, pioneering, industrial development, and finally disillusionment and the recasting of objectives—have been telescoped within the single life-time of some of the older Tulsans."

N. The Rocky Mountain Region: General

4172. Atwood, Wallace W. The Rocky Mountains. New York, Vanguard Press, 1945. 324 p. (American mountain series, edited by Roderick Peattie, v. 3) 45-11388 F721.A8

Bibliography: p. 311-315.

Wallace W. Atwood (1872-1949), president of Clark University from 1920-46, was a field geologist as well as a professor of the subject in major universities, and was attached to the U. S. Geological Survey from 1901. In 1909 he was assigned to make a model physiographic study of mountain erosion and sculpture, which took him into the high ranges from New Mexico to Alaska—"he has ridden with pack train the length of the sky-line trail," says Mr. Peattie in his introduction to his teacher's book. In this exceptional volume Dr. Atwood combined an outline, in untechnical language, of the geological evolution and structure of the Rockies with a vivid evocation and appreciation of mountain scenery and the life of pack train and mountain camp. Three final sections summarize the gold-mining strikes in various areas, the life of "Indians, Ranchmen, Farmers, and Tourists," and the 14 national parks of the Rockies, seven of which are Canadian. A general map and eight cross-sections are supplied by Erwin Raisz.

4173. Garnsey, Morris E. America's new frontier, the Mountain West. New York, Knopf, 1950. xviii, 314, ix p. maps, diagrs.
50–7765 F721.G3 1950

Bibliography: p. 310–314.

The eight states of the Mountain West are a new frontier, in the author's conception, only potentially, for their recent economic trends have exhibited small progress, and the present crucial stage must determine whether they will instead become a backwater—"an underdeveloped and neglected region whose resources have been irreparably exploited and destroyed." At present, with only 4.8 persons per square mile, they are underpopulated, and their labor remains relatively unproductive and unremunerated because they are confined to raw materials which are manufactured elsewhere. The region's balance of payments has been kept in equilibrium only by substantial Federal subsidies, which means that it is in effect a charge upon the other sections. The author offers the outline of a regional program based on the optimum utilization of Western resources of water and hydroelectric power, which could double the irrigated areas and increase power capacity so as to provide the basis for Western industrialization and minerals development. Such a program "will result in population growth, greater stability in the regional economy, a rise in per capita income, and an increase in the region's contribution to the wealth and security of the American people."

4174. Lavender, David. The Big Divide. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1948. 321 p.
48–11660 F591.L39

Bibliography: p. [299]–307.

Mr. Lavender, a resident of Colorado and an enthusiastic connoisseur of his mountainous region, here essays a presentation of life in "those sections of the Rockies which lie inside Colorado, Wyoming, eastern Utah, and northern New Mexico," from the days of the mountain men to the present. This he achieves in 17 episodic or topical chapters, each more or less complete in itself, but so disposed as to form a reasonably chronological sequence. The first gold rush, just before the Civil War, resulted in "poor man's diggings, placer beds that could be stripped to bedrock with no other resources than hard work, ordinary tools, and limited capital." Subsequent chapters deal with the Mountain Utes, the silver stampedes of the later 19th century, early transportation principally by mulepower, the narrow-gauge mountain railroads, labor violence in the Cripple Creek district, the development of stock ranching, the conservation and reclamation movements, the rise of the tourist trade, and the modern sports of climbing and skiing. Mr. Lavender's story of his own experiences in mining and cattle ranching appeared in 1943: One Man's West (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday. 298 p.).

4175. Vestal, Stanley. Mountain men. Boston, Houghton Mifflin. 1937. 296 p.
37–8786 F591.V47

"Acknowledgments and bibliography": p. [293]–296.

In the spring of 1822 the Missouri partners, William H. Ashley and Andrew Henry, adopted a new method of conducting the fur trade: they advertised for 100 enterprising young men to ascend the Missouri to its source and be employed there. These white trappers would meet at an annual rendezvous in some mountain valley previously agreed upon, turn over their year's take of furs, and receive their wages and a new outfit. Such was the origin of the mountain men, so called because they lived the year round in the Rockies. Mr. Vestal tells their story through the Mexican War in a succession of dramatic episodes, involving such figures as Jim Bridger, Jedediah Smith, Thomas Fitzpatrick, William Sublette, and Old Bill Williams. Some of his information is oral in origin, derived from his stepfather and from Indians of western Oklahoma.

4176. West, Ray B., ed. Rocky Mountain cities; with an introduction by Carey McWilliams. New York, Norton, 1949. 320 p.
49–1907 F591.W463

CONTENTS.—Reno, the state city, by W. V. T. Clark.—The Coeur d'Alene, vulnerable valley, by J. K. Howard.—El Paso, big mountain town, by Duncan Aikman.—Cheyenne, cowman's capital, by Dee Linford.—Albuquerque, a place to live in, by Erna Fergusson.—Salt Lake City, city of the Saints, by D. L. Morgan.—Tucson, the folk industry, by June Caldwell.—Butte, the copper camp, by John Stahlberg.—Santa Fe, city of many molds, by Haniel Long.—Denver, reluctant capital, by C. A. Graham and Robert Perkin.—Notes on the contributors.

Sketches of life, the economic structure, and politics in nine cities of the intermountain West, together with Burke, Kellogg, and Wallace, the three towns of the Coeur d'Alene valley in northern Idaho. Mr. McWilliams presents them as case studies which demonstrate that the West "suffers from the effects of a too rapid, one-sided, and improvident industrialization."

4177. Wolle, Muriel V. (Sibell) The bonanza trail; ghost towns and mining camps of the West. Illustrated by the author. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1953. xvi, 510 p. maps. 53-10019 F591.W853

"A Glossary of the Mining and Mineral Industry, by Albert H. Fay": p. 477-842.

"Selected bibliography": p. 483-489.

During 1951 and 1952 Mrs. Wolle, professor of fine arts in the University of Colorado, traveled over 70,000 miles by motor car, largely on mountainous back roads, seeking out and sketching the ghost towns of the West. She covered the eleven westernmost States of the Union, as well as the Black Hills of South Dakota, concentrating on the places where the earliest discoveries of precious metals were made, and those where the richest strikes were found. She includes not only the true ghost towns—"completely deserted, although buildings still line their streets"—but the partials, where a portion of the town remains inhabited, or where mining has been supplanted by other pursuits. Mrs. Wolle's drawings have the same qualities of emphasis and clarity as her writing, and when possible she has enlivened her accounts of the old mining communities by extracts from contemporary newspaper files. The ghost towns, to which her book forms so attractive a guide, she does not find depressing: "Behind the present ruins I see the once bustling cities whose teeming life made possible the West of today."

O. The Rocky Mountain Region: Local

MONTANA

4178. Howard, Joseph Kinsey. Montana; high, wide, and handsome. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1943. 347 p. A43-3702 F731.H86

"Acknowledgments and bibliography": p. [330]-339.

Howard (1906-1951) was a Montana journalist, editor of the Great Falls Leader, and his book, in spite of the unpropitious time at which it appeared, made a considerable stir and inaugurated a critical trend in the regional literature of the Mountain West. It is a vigorously written indictment of the elements of exploitation in successive phases of Montana's economy, which made it "an object lesson in American domestic imperialism." "Montana's is a cashcrop agriculture, hitherto exploited to the limit while the soil remained"; minerals have been extracted in the same spirit; and the development of hydroelectric power has been artificially retarded. The root of the State's economic disasters in the 1920's and 1930's, the author suggests, was the campaign of James J. Hill and the Northern Pacific to attract homesteaders, which increased the State's wheat acreage twelvefold in the decade after 1909, only to lead to dust storms and foreclosures in periods of drouth. Mr. Howard also edited Montana Margins, a State Anthology (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1946. xviii, 527 p.), which has no such special emphasis, but aims only to picture life in the State "as it was and is." There are many magazine articles and newspaper extracts, poems, short stories, and episodes from novels in the 11 topical sections of this very representative selection.

WYOMING

4179. Hafen, Le Roy R., and Francis Marion Young. Fort Laramie and the pageant of the West, 1834-1890. Glendale, Calif., A. H. Clark, 1938. 429 p. 38-7543 F761.H24

The Oregon Trail, a route well known to trappers from 1823, follows the North Platte River and crosses its tributary, the Laramie (so named as early as 1821, from an otherwise unknown trapper), in border country between the high plains and the mountains. At this natural point for trade between Indian and white, in 1834 William Sublette and Robert Campbell constructed a fort which, after its rebuilding in 1840 or 1841, was usually called Fort Laramie. From 1841 on it was a landmark for the emigrants in their trains of covered wagons, and in 1849 it was bought by the United States from the American Fur Company and received a garrison of three companies, the majority mounted riflemen. From its purchase until as late as 1876 it was of importance in all the Indian affairs of the region. Near it, in the summer of 1854, Lieutenant Grattan and his company were massacred by the Brulé Sioux who, in their turn, were massacred a year later by General Harney's command. By 1890 the Fort's usefulness was past, and it was abandoned by order of the War Department. The authors' unadorned narrative, made up in large part of extracts from the sources, indeed makes a striking pageant of the Old West as seen from a single strategic viewpoint.

COLORADO

4180. Fritz, Percy Stanley. Colorado, the Centennial State. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1941. 518 p. (Prentice-Hall books on history, edited by Carl Wittke) 41–1853 F776.F83

"Selected bibliography" at end of each chapter.

A textbook of standard type by the then assistant professor of history at the University of Colorado. After an introducton on general Western history, some 90 pages are allotted to the pioneer period, 50 to the territorial (1861–76: "the Centennial State" refers to the fact that Colorado was admitted to the Union during the hundredth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence), and 250 to the period of statehood. In addition to the usual topics, the last part has chapters on "The Settlement of the Western Slope" since 1880, on "The Motor Age" since 1910, and on "Aesthetic and Cultural Attainments."

4181. Sprague, Marshall. Money mountain; the story of Cripple Creek gold. Boston, Little, Brown, 1953. xx, 342 p. illus.

52–12637 F784.C8S6

Bibliography: p. [321]–327.

Cripple Creek, in the mountains 18 miles west of Colorado Springs, became the world's greatest gold camp in 1891, boomed until 1902, maintained high production until 1917, and down to 1952 yielded 625 tons of gold valued at $432,000,000. The district's population rose from 15 to 50,111 at the turn of the century, and has since sunk to 1,980. This boom started not in a remote wilderness but in a ranching area, and was easily accessible, from 1895 by railroad. Mr. Sprague has used Cripple Creek and Colorado Springs newspapers, and has interviewed many survivors or descendants. He has been able to reconstruct the story through its leading personalities, and follows Bob Womack, the part-time cowboy who made the original strike on Oct. 20, 1890, to his death, as a penniless paralytic, 19 years later. Of Cripple Creek's 28 millionaires, the most attention goes to the richest, Winfield Scott Stratton, "a weary, defeated carpenter who had spent most of his forty-four years working for three dollars a day," who cared nothing for his money nor for Colorado Springs society, and who, after giving or throwing away millions, left an estate of $6,000,000 to establish a home for poor children and old people. There are detailed narratives of the miners' strikes of 1893–94 and 1903–4, and of the double fire which demolished the town in 1896.

4182. Chittenden, Hiram Martin. Yellowstone National Park, historical & descriptive. Rev. by Eleanor Chittenden Cress and Isabelle F. Story [5th ed.] Stanford, Calif., Stanford University Press, 1949. 286 p. plates, fold. map.

49–9516 F722.C54 1949

Yellowstone National Park in northwestern Wyoming, a natural wonderland containing the yellow walls of the Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone River, the upper and the lower Falls, fossil forests, and more geysers than are to be found in the rest of the globe, was not thoroughly explored until 1870, and has been a Federal reserve since 1872. General Chittenden (no. 4148), in the course of two official assignments there in the 1890's, gathered the materials for this comprehensive manual of the Park, which he revised a second time just before his death in 1917. It has since been kept up to date by the Stanford University Press, and provides full information on the discovery and early history of the region, its administration as a park by the Federal Government, and its physical characteristics and wildlife.

UTAH

4183. Hunter, Milton R. Utah, the story of her people, 1540–1947; a centennial history of Utah. Salt Lake City, Deseret News Press, 1946. xvi, 431 p. illus. 46–8266 F826.H85 1946

This revised edition of the author's Utah in Her Western Setting, 2d ed. (1943) was published in observance of the centennial of the arrival in 1847 of the Mormon pioneers in the valley of the Great Salt Lake. Having searched across four-fifths of the continent for a place to establish their new faith, they contributed to opening up the vast resources of the West by planting settlements in a presumed desert and developing irrigation projects. Early chapters deal with the Spanish exploration of the territory that became the State of Utah in 1896, the fur traders and trappers, and Government explorations prior to the arrival of the Mormons. Their migration under the leadership of Joseph Smith, the founder, from New York to Ohio, Missouri, and Illinois, where Smith was killed, and the trek to Utah under Brigham Young are described in succeeding chapters. The Mormon doctrine of plural marriage, and economic and political solidarity, led to conflicts between Mormons and non-Mormons, and in 1887 Congress passed more rigid laws against polygamy, which was discontinued in 1890 by a Manifesto issued by Wilford Woodruff, President of the Church. In the final chapter the author describes the impact of World War II on the development of Utah, and the economic and climatic advantages of Utah as a place to live.

NEVADA

4184. Lillard, Richard G. Desert challenge, an interpretation of Nevada. New York, Knopf, 1942. viii, 388, ix p. plates, maps (1 fold.)
42-20630 F841.L5

Bibliographical references included in "Acknowledgments" (p. 385-388).

Geology and climatology, history and sociology are combined with guidebook data in this interpretation of the influences that have created this region of contrasts—the sixth state in area but the last in population, although it became a state in 1864. Those influences, the author points out, came mostly from the outside. Nevada's fabulous mines early attracted attention, and the State suffered the consequences of the exploitation of its leading resource by a transient population. Chapters are devoted to the mining camps, and towns such as Virginia City and Goldfield, which have "lived on in contracted form," and the true ghost towns, which are reminders of more affluent years but are also "a genuine American antiquity as meaningful and significant as the trench mounds of Valley Forge and the white church at Lexington." A final chapter describes the prosperity of Reno and Las Vegas as "cosmopolitan divorce capitals." The author, a native of California, pursued advanced study at the universities of Montana, Harvard, and Iowa, and this book is part of his doctoral dissertation at the last.

4185. Lyman, George D. The saga of the Comstock Lode; boom days in Virginia City. New York, Scribner, 1947 [c1934] 407 p.
54-26534 F849.V8L92 1947

The Comstock Lode—named after Henry T. P. Comstock, a ne'er-do-well sheep-herder—was the West's richest strike (1859) and Virginia City—christened by a drunken prospector known only as "Old Virginny"—was its most feverish boom town. Dr. Lyman, a San Francisco physician who was born in Virginia City after its heyday was over, has sought out the facts of its origin and first boom in a variety of original sources, and has presented them in so gasping and breathless a style that few readers would suspect the book's solid foundations. This story of grinding labor, sudden wealth, perpetual litigation, recurrent bloodshed, and riotous relaxations could well have endured a more sober and coherent narration, and so fact-filled a book deserved an index. It ends with the slump of 1865, which came about when the surface ore had been skimmed off—but only $45 million out of an eventual $900 million had been extracted, and the Comstock's greatest days still lay ahead.

P. The Far Southwest: General

4186. Cleland, Robert Glass. This reckless breed of men; the trappers and fur traders of the Southwest. New York, Knopf, 1950. xv, 361, xx p. 50-6356 F592.C62 1950

Bibliography: p. 347-361.

In this volume Dr. Cleland, one of the permanent research staff of the Huntington Library since 1943, has utilized widely scattered manuscript sources to supply both a neglected chapter in the history of the American fur trade and a connected account of the real pioneers of the American Southwest. These were the intrepid and indefatigable "mountain men," who pursued the vanishing beaver along the desert or semidesert rivers of the Southwest, enduring terrible hardships and carrying on a merciless feud with the Indians of the region. Their expeditions, in which 50 to 100 men might participate either as bands of independent trappers, or under the auspices of partnerships or companies, continued for some 20 years after 1820. The trade, however, was in decline after 1835, the fashion in men's hats having turned from beaver to silk, and by 1845 the mountain men were "a fast-disappearing race." Meanwhile such skillful and daring explorers as Jedediah Strong Smith, James Ohio Pattie, Ewing Young, and Joseph Reddeford Walker had blazed the trails of the Southwest for the benefit of traders, soldiers, Government officials, and settlers.

4187. Fergusson, Erna. Our Southwest; photographs by Ruth Frank and others. New York, Knopf, 1940. 376 p. 40-7056 F786.F49

A granddaughter of Southwestern pioneers, the author was born in Albuquerque. As a teacher in the public schools, a dude wrangler, and lecturer, she early gained an insight into the history and traditions that produced the people of the Southwest and their characteristic manners and customs. Here she interprets the region in terms of the significance of such cities as Fort Worth, San Antonio, El Paso, Tucson, Phoenix, Prescott, Gallup, Albuquerque, Santa Fé, and Taos, and the people whose Indian and Spanish descent has colored the civilization of the region. "Fred Harvey, Civilizer," "the man who made the desert blossom with a beefsteak," and went on to become a propagandist of the regional arts and crafts, gets a chapter to himself. A final chapter on "The Interpreters," a running commentary on Southwestern books and authors, does service for a bibliography.

4188. Gregg, Josiah. Commerce of the prairies; edited by Max L. Moorhead. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1954. xxxviii, 469 p. (American exploration and travel [17])
54–10055 F800.G83 1954

"Gregg's bibliography [reconstructed by the editor]": p. 445–447. "Editor's sources": p. 448–454.

Prompted by ill health to seek the curative air of the prairies, Josiah Gregg (1806–1850) set out with a merchant caravan from Independence, Mo., for Santa Fé in 1831, and by 1840 had crossed the Great Plains eight times. As a trader of American goods for Mexican silver and mules, he had developed a "passion for Prairie life" which he did not expect to survive. An avid reader with a natural scientific bent, Gregg made notes on the animals, the plants, and the Indians of the prairies, on the mineral resources of New Mexico, and the manners and customs of its people, and on his journeys to Mexico and Texas. During those journeys he blazed new trails, some of which became favorites with later comers, and gathered material for what became in 1845 "the most complete and reliable map of the prairies then in existence." His observations were published in 1844 as Commerce of the Prairies (New York, H. G. Langley. 2 v.), which "has been recognized for more than a hundred years as the classic description of the early southern plains and as the epic of the Santa Fé Trail." It has gone through "fourteen printings (seven during Gregg's own short lifetime) and came from the presses in England and Germany as well as the United States." Mr. Moorhead calls his volume the "first edition of Gregg's complete text, notes, and maps which also contains a biographical introduction, critical notes, and a list of the author's sources."

4189. Richardson, Rupert Norval, and Carl Coke Rister. The greater Southwest; the economic, social, and cultural development of Kansas, Oklahoma, Texas, Utah, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Arizona, and California from the Spanish conquest to the twentieth century. Glendale, Calif., A. H. Clark, 1934. 506 p. 34–28934 F786.R524

"References for additional reading" at end of each chapter.

"As used in this book the Southwest or the Greater Southwest includes the country of the United States west of the eastern border of the Great Plains . . . and south of the northern boundaries of the tier of states extending from Kansas to California." This well-proportioned textbook deals mainly with the foundations of civilization as they were planted in that region from the coming of the first white men to the close of the 19th century. The spirit of the settlers was molded by the climate, Indian and Spanish influences, and the rapidity with which the area developed after it was acquired from Mexico in 1848. A citizenry of "irrepressible optimism, social democracy, and resourcefulness" emerged. The discovery of gold in California, the development of the cattle and sheep industries, the building of railroads to the Pacific, and the establishment of thousands of farms and agricultural communities with their irrigation and reclamation projects, by the end of the century gave the Southwest a position of significance in the economic structure of the United States.

4190. Vestal, Stanley. The book lover's Southwest; a guide to good reading, by Walter S. Campbell (Stanley Vestal) Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1955. xii, 287 p.
55–6367 Z1251.S8V4

Bibliography: p. 269–272.

Professor Campbell of the University of Oklahoma English Department, after writing or editing 21 books on the Southwest under the pen name of Stanley Vestal, surveys its literature under his own. Arizona and the eastern halves of Oklahoma and Texas are excluded from consideration. The books considered are arranged by categories, with biography (16 subsections), description and interpretation, and history receiving the greatest amount of attention, but with substantial sections for folklore, humor, juveniles, poetry, and fiction. No assessment is attempted, as being beyond the powers of a contemporary, but the writer frequently gives vent to his enthusiasm. He certainly makes his point that, considering the newness of the region as an area of Anglo-American settlement, the quantity, variety, and quality of the literary achievement is impressive. A companion to the course taught by James Frank Dobie at the University of Texas, entitled Guide to Life and Literature of the Southwest, rev. and enl. (Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1952. 222 p.), is especially strong on Texas, cowboys, cattle, and folklore.

4191. [Wertenbaker, Green Peyton] America's heartland, the Southwest, by Green Peyton [pseud.] Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1948. xvii, 285 p. 48–10982 F396.W4

Bibliographical references included in "Acknowledgments": p. 274–277.

This is the introductory volume to a series of books about the culture of the Southwest projected by the University of Oklahoma with funds from the Rockefeller Foundation. As an experienced journalist, the author describes the impressions which he has gathered from interviews and ten thousand miles of travel in the states of Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, Oklahoma, and New Mexico. It is not offered as a scholarly study, but as a general survey and an impression to "explain why the Southwest is important to the life of our time, and how its people come to be the way they are."

Q. The Far Southwest: Local

TEXAS

4192. Goodwyn, Frank. Lone-Star Land; twentieth-century Texas in perspective. New York, Knopf, 1955. 352 p. 55–7850 F391.2.G6

"This book embraces the geology, geography, anthropology, history, economics and culture of Texas. Selectivity is necessarily high, and all details are eschewed except those which delineate the essential peculiarities of the chosen area." The result is a genuine synthesis, presented in a clear and straightforward exposition, and illustrated by excellently chosen and reproduced photographs. The author is evidently fascinated by the personality of W. Lee O'Daniel, whose political career he treats at some length.

4193. Hogan, William Ransom. The Texas republic; a social and economic history. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1946. 338 p. 46–8214 F390.H6

Bibliography: p. 299–326.

For ten years before being admitted to the Union in 1846, Texas was an independent republic. This volume describes everyday existence in that frontier democracy during those years. It is a record of "devout circuit riders, pioneer physicians and school teachers, unruly young lawyers, gun-bearing rowdies and duelists, town builders and land pirates, planters and farmers" who, at work and play, developed those characteristics which distinguish Texans from the citizens of other states. The author attributes much of Texas nationalism to its public-land system: here free land was obtained, not from a distant government in Washington, but from a national government that was close at hand, and that did what it could to discourage large-scale land speculation, especially by nonresidents.

4194. Richardson, Rupert Norval. Texas, the Lone Star State. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1943. xix, 590 p. [Prentice-Hall history series; Carl Wittke, editor] 43–2288 F386.R52

"Selected bibliography" at end of each chapter.

A book intended both for college classes and the reading public, whose purpose "is to provide, as far as the limitations of a single volume will permit, a complete survey of the history of Texas." It gives equal attention to the romantic and colorful period of Texas history, and to more prosaic events such as the development of education and the fluctuations of economic conditions. Approximately half the book is devoted to "the extension of farming into the Great Plains, the growth of industries, the revolution in transportation, efforts to regulate business, the program of social security, the regulations of agriculture, and the varied political history" of the years since 1876—a period hitherto neglected by historians. Lists of "Governors of Texas" and "United States Senators from Texas" form an Appendix.

4195. McCarty, John L. Maverick town, the story of old Tascosa. With chapter decorations by Harold D. Bugbee. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1946. 277 p. 46–6343 F394.T17M3

Bibliography: p. 261–266.

Tascosa, high up in the Texas Panhandle, is typical of those communities in the West that once flourished, and then declined into ghost towns. For nearly a decade beginning in the late 1870's, Tascosa as an open-range trading center and the "legal capital of ten counties in a cattle empire," was the center of all affairs, public and private, lawful and unlawful, as well as the home "of a group of great 'little' men both Mexican and Anglo-American." But the railroad never came, and the great flood of the Canadian River in 1893 merely hastened the death of an already moribund town. The author has based his narrative, made possible by a grant through the Texas State Historical Society from the Rockefeller Foundation, in large part on interviews with and letters from oldtimers, and on the unique file of The Tascosa Pioneer (1886–91).

4196. Haley, James Evetts. The XIT Ranch of Texas, and the early days of the Llano Estacado. [New ed.] Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1953. xiv, 258 p.
53–8818 F391.H16 1953

Bibliography: p. 247–252.

The files of the XIT Ranch and its Chicago office, now in the archives of the Panhandle-Plains Historical Society at Canyon, Texas, together with letters, personal interviews, newspapers, books, pamphlets, and periodical articles have been used as sources for this chronicle of "the most extensive Western range ever placed under one barbedwire fence." Established in the middle 80's, the XIT Ranch included 3,050,000 acres of land in the Panhandle of Texas, patented by the State to a Chicago firm in payment for constructing the Capitol at Austin. The first edition of this book, published in 1929, was printed by the Farwell family of Chicago "as a privately issued memorial to their people, their associates, and their cowboys." A log of an 1892 cattle drive and the "General Rules of the XIT Ranch, January, 1888" are published as appendixes.

4197. Horgan, Paul. Great river: the Rio Grande in North American history. New York, Rinehart, 1954. 2 v. (1020 p.)
54–9867 F392.R5H65 1954

Bibliography: v. 2, p. 957–977.

Mr. Horgan, a writer of novels and other fiction who has lived in New Mexico since 1915, spent 13 years in the preparation of this book. He wished "to produce a sense of historical experience, rather than a bare record" of this river, nearly 2,000 miles long, whose "historical course takes us through something over ten centuries of time and through the chronicles of three cultures." The result is a stately pageant of the Indian and the Spanish Rio Grande in volume I, and of the Mexican and "The United States Rio Grande" in volume II. The author's ability to penetrate the inwardness of vanished cultures is evidenced in such chapters as "The Stuff of Life" in the Indian section, and "Collective Memory" and "Hacienda and Village" in the Spanish. Save for a chapter on the border troubles leading to General Pershing's Punitive Expedition of 1916–17, the detailed narrative ceases with the 1870's. "Finally all indigenous aspects of the river's three societies would be dissolved in the technological uniformity of the national life in the twentieth century." The author's achievement was recognized with two annual prizes: the Bancroft prize and the Pulitzer prize in history.

NEW MEXICO

4198. Fergusson, Erna. New Mexico; a pageant of three peoples. New York, Knopf, 1951. 408 p. 51–11094 F796.F35

"Books recommended for further reading": p. 395–404.

Mrs. Fergusson describes the development of her native State under the influence of Indian, Spanish, and American civilizations, which are blended in this "land of enchantment." The backwardness of Spanish-speaking villagers is attributed to "the powerful in politics, government, and even education," who have failed to impart the mastery of English that could be had "within one school generation, twelve years." Twentieth-century elements in New Mexico are described in chapters on "The Federal Man"—atomic scientist or conservationist, "Water"—the new dams, and the "Artist Discoverers" who have centered in Taos. A final chapter points out to tourists the natural wonders and other places of interest. The selected bibliography at the end is aimed at the general reader, and is arranged according to the chapters of the book. There is also a glossary of Indian and Spanish words and phrases characteristic of the region.

ARIZONA

4199. Lockwood, Francis Cummins. Pioneer days in Arizona, from the Spanish occupation to statehood, by Frank C. Lockwood. New York, Macmillan, 1932. xiv, 387 p. 32–29213 F811.L75

Arizona, in which the Grand Canyon, the Painted Desert, and the Petrified Forest are located, was the last state to enter the Union. It is noted for its mild winter climate and sunshine which have made southern Arizona a winter vacation and health resort; for the development of the Colorado River for irrigation and power; for its Indian tribes with their handicraft trade; and for its mineral resources. The author, associated in various capacities with the University of Arizona from 1916 to 1930, wrote this book to fill the need, which he discovered when he moved to Arizona, for a book that traces the political, industrial, social, and cultural beginnings of the State. He has brought together from interviews with pioneers, early newspapers, letters, diaries, reminiscences, government documents, and other sources, the material which he uses "to narrate in an orderly and graphic way the chief incidents that took place in Arizona from the coming of the Spaniards in 1539 to the achievement of Statehood in 1912." The literature of the State is described in a chapter on "Newspapers, Books, and Libraries" (p. 345–367).

R. California

4200. Caughey, John Walton. California. 2d ed. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1953. 666 p. illus. (Prentice-Hall history series)
53–9858 F861.C34 1953
"A commentary on Californiana": p. 595–634.

Professor Caughey of the University of California at Los Angeles published the original edition of this very successful textbook for college classes in 1940. He allots a little over a third of the volume to the periods before American acquisition. California, first visited by the Spaniards in 1542, was not settled by them until 1769. The Mexican period, beginning in 1822, was brief and "self-consciously transitional." Cattle raising was the prevailing economy until the Gold Rush transformed the north, and southern California remained predominantly pastoral until the boom of the 1880's. The growth of the State in population and wealth has been accelerated by subsequent booms, but has gone steadily on between them. California is its own region, and developments there have proceeded in relative independence of the rest of the United States. The annotated bibliography furnishes guidance to a literature that has become enormous. In the second edition some of the earlier chapters are expanded, and the story is continued down to "The Scene at Midcentury."

4201. Caughey, John Walton. Gold is the cornerstone. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1948. xvi, 321 p. 48–10984 F865.C33
Bibliography: p. 301–314.

4202. Ellison, William Henry. A self-governing dominion: California, 1849–1860. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1950. 335 p.
Bibliography: p. 315–322. 50–62714 F865.E5

The Chronicles of California, inaugurated by the University of California Press under the editorship of Professors Herbert E. Bolton and J. W. Caughey as a part of the State's centennial celebration, are a series of volumes on periods or topics of State history. Of the pair here listed, the first is a balanced narrative of the Gold Rush, and an estimate of its importance in California history. On Jan. 24, 1848, James Wilson Marshall, a carpenter constructing a mill at Coloma on land belonging to John W. Sutter, found fragments of gold in the millrace. Before winter most of the able-bodied males in California had turned gold miners, and in the course of 1849 the influx of outsiders brought the number of prospectors and miners to some 45,000. The result was the stimulation of developments in California, the West at large, and the whole Pacific basin that would otherwise have taken a generation, or might not have occurred at all. One obvious consequence was that by Sept. 7, 1850, less than 32 months after the discovery of gold, California had become the 31st State of the Union. But for over a decade, because of her isolation, and the assumption of her citizens that they were a people apart, California's ultimate destiny remained undetermined. Not until 1860, Prof. Ellison believes, was a political contest first waged around national issues, and decided "by the rather general recognition that California could not stand as a self-governing dominion but only as an integral and dependent part of the United States." Other volumes published in the Chronicles of California have been Charles L. Camp's Earth Song: A Prologue to History (1952. 127 p.), Jeanne Skinner Van Nostrand and Edith M. Coulter's California Pictorial; a History in Contemporary Pictures, 1786 to 1859 (1948. 159 p.), William W. Robinson's Land in California (1948. 291 p.), George E. Mowry's The California Progressives (1951. 349 p.), and Franklin D. Walker's A Literary History of Southern California (1950. 282 p.).

4203. Cleland, Robert Glass. From wilderness to empire; a history of California, 1542–1900. New York, Knopf, 1944. xii, 388, xiv p. illus.
44–2422 F861.C6

4204. Cleland, Robert Glass. California in our time (1900–1940) New York, Knopf, 1947. viii, 320, xx p. 47–30606 F866.C62

Dr. Cleland came to California at the age of four in 1889, has visited all parts of the State, and has spent most of his life in studying its history. After 30 years in the service of Occidental College, he transferred to the research staff of the Huntington Library in 1943, and has since published a series of important works on California history, beginning with the present pair, and including a study of the fur trade in the Southwest (no. 4186). The above titles were originally planned as a one-volume history of the State, but were divided when the author became convinced that it would be impossible to do justice to the complex economic, political, and cultural developments of the 20th century in a few chapters. From Wilderness to Empire is largely narrative incorporating many extracts from original sources, and does not slight the colorful and romantic aspects of the subject, but also contains descriptive chapters such as "Missions and Ranchos" and "California of the Ranges." The sequel traces "the over-rapid transformation of an agrarian region into a highly industrialized society," and the overtaking of northern California by southern, with much awe and some criticism. The concluding chapters are concerned with the false hopes aroused by the Townsend movement, the difficulties of the Japanese, Mexican, and "Okie" minorities, Hollywood as Bunyan's Vanity Fair magnified to huge proportions, and a review of California literature from its beginnings to John Steinbeck.

4205. Putnam, George Palmer. Death Valley and its country. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1946. 231 p. 46–8329 F868.D2P8
Bibliography: p. 219–220.

California's Death Valley, "the lowest, driest, and hottest place in America," is at the bottom of a volcanic trough on the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevada. Some 550 square miles of it are below sea level, and Badwater, 279.6 feet below, is the lowest land in North America—less than 80 miles from Mount Whitney, the highest peak in the United States. The Valley, which the author likens to an inferno in suspended animation, has been conspicuous in the American imagination ever since a train of '49-ers came to grief there, and has been a National monument since 1933. Mr. Putnam describes its kangaroo rats, chuckwallas, vinegaroons, and other strange fauna, its exploitation for Twenty Mule Team Borax in the 1880's, and the legends of its eccentric prospectors, of whom Death Valley Scotty was much the best known. Some bibliographic sources include this volume in the American Folkways series (no. 3942), but the Library of Congress copies have no such indication.

4206. Mayo, Morrow. Los Angeles. New York, Knopf, 1933. x, 337, xvi p. 33–6581 F869.L8M2
"Bibliographical note": p. 331–337.

4207. Carr, Harry. Los Angeles, city of dreams. Illus. by E. H. Suydam. New York, Appleton-Century, 1935. 35–18559 F869.L8C3

A modern and scholarly treatment of the spectacular rise of Los Angeles to a high rank among the world's great cities is badly needed; these volumes, over 20 years old and journalistic in manner, are inadequate substitutes. Mr. Mayo relates the more dramatic episodes in the annals of Los Angeles from 1781 to the 1920's, such as Collis P. Huntington's campaign to locate the artificial harbor at Santa Monica instead of San Pedro, and the Los Angeles Times dynamiting of 1910. This he does in a muscular style and with small sympathy, for he regards his subject as "an artificial city which has been pumped up under forced draught, inflated like a balloon, stuffed with rural humanity like a goose with corn." Harry Carr, who died the year after this book appeared, had been associated with the Los Angeles Times for nearly 40 years, and with the Hollywood studios in the days of their early celebrity. His topical chapters are more sympathetic in tone—to him, "Los Angeles is the ingredients of a cocktail, not yet shaken"—and studded with the reminiscences of an oldtimer who has watched the great transformation happen.

4208. Camp, William Martin. San Francisco: port of gold. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1947. xv, 518 p. 47–11836 F869.S3C25

4209. O'Brien, Robert. This is San Francisco; illus. by Antonio Sotomayor. New York, Whittlesey House, 1948. xv, 351 p. 48–10991 F869.S3O15

Mr. O'Brien came to San Francisco in 1939, and conducted a column, "Riptides," in the San Francisco Chronicle from 1946. His columns, and other materials gathered in the course of preparing them, are here organized into a "portrait of an American city" which stresses its less-known aspects and personalities. He divides the city into five main areas—"The Waterfront," "Old Town," "The Hills," "Main Stem," and "South of the Slot," and in each presents his material under particular streets and avenues. For each street the retrospective material is followed by an impression of the recent state of things. This organization certainly called for a better map than the very sketchy one which appears on the end papers. Mr. Camp explains that he has written "not a book about the City, but rather one about the Port, the water front of San Francisco." He recounts a number of episodes from earlier periods, such as Asbury Harpending's plot to capture San Francisco and hand it over to the Confederacy, but gives major space and emphasis to the creation of the facilities and the organization of the modern port, to the failure of the laws to protect sailors against crimps, shanghaiers, and brutal captains, to the movement to organize maritime workers which began in 1885, and to the frequent waterfront disturbances which have ensued.

4210. King, Clarence. Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada. Edited and with a pref. by Francis P. Farquhar. New York, Norton, 1935. 320 p. 35-35677 F868.S5K53

"Bibliographical notes": p. 317-320.

Clarence King (1842-1901) learned geology in the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale University, and soon after graduation joined the staff of the California State Geological Survey under Josiah Dwight Whitney and William H. Brewer. Much of the succeeding decade he spent in the geological exploration of the High Sierra, at first for the State Survey, and subsequently for the Federal Survey of the 40th Parallel, which he had suggested and of which he was placed in charge. These famous sketches were first published as articles in The Atlantic Monthly in 1871, and appeared in book form the following year. They give vivid glimpses of the Yosemite and its region, and of Mounts Tyndall, Shasta, and Whitney (King's party named the highest peak in the United States after their chief) as they appeared to a pioneer of American mountaineering—for King "was almost alone among Americans of his day in having the desire to climb remote and difficult peaks."

4211. Russell, Carl Parcher. One hundred years in Yosemite; the story of a great park and its friends; with a foreword by Newton B. Drury. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1947. xviii, 226 p. illus., fold. map. 47-30335 F868.Y6R8 1947

The Yosemite Valley, named after the local Indian tribe but formed by the north fork of the Merced River, was first visited in 1833, explored in 1851, turned over to California as a public trust in 1864, and restored to Federal ownership as part of a much larger Yosemite National Park in 1905. On the western slope of the Sierra Nevada about 150 miles due east of San Francisco, and containing some 1176 square miles, it is a natural wonderland of mountain valleys, sheer cliffs, towering peaks, waterfalls, giant sequoias, and abundant wildlife. Dr. Russell, who was Park Naturalist in 1923-29, brought out the first edition of this work in 1931, and in the second has expanded the original text from manuscripts contributed to the Yosemite Museum, and added the information called for by 16 years of development during which the Yosemite had eight million visitors. His volume is essentially a history, with chapters on the area's discoverers, pioneers, early tourists, mountain explorers, hotels, scientific interpreters, and administrators before and since the creation of the National Park Service in 1916. There is no systematic description of its natural features, but there is a substantial "Chronology, with Sources" (p. [177]-193) and a "Bibliography" (p. [195]-213) of titles of historical interest.

S. The Pacific Northwest: General

4212. Freeman, Otis W. and Howard H. Martin, eds. The Pacific Northwest, an overall appreciation. 2d ed. New York, Wiley, 1954. xvi, 540 p. 54-9235 HC107.A19F7 1954

The Pacific Northwest includes Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and the mountain counties of western Montana—a region that has an "identity differentiated from other areas of the United States," mainly by its topography. The first edition of this book (1942) was also the "first comprehensive study of the resources of the region which concerns itself with the geographic bases involved." Here it has been revised to take account of the many changes that have taken place in the region since that date. Thirty professors and technicians have contributed to the five parts on "Changing Human Adjustment," "Physical Environment," "Exploitation and Conservation of Various Resources," "Agriculture," and "Industry, Commerce, and Urban Development." The numerous sketch maps illustrate single factors. Most of the chapters conclude with a set of references.

4213. Fuller, George W. A history of the Pacific Northwest. New York, Knopf, 1931. xvi, 383, [16] p. 31-26862 F851.F96

Librarian of the Spokane Public Library (1911-36) and secretary of the Eastern Washington State Historical Society (1916-35), the author received historical recognition for The Inland Empire of the Pacific Northwest, a History (Spokane, H. G. Linderman, 1928. 4 v.) and for this book, a notable one-volume contribution to the early history of the region. Its principal subjects are the Indian tribes, whose manners and customs were first observed by Lewis and Clark, and their uprisings; the explorers who converged on the Pacific Northwest from the sea and land; the great fur companies; and the missionary pioneers who planted the first American settlement in the region—the Methodists in the Willamette valley (1834). Less than half of the narrative is concerned with the beginnings of government, pioneer social life, and political and economic growth through the first quarter of the 20th century. A list of "Governors of the Territories and States" appears at the end.

4214. Winther, Oscar Osburn. The Great Northwest; a history. 2d ed., rev. and enl. New York, Knopf, 1950. xviii, 491, xxx p. (Western Americana) 50–12482 F852.W65 1950
Bibliography: p. 463–491.

This historical survey of the Pacific Northwest from the period of exploration, through the fur trade era and the coming of the first missionaries and immigrants, to the present day was first published in 1947. In the revised edition the author has expanded Part II, "The Post-frontier Period, 1883–1950," which begins with the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad. He emphasizes the influence of transportation, and especially of the railroads, on the development of the territory. There are chapters on the range cattle business, irrigation, husbandry, industry and commerce including the tourist business, hydroelectric power projects, political ferment, and social and cultural achievements. In the same year the author also published The Old Oregon Country; a History of Frontier Trade, Transportation and Travel (Stanford, Calif., Stanford University Press, 1950. 348 p.). It includes much of the data that appeared in the 1947 edition of The Great Northwest, but the author hopes that "the more extended and detailed treatment here, with accompanying documentation, will be of added value to the readers." In his Farthest Frontier, the Pacific Northwest (New York, Macmillan, 1949. 375 p.), which was supported by the Library of Congress Grants in Aid for Studies in the History of American Civilization, Sidney Warren acknowledges his appreciation to Professor Winther for his "helpful suggestions and comments." Mr. Warren's book is a chronicle of the society created by the pioneers down to the year 1910, when "the region was well on the way to maturity." It describes their homes, schools, medical facilities, newspapers, recreation, and cultural growth.

T. The Pacific Northwest: Local

WASHINGTON

4215. Meany, Edmond S. History of the State of Washington. New York, Macmillan, 1924. 412 p. illus. 24–9257 F891.M46 1924

Best known as an educator during his years of association with the University of Washington (1897–1935), the author had numerous business interests, served in the State House of Representatives (1891–93), and achieved recognition as the historian of his adopted State. Intended primarily for the general reader, but also usable as a textbook in high schools or colleges, this book was first published in 1909. It is a "compact record" of the history of Washington State from the discovery and exploration of the Pacific Northwest by the Spanish, Russians, English, and, finally, the Americans under the leadership of such men as Robert Gray, Lewis and Clark, Charles Wilkes, and John Charles Frémont, to the year 1923. Separated from the Territory of Oregon in 1853, Washington Territory became a State in 1889, a late addition to the Union. The organization of the State, and its economic, political, and social development, occupy less than a fourth of the text. The last chapter is devoted to "Evidences of Recent Advance." Lists of counties, Territorial and State officers, and of State institutions form the appendixes.

4216. Morgan, Murray C. Skid Road; an informal portrait of Seattle. New York, Viking Press, 1951. 280 p. 51–14111 F899.S4M72

Seattle is located on the eastern shore of Puget Sound on Elliott Bay. The book's title was derived from the pioneer method of skidding logs by oxteams along the route to Yesler's sawmill—the business which first made Seattle look like a real town. Saloon keepers, show people, and others followed the loggers on the route later known as Yesler Way, "the northern limit of what Seattleites called 'our great restricted district.'" It is the story "of some who tried and failed and of some who achieved success without becoming respectable, of the life that centered on the mills and on the wharves. That is Seattle from the bottom up." It is told in the activities of such folk as Doc Maynard, "Seattle's first booster," who dreamed of making the city grow, and died before it reached maturity, the Mercer girls, imported for matrimony, and Mary Kenworthy, who challenged the Sinophobes. From more recent years, Mayor Ole Hanson and the general strike of 1919, Dave Beck and the labor movement, Lt. Governor Vic Meyers, the local wit, and others are given their part in the growth of Seattle. It has become one of the largest cities of the Pacific Northwest, and was made possible "by every sort of American and almost every sort of people."

4217. Fargo, Lucile F. Spokane story. New York, Columbia University Press, 1950. 276 p. 50–10471 F899.S7F3 1950
Bibliography: p. [261]–270.

A leader in the development of school libraries, the author began her career in Oregon and Washington. She spent 17 years as a librarian in Spokane, and had already written several books of fiction based on life in Dakota Territory and the Pacific Northwest, when she was invited by the Columbia University Press to write a book "picturing the life and culture of Spokane during successive phases of its development from fur trade days to the attainment of municipal adulthood in the early years of the twentieth century." She has approached her subject through the lives of those "whose activities have become a part of local lore," such as Ross Cox, the Walker family, Spokane Garry, the Ashlocks, Jim Glover, the "Father of Spokane," May Hutton, and others. She has produced an entertaining narrative for those who are "interested in the development of the so-called Inland Empire and its capital city." Titles which have been found useful as background material, because of "their human interest, lively style, and portrayal of social life and customs," have been included in the bibliography.

U. Overseas Possessions

4218. Pratt, Julius W. America's colonial experiment; how the United States gained, governed, and in part gave away a colonial empire. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1950. 460 p.
50–11728 F970.P7

The author has brought together in one volume a narrative of the United States' acquisition and government of Alaska and Hawaii; its administration of the Canal Zone and Panama Canal, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Wake and Midway Islands; its joint control, with Great Britain, of Canton and Enderbury Islands; and its interest in the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands—the Marshalls, Carolines, and Marianas. The rise of our "Caribbean sphere of influence" is traced through the first two decades of the century, and our "retreat from empire" dated from the beginning of President Harding's administration (1921). Economic conditions and causes of discontent, with "the remedies adopted or proposed, ranging from independence for the Philippines to proposed statehood for Alaska and Hawaii," are outlined. A summary of "United States-Philippines Relations after World War II" and of the "Government of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands" appears in the appendixes. The book describes the development in the overseas policies of the United States during the decade since William H. Haas published his largely geographical description, The American Empire, a Study of the Outlying Territories of the United States (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1940. 408 p.).

ALASKA

4219. Gruening, Ernest Henry. The State of Alaska. New York, Random House, 1954. 606 p. 54–7799 F904.G7

As Governor of Alaska (1939–53) and Director of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions in the Department of the Interior (1934–39), the author gained an insight into Alaska's problems which enables him to analyze here, in a manner not previously attempted, the relations between the United States Government and the Territory, and the economic forces which have influenced the destiny of Alaska, especially in the period since 1912. Following a brief summary of the discovery of Alaska by Vitus Bering, its botanical exploration by Georg W. Steller (1709–1746), who also gave the world the first account of the seal and other fur-bearing marine animals, and the purchase of Alaska from Russia in 1867, the author describes the neglect and indifference of the United States towards its new possession, and the struggle of the people of Alaska for more voice in the development of its resources and government. Almost half of the book is concerned with the period of the author's administration, during which World War II brought recognition to Alaska as a strategic military outpost, increased American interest in its development, and gave impetus to Alaska's determination "to fight on to validate the most basic of American principles—government by consent of the governed."

HAWAII

4220. Kuykendall, Ralph S., and Arthur Grove Day. Hawaii: a history, from Polynesian kingdom to American commonwealth. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1948. 331 p.
48–9650 DU625.K778
Bibliography: p. 301–308.

Located in the eastern half of the North Pacific, closer to America than any other important body of land, the Hawaiian Islands by reason of their strategic position have become, since their discovery by Captain James Cook in 1778, "the Crossroads of the Pacific." The native inhabitants are a part of the Polynesian family, and the Islands were first firmly united by Kamehameha I, who ruled from 1782 to 1819 and established the foundations of the Hawaiian kingdom. It endured until 1893, giving place to a Republic which sought annexation to the United States, and obtained it in 1898. As professors at the University of Hawaii, the authors were well-equipped to write the "main narrative of Hawaii's history, from the days of the ancient feather-cloaked warriors to the present time, when Hawaii's fight for statehood has made it an issue of national importance." A third of the book is devoted to the period since the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States. The book should interest residents of Hawaii, students of Pacific history, and the visitors who have added an extensive tourist trade to the Islands' basic sugar, pineapple, livestock, and fishing industries.

PANAMA CANAL

4221. Mack, Gerstle. The land divided, a history of the Panama Canal and other isthmian canal projects. New York, Knopf, 1944. xv, 650, xxxiv p. 44-3323 TC773.M25

"Notes on map and diagram sources": p. 592–597. Bibliography: p. 598–650.

This is a comprehensive and scholarly, yet readable, history of the movement for a transportation route between the Atlantic and the Pacific from the discovery of the New World to 1943. The prolonged controversies that preceded the selection of a route have led the author to describe in detail "all interoceanic canal projects throughout the length of the American continent from the Arctic Ocean to Cape Horn," with emphasis on a canal through Nicaragua, the most formidable rival of Panama. In addition to the location of the canal, the mode of construction, costs, tools, labor policies, treaties, concessions, and ownership became the subjects of endless controversies. Here the author attempts to combine "the political, economic, strategic, hygienic, and engineering aspects of the canal problem into a general history of the entire field." He deals with the early interest of the Spanish who first proposed to construct a canal as early as 1534; the French project directed by Ferdinand de Lesseps in the 1880's; and finally the eradication of yellow fever from the Isthmus by William Crawford Gorgas (no. 4823), and the construction of the Panama Canal by George W. Goethals (no. 4796). It was completed in 1914 on the eve of World War I, and improvements were in progress at the beginning of World War II. The land, says the author, had been divided, but the world was far from united.

PUERTO RICO

4222. Hanson, Earl Parker. Transformation: the story of modern Puerto Rico. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1955. 416 p. 54-9797 F1958.H3

Puerto Rico is unique in its status as a free commonwealth associated with the United States and at the same time fully self-governed at home. Its emergence from a backward, undeveloped society since 1940, and especially since 1948 when Luis Muñoz Marín became the first Governor elected by the people, "stands as a symbol of progress" for other undeveloped lands in the world. A remarkable program of industrialization has been launched; strides have been made in the amount and distribution of income; public health services, education, and employment have been expanded; and the commonwealth has become a "social laboratory of world importance." At one time executive secretary of the Planning Division of the Puerto Rico Reconstruction Administration, the author, in 1952, took a class of students from the University of Delaware to Puerto Rico to study its achievements. Here he tells the story of Puerto Rico's "anguish, explosion, and current effort . . . which should be better known than it is, if only because it reflects great credit and honor on the United States," and on the ingenuity and determination of a people. Rafael Pico, chairman of the Puerto Rico Planning Board since 1942, discusses the economic, physical, and human characteristics of the various regions of Puerto Rico in The Geographic Regions of Puerto Rico (Rio Piedras, P. R., University of Puerto Rico Press, 1950. 256 p.), an expansion of his doctoral dissertation submitted to Clark University, Worcester, Mass., in 1938. Published as a Social Science Research Center study of the College of Social Sciences, University of Puerto Rico, and edited by Julian H. Steward and others, The People of Puerto Rico; a Study in Social Anthropology (Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1956. 540 p.) was undertaken "to analyze the contemporary culture and to explain it in terms of the historical changes which have occurred on the island, especially those which followed the transition from Spanish sovereignty to United States sovereignty a half century ago."

XIII

Travel and Travelers

A. General Works 4223–4230
B. Anthologies 4231–4235
C. 50 Selected Travelers, 1743–1894
(chronologically arranged by the date of their travels) 4236–4389

THE literature of travel in America, which begins with the Journals of Columbus, or, if one prefers, with the Vinland Sagas, and continues unabated through the publications of the current year, is enormous. Arbitrarily enough, the present selection omits the literature of exploration, examples of which will be found in chapters VIII and XII, and is largely confined to travels in areas of the present continental United States after or during the process of settlement. This literature of travel has evoked and forms the subject matter of a secondary literature in which it is inventoried, described, or interpreted, in whole or in part. Section A is devoted to this secondary literature and includes a bibliography (no. 4229), works on the modes and mechanics of travel (nos. 4226, 4227), native reactions to the accounts of foreign visitors (nos. 4225, 4230), and dissertations dissecting a certain body of travel literature as to both information and interpretation (nos. 4223, 4224, 4228).

The primary literature is here presented in two forms: a group of anthologies which present extracts from it (or, in one case, a group of brief originals published for the first time: no. 4233) appropriately arranged, introduced, and commented upon, and a roster of 50 selected travelers, well assorted as to nationality, outlook, interests, and itinerary. While many substitutions could be readily made in this selection, we doubt whether much increase in all-round intrinsic quality would thereby be achieved. For each traveler we provide an identification, a concise statement of his route, and some indication of his separate personality. We have concentrated our travelers in the century and a quarter, 1740–1865, and have included only two men who fall after that period. While the literature after 1865 is quite as voluminous and readable as before, it does not, as a rule, have the same plain informativeness; it is rivaled by alternative sources relatively more copious and often more precise, and it has not proved of equal value as materials for social and cultural historians. For each of our travelers we have listed his original publication or publications (sometimes in the best rather than the first edition), and, whenever available, an English translation for works in foreign languages, an American edition for works first published in Britain, and recent reprints or scholarly editions. In no case have we tried to list all versions or editions, although this has sometimes happened.

Both before and after 1865 travelers' narratives may tend to assume the form of essays on American society. There is no absolute line between some works we have listed here, and some which appear in our Section XV A, Some General Views of American Society. Crèvecoeur, Tocqueville, Bryce, and Siegfried were all travelers before they undertook their famous interpretations, and the works of Prince Murat, Mrs. Trollope, Miss Martineau, and Paul Bourget listed below may seem, in purpose and in form at least, to differ little from theirs. There is also a close relation between this chapter and Sections XI E and F, International Influences in our Intellectual History. Such influences are in part borne by travelers, and such works as Spoerri (no. 3771) and Torielli (no. 3779) would not be out of place here.

677676 O–63–35

A. General Works

4223. Athearn, Robert G. Westward the Briton. New York, Scribner, 1953. 208 p.
53–11215 F594.A85

A digest of the comments of British travelers in the Far West from 1865 to 1900, significant because "by and large, these people were literate, intelligent, well-traveled," and furnished with a basis of comparison. They found, not the "Wild West" most of them had been led to expect, but "a frontier civilization trying desperately to look like the culture from which it sprang, and on the whole, ashamed of the few rowdies who had given it a bad name in its first hours." There is an annotated list of travelers alphabetically arranged (p. 187–202).

4224. Berger, Max. The British traveller in America, 1836–1860. New York, Columbia University Press, 1943. 239 p. (Columbia University. Faculty of Political Science. Studies in history, economics, and public law, no. 502)
43–16988 H31.C7, no. 502
E165.B48 1943a

"Critical bibliography": p. 189–229.

This and Mesick below (no. 4228) are Columbia dissertations which, although two decades apart and published in different University series, are in effect continuous. Each notices briefly the travelers as a group, their motives and typical journeys, and then proceeds to a synthetic treatment of the major subjects contained in their books: customs, slavery, religion, education, etc. Mr. Berger has a chapter on democratic government to which there is no counterpart in the earlier volume. He attempts larger generalizations, and has furnished his bibliography with substantial annotations.

4225. Brooks, John Graham. As others see us; a study of progress in the United States. New York, Macmillan, 1908. 365 p.
8–31147 E168.B883

Brooks (1846–1938), a Unitarian clergyman turned labor economist and Progressive reformer, became fascinated with the literature of American travel, and determined to use it as a gauge for American social progress. His initial chapters offer a lively critique of our early critics, with much assessment of reliability by common sense methods. Bryce, Münsterberg, and H. G. Wells receive extended reviews. The whole literature, he concludes, testifies to a "slow rise in social sensitiveness, and in social purpose to free ourselves from industrial and political tyrannies."

4226. Dunbar, Seymour. A history of travel in America, being an outline of the development in modes of travel from archaic vehicles of colonial times to the completion of the first transcontinental railroad. New York, Tudor, 1937. 1530 p. 38–7081 HE203.D77 1937

First published, 1915.

Bibliography: p. [1445]–[1481].

A history of transportation and of internal migration as well as a history of travel, with much miscellaneous social history thrown in for good measure, but quite haphazard in arrangement. It contains, however, a mass of detailed information on the means and conditions of travel, and actual incidents of traveling endured by our hardy forefathers. It is abundantly illustrated from contemporary prints.

4227. Earle, Alice (Morse) Stage-coach and tavern days. New York, Macmillan, 1935. 449 p. 38–34442 E162.E2 1935

First published, 1900.

Mrs. Earle wrote her "social and domestic histories of colonial times" at a time when academic historians regarded such matters as beneath their notice. Her easy-going and gossipy volume on the oldtime taverns and the stagecoaches that ran between them has not been replaced. She tells of tavern landlords and tavern fare, of kill-devil (rum) and small drink, of signboards and ghost stories. There are chapters on "the pains of stage-coach travel," and on stage drivers and highwaymen. As is usual in her books, the greater part of the material is drawn from New England.

4228. Mesick, Jane Louise. The English traveller in America, 1785–1835. New York, Columbia University Press, 1922. 370 p. (Columbia University studies in English and comparative literature) 22–16243 E165.M58

See Berger above (no. 4224).

4229. Monaghan, Frank. French travellers in the United States, 1765–1932; a bibliography. New York, New York Public Library, 1933. xxii, 114 p. 33–22177 Z1236.M73

"1806 title entries," including the various editions of an item and the translations, arranged alphabetically by authors, with a "Selected chronological list of French travellers" (p. 107–108) and an index of places, persons, and important subjects.

"An attempt has been made to locate copies in two American libraries" (preferably the New York Public Library and the Library of Congress); 267 titles not yet located in America.

"Reprinted with additions and revisions from the Bulletin of The New York Public Library of March–April & June–October 1932."

This bibliography includes not merely books of travel, but works of description, analysis, or criticism by French authors based upon an actual visit to the United States, and forms the most complete record of its kind. There are frequent annotations, some fairly long, on books or writers, as well as an introduction in which some fabricated "travels" are discussed. A few unnumbered entries represent prominent visitors who failed to leave any record of their impressions.

4230. Tuckerman, Henry T. America and her commentators. With a critical sketch of travel in the United States. New York, Scribner, 1864. 460 p. 3–8368 E157.T89

CONTENTS.—Introduction.—Early discoverers and explorers.—French missionary exploration.—French travellers and writers.—British travellers and writers.—English abuse of America.—Northern European writers.—Italian travellers.—American travellers and writers.

A pioneer synthesis of American travel literature, by a literary gentleman of old New York City (1813–71). Tuckerman aimed at a guide to the sources, a general view of American "traits and transitions" as therein reflected, and, incidentally, a "discussion of the comparative value and interest of the principal critics of our civilization." One of his conclusions is that foreign visitors are deficient observers of regional and personal variations in American life and character.

B. Anthologies

4231. Commager, Henry Steele, ed. America in perspective; the United States through foreign eyes. New York, Random House, 1947. xxiv, 389 p. 47–6240 E169.1.C67

Bibliography: p. [387]–389.

4232. Handlin, Oscar, ed. This was America; true accounts of people and places, manners and customs, as recorded by European travelers to the western shore in the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth centuries. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1949. ix, 602 p. 49–7940 E161.H3

Two anthologies of foreign travelers in America which hardly overlap. Mr. Commager's 35 extracts, from Crèvecoeur in 1782 to Victor Vinde in 1945, comprise brief and, in the main, generalizing and interpretive passages: "God made America for the poor" (Edward Dicey, 1863); "Americans are boys" (de Madariaga, 1928). Mr. Handlin's 40 extracts, from Pehr Kalm in 1744 to André Maurois in 1939, are in the main penetrating descriptions, with some reflective or critical commentaries. Mr. Commager has one Asiatic (No Yong-Park), but Mr. Handlin has a greater variety of continental Europeans, and many of his selections are here translated into English for the first time.

4233. Mereness, Newton D., ed. Travels in the American colonies, edited under the auspices of the National Society of the Colonial Dames of America. New York, Macmillan, 1916. 693 p. 16–9410 E162.M57

Eighteen journals written between 1690 and 1783 and published for the first time, some from the Moravian Church Archives in North Carolina and some from the Draper Collection in Wisconsin, but most from transcripts made for the Library of Congress in British and French archives. Most of them record official errands of one kind or another; there are several missions to the Creeks, Cherokees, and Choctaws, and one French captivity among the Cherokees. A miscellany by ordinary observers, in which the realities of wilderness travel stand out the more starkly for the absence of any literary intention.

4234. Nevins, Allan, ed. America through British eyes. [New ed. rev. and enl.] New York, Oxford University Press, 1948. 530 p. 48–7848 E169.1.N52 1948

First edition published 1923 under title: American Social History as Recorded by British Travellers.

"An annotated bibliography": p. 503–519.

Substantial extracts from 30 British travelers, from Henry Wansey in 1794 to Graham Hutton who interpreted the Midwest in 1946. The compiler groups his travelers in periods, and provides each section with an introduction characterizing individual attitudes and insights as well as the general outlook. These periods receive the labels "Utilitarian Inquiry" (to 1825), "Tory Condescension" (1840), "Unbiased Portraiture" (1870), "Analysis" (1922), and "Boom, Depression and War."

4235. Tryon, Warren S., ed. A mirror for Americans; life and manners in the United States, 1790–1870, as recorded by American travelers. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1952. 3 v. (xx, 793, v p.) 52–13949 E161.T78

Bibliography: v. 3, p. 783–791.

CONTENTS.—1. Life in the East.—2. The Cotton Kingdom.—3. The frontier moves west.

An anthology containing 43 extensive extracts from Americans who traveled in and observed their own country. The editor furnishes an introduction to each writer, as well as more general ones. The final volume is in two parts, "The Valley of Democracy," on the trans-Appalachian West, and "Westward the Course of Empire," on the trans-Mississippi West. Passages have been deleted from, and words added to, the original texts without editorial indication.

C. 50 Selected Travelers, 1743–1894

(chronologically arranged by the date of their travels)

4236. 1743. JOHN BARTRAM (1699–1777)

The elder Bartram was the self-taught founder of American botany and the creator of the famous Botanic Garden a few miles from Philadelphia. In July and August 1743, in company with Conrad Weiser and Lewis Evans, he went north through the wilderness to Oswego, where a preparatory conference with the Indians was held. Bartram's journal did not reach London until 1750, and was published without the author's knowledge "at the instance of several gentlemen" who thought that a better knowledge of the back country was desirable in view of increasing rivalry with France. The editor is rather apologetic for the lack of literary art in "this plain yet sensible piece," and for the journalist's concentration on "the several plants, and the various qualities of the soil and climate." Bartram took a keen interest in Indian ways, especially food preparation, hospitality, ceremonies, and techniques, and appends some concluding reflections on the origin of the red race, and the declining state of the Six Nations.

4237. Observations on the inhabitants, climate, soil, rivers, productions, animals, and other matters worthy of notice. Made by Mr. John Bartram, in his travels from Pensilvania to Onondago, Oswego, and the Lake Ontario, in Canada. London, J. Whiston & B. White, 1751. 94 p. 1–16152 F122.B129

4238. ——— [Geneva, N. Y., W. F. Humphrey] 1895. 94 p. 16–9745 F122.B133

4239. 1744. ALEXANDER HAMILTON (1712–1756)

Dr. Hamilton was a graduate of the University of Edinburgh Medical School practicing at Annapolis, Md. Suffering from incipient tuberculosis, he set out on a leisurely journey for the benefit of his health, and covered 1624 miles in a little less than four months, venturing as far north as Albany, N. Y., and York, Me. He was a sharp and satirical observer, with a keen eye for oafish behavior, and his journal is unique for its glimpses of polite and convivial society in the colonial cities. The inhabitants, he concluded, were more civilized in the great towns, "especially at Boston." His editor appends over 50 pages of notes which completely elucidate the text and practically constitute a guidebook to the Eastern Seaboard in 1744.

4240. Gentleman's progress; the Itinerarium of Dr. Alexander Hamilton, 1744; edited with an introduction by Carl Bridenbaugh. Chapel Hill, Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Va., by the University of North Carolina Press, 1948. xxxii, 267 p. 48–28157 E162.H21 1948

The Itinerarium was privately printed in 1907.

4241. 1748–1751. PEHR KALM (1716–1779)

Pehr or Peter Kalm was a Swedish naturalist, a pupil of the great Linnaeus, a member of the Swedish Royal Academy of Sciences, and professor at the University of Åbo in Finland. He was in the American colonies for nearly two and a half years, making his headquarters at Raccoon, N. J. (the present Swedesboro) and thence striking out into the back country of Pennsylvania and New York, with a three months' journey into French Canada. While his primary concern was with the flora and fauna, and their economic uses and potentialities, he was an indefatigable observer of every kind of natural and social fact, and was at pains to record them with a rare lucidity and precision. A fourth volume of his Resa remained unpublished and the manuscript was burnt, but many of the rougher notes upon which it was based were discovered and published by Elfving in 1929, and a translation of these is included in Benson's English version. Kalm thought that Pennsylvania "enjoys such liberties that a citizen here may, in a manner, be said to live in his house like a king."

4242. En resa til Norra America, på Kongl. Swenska Wetenskaps Academiens befallning, och publici kostnad, forrattad af Pehr Kalm. Stockholm, Tryckt på L. Salvii kostnad, 1753–61. 3 v. 2–5526 E162.K14

Volume 1 and part of volume 2 treat of the author's travels in Norway and England.

4243. Pehr Kalms Resa till Norra Amerika, å nyo utgifven at Fredr. Elfving och Georg Schauman. Helsingfors, Tidnings- & Tryckeri-aktiebolagets Tryckeri, 1904–15. 3 v. (Skrifter utg. af Svenska litteratursällskapet i Finland, v. 66, 93, 120) 40–34888 E162.K144

4244. Pehr Kalms Resa till Norra Amerika, utgiven av Fredr. Elfving och Georg Schauman. Tilläggsband sammanställt av Fredr. Elfving. Helsingfors [Mercators Tryckeri Aktiebolag] 1929. 235 p. (Skrifter utg. av Svenska litteratursällskapet i Finland, v. 210) 40–34888 E162.K145

4245. Travels into North America; containing its natural history, and a circumstantial account of its plantations and agriculture in general, with the civil, ecclesiastical and commercial state of the country, the manners of the inhabitants, and several curious and important remarks on various subjects. Translated into English by John Reinhold Forster. London, The Editor, 1770–71. 3 v. 2–13568 E162.K16

Volume 1 published at Warrington, printed by W. Eyres.

This translation omits a great number of details, and everything relating to England.

4246. The America of 1750; Peter Kalm's travels in North America; the English version of 1770, revised from the original Swedish and edited by Adolph B. Benson, with a translation of new material from Kalm's diary notes. New York, Wilson-Erickson, 1937. 2 v. (797 p.) 37–22242 E162.K165

"The part on Norway and England has been omitted . . . The hitherto untranslated portion . . . has been done into English by Miss Edith M. L. Carlborg . . . and the present editor. The remainder . . . is based on Forster's translation."—p. xv.

"A bibliography of Peter Kalm's writings on America": v. 2, p. 770–776.

4247. 1773–1778. WILLIAM BARTRAM (1739–1823)

William Bartram was a younger son of John Bartram by his second wife, but the one who followed most completely in his worthy father's footsteps. Dr. John Fothergill, the English Quaker botanist, provided funds for him "to search the Floridas, and the western parts of Carolina and Georgia, for the discovery of rare and useful productions of nature, chiefly in the vegetable kingdom." He left Philadelphia for Charleston in April 1773 and did not get back until Jan. 1778, when his father was dead and the city occupied by a British army. From Charleston he made two major tours: the first in 1773–75, up the rivers of Georgia and East Florida, and the second in 1776–77, into the Cherokee towns of the Southern Appalachians, and thence via the Creek towns to Mobile and the Mississippi. His concern with plants did not hinder Bartram from making major observations of snakes and frogs, and the longest list of American birds hitherto compiled. To Bartram the Indian was a noble savage indeed, closely and appreciatively viewed. Writers of the new romantic generation in England and France found an important source of poetic ideas and images in his book. It closes with a brief but systematic account of the Creeks, Cherokees, and Choctaws. If available, the contemporary editions with the copper plates are much to be preferred to the 20th-century reprints.

4248. Travels through North & South Carolina, Georgia, East & West Florida, the Cherokee country, the extensive territories of the Muscogulges, or Creek confederacy, and the country of the Choctaws; containing an account of the soil and natural productions of those regions, together with observations on the manners of the Indians. Embellished with copper-plates. Philadelphia, James & Johnson, 1791. xxxiv, 522 p. Rc–2676 F213.B28

4249. The travels of William Bartram, edited by Mark Van Doren. New York, Macy-Masius, 1928. 414 p. (An American bookshelf) 28–3822 F213.B288

4250. ——— With an introd. by John Livingston Lowes. New York, Facsimile Library, exclusive distributors: Barnes & Noble, 1940. 414 p. 40–11235 F213.B289

4251. 1780–1782. FRANÇOIS JEAN, MARQUIS DE CHASTELLUX (1734–1788)

Chastellux accompanied Rochambeau's army to America with the rank of major general and was a highly cultured nobleman, of literary bent, and tinged by the Enlightenment. He made three journeys as his military service permitted; on the first (Nov. 1780–Jan. 1781) he went by way of West Point and Washington's headquarters to Philadelphia and Chester, and returned by way of Albany and Saratoga. In the spring of 1782, starting from Williamsburg he made an excursion through Virginia to see the Natural Bridge. At the close of the same year he went from Hartford to Portsmouth, N. H., thence south to Boston, and eventually, by way of Washington's headquarters at Newburgh and Bethlehem, to Philadelphia. Chastellux was especially concerned to visit the earlier battlefields of the war then drawing to its close, and to narrate such of its incidents as came to his ears. He took a sympathetic interest in each home which he visited, and in its inhabitants, noting each "perfect beauty" that he encountered, and he turned a sharp eye on inns, innkeepers, and their accommodations. He describes the brilliant society of wartime Philadelphia and the crude lodgings of the Virginia backwoods alike with imperturbable good humor. The English versions of his book are provided with obtrusive annotations by the anonymous translator.

4252. Voyages de m. le marquis de Chastellux dans l'Amérique Septentrionale dans les années 1780, 1781, & 1782. Paris, Prault, 1786. 2 v.
2–6014 E163.C50

4253. Travels in North-America in the years 1780, 1781, and 1782. Translated from the French by an English gentleman [George Grieve], who resided in America at that period. With notes by the translator. London, G. G. J. & J. Robinson, 1787. 2 v. 2–6666 E163.C54

4254. ——— Also, a biographical sketch of the author; letters from Gen. Washington to the Marquis de Chastellux; and notes and corrections, by the American editor. New-York, White, Gallaher, & White, 1827. 416 p.
18–18238 E163.C57

4255. 1783–1784. JOHANN DAVID SCHÖPF (1752–1800)

Dr. Schöpf was a native of Bayreuth educated in science and medicine at the University of Erlangen, and had made scientific travels in central Europe before taking his degree. The next year he came to America as chief surgeon of the Ansbach mercenaries in the pay of Great Britain, and on the conclusion of hostilities took the opportunity of traveling before returning to Europe. He went from New York to Philadelphia, thence across Pennsylvania to Pittsburgh, back to Baltimore, and south to Charleston, where he took ship for East Florida. He is objective, equable, and indefatigable; minerals and mining are his first interest, but he records social matters and recent history with the same particularity. Morrison's translation has notes of identification and some of comparison at the end of each volume.

4256. Reise durch einige der mittlern und südlichen Vereinigten Nordamerikanischen Staaten nach Ost-Florida und den Bahama-Inseln unternommen in den Jahren 1783 und 1784. Erlangen, J. J. Palm, 1788. 2 v. 5–13744 E164.S37

4257. Travels in the Confederation, 1783–1784. Translated and edited by Alfred J. Morrison. Philadelphia, W. J. Campbell, 1911. 2 v.
11–12073 E164.S38

4258. 1788. JACQUES PIERRE BRISSOT DE WARVILLE (1754–1793)

Brissot was an active propagandist for the French Revolution who came to America "to examine the effects of liberty on the character of man, of society, and of government." No more enthusiastic book on the United States has been written; he was elated in Boston and rapturous in Philadelphia. Physically, he did not cover much ground; from Boston he went south as far as Mount Vernon, and north to Portsmouth just before he went home; but most of his stay was spent at Philadelphia, which he describes at some length. He admired the Quakers for the austerity of their worship, the serenity of their personal characters, and the simplicity, economy, industry, and perseverance of their way of life, to which he ascribed the prosperity of Pennsylvania. He gives special attention to the condition and character of the Negroes, free and slave, and to efforts toward their improvement, for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade, and for the recolonization of American Negroes in Africa. He spends much time abusing Chastellux, whom he regards as a courtly traducer of freemen!

4259. Nouveau voyage dans les États-Unis de l'Amérique Septentrionale, fait en 1788. Paris, Buisson, 1791. 3 v. 1–25369 E164.B89

Half-title of v. 3: De la France et des États-Unis, ou De l'importance de la révolution de l'Amérique pour le bonheur de la France; des rapports de ce royaume et des États-Unis, des avantages réciproques qu'ils peuvent retirer de leurs liaisons de commerce, par Étienne Clavière, et J. P. Brissot (Warville). Nouvelle édition.

4260. New travels in the United States of America. Performed in 1788. Translated from the French. New York, Printed by T. & J. Swords for Berry & Rodgers, 1792. 264 p.
42–29553 E164.B8917 1792a
Contains a translation of the first two volumes only, of the three in the original French edition.

4261. 1793. JOHN DRAYTON (1766–1822)

Drayton, a member of one of the leading families of South Carolina, had completed his education in England, and was starting out in law and politics at Charleston when he undertook this tour of four and a half months in New York and New England in the latter part of 1793. The book has three plates engraved from Drayton's own rather simple sketches. He took small interest in the New England countryside but was quite absorbed by the municipal life of New York, Providence, Boston, Portsmouth, and New Haven. At Boston he accompanied the selectmen on their annual visitation of the public schools. For these and for the other educational institutions of New England Drayton felt the greatest admiration, which he turned into effective action during his first term as governor, when he took the lead in establishing the University of South Carolina. On the return journey, the Connecticut Sabbath overtook him on the way to New Haven at Durham, where he had a triste séjour, and indignantly declined the landlord's invitation to attend meeting. Drayton was a sentimental and at times a tearful traveler, but his work is full of a desire to learn, and is completely free of all sectional rancor.

4262. Letters written during a tour through the northern and eastern states of America. Charleston, S. C., Harrison & Bowen, 1794. 138 p.
A17–1387 E164.D76

4263. 1794–1798. MÉDÉRIC LOUIS ÉLIE MOREAU DE SAINT-MÉRY (1750–1819)

Moreau de St.-Méry was a Creole jurist who had collected the laws of the French West Indies. Resident in Paris, he was a leader in the early stages of the French Revolution, but was eventually proscribed and narrowly escaped the guillotine. After traveling from Norfolk to New York, he settled at Philadelphia, where he set up a bookstore and publishing house that became a center for French émigrés in America. His Voyage remained among his manuscripts in the Archives Coloniales until it was noted and put into print by Professor Mims. Mr. and Mrs. Roberts' translation of the Mims text is often loose and sometimes quite misleading. The Voyage is a composite manuscript: the basis is Moreau's journal, quite sketchy for his four years in Philadelphia, in which have been inserted a number of letters received, and descriptions of American cities: Norfolk and Portsmouth, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn, and, at considerable length, Philadelphia. It is in the last that occur his unique observations on intimate manners and low life, that require to be taken with more caution than Mr. Roberts supposes. The Voyage is of course a principal source for émigré life in America during those years.

4264. Voyage aux États-Unis de l'Amérique, 1793–1798. Edited with an introd. and notes, by Stewart L. Mims. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1913. xxxvi, 440 p. (Yale historical publications; manuscripts and edited texts, 2)
14–1432 E164.M83

4265. Moreau de St. Méry's American journey, 1793–1798, translated and edited by Kenneth Roberts [and] Anna M. Roberts. Introd. by Stewart L. Mims. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1947. xxi, 394 p.
47–3941 E164.M832

4266. 1795–1797. FRANÇOIS ALEXANDRE FRÉDÉRIC, DUC DE LA ROCHEFOUCAULD LIANCOURT (1747–1827)

La Rochefoucauld-Liancourt was one of the most liberal of the French noblesse and active in many good works, but was nevertheless proscribed in the course of the Revolution, and became an exile in the United States. He traveled widely in order to dispel the ennui and melancholy that beset him, and he wrote voluminously concerning what he saw and what he was able to learn by interrogation. He did not cross the Alleghanies, and his intention of visiting the backcountry of Georgia and Carolina was frustrated by a fever which he contracted at Savannah, but he missed little else, and visited a number of towns more than once. His largest single journey, through the backcountry of Pennsylvania and New York into Canada, and back through New England to Philadelphia, occupied seven months of 1797. He modeled himself upon the tours of Arthur Young in France, and reports at length upon the processes of agriculture and the economic situation of particular farms. He includes essays on the government and laws of most of the States which he visited and concludes with general observations on the Constitution, public finance, commerce, and land system of the United States as a whole.

4267. Voyage dans les États-Unis d'Amérique, fait en 1795, 1796, et 1797. Paris, Du Pont, l'an VII de la République [1799] 8 v.
8–1030 E164.L3

4268. Travels through the United States of North America, the country of the Iroquois, and Upper Canada, in the years 1795, 1796, and 1797; with an authentic account of Lower Canada. London, R. Phillips, 1799. 2 v. 1–24772 E164.L33
Translated by H. Neuman.

4269. 1795–1797. ISAAC WELD (1774–1856)

Isaac Weld, Jr., was barely of age when he came from Ireland to America to inquire whether it could furnish an eligible and agreeable place of refuge from the convulsions of Europe. He spent a year and two or three months here, but a good half of his book is devoted to an extended tour of Canada. It is provided with some very competent illustrations from his own pencil. While he did not enter New England, or go further South than the Great Dismal Swamp, he has faithful descriptions of travel in the back country of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New York. He is not contemptuous or malicious, but he found the conditions of life harsh and manners crude, and he left this continent "without a sigh, and without entertaining the slightest wish to revisit it." His book went through four editions by 1800, was reprinted as late as 1807, and was translated into French, Italian, Dutch, and German.

4270. Travels through the states of North America, and the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, during the years 1795, 1796, and 1797. London, J. Stockdale, 1799. xxiv, 464 p.
5–20874 E164.W44

4271. 1796–1815. TIMOTHY DWIGHT (1752–1817)

Dwight, New England clergyman, theologian, and poet, was chosen president of Yale College in 1795. For the preservation of his health, he devoted the autumn vacations to a regular course of traveling, and began taking notes which he wrote up at considerable length on his return to New Haven, in order that those who lived eighty or a hundred years later might know what had been the appearance of their country. New York he included in his observations as a majority of its inhabitants were derived from New England, and the rest intimately connected there by business, and other attachments. President Dwight was a most objective traveler, and a mighty purveyor of information; along with his topography, economic data, and descriptions of scenery, he gives many passages of local history and biographical sketches of local worthies. There are, he is careful to explain, no adventures, which "must be very rare in a country perfectly quiet, and orderly in its State of Society"—"I have not met with one." He continued his autumn tours through 1815, after which they were suspended by the collapse of his health. His manuscripts were put through the press by his sons Timothy and William T. Dwight; to the travels proper, in volume 4, they have added a number of dissertations, on the errors of European travelers, and on the language, learning, religion, manufactures, etc., of New England.

4272. Travels in New England and New York. New Haven, T. Dwight, 1821–22. 4 v.
1–7597 F8.D99

4273. 1799–1802. JOHN DAVIS (1774–1854)

Davis had been a wanderer since the age of 11 when he came to America at 24, and led the life of an itinerant schoolmaster and tutor up and down the Eastern seaboard from New York to Charleston. Since he did much of his journeying on foot, and conversed with every sort and condition of person from Aaron Burr to the Negro slave Dick, and since impecuniousness never affected his good nature, his book is full of bright glimpses of everyday life from angles which other travelers rarely attained. He had the experience of being refused a job by Secretary Gallatin, and he presents the first romantic version of the Pocahontas legend.

4274. Travels of four years and a half in the United States of America; during 1798, 1799, 1800, 1801, and 1802. London, T. Ostell, 1803. 454 p.
1–24800 E164.D26

4275. ——— With an introd. and notes by A. J. Morrison. New York, Holt, 1909. 429 p.
9–35909 E164.D28

4276. 1802. FRANÇOIS ANDRÉ MICHAUX (1770–1855)

Michaux was, like his father, a distinguished French botanist and came to the United States under the auspices of the Minister of the Interior, although apparently on a very limited budget. He was in this country for over 16 months, 1801–03, but the western journey which is the main theme of his book occupied less than four months in the summer of 1802. From Philadelphia he went by stage to Shippensburg, Pa., and from there to Pittsburgh he shared a horse with an army officer. He went down the Ohio in a dug-out canoe, and overland to Lexington, Ky., on foot. For the rest of his journey, to Nashville, and back through the Carolinas to Charleston, he had his own horse. His primary concerns were useful plants and the state of agriculture, but he also noted stockbreeding, manufactures, wages, the economy in general, and any cultivation of scientific interests. He had not intended to write up his travels and lamented his failure to record innumerable details which would have added to the interest of his narrative, which, however, is businesslike and informative.

4277. Voyage à l'ouest des Monts Alléghanys, dans les états de l'Ohio, du Kentucky, et du Tennessée, et retour à Charleston par les Hautes-Carolines, entrepris pendent l'an X–1802, sous les auspices de son excellence, M. Chaptal, Ministre de l'intérieur. Paris, Levrault, Schoell, 1804. 312 p.
1–24797 E164.M62

4278. Travels to the westward of the Allegany Mountains, in the states of the Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and return to Charlestown, through the upper Carolinas. Undertaken in the year x, 1802, under the auspices of His Excellency M. Chaptal, minister of the interior. Faithfully translated from the original French, by B. Lambert. London, J. Mawman, 1805. xvi, 350 p.
1–24798 E164.M63

4279. 1805–1812. SIR AUGUSTUS JOHN FOSTER, BART. (1780–1848)

Foster, an English career diplomat with extensive connections in the aristocracy, spent three years in Washington as Secretary of Legation in 1805–08, and returned as Minister for a year's stay preceding the outbreak of the War of 1812. During the summers he traveled into the valley of Virginia, and northward along the Atlantic seaboard. When English books of American travel became abundant and controversial, Foster began to work up his old notebooks into a book on the United States, but only a few excerpts were published during his lifetime. Foster's position gave him exceptional opportunities for knowing and describing the society of the capital and of the larger planters in its neighborhood. While he found Pennsylvania democracy quite uncongenial, he was highly appreciative of the settled communities of Long Island and New England. Much of his effort is wasted in an attempt to demonstrate that the respectable part of the American people is of English stock.

4280. Jeffersonian America: notes on the United States of America, collected in the years 1805–6–7 and 11–12. Edited with an introd. by Richard Beale Davis. San Marino, Calif., Huntington Library, 1954. xx, 356 p.
54–8926 E164.F76 1954

4281. 1807–1808. CHRISTIAN SCHULTZ

Christian Schultz, Jr., was a young New Yorker who wished to visit Niagara and the great rivers of the West, and who, provoked at finding no information on record useful to would-be travelers, undertook to provide it himself. He therefore became the most systematic of travelers, reckoning the miles between towns and other landmarks, taking latitude and longitude at intervals, and compiling this into a preliminary 6-page Table of Distances. He furnishes precise information on the mode of traveling, the price of freights and other expenses, the time required, and the risks and dangers of the road. He claimed for himself only the merits of minuteness and fidelity, but in fact he is a straightforward reporter whose method and scope improve as he proceeds and his work, far from being a mere guidebook, is a neglected classic of American travel. He presents a complete picture of the keelboat age in the West as it affected the uncommercial traveler. At Pittsburgh he purchased a completely equipped Kentucky boat for $130, and when this was destroyed by driftwood at the mouth of the Ohio, he had to pay $150 for a New Orleans boat, which would have cost only half as much at Pittsburgh—and it had a leaky roof. He advanced part of their wages to two of his boatmen, only to have each decamp at the first good opportunity. He gives one of the few glimpses of the society of the French settlements in Missouri, where he was compelled to winter by ice in the Mississippi, and where, he thought, eternal dancing and gambling absorbed the inhabitants. His pictures of boating life on the Mississippi and of the waterfront life of Natchez recall the later work of Mark Twain.

4282. Travels on an inland voyage through the States of New-York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky and Tennessee, and through the territories of Indiana, Louisiana, Mississippi, and

New-Orleans; performed in the years 1807 and 1808; including a tour of nearly six thousand miles. New-York, Isaac Riley, 1810. 2 v. in 1.
1–24789 E164.S39

4283. 1814–1819. HENRY COGSWELL KNIGHT (1788–1835)

Knight was a New England minor poet, M. A. of Brown University, who spent some five years in the remoter regions of his own country, presumably being engaged as tutor by well-to-do planters. He summed up his experiences in six polished epistles to his brother, full of literary allusions and quaint turns of phrase, written from Philadelphia, Washington, Virginia, Kentucky, New Orleans, and the packet ship making the return voyage through the Gulf of Mexico. Knight, if a conventional poet, was highly sensitive to sectional differences in landscape, manners, speech, and artifacts, and his letters give vivid impressions of these contrasting locales. His New England viewpoint asserts itself from time to time, but not to any excessive or ill-natured degree; he occasionally deplores, but never denounces.

4284. Letters from the South and West; by Arthur Singleton, esq. [pseud.] Boston, Published by Richardson & Lord, J. H. A. Frost, printer, 1824. 159 p.
1–21522 E213.K69

4285. 1816–1817. FRANCIS HALL (d. 1833)

Francis Hall was a lieutenant of the 14th Light Dragoons, who rose to the rank of colonel a few years later. From New York City he went north and made a tour of Canada before swinging back through backwoods New York and Pennsylvania to Philadelphia, and thence southward to Charleston, the whole journey filling almost one year. These objective and fact-filled pages are free of the least trace of bitterness from the war which had terminated barely a year earlier. Lieutenant Hall took a cheerful view of the minds, manners, morals, and prospects of ordinary Americans, and found the high point of his journey in his visit to the philosopher of Monticello.

4286. Travels in Canada and the United States, in 1816 and 1817. London, Longman, Hurst, Rees, Orme, & Brown, 1818. 543 p.
1–26822 E165.H19

4287. ——— Boston, Republished from the London ed. by Wells & Lilly, 1818. 332 p.
1–26824 E165.H191

4288. 1816–1817. BARON DE MONTLEZUN

This anonymous work is attributed to a Baron de Montlezun. The author represents himself as a veteran of the American War of Independence, who saw Washington at the siege of Yorktown. There was a Barthélemi-Sernin du Moulin de Montlezun de la Barthelle (b. 1762) in the Regiment of Touraine which fought there. The author went from Norfolk to New York, with a visit to Montpelier and Monticello, sailed to New Orleans, where he remained over a month, and on his return from Cuba spent three weeks at Charleston. A French Royalist, he is utterly scornful of the United States and its government, its cities and their people. Oddly enough, this contemptuous attitude does not interfere with much sharp observation and accurate description, or with an appreciation of the American "gentlemen" whom he met along his way—although he insisted that they were a very small minority.

4289. Voyage fait dans les années 1816 et 1817, de New Yorck à la Nouvelle-Orleans, et de l'Orénoque au Mississippi; par les Petites et les Grandes-Antilles, contenant des détails absolument nouveaux sur ces contrées; des portraits de personnages influant dans les États-Unis, et des anecdotes sur les réfugiés qui y sont établis; par l'auteur des Souvenirs des Antilles. Paris, Gide fils, 1818. 2 v.
2–368–M2 E165.M78

4290. 1818–1820. FRANCES (WRIGHT) D'ARUSMONT (1795–1852)

The celebrated Fanny Wright on her first visit to America; she returned in 1824 and from 1829 lived in New York, and for two decades was a lecturer on behalf of feminism and other reforms. Her route on this occasion was largely a circle to Niagara, through Canada and Vermont, and southward to Washington; she pens a general social commentary in her letters from New York City. In her early outlook, America is a land of liberty and republican simplicity, a glowing contrast to the Old World.

4291. Views of society and manners in America; in a series of letters from that country to a friend in England, during the years 1818, 1819, and 1820. By an Englishwoman. London, Longman, Hurst, Rees, Orme, & Brown, 1821. 523 p.
2–9930 E165.D22

4292. ——— From the 1st London ed. with additions and corrections by the author. New York, E. Bliss & E. White, 1821. 387 p.
2–9929 E165.D23

4293. 1823–1830. PRINCE ACHILLE MURAT (1801–1847)

This nephew of Napoleon Bonaparte and sometime Prince Royal of the Two Sicilies lived in America from 1823–30, when he returned to Europe in the hope that the Bonapartist cause might profit from the revolutions of that year. Meanwhile he had married an American wife and acquired a plantation near Tallahassee. The first four of the letters to Count Thibeaudau [sic; the usual form of the name is Thibaudeau] which compose this volume were written from Florida; they were published in 1830 as Lettres sur les États-Unis. The remaining six were written during his sojourn in Europe. Murat, a professed republican, presented American ways and institutions as models for European imitation, defending slavery as a tolerable and inevitable condition. His third letter, "Description des nouveaux établissemens," is a remarkable panorama of the successive stages of civilization in frontier areas. The story of Murat's life in America is reconstructed in Alfred J. Hanna's A Prince in Their Midst (Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1946. 275 p).

4294. Esquisse morale et politique des États-Unis de l'Amérique du Nord. Paris, Crochard, 1832. xxvii, 389 p. 2–370 E165.M94

4295. A moral and political sketch of the United States of North America. With a Note on Negro slavery, by Junius Redivivus [pseud. of W. B. Adams] London, E. Wilson, 1833. xxxix, 402 p. 3–18833 E165.M95

4296. America and the Americans. Translated from the French and edited by H. J. S. Bradfield. New York, W. H. Graham, 1849. 260 p. 2–371 E165.M952

4297. 1825–1826. BERNHARD KARL, DUKE OF SAXE-WEIMAR-EISENACH (1792–1862)

The Duke of Saxe-Weimar was in command of the Dutch army and obtained leave of absence from the King of the Netherlands in order to fulfill a desire of his youth when he came to America in the summer of 1825. He spent nearly eleven months in traversing the East from Boston to Charleston, and in making the great Southern circuit by New Orleans, St. Charles, Mo., and back by way of Pittsburgh. He had traveled over 7,135 miles when he wrote: "To my great and sincere regret, the hour at length arrived when I was constrained to leave this happy and prosperous land, in which I had seen and learned so much, and in which much more still remained to be seen and learned: sed fata trahunt hominem!" The Duke, of course, met the best people in all parts of the country, especially resident foreigners of distinction.

4298. Reise Sr. Hoheit des Herzogs Bernhard zu Sachsen-Weimar-Eisenach durch Nord-Amerika in den Jahren 1825 und 1826. Hrsg. von Heinrich Luden. Weimar, W. Hoffmann, 1828. 2 v. in 1. 1–28054 E165.B52

4299. Travels through North America, during the years 1825 and 1826. Philadelphia, Carey, Lea, & Carey, 1828. 2 v. in 1. 2–356 E165.B53

4300. 1827–1828. BASIL HALL (1788–1844)

Captain Hall of Edinburgh was a retired naval officer, a veteran of the Napoleonic wars who had traveled widely after their conclusion. During more than 13 months in America, he made a considerable tour of Upper Canada, and went from Boston to Savannah, and thence overland to New Orleans. He wrote little concerning his return by way of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. Capt. Hall was the first Briton to arouse the ire of the Americans as a betrayer of their hospitality, and substantial replies to his book were penned by Richard Biddle and Calvin Colton. He is indeed consistently critical, but his criticism all springs from his conviction that democracy is an inferior form of government and society; he argues his case at some length and is quite free from the irritability and captiousness which mark many of his successors. The letters of his wife, Margaret Hunter Hall (1799–1876), have been edited by Una Pope-Hennessy: The Aristocratic Journey; Being the Outspoken Letters of Mrs. Basil Hall Written during a Fourteen Months' Sojourn in America (New York, Putnam, 1931. 308 p.) Forty drawings which Capt. Hall made with the "camera lucida" were etched and published separately.

4301. Travels in North America in the years 1827 and 1828. Edinburgh, Cadell; London, Simpkin & Marshall, 1829. 3 v. 1–26817 E165.H17

4302. ——— Philadelphia, Carey, Lea, & Carey, 1829. 2 v. 1–26818 E165.H171

4303. 1827–1831. FRANCES (MILTON) TROLLOPE (1780–1863)

Mrs. Trollope came from England via New Orleans in order to set up a store for imported merchandise at Cincinnati and so recoup the family fortunes. She spent nearly four years in America, 1827–31, of which a little more than two were in Cincinnati. Cincinnati she would have liked much better if the people had not dealt so very largely in hogs, and the trouble with America was the want of refinement. Her strictures on their deportment succeeded in making Americans angrier than any foreign observer before or since, but Mark Twain thought that she was merely telling the truth. Mr. Smalley's introduction to his edition gives a complete and scholarly narrative of her American venture.

4304. Domestic manners of the Americans. London, Whittaker, Treacher, 1832. 2 v.
2–396 E165.T84

4305. ——— London, Whittaker, Treacher; New York, Reprinted for the booksellers, 1832. 325 p. 16–25372 E165.T842

4306. ——— Edited, with a history of Mrs. Trollope's adventures in America, by Donald A. Smalley. New York, Knopf, 1949. lxxxiii, 454, xix p. 49–11380 E165.T84 1949
Bibliography: p. [444]–454.

4307. 1832–1834. MAXIMILIAN ALEXANDER PHILIPP, PRINZ VON WIED-NEUWIED (1782–1867)

This German princeling had already traveled in South America when he essayed the North American wilderness at the age of 50. He crossed the continent from Boston to St. Louis and ascended the Missouri River to Fort Mackenzie, making considerable stays at Fort Union, and wintering at Fort Clarke. His interests are those of a naturalist and especially an anthropologist; he tells all he could learn of the way of life of the northwestern Indians and recreates the life of these outposts of the fur trade. He was accompanied by the artist Carl Bodmer, whose 81 "elaborately colored plates" form one of the great attractions of the original publication.

4308. Reise in das innere Nord-America in den Jahren 1832 bis 1834. Coblenz, J. Hoelscher, 1839–41. 2 v. and atlas. 2–5381 E165.W64

4309. Travels in the interior of North America. Translated from the German, by Hannibal Evans Lloyd. London, Ackermann, 1843. 520 p.
2–5382 E165.W65
The appendix on Indian languages and some matters of detail are omitted in the translation.

4310. 1833–1834. EDWARD STRUTT ABDY (1791–1846)

This fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, was an intensive rather than an extensive traveler, but he went southwestward into the valley of Virginia, and thence into Kentucky and to Cincinnati. He accompanied a British commissioner charged with investigating American prisons, and his earlier chapters have a strong "social science" interest: he reports very objectively on prisons, hospitals, orphanages and homes for juvenile offenders, schools, poorhouses, asylums for the insane and the deaf and dumb, and on wages, labor disputes, and strikes. However, his narrative soon develops an obsession with the Negro problem, and he heatedly assails, not merely slavery, but the "aristocracy of the skin" in general, so that he is equally condemnatory of the treatment of the free Negro in the North, and he tilts regularly against the American Colonization Society.

4311. Journal of a residence and tour in the United States of North America, from April 1833 to October 1834. London, J. Murray, 1835. 3 v.
1–26738 E165.A13

4312. 1833–1835. MICHEL CHEVALIER (1806–1879)

Chevalier was one of the early French socialists and a publicist of great reputation in his own day. Sent by the French Ministry of the Interior to study American internal improvements, he spent nearly two years here. While most of his chapters are general discussions of aspects of society and public affairs, he devotes separate descriptions to Lowell, Mass., and its factory girls, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and its hog-slaughtering, and the watering-place of Bedford Springs, Pa. He is acute, philosophical, and critical without being hostile, and makes frequent comparisons of American with European society. A long chapter on intercommunications, surveying the canal and railroad systems built or in progress, reflects his original purpose.

4313. Lettres sur l'Amérique du Nord. 3. éd. rev., corr., augm. de plusiers chapitres et d'une table raisonnée des matières. Paris, C. Gosselin, 1838. 2 v. 11–22310 E165.C535

4314. Society, manners and politics in the United States; being a series of letters on North America. Translated from the 3d Paris ed. by Thomas Gamaliel Bradford. Boston, Weeks, Jordan, 1839. 467 p. 1–26758 E165.C54

4315. 1834–1836. HARRIET MARTINEAU (1802–1876)

Miss Martineau was a frail English gentlewoman who had just emerged from impecunious obscurity and become a literary lioness, by means of her 9-volume Illustrations of Political Economy, an odd mixture of fiction and classical economic theory. She undertook to recuperate from her literary labors by travels in the United States, which lasted nearly two years, and included two western tours, one by way of New Orleans and one by way of the lake cities, with a winter in Boston between them. The first product of her visit, Society in America, is an extended moral assessment, topic by topic: politics and economics, the "idea of honour," women, children, sufferers, "utterance," and religion, with incidents from her travels introduced as illustrations under the appropriate heading. She concluded that "the civilization and the morals of the Americans fall below their own principles," as would any other subjected to so intense a spinsterly scrutiny. At the request of her publishers, she made further drafts upon her journals for her Retrospect of Western Travel, which aimed "to communicate more of my personal narrative, and of the lighter characteristics of men, and incidents of travel" than the first. It won a greater popular success, and should best be read before Society in America.

4316. Society in America. London, Saunders & Otley, 1837. 3 v. 1–27890 E165.M39

4317. ——— New York, Saunders & Otley, 1837. 2 v. NNC

4318. Retrospect of western travel. London, Saunders & Otley, 1838. 3 v. 37–15429 E165.M379

4319. ——— London, Saunders & Otley; New York, Sold by Harper, 1838. 2 v. 1–27893 E165.M38

4320. 1835, 1859. RICHARD COBDEN (1804–1865)

Cobden made two visits to the United States, the first in 1835, before winning fame as the leader of the English radicals, and the second in 1859. On the first he went from New York to Pittsburgh and back to Boston; on the second he represented British investors in the Illinois Central Railroad and traveled extensively over its routes in private cars. During the first journey he was impressed by American technological and industrial enterprise; on the second he described the life of settlers on the western prairie and, with enthusiasm, the new free public schools.

4321. American diaries; edited, with an introd. and notes, by Elizabeth Hoon Cawley. Princeton, Princeton University Press. 1952. xii, 233 p. 52–5850 E166.C6

The manuscripts of the two diaries are in the British Museum (Add. mss. 43807 and 43808).

Bibliography: p. 221–224.

4322. 1836. EDMUND FLAGG (1815–1890)

In the summer of 1836 this young Bowdoin graduate undertook a ramble over the prairies, "in the hope of renovating the energies of a shattered constitution." He sent in a series of travel sketches to the Louisville Journal and during the next year substantially reworked them for publication in book form. His "Far West" is not very far; he went by steamboat from Louisville to St. Louis, and thence up the Illinois River to Peoria. He transferred to horseback and rode in leisurely manner over the prairies of central Illinois as far as Decatur. He was of a literary and sentimental bent, and his style is often artificial and turgid. However, he rode with a mind open to the natural beauties and historical associations of the region, and so produced a very different kind of travel book from the majority of his contemporaries.

4323. The Far West: or, A tour beyond the mountains. Embracing outlines of western life and scenery; sketches of the prairies, rivers, ancient mounds, early settlements of the French, etc. New York, Harper, 1838. 2 v. 1–8701 F353.F57

4324. 1837–1838. FREDERICK MARRYAT (1792–1848)

Captain Marryat, a British naval officer who had won sudden fame by his novels of seafaring life, came to America in May 1837 and traveled extensively in the Northeast and Northwest for about a year. He crossed Wisconsin from Green Bay, went up the Mississippi to Fort Snelling, and returned by the Ohio to the hot springs of Virginia. His object, he tells us, was "to ascertain what were the effects of a democratic form of government and climate upon a people which, with all its foreign admixture, may still be considered as English." These effects, it becomes evident after a few pages, were exclusively degenerative in nature: "The scum is uppermost . . . The prudent, the enlightened, the wise, and the good, have all retired into the shade, preferring to pass a life of quiet retirement, rather than submit to the insolence and dictation of a mob." Marryat is the archetype of the irascible High Tory at large, resenting every intrusion upon his privacy, and ascribing every contretemps along his way to some sinister operation of the democratic principle. The diary comes to an end two-thirds of the way through the second volume of the first series, and the remaining volumes are filled with a series of topical essays on a variety of subjects.

4325. A diary in America, with remarks on its institutions. London, Longman, Orme, Brown, Green, & Longmans, 1839. 3 v.
2–359 E165.M35

First series.

4326. ——— Philadelphia, Carey & Hart, 1839. 2 v. 1–28313 E165.M364

4327. A diary in America, with remarks on its institutions. Part second. London, Longman, Orme, Brown, Green, & Longmans, 1839. 3 v. 1–28044 E165.M37

4328. Second series of a diary in America, with remarks on its institutions. Philadelphia, T. K. & P. G. Collins, 1840. 300 p.
1–28045 E165.M375

An appendix, "Discourse on the Evidences of the American Indians Being the Descendants of the Lost Tribes of Israel," is omitted from the American reprint.

4329. 1837–1840. JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM (1786–1855)

Buckingham was an English ex-seaman, journalist, M. P., temperance and miscellaneous reformer and lecturer, and professional traveler. His second and third tours in America were guaranteed by a considerable subscription list. The original publication, America, covers the larger cities of the middle eastern seaboard, with a trip to Niagara via Albany. On his southern journey he went overland from Charleston to New Orleans and returned by a more northerly route which took him to the Virginia hot springs. In the final tour he visited New England and then went to St. Louis by way of Cincinnati, returning by the then novel route of the lake cities, Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, and Cleveland. Buckingham is the most indefatigable and encyclopedic of the English travelers, who aimed at producing a strictly impartial account, and deliberately gave more history, topography, "productions," and statistics in order to balance the usual concentration on manners. Viscount Morpeth praised his first two series as "most useful and satisfactory Guides and Text-Books," and Buckingham prefixed his letter to the third series.

4330. America, historical, statistic, and descriptive. London, Fisher, 1841. 3 v.
1–26750 E165.B92

4331. ——— New York, Harper, 1841. 2 v.
1–26751 E165.B93

4332. The eastern and western states of America. London, Fisher, 1842. 3 v.
1–26752 E165.B94

4333. The slave states of America. London, Fisher, 1842. 2 v. 1–Rc–2421 F210.B92

4334. 1839–1846. THOMAS COLLEY GRATTAN (1792–1864)

Grattan was an Irishman who resided on the Continent for over 20 years, during which he acquired some literary reputation and the favor of the King of the Belgians. The latter was at least in part responsible for his appointment as British Consul at Boston, where he resided from 1839–46. "Civilized America," it appears from the map in the first volume, consisted of the states of the eastern seaboard; the more westerly ones are divided into two degrees of rawness. The United States under its Constitution, Grattan thought, was "better adapted than any country on earth for securing the greatest amount of good to the greatest number of mankind," but far less so for the cultivation of the higher degrees of human excellence. In spite of his own considerable success as a public speaker, Grattan found life at Boston increasingly distasteful, and his topical chapters speedily turn into homilies on the deficiencies of American character and achievement. They reflect, however, an acquaintance both wide and intimate with the public life and public men of the 1840's.

4335. Civilized America. London, Bradbury & Evans, 1859. 2 v. 2–2416 E166.G81

4336. 1841–1846. SIR CHARLES LYELL (1797–1875)

Lyell was the leading geologist of his day and a principal founder of the modern science. He traveled in the United States for over 10 months in 1841–42, and for over eight months in 1845–46. On both tours he traversed the Atlantic seaboard; on the first he went to Cincinnati and Cleveland; on the second he made the grand circuit through the lower South and up the Mississippi and the Ohio. Geology is, of course, his primary interest, and his books have much technical data and many diagrams. But his professional interests have wide relationships: he analyzes such standard American showpieces as Niagara, the Great Dismal Swamp, and the Big Bone Lick; he meets American geologists in various parts of the country; he delivers a series of Lowell lectures in Boston and later attends the third annual meeting of the Association of American Geologists there; he describes coalfields and the manner of their exploitation, etc. He is, in general, a cool, intelligent, and scientifically detached observer. He observes that the English travelers, in general, compare the manners of a lower social class abroad with those of a higher one at home; and he perceives that slavery is a very complex problem, admitting of no simple, easy, or rapid solution.

4337. Travels in North America; with geological observations on the United States, Canada, and Nova Scotia. London, J. Murray, 1845. 2 v. 1–26862 E165.L97

4338. Travels in North America, in the years 1841–2; with geological observations on the United States, Canada, and Nova Scotia. New York, Wiley & Putnam, 1845. 2 v. in 1. 1–26864 E165.L974

4339. A second visit to the United States of North America. London, J. Murray, 1849. 2 v. 1–26865 E165.L98

4340. ——— New York, Harper; London, J. Murray, 1849. 2 v. 1–26866 E165.L982

4341. 1842. CHARLES DICKENS (1812–1870)

Dickens celebrated his 30th birthday during the four and a half months he spent in America during the first half of 1842; he was already a novelist of the first fame, and his progress was a series of ovations. He traveled from Boston to Richmond, where he decided he had seen enough of slavery, and then went by canal boat to Pittsburgh and by steamboat to St. Louis, returning to New York via Niagara and Quebec. Dickens' emotional nature sees only black or white, and after glowing pictures of the philanthropic institutions of New England and the factory misses of Lowell, the scene promptly becomes and remains black. His concluding remarks lecture the Americans upon their attitude of suspicion, their tolerance of sharp practice, and that "monster of depravity," their press. Dickens' distaste for American life received further expression in the satire of Martin Chuzzlewit (1843). Many of his letters written during the tour are printed in the first volume of John Forster's biography (London, Chapman & Hall, 1872).

4342. American notes for general circulation. London, Chapman & Hall, 1842. 2 v. 22–22851 E165.D53

4343. American notes and Pictures from Italy. London, Dent; New York, Dutton, 1926. xxii, 430 p. (Everyman's library, ed. by Ernest Rhys [no. 290]) 36–37248 AC1.E8, no. 290

"First issue of this edition, 1908; reprinted . . . 1926."

Introduction by G. K. Chesterton.

4344. 1846–1847. ALEXANDER MACKAY (1806–1852)

Alexander Mackay, a Scot who had lived in Canada, came to the United States in 1846 to report the Oregon crisis for the London Morning Chronicle, and supplemented his long residence at Washington by a grand circuit tour via the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. Of his three volumes, the first covers the East, the second the South, and the third the West, but each includes chapters on general topics suggested by the local circumstances. The whole is the most comprehensive report on the United States made by an Englishman before James Bryce. The tone, while critical on occasion, is eminently fair and discriminating; thus the author points out that the best of the South lies in its domestic, indoor life, quite unknown to those travelers who "were but depicting life as they saw it in the railway carriage, on the steamer, and in the bar-room." The book is dedicated to Richard Cobden, and America, Mackay says, "is the country for the industrious and hard-working man."

4345. The western world; or, Travels in the United States in 1846–47: exhibiting them in their latest development, social, political, and industrial; including a chapter on California. 2d ed. London, R. Bentley, 1849. 3 v. 5–36861 E166.M15

4346. ——— From the 2d London ed. Philadelphia, Lea & Blanchard, 1849. 2 v. 8–2679 E166.M152

4347. 1847–1848. OLE MUNCH RÆDER (1815–1895)

Ole M. Ræder was a Norwegian lawyer and civil servant sent abroad to study foreign methods of legal procedure, who produced a massive report on the jury system in Britain and America. He was in the United States for over a year and spent much of it in the frontier settlements of Norwegian immigrants in Wisconsin. His letters home are here collected from their original newspaper publication, or from unpublished manuscripts. His report on the frontier Norwegians, their situation as compared with what it had been at home, and their relations with their American neighbors, supply the central interest of a special type of traveler's narrative.

4348. America in the forties; the letters of Ole Munch Ræder, translated and edited by Gunnar J. Malmin. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1929. xxi, 244 p. (Norwegian-American Historical Association. [Publications] Travel and description series, v. 3)
29–28792 E184.S2N83, v. 3
E166.R13

The Norwegian letters were originally published in Den Norske Rigstidende, a Christiania newspaper, in 25 installments from November 6, 1847, to July 3, 1848.

4349. 1848. JOHN LEWIS PEYTON (1824–1896)

Peyton was a young lawyer of Staunton,. Va., who, after a severe illness, was advised by his physician to "take a few months' run across the Alleghanies and among the northern lakes." This he did, from June 26–December 17, 1848, and went across Ohio to Sandusky, where he took a lake steamboat as far as Fond du Lac at the western end of Lake Superior. His narrative illuminates the hazards of western transportation at this period, for after a race his river steamboat blows up, and he gets to land by the help of a floating chair; his stagecoach breaks down in mid-Ohio, and he carries his trunk on his shoulder for 25 miles. A well-connected young Virginian, he is able to meet such notables of the region as Henry Clay, John C. Crittenden, Lewis Cass, and Edward Bates. From Fond du Lac he crosses the wilderness to St. Paul, and sees Indian life at first hand. Peyton prepared his journals for publication in Britain, where he had represented the State of North Carolina during the Civil War, and where he remained for eleven years after its close.

4350. Over the Alleghanies and across the prairies. Personal recollections of the Far West, one and twenty years ago. London, Simpkin, Marshall, 1869. xvi, 377 p. 1–8714 E166.P48

4351. 1849. BAYARD TAYLOR (1825–1878)

Taylor, one of the most prominent literary figures of his generation, was still a journalist in the employ of the New York Tribune when Horace Greeley sent him to report the California Gold Rush in June 1849. He went via the Isthmus of Panama to San Francisco, roamed at length among the diggings, attended the State Constitutional Convention at Monterey, and on his return made an extremely hazardous crossing of Mexico from Mazatlan to Vera Cruz. As Taylor says, "The condition of California during the latter half of the year 1849 was as transitory as it was marvellous; the records which were then made can never be made again." The fortunate chance which brought a writer of real descriptive power on the scene resulted in a book of immediate popularity, which has remained a minor classic.

4352. Eldorado, or, Adventures in the path of empire; comprising a voyage to California, via Panama, life in San Francisco and Monterey, pictures of the gold region, and experiences of Mexican travel. 2d ed. New York, Putnam, 1850. 2 v. in 1. 1–Rc–822 F865.T23

4353. ——— Introd. by Robert Glass Cleland. New York, Knopf, 1949. xxvii, 375 p. (Western Americana, planned in connection with California's centenary celebrations, 1946–50)
49–11110 F865.T24 1949

4354. 1849–1851. FREDRIKA BREMER (1801–1865)

Fredricka Bremer was Sweden's first woman of letters and first prominent novelist, whose tales of domestic life, at once realistic and sentimental, won her an international reputation during the 1830's. She spent nearly two years in America, and went in the East from Boston to Savannah, and in the West from St. Paul to New Orleans, with long residences in several parts of the Union. Her title is justified: she saw many American homes from the inside, and her leisurely, kindly, and often long-winded book affords an exceptionally intimate and domestic view. Hawthorne thought her "worthy of being the maiden aunt of the whole human race." Benson supplies an informative introduction, but his selections by no means exhaust the interest of the complete book.

4355. Hemmen i den Nya Verlden. En dagbok i bref, skrifna under tvenne års resor i Norra Amerika och på Cuba. Stockholm, P. A. Norstedt, 1853–54. 3 v. 2–2878 E166.B83

4356. The homes of the New World; impressions of America. Translated by Mary Howitt. New York, Harper, 1853. 2 v. 2–2879 E166.B84

4357. America of the fifties: letters of Fredrika Bremer, selected and edited by Adolph B.

Benson. New York, The American-Scandinavian Foundation, 1924. xx, 344 p. (Scandinavian classics, v. 23) 25-26021 E166.B837

Selections from the preceding.

4358. 1851–1852. JEAN JACQUES ANTOINE AMPÈRE (1800–1864)

Professor Ampère of the Collège de France and the French Academy was the son of the famous scientist whose name is preserved in electrical terminology, and himself a distinguished classical and medieval scholar. He spent not quite five months in the United States and, in addition to covering the Atlantic seaboard, made a tour of the Northwest by steamboat and railway, marveling at such new, raw, and mushrooming communities as Buffalo and Chicago. In order to leave the country from New Orleans, he went by railroad from Charleston to Montgomery, and by steamboat down the Alabama to Mobile. He paused from time to time to pen little essays on American literature, the temperance movement, the Protestant denominations, etc. He came to America, he said, in order to see something entirely new, and his gracefully written Promenade is the work of an exceedingly intelligent, cultured, judicious, and even-tempered traveler.

4359. Promenade en Amérique; États-Unis—Cuba—Mexique. Nouv. éd., entièrement rev. Paris, Michel Lévy, 1856. 2 v. 20-3056 E166.A525

First edition, 1855.

4360. 1851–1852. FERENCZ AURELIUS PULSZKY (1814–1897); TERÉZIA (WALDER) PULSZKY

Pulszky and his wife shared the exile of Louis Kossuth, the leader of an unsuccessful attempt to win Hungarian independence, and accompanied him on the American tour to which he was invited by a joint resolution of Congress. They arrived in December 1851 and continued their triumphal progress for six months, visiting all the larger cities of the Union, including Cleveland, St. Louis, and New Orleans. Madame Pulszky kept a diary of the tour, the extracts from which are considerably more interesting than her husband's interpolations. She took particular note of the Hungarians and Germans whom they met on the way, and breaks out against "the race-mongers"—the Celts and Gauls, the Latin, Slavonic and Tartar races and nations, "which in Europe are decried as unripe for liberty, become across the Atlantic good republicans, thriving under the freest institutions of the world." In Cincinnati, where Kossuth addressed a gathering of 30,000, the Pulszkys attended a spiritualist seance of the Fox sisters.

4361. White, red, black. Sketches of society in the United States during the visit of their guest [Louis Kossuth] By Francis and Theresa Pulszky. London, Trübner, 1853. 3 v. 2-22433 E166.P98

4362. White, red, black. Sketches of American society in the United States during the visit of their guests. By Francis and Theresa Pulszky. New York, Redfield, 1853. 2 v. MB

4363. 1852–1854. FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED (1822–1903)

Olmsted was at this time a practical and improving farmer on Staten Island. Having a recurrent debate with one of his closest friends on the subject of slavery, he resolved to tour the South examining the institution as closely as possible, and arranged to report his experiences in letters to The New York Times. His first journey took three months (Dec. 1852–Mar. 1853); his second, from which the second and third publications on Texas and the back country derived, considerably longer (Nov. 1853–Aug. 1854). Olmsted then engaged in much historical, agricultural, and statistical research, and took his time in converting his journals and newspaper articles into the three solid travel books of 1856–60. The Cotton Kingdom was a condensation of the three, with a small proportion of additional material, commissioned by a British publishing house after the outbreak of the Civil War, and largely carried out by a journalist, Daniel R. Goodloe. Dr. Schlesinger's edition of this work includes a scholarly 50-page introduction which puts Olmsted's works in perspective. Olmsted passed from plantation to plantation, obtaining lodgings, engaging in conversation, and making discreet inquiries. His cool, judicious tone and his fairness to individuals strengthen the cumulative effect of this massive indictment of the slave system as a perpetuation of frontier backwardness.

4364. A journey in the seaboard slave states, with remarks on their economy. New York, Dix & Edwards, 1856. 723 p. 7-35036 F213.O49

4365. A journey through Texas; or, A saddle-trip on the southwestern frontier; with a statistical appendix. New York, Dix, Edwards, 1857. xxxiv, 516 p. Rc-2560 F391.O51

677676 O-63-36

4366. A journey in the back country. New York, Mason Bros., 1860. xvi, 492 p.
1–8724 F353.O51

4367. The cotton kingdom: a traveler's observations on cotton and slavery in the American slave states. Based upon three former volumes of journeys and investigations. New York, Mason Bros., 1861. 2 v. Rc–2428 F213.O53

4368. ——— Edited, with an introd., by Arthur M. Schlesinger. New York, Knopf, 1953. lxiii, 626, xvi p. 52–12193 F213.O53 1953
Bibliography: p. 623–626.

4369. 1857–1858. CHARLES MACKAY (1814–1889)

Charles Mackay was an English journalist and verse-writer who had won fame by the popularity of the songs for which he had provided lyrics. He came to the United States for a lecture tour that occupied some six months and took him over the grand circuit in reverse: first to St. Louis, thence to New Orleans, and back through the lower South. An unusual feature of this travel book is the inclusion of several verses, such as "Down the Mississipp'," inspired by local circumstances and composed in order to relieve the tedium of long journeys. The author is interested in Americanisms and street nomenclature, and includes a succession of sketches or set pieces on such topics as night life on Broadway, New York fires and fire-fighters, American hotel life, Nicholas Longworth's vineyards near Cincinnati, etc. The second half of volume 2 is devoted to Canada.

4370. Life and liberty in America; or, Sketches of a tour in the United States and Canada in 1857–8. London, Smith, Elder, 1859. 2 v.
2–22443 E166.M17

4371. ——— New-York, Harper, 1859. 143 p.
9–15726 E166.M165

4372. 1859. HORACE GREELEY (1811–1872)

The famous and influential editor of the New York Tribune did not take his own advice and go west until he was 48. His route, after leaving the railroad, took him through Kansas, across the plains to Denver, and thence north to Salt Lake City. Crossing the mountains into California, he covered the mining and agricultural regions and went to San Francisco only when he was ready to return, nearly four months after leaving home. Greeley regarded his work as quite ephemeral, but it brought the outlook of a thorough-going democrat and egalitarian to this vast area, and was concerned to assess the spread of true civilization. The wildness of the West was distasteful but sure to be ephemeral; the pursuit of gold was little different from gambling. Mormonism was orderly and productive but oriental in its suppression of women; the Chinese in the West acquiesced in discrimination and oppression; and California had a greater future in fruit than in gold. The first of the West's concerns was the completion of a transcontinental railroad.

4373. An overland journey, from New York to San Francisco, in the summer of 1859. New York, Saxton, Barker, 1860. 386 p.
Rc–1223 F593.G79

4374. 1861–1862. ANTHONY TROLLOPE (1815–1882)

This major Victorian novelist was the son of Mrs. Frances Trollope [no. 4303] and quite conscious that he was following in her footsteps. His stay in the country (Sept. 1861–Mar. 1862) coincided with a comparatively quiet interval in the Civil War. He made two journeys into the West, as far as St. Paul the first time, and as Rolla, Mo., the second, visited several military encampments, and spent much time in Boston, New York, and Washington. While much of what he saw, especially in the West, got badly on Trollope's nerves, he made a conscientious effort to be fair, and to think of American society in its own terms. Messrs. Smalley and Booth have a scholarly introduction, notes, and appendices in their edition.

4375. North America. London, Chapman & Hall, 1862. 2 v. 2–4107 E167.T84

4376. ——— New York, Harper, 1863. 623 p.
8–2680 E167.T842

4377. ——— Edited, with an introd., notes, and new materials, by Donald Smalley and Bradford Allen Booth. New York, Knopf, 1951. xxxvii, 555 p. 51–11097 E167.T843
Bibliography: p. 548–554.

4378. 1861–1862; 1881. SIR WILLIAM HOWARD RUSSELL (1820–1907)

This correspondent of the London Times had established his fame by reporting the Crimean War in dispatches from the front. He came to Washington in March 1861 and, after several weeks of viewing and interviewing, pushed on to Charleston, Montgomery, and New Orleans, and returned by way of Chicago in time for the Battle of Bull Run. His report of the Federal rout, unvarnished truth as it was, aroused unwarranted indignation in the North, and led to the termination of his mission as the campaigns of 1862 were about to open. His sketches of and conversations with the leaders on both sides, his evocation of the universal tension and excitement, and his glimpses of the hectic preparations for the great struggle have no counterpart, and have been heavily drawn upon by historians ever since their publication. By comparison, his travel notes of twenty years later, when he visited Arizona, California, and Colorado, are tame and touristic. Fletcher Pratt's edition is a drastic reduction which omits much of interest in the original.

4379. My diary North and South. London, Bradbury & Evans, 1863. 2 v.
1–22502 E167.R96

4380. ——— Boston, T. O. H. P. Burnham, 1863. xxii, 602 p. 32–3321 E167.R963

4381. ——— Edited and introduced by Fletcher Pratt. New York, Harper, 1954. xiii, 268 p. 54–6027 E167.R9635

4382. Hesperothen; notes from the West; a record of a ramble in the United States and Canada in the spring and summer of 1881. London, S. Low, Marston, Searle, & Rivington, 1882. 2 v.
2–4130 E168.R96

4383. 1865. SAMUEL BOWLES (1826–1878)

Bowles was proprietor and editor of the Springfield Republican, and one of the most influential journalists of the Republican Party. On the conclusion of the Civil War, he and two other newspapermen accompanied the Speaker of the House, Schuyler Colfax, on a transcontinental tour. From Atchison, Kan., they went by overland stagecoach to Denver, Salt Lake City, and Virginia City, Nev., and from San Francisco north to Victoria, B. C. In Utah Colfax debated polygamy with Brigham Young, and in San Francisco they dined with the Chinese tongs. Bowles describes western scenery with the facility of a veteran journalist, but his major interest lies in mining, irrigation, and all the other sources of potential wealth in the West, which required only the completion of the transcontinental railroad to inaugurate a fabulous national prosperity.

4384. Across the continent: a summer's journey to the Rocky Mountains, the Mormons, and the Pacific States, with Speaker Colfax. Springfield, Mass., S. Bowles, 1865. xx, 452 p.
1–Rc–1502 F594.B76

4385. 1866–1867. JAMES FOWLER RUSLING (1834–1918)

General Rusling was sent by the Quartermaster General of the United States Army on a tour of inspection of its western posts, which occupied him for nearly eleven months before he took the homeward steamer from San Francisco in June 1867. He departed from the route of Greeley and Bowles in that he made a large southward loop in the Rockies from Denver to Fort Garland, where he saw General Sherman conclude a treaty with the Utes, and from Salt Lake City he went northwestward through the mushroom town of Boise, not three years old, and via the Columbia River to Portland. He also made a southern tour from Los Angeles to Tucson and Prescott, Arizona Territory, and found little there to please him. The military matters that took him west have no prominence in his narrative, which has a graphic power and a sparkle that would hardly have been anticipated from the circumstances of its origin.

4386. Across America: or, The great West and the Pacific coast. New York, Sheldon, 1874. 503 p. Rc–1535 F594.R94

4387. 1893–1894. PAUL CHARLES JOSEPH BOURGET (1852–1935)

Bourget, well-known as a French novelist and high-class journalist who specialized in psychologie contemporaire, sojourned in America during the year of the World's Fair. The itinerary form has completely disappeared, although there are chapters on life in Newport, the West, and the South; instead there are sections on women, business men, the lower orders, education, and American pleasures, including sport. The book drew a rather ill-natured rejoinder from Mark Twain, but after 60 years it seems a sympathetic and penetrating performance, in far closer touch with its subject than most of its many successors from French pens. M. Bourget found an invaluable lesson for France in the individualism upon which American democracy was founded, and which consisted "in multiplying indefinitely the centres of local activity, and consequently in continuously breaking up, by means of localized action, the forces which, massed in groups, would be too powerful."

4388. Outre mer (notes sur l'Amérique) Paris, New York, A. Lemerre, 1895. 2 v.
25–12819 E166.B76

4389. Outre-mer: impressions of America. New York, Scribner, 1895. 425 p.
2–1497 E168.B77

This translation first appeared in the New York Herald.

XIV

Population, Immigration, and Minorities

A.	Population	4390–4403
B.	Immigration: General	4404–4417
C.	Immigration: Policy	4418–4425
D.	Minorities	4426–4435
E.	Negroes	4436–4451
F.	Jews	4452–4462
G.	Orientals	4463–4469
H.	North Americans	4470–4476
I.	Germans	4477–4481
J.	Scandinavians	4482–4487
K.	Other Stocks	4488–4498

THE present chapter has proved exceptionally difficult to compile and to annotate, but the difficulty has been of different kinds in its several parts. With respect to "Population," it has not been easy to find enough suitable titles to make up a section adequate to its subject. The scientific study of population statistics, although no new idea, has only gradually revealed its possibilities, and these possibilities can only be realized when the statistics have been taken in such form and with such thoroughness as to make refined operations possible. Certain kinds of results, therefore, can be obtained only for 10, 20, or 30 years in the past; beyond that there is only conjecture. Another difficulty proceeds from the fact that no work on population can get too far away from its statistical tables, and such tables are not the favorite reading of anyone but a professional statistician. The titles offered here as a rule have a text in which ideas are developed in close association with a quantitative framework, and should daunt no reader who aims at deeper understanding.

With respect to "Immigration," we have a situation where public policy has followed a fairly consistent line for over three decades, but for the same period most of the literature has criticized that policy to a greater or lesser extent, and with varying degrees of harshness. It may well be that the policy is justifiable enough, but if its adherents do not write books to justify it, the defect cannot be supplied here.

General works on ethnic or other minorities in the United States pose a special difficulty, for to a rare degree they all say the same thing, and in the main are as like as two peas. Yet the unanimity of the textbooks does not correspond to any like unanimity in the public mind, as can be learned from a glance at the daily newspaper. Here we have tried to select works with some degree of individuality.

The works on individual stocks, six of which have literatures large enough to warrant sections of their own, while the others are grouped in an omnibus section at the end, present another type of difficulty. Whether historical or contemporary, such a book must be written by one who is either a member of the group or an outsider. If an outsider, he may lack sympathy and special knowledge. If a member, he may find every virtue in his group and every fault outside it. We have tried to include the most fair-minded authors of each kind. Works on religious Judaism, the major ingredient of Jewish nationality, will be found in Chapter XXIII, Religion, Section G; and works on the Negro's church, which segregation has made into a separate and special entity, are entered in Section K of the same chapter.

In conclusion, while much first-class work has been done in recent years on the ethnic history of the American people, both in general and in the way of particular groups, it is obvious that much remains to be done and that many aspects and peoples are inadequately covered. In the present vigorous state of national feelings and of American studies, it is unlikely that they will long remain so.

A. Population

4390. American Council of Learned Societies Devoted to Humanistic Studies. Committee on Linguistic and National Stocks in the Population of the United States. Report. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1932. p. 103–441. incl. tables.
37–30356 E184.A1A6

Reprinted from the Annual Report of the American Historical Association for 1931.

Bibliography: p. 325–359.

Chapters X and XI of A Century of Population Growth (no. 4400) deal with "Surnames of the White Population in 1790" and "Nationality as Indicated by Names of Heads of Families Reported at the First Census." They acquired an unanticipated importance in 1927 when the Quota Board made use of them in determining quotas of immigrants to be admitted under the "national origins" plan enacted three years earlier, and in 1927 the American Council of Learned Societies appointed a committee under the chairmanship of Walter F. Willcox to reexamine the problem. The present publication includes, in addition to the concise report of the committee, a long study by a genealogist, Howard F. Barker, on "National Stocks in the Population of the United States as Indicated by Surnames in the Census of 1790" (p. 126–359) and two briefer ones by Marcus L. Hansen, "The Minor Stocks in the American Population of 1790," and "The Population of the American Outlying Regions in 1790." The committee's revised classification table differed in the following respects from A Century of Population Growth: English stock, 60.1 percent instead of 82.1; Scotch, 8.1 instead of 7.0; Irish (including Ulster), 9.5 instead of 1.9; German, 8.6 instead of 5.6; Dutch, 3.1 instead of 2.5; and French, 2.3 instead of 0.6.

4391. Davis, Joseph S. The population upsurge in the United States. Stanford, Calif., Food Research Institute, Stanford University, 1949. 92 p. diagrs. (War-peace pamphlets, no. 12)
50–7898 HB3505.D38

A somewhat polemical pamphlet which was one of the earliest publications to emphasize the completely altered demographic outlook since World War II. Earlier marriage, higher fertility rates, the reduction of maternity risk and infant mortality, longer life expectancy, and the persistence of immigration have all contributed to the accelerated population increase of the 1940's. The author rejects the notion of a "definable upper limit to our population" and believes that, "barring calamity and egregious policy blunders," it may increase indefinitely at changing rates and the American economy may continue to expand with it.

4392. Durand, John D. The labor force in the United States, 1890–1960. New York, Social Science Research Council, 1948. xviii, 284 p.
48–7397 HD5724.D8

Prepared under the auspices of the Committee on Labor Market Research of the Social Science Research Council.

"References": p. 266–279.

The 1940 census was the first to make a complete count of the labor force of the United States, defined as all persons who work or seek work for economic gain, and excluding homemakers, students, rentiers, the incapacitated, and the superannuated. Since 1940 the Bureau of the Census has issued monthly data on the labor force. The author has used the labor statistics contained in the censuses from 1890 to estimate its earlier size, and has projected postwar trends into estimates for as late as 1960. Separate chapters consider demographic factors affecting the labor force, economic factors, changing customs relating to the employment of women, and the wartime expansion of the labor force (from 54 to 66 million) and its subsequent contraction. The major changes in its composition are the reduced number of boys in their teens and of older men, and the increased and increasing number of women, especially married women. The final chapter asserts that a Federal labor force policy is indispensable. However, since an expanding labor force promotes national prosperity, the Government ought not, as a means of combating unemployment, to place undue restrictions upon the employment of youths and women, and it should encourage the employment of older men.

4393. Hawley, Amos H. The changing shape of metropolitan America: deconcentration since 1920. Glencoe, Ill., Free Press, 1956. 177 p.
55–11000 HB2175.H3

This volume of modest size enjoys a triple sponsorship, shared by the Scripps Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation, and the U. S. Housing and Home Finance Agency. It refines upon the conclusions of Donald J. Bogue's Population Growth in Standard Metropolitan Areas, 1900–1950, with an Explanatory Analysis of Urbanized Areas (Washington, Housing and Home Finance Agency, 1953. 76 p.). The author analyzes the 168 metropolitan areas which in 1950 contained 56% of the population of the United States, dividing each into central cities and satellite areas. Whereas in 1910 the satellite areas contained only 23.3% of the total metropolitan-area population, by 1950 they had risen to 41.6%, and during the same period approximately 25 to 30 miles were added to the average radius of metropolitan influence. A reversal of tendency took place about 1920: previously there had been a rapid growth of centers at the expense of satellite areas, while since there has been a centrifugal movement to satellite areas to the detriment of growth in central cities. This general tendency is measured against such qualifying factors as the size of the central city, its average annual growth rate, the distance between such cities, the proportion of population employed in manufacturing, and regional location.

4394. Holbrook, Stewart H. The Yankee exodus, an account of migration from New England. New York, Macmillan, 1950. 398 p. maps.
50–7972 E179.5.H65

Bibliography: p. 364–371.

The author, a native of Vermont, considers the dispersion of the New Englanders throughout the rest of the Union to be "the most influential migration in all our history," but strangely ignored among the great movements that civilized the United States. Among the qualities which rendered the Yankee leaven exceptionally influential he singles out their fanatical respect for education, their shrewdness and great industry in business, and their powerful urge to impose their moral notions upon their new homes. The body of the book is largely a treatment of individual Yankees in particular communities from New York State to the Pacific coast. Mr. Holbrook cheerfully concedes that his book is "little more than a footnote to what is needed to tell the Yankee story in full." In spite of its bewildering detail and low level of generalization, it is the only book which attempts to show how, through the migratory process, the standards and ideas of one section permeated all the others.

4395. Hutchinson, Edward P. Immigrants and their children, 1850–1950, by E. P. Hutchinson for the Social Science Research Council in cooperation with the U.S. Dept. of Commerce, Bureau of the Census. New York, Wiley, 1956. xiv, 391 p. maps, tables. (Census monograph series)
56–5602 HB2595.H8

This volume continues and expands Niles Carpenter's 1920 Census monograph, Immigrants and Their Children, 1920 (Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1927. xvi, 431 p.), by "describing changes in the size, composition, and geographical distribution of the foreign stock from 1920 to 1950," and by presenting occupational data for the foreign stock from 1870 to 1950. According to Mr. Hutchinson's interpretation of the figures, the drop in immigration since 1920 has brought about as wide an occupational distribution among the foreign stock as among the native stock. For "each of the many different immigrant peoples contributed its own complement of native endowment and acquired skills to its adopted country; and, as the data show, each found its own place in the territory and labor force of the United States." The 1950 Census monograph series is produced in cooperation with the Social Science Research Council and published by Wiley. Other volumes which have so far appeared, treating a variety of subjects on the basis of data gathered by the Bureau of the Census, are the following: Social Characteristics of Urban and Rural Communities, 1950, by Otis Dudley Duncan and Albert J. Reiss, Jr. (1956. xviii, 421 p.); Income of the American People, by Herman P. Miller (1955. xvi, 206 p.); and American Housing and Its Use; the Demand for Shelter Space, by Louis Winnick, with the assistance of Ned Shilling (1957. xiv, 143 p.).

4396. Kiser, Clyde V. Group differences in urban fertility, a study derived from the National Health Survey. Baltimore, Williams & Wilkins Co., 1942. xii, 284 p. tables, diagrs.
42–22364 HB891.K5

Bibliography: p. 274–277.

The National Health Survey was an investigation conducted in 83 American cities by the U. S. Public Health Service during 1935–36. On the basis of its data, the author attempts to relate marital fertility rates to the occupational, educational, and income status of the parents. Fertility rates of rural groups are presented for comparison, and the incidence of pregnancy wastage is studied. Economically retarded groups, it is concluded, produce more than their numerical share of births, but, whether or not because of the spread of contraceptive practices, there is evidence that "group differences in fertility are tending to diminish rather than increase."

4397. Lively, Charles E., and Conrad Taeuber. Rural migration in the United States. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1939. xxi, 192 p. maps, tables, diagrs. ([U. S.] Works Progress Administration. Research monograph 19)
39–29056 HV85.A36, no. 19
HB2385.L5

Issued also by the U. S. Farm Security Administration as its Social Research report no. 17 under the title: Migration and Mobility of Rural Population in the United States.

"Selected bibliography": p. 177–183.

Because the data for detailed study of rural population movements before 1930 are quite inadequate, the authors have devoted only their first 25 pages to that era. Even though limited to the decade 1930–39, it remains the most substantial study of the internal migration of the United States. Concerned with the nature and characteristics of rural migration, it gives particular attention to the relationship of migration, or failure to migrate, to destitution and economic opportunity. Migration is studied in selected areas, in its relation to rural reproduction, and in its effects upon rural and urban life.

4398. Sutherland, Stella H. Population distribution in colonial America. New York, Columbia University Press, 1936. xxxii, 353 p. tables, fold. maps. 37–1006 HB1965.S84

Bibliography: p. [xvii]–xxxii.

This somewhat misleadingly entitled book is in fact an attempt to reconstruct the population statistics of the Thirteen Colonies in 1775, on the verge of the Revolution, and to prepare a dot map, which here appears in three folded parts, with each dot representing 50 persons. The New England colonies all took censuses in 1774, 1775, or 1776, but elsewhere it has been necessary to estimate on the basis of earlier and later censuses, or to use tax lists as a substitute or, in the case of Georgia, the "head grants," a list of land and lot grantees from 1754 to 1775. In the cases of Maryland and Virginia, the author has been content with figures of 1782 and 1782–85 respectively. The estimated total is 2,507,180, ranging from Virginia with 504,264 to Georgia with 33,054. A considerable text discusses the growth of population in each colony in its relation to immigration, settlement, and economic development, but does not attempt to arrive at detailed figures for successive epochs. An appendix reproduces the official British detailed list of the colonies' imports and exports for 1771. Concerning her map the author remarks: "Away from the cities, with their tributary suburbs, there is little to relieve the monotonous level of rural density."

4399. Thompson, Warren S., and Pascal K. Whelpton. Population trends in the United States. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1933. 415 p. (Recent social trends monographs)
33–27203 HB3505.T5

One of the 13 monographs prepared under the direction of the President's Research Committee on Social Trends, named by Herbert Hoover in 1929 with Wesley S. Mitchell as chairman and William F. Ogburn as director of research. Investigation was carried on during 1930–32 through funds granted by the Rockefeller Foundation. For the present volume advance figures from the 1930 census were made available, and assistance was lent by the staff of the Scripps Foundation for Research in Population Problems at Miami University. The authors were limited to the analysis of objective data and sought to "give a more complete picture of population in the United States than has been available hitherto and to project past trends into the future." Chapters are concerned with population growth by race, region, and locality, the distribution of various stocks, the national origins of the white population, age and sex composition, marital condition, death and birth rates, and the effect of immigration upon population growth. Two final chapters discuss probable trends and "Population Policy." They are naturally colored by the Great Depression, in which a reduced rate of population growth is taken to be "a contributory factor," and they favor planning and strict control, including sterilization of the unfit as a means of improving the quality of population. In addition to the 88 tables and 36 graphs in the text, there is an appendix of 27 large tables (p. 339–408).

4400. U. S. Bureau of the Census. A century of population growth from the first census of the United States to the twelfth, 1790–1900. Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1909. 303 p. maps (part fold.) diagrs. 9–35728 HA195.A5

The first complete national census was that of Sweden in 1749, and the first United States census of 1790 has some claim to have been the second. The Bureau of the Census, however, did not become a permanent organization until 1902, soon after which it received custody of the surviving records of the first census, which had been published only in very summary form, and from which four States and two Territories had disappeared. This volume, compiled by the chief clerk of the Bureau, William S. Rossiter, resulted from the Bureau's decision to publish the returns in detail, and to present comparisons with the corresponding figures from later censuses. Chapter III deals with the first census act and the methods by which the census of 1790 was carried out. Bases for comparisons are established in Chapter IV, which includes a series of maps showing the counties of 1790 in comparison with the modern counties. Other subjects are the White vs. the Negro population, sex and age of the White population, the family and the proportion of White children, interstate migration, the foreign-born, slave statistics, and occupations and wealth. Pages 149–298 are occupied by 40 general tables, the first 28 of which contain census material from the Thirteen Colonies. The remainder present the data of 1790, Table 104 (p. 188–200) being "Population as Reported at the First Census, by Counties and Minor Civil Divisions."

4401. Vance, Rupert B. All these people; the nation's human resources in the South, by Rupert B. Vance in collaboration with Nadia Danilevsky. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1945. xxxiii, 503 p. maps, tables, diagrs. 46–3393 HB3511.V3

"Bibliographic notes": p. 489–492.

This study of population pressure in the Southern States, related to national manpower needs and local economic development, is the only large work on the population of an American region. The fact that "Southerners are doing more to replace themselves in the next generation" than the inhabitants of any other area, and doing it on fewer resources, is presented as a continuing problem. The effects of population growth on Southern agriculture and industry and the educational needs of the area are described. There are 146 tables and 281 figures.

4402. Whelpton, Pascal K. Cohort fertility; native white women in the United States. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1954. xxv, 492 p. diagrs., tables. 52–5836 HB915.W47

A severely technical volume whose lithoprinted pages effect a new refinement in analyzing population developments in the United States during the years since 1920. The available statistics are inadequate to a like treatment of any earlier period. Colored women have been excluded from the tables in part because the data for them are significantly less accurate, and foreign-born women because of their rapidly decreasing proportion to the whole. A "cohort" here means all native white women born in a single year, those born from July 1, 1899, to June 30, 1900, being the cohort of 1900. The cohorts considered extend from that of 1875, with births as late as 1922, to that of 1933, whose births began in 1949. The essential information is contained in Tables A–L (p. [283]–[386]). Annual fertility rates "had a U-shaped trend from 1920 to 1949," but the old high level and the recent rise are qualitatively different: more women now have one, two, or three children than formerly, but fewer have five or more children. The operative cause of fluctuations in fertility, the author is sure, is the practice of birth control measures.

4403. Willcox, Walter F. Studies in American demography. Ithaca, N. Y., Cornell University Press, 1940. xxx, 556 p. tables, diagrs. 41–2109 HB3505.W5

"Bibliography of the more important writings of the author": p. 541–547.

Dr. Willcox (b. 1861) is a pioneer and elder statesman of American demography, whose career has included 40 years as professor and dean at Cornell University and over 30 years' association with the U. S. Bureau of the Census, beginning with his service as chief statistician of the 12th census (1900). This volume collects the pieces which he had hoped would grow into an Introduction to American Demography but, because of the deficiencies of American vital statistics, did not. All are informed by the broad and humane outlook of 19th-century social studies, so often lacking from the work of latter-day specialists. The first part, "Studies in American Census Statistics," contains, along with papers on the urban and rural, sex, age, race, literacy, and marital characteristics of the American population, one on the "Development of the American Census and Its Methods." The second part, "Studies in American Registration Statistics," discusses the birth, death, and cancer rates and other aspects of these state-compiled figures, which did not become nationwide until 1933. A final miscellaneous part includes a paper on "Statistical Societies and their Cooperation with Statistical Bureaus," and biographical sketches of Lemuel Shattuck and John Shaw Billings.

B. Immigration: General

4404. Abbott, Edith. Immigration; select documents and case records. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1924. xxii, 809 p. 24–8650 JV6455.A7

4405. Abbott, Edith. Historical aspects of the immigration problem; select documents. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1926. xx, 881 p. 26–27485 JV6455.A68

These complementary volumes form a part of the University of Chicago social service series, and their compiler was for 18 years dean of that university's Graduate School of Social Service Administration. The earlier volume opens with two historical sections, on "The Journey of the Immigrant" since 1751, and the "Admission of Immigrants under State Laws, 1788–1882." The remainder of the material dealing with the admission, exclusion, and expulsion of aliens consists largely of federal court decisions, 1892–1921, and of social case records drawn from the files of the Immigrants' Protective League of Chicago, 1912–23. The same files are drawn upon for the cases which illustrate "Domestic Immigration Problems" in Part III. The materials in Historical Aspects nearly all antedate 1882, the year in which the control of immigration was assumed by the Federal Government. They are arranged within the following sections: "Causes of Immigration," "Economic Aspects of the Immigration Problem," "Early Problems of Assimilation," "Pauperism and Crime," and "Public Opinion and the Immigrant." No subsequently published volumes give as good an idea of the variety and character of the sources for the study of immigration.

4406. Brunner, Edmund de S. Immigrant farmers and their children, with four studies of immigrant communities. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1929. xvii, 277 p.
29–11033 JV6606.A4B7

A study of the foreign-born farming population, undertaken by the Institute of Social and Religious Research (New York City) in 1926–27, and necessarily based on the census of 1920, which put the total at nearly one and a half million. Mr. Brunner concluded that the newcomers, judged by economic and technical standards, were making good on the soil; that their children were no more and no less intelligent than native children, whether judged by special tests or by their school records; that marriage outside the immigrant group increased substantially after World War I; that over two-thirds of the communities studied "were progressing more or less surely along a well-charted course leading toward complete assimilation into the life of rural America"; and that the younger generation were not deserting the church into which they were born, but were insisting "that their church shall be an American institution." The concluding portion of the book consists of four case studies of immigrant villages by different hands: Castle Hayne, N. C. (various stocks); Askov, Minn. (Danes); Petersburg, Va. (Czechs); and Sunderland, Minn. (Poles).

4407. Committee for the Study of Recent Immigration from Europe. Refugees in America, report of the Committee, by Maurice R. Davie with collaboration of Sarah W. Cohn, Betty Drury, Samuel Koenig [and others] New York, Harper, 1947. xxi, 453 p. 47–2565 D809.U5C6

A study of the immigration since 1933, taking refuge from Hitler and his allies, which is estimated at an approximate 275,000 persons, of whom nearly fourth-fifths are Jews by religion or race. Over half come from Germany and Austria, and most of the rest from Poland, Italy, Czechoslovakia, Russia, France, and Hungary. Unlike the earlier migrations, it is composed primarily of middle and upper-class persons, spearheaded by 12 Nobel prize winners in science and literature, and including many names since listed in Who's Who or American Men of Science or both. It is here studied in a sample of 11,233 replies to a questionnaire, from 638 communities in 43 states. The text, which makes skillfull use of excerpts from the individual replies, deals with the economic, occupational, social, and cultural adjustment of the refugees; the occupational experiences of businessmen and manufacturers, physicians, lawyers, teachers and scientists, artists and writers; and their opinion of America and Americans' opinion of them. "In general, the attitude of the American community toward the refugee has been preponderantly sympathetic and helpful," and the hopes of the vast majority, especially for their children, are now centered here.

4408. Erickson, Charlotte. American industry and the European immigrant, 1860–1885. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1957. 269 p. (Studies in economic history)
57–5485 HD8081.A5E7

A study of the efforts of organized labor to obtain legislation preventing contract labor from entering the United States. "The thesis of this book is that contract labor was rare in America during the years after the Civil War, and never reached the proportions claimed by the advocates of a law against its importation." The exclusionist movement, Miss Erickson demonstrates, originated with the craft unions. They feared the importation of skilled workers from Europe as strike breakers, and manipulated the Knights of Labor and the American Federation of Labor until the passage of the Foran Act of 1885, which excluded contract labor of all types. The author describes the haphazard labor recruiting methods of American industries to show that they had little to do with this legislation, which, she contends, was actually racist in motivation. Methods of distributing unskilled labor are also treated and the fact emphasized that the industries depended upon a ready reservoir of cheap foreign labor and had no interest in excluding it.

4409. Ernst, Robert. Immigrant life in New York City, 1825–1863. New York, King's Crown Press, 1949. xvi, 331 p.
49–9759 F128.9.A1E7 1949
Bibliography: p. [297]–319.

Between the opening of the Erie Canal and the draft riots of 1863 the foreign-born of Manhattan Island increased from less than 20,000, or about 11%, to 384,000, or 48% of the whole. Of the latter, over 200,000 came from Ireland, 120,000 from Germany, and 27,000 from England. The author details the miseries of tenement life in congested lower Manhattan, but points out that the younger immigrants and their children were able, through their earnings, to improve their status and move to cleaner, safer neighborhoods, making way for newcomers from abroad. One reason for this was the vigorous labor movement, which carried on four decades of struggle for better wages and working conditions, and in which, for the most part, natives and immigrants worked toward the same ends, although the Germans usually had labor organizations of their own. The newcomers maintained a variety of military and social organizations, churches, and periodicals of their own, which contributed to New York's cosmopolitan appearance but did not prevent the assimilation of their children to American speech and habits. Once manhood suffrage was adopted in 1827, Tammany Hall forestalled all opponents in the systematic cultivation of the foreign vote and thereby kept the Democratic Party in control during most of the period.

4410. Handlin, Oscar. Boston's immigrants, 1790–1865; a study in acculturation. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1941. xviii, 287 p. tables, diagrs. (Harvard historical studies, v. 50)
A41–4664 F73.9.A1H3
Note on sources: p. [251]–268.

An outstanding study, based upon a Harvard dissertation of 1940, of "the transformation of a neat, well managed city into a slum and disease ridden metropolis." Many immigrants entered the great commercial port of Boston, but few remained until the penniless Irish, fleeing from eviction and starvation at home, began arriving in quantity about 1835. By 1865 there were 72,000 of them in a total population of 331,000, more than double the number of all the other foreign-born. Without capital or training, they were confined to the least desirable occupations. They were crowded into the old mansions and disused warehouses of Fort Hill and the North End, without cleanliness, privacy, or proper ventilation, and epidemic diseases and tuberculosis rose to new levels. They remained the one element which took no part in Boston's thriving cultural life, and made fewer marriages out of their group than did Boston's Negroes. The 1850's were marked by jarring group conflicts and Know-Nothing racism, but the strong loyalty and excellent military record of the Boston Irish in the Civil War led to a remarkable relaxation of antagonisms and discriminations, although it by no means ended their physical and cultural isolation.

4411. Handlin, Oscar. The uprooted; the epic story of the great migrations that made the American people. Boston, Little, Brown, 1951. 310 p.
51–13013 E184.A1H27
Bibliography included in "Acknowledgments" (p. 308–310).

An original book which attempts a generalized psychological history of the 35 million immigrants who came to America in the century after 1820, in terms of "alienation and its consequences." It was the collapse of the old village economy in central and eastern Europe which uprooted the peasant and started him on his way to the very different life of the New World. The native conservatism of these folk was increased by the harshness of their new circumstances and led them to cling firmly to the churches of their old communions, which they reconstructed here in minute detail, and to reject political radicalism, leaving a fair field for the local party boss and his system of special favors. The book concludes with an affecting evocation of transplanted peasants who had bogged down in the slums of the seaboard cities and become sweated, unskilled laborers; turned old folk, they still labored under "a consciousness that they would never belong." As an overall picture, it gives small place to the migration from farm to farm, and underestimates the degree of prosperity and rapid acculturation, especially among those elements closest to the older American stocks.

4412. Hansen, Marcus Lee. The Atlantic migration, 1607–1860; a history of the continuing settlement of the United States. Edited with a foreword by Arthur M. Schlesinger. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1940. xvii, 391 p.
40–6920 JV6451.H3

4413. Hansen, Marcus Lee. The immigrant in American history. Edited with a foreword by Arthur M. Schlesinger. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1940. 230 p.
40–35768 JV6451.H33

Professor Hansen (1892–1938) was the son of a Norwegian immigrant to Wisconsin. A graduate of the University of Iowa, his work for his Ph. D. at Harvard was interrupted by service in World War I. He was the first to master the 19th-century immigration to America as an immense but unitary historical process, and to exhibit it at once in its roots, trunk, and branches. His death at 45 was a misfortune to American scholarship, but his published writings, and especially the two posthumous volumes listed here, were at once a solid achievement and a guide for all subsequent workers in the field. The Atlantic Migration was to have been the first volume of a three-volume work, with the others carrying the story from 1860 to the 1920's. The recurrence of economic distress among the laboring classes of western Europe, rural and urban, in the years after 1815, is emphasized, along with the common man's discovery of America, which, notwithstanding its hardships, "he did not hesitate to call a Utopia." Conditions on either side of the ocean responsible for the statistical fluctuations of the migration are clearly isolated. Five out of the nine essays of The Immigrant in American History are adapted from the course of eight public lectures which Hansen delivered at the University of London in 1935 on "The Influence of Nineteenth Century Immigration on American History," and discuss immigration in its relation to expansion, democracy, Puritanism, and American culture. All evidence the author's genius for solid generalization. "The Second Colonization of New England" puts into perspective the coming of the Irish after 1825 and the French Canadians after 1900. The serious student will find no more suggestive aid than "Immigration as a Field for Historical Research."

4414. Kent, Donald Peterson. The refugee intellectual; the Americanization of the immigrants of 1933–1941. New York, Columbia University Press, 1953. xx, 317 p.
53–7600 E184.A1K4 1953
Bibliography: p. [303]–307.

A study which continues, on a more minute scale, Refugees in America (no. 4407); it was undertaken in 1947 by the Oberlaender Trust in cooperation with the Carl Schurz Memorial Foundation. It is based upon 721 replies to questionnaires or interviews with German and Austrian professional persons, estimated to represent nearly 10% of the total immigration of such persons during 1933–41. It was found that 520 of the 721 were able to follow their former pursuits in the United States. The author concludes that if the immigrant is under 40 and has children, he has a decided advantage toward integration, and identifies other facilitating or retarding factors. However, "fine personal qualities" permit adjustment even under unfavorable conditions. In sum, "probably no other large group of immigrants has ever surpassed them in the speed with which they have adjusted to American culture."

4415. Smith, William Carlson. Americans in the making; the natural history of the assimilation of immigrants. New York, Appleton-Century, 1939. xvii, 454 p. (The Century social science series) 39–22860 JV6465.S55
Bibliography: p. 432–439.

"An endeavor to set forth the natural history of the assimilation of immigrants to America; it aims to present the more general aspects of the assimilative process which are common to all groups." Data have been largely selected from personal letters, as well as published and unpublished diaries, autobiographies, and life histories, to afford an understanding of immigrants and their children as persons, and of their problems in American society. To this end, the author presents the immigrants' point of view regarding the causes of immigration; their reception and settlement; the processes, stages, factors, and agencies of assimilation; and the effects of their heritage upon their way of life in a new environment. The second generation is seen as belonging neither to the immigrant society nor to the society of those longer established, and is studied from the point of view of its reception by the American social mélange. The immigrants' contribution to America in all fields is treated separately.

4416. Stephenson, George M. A history of American immigration, 1820–1924. Boston, Ginn, 1926. 316 p. 26–4956 JV6455.S94
"Select bibliography": p. 283–302.

A brief treatment of the great century of immigration to the United States, emphasizing "the part that immigration and the immigrants have played in the political history of the United States." Part I is introductory, reviewing the European background and characteristic settlement of seven major racial groups. Part II analyzes the American political reaction to the immigrants from the Know-Nothing movement through World War I, including the various schemes of restriction which came increasingly to the fore, the attitudes of immigrant groups to European conflicts, especially the war of 1914, and the evolution of naturalization policy. A final part gives separate and very brief treatment to the condition and political vicissitudes of Oriental immigration.

4417. Wittke, Carl F. We who built America; the saga of the immigrant. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1939. xviii, 547 p.
40–137 JV6455.W55

A general survey of the history of immigration to the United States by ethnic groups, which is necessarily based on secondary works, but has some augmentation from contemporary newspapers and public documents. The author, who is of German descent and has made distinguished contributions to the history of German immigration, was dean of Oberlin College when the book appeared, and has been dean of the Graduate School of Western Reserve University since 1948. It is divided into three parts: "The Colonial Period," "The Old Immigration," and "The New Immigration and Nativism." Some racial groups, such as the Welsh, Swedes, and Jews, are considered in each of the first two parts. There are also a few topical chapters: "The Immigrant Traffic" in its general conditions, in each of the first two parts; "Immigrant Utopias" such as the Harmony Society and Amana, Iowa; "Culture in Immigrant Chests," largely a roll call of individual immigrants of outstanding achievement; and "Closing the Gate," which reviews restrictionist action and sentiment from 1729 to the national-origins law of 1929.

C. Immigration: Policy

4418. Bernard, William S., ed. American immigration policy, a reappraisal. Edited by William S. Bernard; Carolyn Zeleny [and] Henry Miller, assistant editors. New York, Harper, 1950. xx, 341 p. diagrs. 50–120 JV6507.B4

Bibliography: p. 315–330.

This "broad survey" of American policy, past, present, and future, is published under the sponsorship of the National Committee on Immigration Policy, and consistently maintains an internationalist point of view. The immigration policy of the United States which has prevailed since 1924 is criticized as anachronistic and reactionary in character, with discriminatory features which "have been increasingly conspicuous as contradictions of our democratic ideals and traditions." Chapter 2 demonstrates statistically that the preferred nations do not use their quotas, and that the North American nations, Canada and Mexico, have become major sources of immigration since 1924. Pairs of chapters are devoted to partly statistical arguments that immigration stimulates the American economy and maintains a moderate rate of population growth, and that immigrant adjustment, as reflected by a variety of indexes, has always progressed steadily and in recent times has been speeded up. There are concluding recommendations that the present annual limit of 150,000 persons be increased, "possibly doubled"; that the present system be operated with greater flexibility, especially in the case of quotas left unused; that small quotas be granted to Asiatic peoples; that the United States cooperate with the international organs concerned with immigration; and that a Congressional commission work out an equitable alternative to the national origins system.

4419. Divine, Robert A. American immigration policy, 1924–1952. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1957. 220 p. (Yale historical publications. Miscellany 66) 57–6336 JV6455.D5

"Bibliographical essay": p. 195–209.

An objective and well-proportioned narrative which puts the recent history of opinion and legislation concerning immigration into very clear perspective. The restrictive policy established in 1924 has been repeatedly challenged but with small success, for on crucial occasions it has commanded a majority of both houses of Congress, and relaxations have been partial and temporary. The application of the national origins system in 1927 led to two years of debate which did not alter the law but did increase minority group consciousness and stir up antagonisms among the various foreign elements. Mexican immigration, heavily increased since 1921, was reduced after 1929 through administrative action by the State Department without further legislation. The same device was used to cut off immigration during the depression, the total falling to 23,068 in 1933, the lowest figure in over a century. Congress refused to take action in favor of European refugees after 1933, but administrative action reduced the stringencies of the quota system and enabled an estimated 250,000 to enter. The Displaced Persons Act of 1948 was greatly watered down by the restrictionist bloc in Congress; it took a major effort to put through the 1950 measure which finally solved the problem. The old racialist views, the author finds, were common to the Southern and Western members of Congress who passed the McCarran-Walter Act of 1952 over the veto of President Truman.

4420. Garis, Roy L. Immigration restriction; a study of the opposition to and regulation of immigration into the United States. New York, Macmillan, 1928. 376 p.

32–1946 JV6507.G3 1928

Bibliography: p. 355–371.

Professor Garis of Vanderbilt University, writing in the turmoil of the immigration debate of the 1920's, was concerned to point out that it was no new thing, for the opposition to immigration could be traced back to early colonial days. As early as 1639 Plymouth Colony required the removal of foreign paupers. While the background of opinion has been more thoroughly presented in Higham (no. 4422) and other books, this remains the most convenient description of actual legislation, colonial, state, and federal, through the Immigration Act of 1924. The débacle of the Alien and Sedition Acts at the close of the 18th century had led to doubt concerning the competence of the Federal Government in this sphere, and it was not until the 1870's and early 1880's that the Supreme Court definitely reestablished its right to supersede state enactments. Up to 1921, the author points out, restrictive laws were all qualitative, defining and excluding particular types of undesirables. The act of 1921 was the first to apply a quantitative limitation in the form of an annual maximum figure. The utilization of the census figures of 1890 in the act of 1924 is expounded in detail. Oriental immigration is separately treated in two concluding chapters. The author was himself a believer in the case for restriction, but was careful to keep it separate from his factual expositions.

4421. Hartmann, Edward George. The movement to Americanize the immigrant. New York, Columbia University Press, 1948. 333 p. (Columbia University. Faculty of Political Science. Studies in history, economics and public law, no. 545) 48–9245 H31.C7, no. 545 JK1758.H35 1948a

Bibliography: p. 281–325.

A Columbia dissertation which traces the course of an educative movement aiming at a rapid assimilation of the millions of immigrants who had come to America in the decades preceding World War I. It began with the organization of the North American Civic League for Immigrants in 1907, gained momentum as German-American relations deteriorated, thrived during the war and its immediate aftermath, and died as the nation returned to "normalcy." Unlike other American social crusades, the Americanization drive was led by the intelligentsia, educators, and social workers and supported by industrialists and business and civic groups. Neither restrictive nor repressive, the movement sought to solve the problem of the immigrant's social isolation through night classes and personal guidance intended to mold him "into a patriotic, loyal, and intelligent supporter of the great body of principles and practices which the leaders of the movement chose to consider 'America's priceless heritage.'" The author evaluates the results of the program as both negative and positive: negative in that it caused some immigrants to band more closely together and led to a revival of nativism, and positive in that it brought native and foreign-born into closer contact and gave impetus to the budding adult education movement.

4422. Higham, John. Strangers in the land; patterns of American nativism, 1860–1925. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1955. xiv, 431 p. illus. 55–8601 E184.A1H5

"Bibliographical note": p. 399–411.

A general history of the antiforeign spirit defined by the author as nativism and manifested in "the hostilities of American nationalists toward European immigrants." Its development is traced as it was affected by the successive impulses of American history, and as it affected, in turn, every level of society and section of the country—politically, economically, socially, and intellectually. Nativism, which had waned during the Civil War, experienced a complete renaissance as South and East European immigration increased in the 1880's and 90's. It ebbed and then flowed again following the turn of the century, reached its zenith with America's entry into World War I and the "100 per cent Americanism" movement, and died in the indifference of the Flapper Era, but not before it had achieved "the Nordic victory" of 1924. According to the author, "nativism as a habit of mind has mirrored our national anxieties and marked out the bounds of our tolerance"; he therefore considers his book as a study of public opinion.

4423. Solomon, Barbara Miller. Ancestors and immigrants, a changing New England tradition. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1956. 276 p. 56–10163 F4.S67

"A note on sources": p. [211]–221.

In this outgrowth of a Harvard doctoral dissertation, prosperous and educated descendants of old New England families are denominated "Brahmins," and the writings of such persons from about 1850 are examined for "the association of ideas which produced a rationale for immigration restriction." The crystallization was not effected until the 1880's; the Massachusetts Society for Promoting Good Citizenship was founded in 1889 and the Immigration Restriction League in 1894. A number of "Teutonist academicians," such as Henry Adams, Barrett Wendell, and Herbert Baxter Adams, historians, and Francis A. Walker, Richmond Mayo Smith, and William Z. Ripley, social scientists, are castigated for their contributions to the creation of "the Anglo-Saxon complex." A few distinguished New England thinkers are individually exonerated from participation in this "betrayal of the continuing faith in the potentialities of America's democratic people," which still lingers in the immigration laws of the land.

4424. U. S. Congress. Senate. Committee on the Judiciary. The immigration and naturalization systems of the United States. Report pursuant to S. Res. 137, 80th Cong., 1st sess., as amended, a resolution to make an investigation of the immigration system. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1950. xviii, 925, xxvi p. (81st Cong., 2d sess. Senate. Report no. 1515)

50–60699 JV6416.A39 1950d

This, the first general Congressional investigation of its subject since that of 1907–11, was carried on for nearly three years with the late Senator Patrick McCarran as chairman. Part 1, on "The Immigration System," has introductory chapters on the history of immigration and immigration policy, and the characteristics of the population of the United States. It then deals with "Enforcement Agencies," including the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the Board of Immigration Appeals, the Visa Division of the State Department, and the U. S. Public Health Service, and with "Excludable and Deportable Classes," "Admissible Aliens," including quota immigrants, nonquota immigrants, and nonimmigrants, "Adjustment of Status," "Procedures," and "Territories and Possessions." Part 2, on "The Naturalization System," has historical and statistical chapters, and discusses citizens, noncitizen nationals, ineligibles for citizenship, becoming a citizen, and how citizenship may be lost and regained. A brief third part deals with "Subversives." Appendix II (p. 805–810) is a synopsis of the recommendations of the committee, which appear in greater detail at the conclusion of most of the chapters; a number of them were embodied in the McCarran-Walter Act of 1952. The remaining appendixes (p. 811–925) are statistical tables.

4425. U. S. President's Commission on Immigration and Naturalization. Whom we shall welcome; report [Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1953] xv, 319 p.

53–60119 JV6415.A4 1953

The passage of the McCarran-Walter Act over President Truman's veto in June 1952 was followed by much criticism and, in September, by the establishment of the President's Commission on Immigration and Naturalization with Philip B. Perlman as chairman and Harry N. Rosenfield as executive director. Instructed to report by January 1, during October it received testimony in 11 cities; these Hearings have been printed for the use of the House Committee on the Judiciary (Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1952. 2089 p.). This Report condemns the existing law as embodying xenophobia and racial discrimination, and calls for the annual admission of one-sixth of 1 percent of the population at the last census (or 251,162 as against 154,657, under the census of 1940). All relevant functions should be consolidated in a new agency under a commission on immigration and naturalization, which would distribute the annual figure on the basis of the right of asylum, the reunion of families, needs in the United States, special needs in the Free World, and "general immigration." Conditions of admission and grounds for deportation of aliens should "bear a reasonable relationship to the national welfare and security."

D. Minorities

4426. Brown, Francis J., and Joseph S. Roucek, eds. One America; the history, contributions and present problems of our racial and national minorities. 3d ed. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1952. xvi, 764 p. (Prentice-Hall education series)

52–1682 E184.A1B87 1952

The most comprehensive and informative single volume on the American minorities; its usefulness since the first publication in 1937 is attested by the second revised edition of 1945 as well as the present revision. There are 51 contributors including the two editors, and Part 2, the largest section of the book, contains concise presentations of the significant aspects and problems of 45 minority groups, down to Ukranian Americans, Estonian Americans, Hindu Americans, and Icelandic Americans. The majority of these are written by leaders in their own groups, and reflect the "very sense of group superiority that lies at the root of the problem." Part 3 describes certain activities of minority groups that influence cultural adjustment, such as the foreign-language press and radio. Part 4 analyzes various aspects of racial and cultural conflict. Part 5 appraises the role of government, the community, and especially of educational institutions in the development of intergroup understanding; its keynote can be gathered from the title of Maurice R. Davie's contribution: "Our Vanishing Minorities." The large bibliography (p. [703]–750) was specially revised for this edition; it follows the organization of the book, and contains many brief annotations.

4427. Fairchild, Henry Pratt. Race and nationality as factors in American life. New York, Ronald Press Co., 1947. 216 p. (Humanizing science series) 48–33 E184.A1F3

Dr. Fairchild (1880–1956), long a professor of sociology at New York University, continued in his later years to assert a viewpoint which had become academically unfashionable or worse. Racial thinking and feeling, he maintained, were obstinate social realities which could not be exorcised by denying their existence or by alleging their unscientific character, especially since most of the opposing dogmas were equally unproved. He did not believe that all faults were on the side of the much-abused majority, and pointed to the Catholic Church's progressive invasion of a number of social fields, and to Jewry's own sentiments of superiority, exclusion, and discrimination. Doctrinaire liberal tenets of equality, and attempts to eliminate racial antipathies by legislation, merely promoted social turbulence. The achievement of intergroup harmony and the elimination of friction must proceed, like all genuine progress, from the heart of the individual, and must rest on an essentially religious base, the abandonment of the sense of self-centered superiority.

4428. Gittler, Joseph B., ed. Understanding minority groups. New York, Wiley, 1956. 139 p. 56–11777 E184.A1G5

CONTENTS.—The philosophical and ethical aspects of group relations, by Wayne A. R. Leys.—The American Catholic, by John LaFarge.—The United States Indian, by John Collier and Theodore H. Haas.—The American Jew, by Oscar Handlin.—The American Negro, by Ira De A. Reid.—The Japanese American, by Dorothy Swaine Thomas.—The Puerto Rican in the United States, by Clarence Senior.—Understanding minority groups, by Joseph B. Gittler.

Eight papers originally presented at the Institute on Minority Groups in the United States sponsored by the University of Rochester in 1955 and edited by the chairman of its Department of Sociology. In his introduction President Cornelis W. de Kiewiet suggests that these lectures were themselves "part of the slow tide that is evening out the discriminations of American life," since scholarship is the great emancipator preparing the way for the legislator and the jurist. The editor, in his summing up, says that the basic problem is not group diversity but the acceptance of such diversity, and the avoidance of those reactions of prejudice and discrimination which impose minority status.

4429. Handlin, Oscar. The American people in the twentieth century. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1954. 244 p. (The Library of Congress series in American civilization) 54–8626 E169.1.H265

Of narrower scope than its title suggests; the people in whom the author is principally interested are the immigrant hordes recently arrived at the beginning of the century, and who kept coming for another decade, and the depressed Negro population still largely confined to the South in 1900. He traces the fortunes of these groups against the economic tides of the half-century, and especially under the impact of two world wars. World War I produced a narrow restrictive nationalism and bitter conflicts; but World War II produced a nationalism which had lost its exclusive character, and left men to find new values in their ethnic affiliations and traditions.

4430. Handlin, Oscar. Race and nationality in American life. Boston, Little, Brown, 1957. 300 p. 57–5827 E184.A1H25

"Notes and acknowledgments": p. [281]–287.

A number of Professor Handlin's articles and papers of the 1950's are here revised and amplified with additional essays in order to form an orderly analysis of "the horror"—racism and its consequences in totalitarianism and genocide. The book's point of departure is the origins of Negro chattel slavery in the 17th century, and the exclusion of Orientals, Negroes, and Indians from the ideal of national homogeneity in the 19th. Racism, however rooted in emotion, expressed itself in a series of ideas which came to permeate much of 19th century science. The dubious science in the 1910 report of the Immigration Commission and the 1923 Laughlin report is emphasized, and in particular the invalidity of the contrasts between the "new immigration" and the "old." In the concluding portions of the book the author presents evidence that, particularly since World War II, inflexible isolationism, racial thinking, and racial antagonisms are all on the decline in this country. A nationalism free of restrictive and exclusive elements need not conflict with the traditional democratic mission of America.

4431. McDonagh, Edward C., and Eugene S. Richards. Ethnic relations in the United States. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts [1953] xiv, 408 p. (Appleton-Century-Crofts sociology series) 52–13692 E184.A1M137

"Selected readings" at end of each chapter.

4432. Marden, Charles F. Minorities in American society. New York, American Book Co., 1952. 493 p. (American sociology series) 52–972 E184.A1M3

"Suggested reading" at end of each chapter.

Both titles are textbooks for college courses in sociology, and their general similarity in approach, materials, and point of view is more noticeable than their differences of detail. Professor Marden of Rutgers University calls attention to the originality of his book in taking "as its central unit, not minorities as such, but rather the relations, or the dynamic interaction, between the minority and its reciprocal," which he calls the dominant. The varieties into which he classifies these relations are four: "native"-foreigner, white-colored, ward-wardship, and religious (Catholic-Protestant and Jewish-gentile). While, as the author believes, the ultimate prospect for all minorities is complete assimilation, "it is not certain whether or when white Americans are going to be able to eliminate their 'race-color' consciousness." This should not hinder believers in "the American creed" from oppportunistic activity to reduce discrimination, with the least arousal of antagonism, on various fronts. The first title is unusual in its "biracial authorship," for Professor Richards of Texas Southern University is a Negro. Its three major parts are concerned with understanding, analyzing, and with improving ethnic relations. The authors point to the originality of the analytical part, which provides a common frame of reference in "the status system of the United States," and examines the social or interpersonal, the educational, the legal, and the economic status of seven major ethnic groups. Most of the chapters contain one or more extracts from articles in sociological periodicals. The authors conclude that the United States has probably made the greatest progress of any modern nation "in testing the traditional assumptions that ethnic differences and social inequality are inherently linked."

4433. Rose, Arnold M., and Caroline Rose. America divided, minority group relations in the United States. New York, Knopf, 1948. xi, 342, ix p. 48–9862 E184.A1R68 1948
Bibliography: p. 329–342.

4434. Rose, Arnold M., ed. Race prejudice and discrimination: readings in intergroup relations in the United States. New York, Knopf, 1951. xi, 605, vi p. 51–11305 E184.A1R7

The authors of America Divided, producing the first general survey of their subject in 16 years, hoped to pull together all recent scientific study and scholarly writing in their field, but were compelled by its voluminousness to confine themselves to the most important topics and salient facts. Minority problems are defined as distortions in the mind of the majority, and 12 minority groups comprising 43 out of our 131 millions are identified. The positions of minorities are then discussed with respect to American economic life, law and justice, and political and social life. Descriptive chapters on group self-identification and the minority community are followed by analytical ones which minimize race differences and note that present-day theories of race prejudice are inadequately grounded in empirical research. A concluding chapter on recent and future trends suggests that relations among nationality and racial groups are improving, but among religious groups are deteriorating. The second title is an anthology made up principally of articles from scholarly periodicals, with a few extracts from books; the editor contributes introductions to each of the five parts and the 58 selections. The arrangement follows that of America Divided, save that Part V, "Proposed Techniques for Eliminating Minority Problems," with seven selections, has no counterpart there. The book brings within one pair of covers a quantity of scattered and quite valuable material.

4435. Warner, William Lloyd, and Leo Srole. The social systems of American ethnic groups. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1945. 318 p. tables, diagrs. (Yankee City series, v. 3) A45–3302 E184.A1W25

The third in this series of volumes on the social structure of an old New England community as it appears to a group of social anthropologists applying the techniques developed in studying more primitive societies. The research was performed during 1930–35 by a staff of 25 field workers, analysts, and writers, as a part of the larger investigation. A part of the text written by Dr. Srole formed his doctoral dissertation submitted to the University of Chicago in 1940. The method varies, as in other volumes of the series, between mathematical tabulations of social distance, expressing intangibles in decimal points, and imaginatively fictive "case histories." The ethnic groups studied are the Irish, French Canadians, Jews, Italians, Armenians, Greeks, Poles, and Russians, with the Yankees at one pole as a positive absolute, and the Negroes at the other as a negative one. "Each group enters the city at the bottom of the social heap (lower-lower class) and through the several generations makes its desperate climb upward. The early arrivals, having had more time, have climbed farther up the ladder than the ethnic groups that followed them." The unassimilated portion of each ethnic group usually has a status structure of its own. Later chapters consider the ethnic groups in their bearing upon the family, the church, the school, and private associations.

677676 O–63–37

E. Negroes

4436. Crum, Mason. Gullah; Negro life in the Carolina Sea Islands. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1940. xv, 351 p.
40–34941 E185.93.S7C85

Bibliography: p. [345]–351.

Most of the titles in the present section are concerned with the interaction of Negro and white communities amid the increasing complexities of industrial civilization. This one differs in presenting the life of an isolated Negro community where, at the time of writing, relatively few changes had "taken place in their mode of living and their outlook upon life since Emancipation." These Sea Islands of South Carolina, from Georgetown to Port Royal Sound, are cut off from the coastal plain by a belt of wide swamps infested by the cottonmouth moccasin, and were little frequented from the fall of the slave regime at the end of 1861 until the construction of modern hard-surfaced roads. In 1940 the sea island Negroes were largely tenant farmers, raising cotton and corn on exhausted land, living in poverty and chronic debt, and on a diet of cornbread, molasses, and fatback. Their speech is the Gullah dialect, incomprehensible to the outsider, "perhaps the most peculiar of all American forms of speech." It is, nevertheless, almost wholly English, derived from the speech of indentured servants, with only a score of African words. The author has traced the Biblical lineage of the Gullah spirituals, in parallel passages which "show how deeply the slaves of the Carolina coast draw upon the dramatic episodes of the Old and New Testaments, and particularly the apocalyptic passages." The remainder of the book is a historical treatment of plantation days and the aftermath of Emancipation, with frequent quotations from source materials.

4437. Davie, Maurice R. Negroes in American society. New York, Whittlesey House, 1949. 542 p. 49–11574 E185.6.D3

"References" at end of chapters.

A textbook by a Yale professor of sociology which aims to give a factual, scientific analysis and is explicitly "eclectic in character"—i. e., is based on other sociological literature rather than on any personal experience or investigations of its author. This gives the book the relative advantage of being less exacerbated and hortatory in tone than many recent writings on the subject. Four historical chapters are followed by substantial analyses of the situation of the Negro in economic life, education, religion, family life, housing, crime, and suffrage. Interesting chapters on subjects not always so well covered in general works include "Negro Health and Vitality," "The Negro Question in Wartime," "Lynching and Race Riots," and "Race Mixture and Intermarriage." The controversies of the present and the recent past are reviewed in chapters on "Segregation and Discrimination," "The Doctrine of Racial Inferiority," "The Negro's Reaction to His Status," and "The Future of the Negro." The author believes that the indirect approach to a change of attitudes on race relations is more effective than the direct one, and points out that "American Negroes now rate in education, health, economic status, and other measures of achievement far above the total population of all but a few very favored nations."

4438. Davis, Allison, Burleigh B. Gardner, and Mary R. Gardner. Deep South; a social anthropological study of caste and class. Directed by W[illiam] Lloyd Warner. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1941. xv, 558 p. tables.
41–23645 HN79.A2D3

An exploration of a Southern community's organized system of sentiments and attitudes as expressed in the social practices of whites and Negroes and in the beliefs they hold about themselves and about each other. A white man and his wife and a Negro and his wife, all trained in social anthropology at Harvard, were sent to live for two years in an unnamed city of the deep South. Over half of its 10,000 inhabitants were Negroes, and the adjacent rural areas were over 80 percent Negro. They attempted to discover group attitudes less by formal interviews than by stimulating free discussions with members of both the white and Negro communities, as soon as these had come to accept the investigators as belonging to their own social groups. Southern society, they conclude, is rigorously divided into two racial castes; there are classes within each caste and cliques within each class. However, there is a relatively slight differentiation of class within the Negro caste, and both castes attempt to conceal their class feelings in deference to democratic and Christian dogmas. On occasion force and intimidation may be used to maintain caste divisions. Caste and class have changed and are changing through time, but remain recognized and observable systems. Over half the book is devoted to the relation of caste and class to the cotton economy of the area, and a long final chapter to their relation to the white monopoly of local government.

4439. Drake, St. Clair, and Horace R. Cayton. Black metropolis; a study of Negro life in a northern city. With an introd. by Richard Wright. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1945. xxxiv, 809 p. maps, diagrs. 45–9257 F548.9.N3D68

"A list of selected books dealing with the American Negro": p. 793–796.

This thick volume originated in a series of projects financed by the Works Projects Administration and directed by Professors Cayton and William Lloyd Warner of the University of Chicago. They gradually broadened from a study of juvenile delinquency in Chicago's South Side to that of "the description and analysis of the structure and organization of the Negro community, both internally, and in relation to the metropolis of which it is a part." The Negro ghetto was the Black Belt, a narrow tongue of land, seven miles in length and one and a half in width, in which, together with five smaller South-Side areas, 90 percent of Chicago's 337,000 Negroes were solidly packed. This work sketches the historical development of the Belt, analyzes the nature of the "color-line" in this Northern city and the movements across it, and describes the "job ceiling" which kept Negroes from competing as individuals for any type of job for which they were qualified, and concentrated them in semiskilled and unskilled occupations. Part III describes the ways of life of "Bronzeville" in a variety of spheres and on three class levels. In conclusion the authors stress the contradiction between the principle of fixed status and that of free competition, which prevails elsewhere in American urban society, and describe the problem as essentially a moral one.

4440. Franklin, John Hope. From slavery to freedom; a history of American Negroes. 2d ed., rev. & enl. New York, Knopf, 1956. xv, 639, xlii p. 56–13200 E185.F825 1956

"Bibliographical notes": p. 605–639.

Professor Franklin's volume, originally published in 1947, was at once recognized as the most successful of all attempts to tell the story of the American Negro in a single volume. In order to put his story in its proper perspective, the author has maintained "a continuous recognition of the main stream of American history and the relationship of the Negro to it," as well as "a discreet balance between recognizing the deeds of outstanding persons and depicting the fortunes of the great mass of Negroes." The close of the Civil War forms a halfway point in the volume. Negro beginnings are traced in chapters on "Early Negro States of Africa" and "The African Way of Life," and the introduction to America in chapters on "The Slave Trade" and the origins of the slave system in the Caribbean Islands. A chapter on "That Peculiar Institution" of the Old South is followed by one on the "Quasi-Free Negroes," North and South, of the years before 1860. "Losing the Peace" is the author's description of the gradual overthrow of the Reconstruction settlement and the triumph of White Supremacy. Interesting chapters describe "A Harlem Renaissance" following World War I and the immense benefits which Negroes received from the New Deal. Separate chapters are devoted to the progress of the Negro in Latin America and in Canada. Rayford W. Logan's The Negro in the United States, A Brief History (Princeton, Van Nostrand, 1957. 191 p. An Anvil original, no. 19) is an inexpensive paperback with only 14 pages on the years before 1865. However, it gives a concise outline of the Negro's upward struggles since that year, together with 28 selected documents (p. 106–182) and a select bibliography (p. 183–185). Langston Hughes and Milton Meltzer, in A Pictorial History of the Negro in America (New York, Crown, 1956. 316 p.), present a very interesting and various body of illustrations, most of them contemporary with their subject matter, and provided with an adequate textual commentary.

4441. Frazier, Edward Franklin. The Negro family in the United States. Rev. and abridged ed. New York, Dryden Press, 1948. xviii, 374 p. (The Dryden Press sociology publications) 48–7000 E185.86.F74 1948

Professor Frazier describes this edition as a popular condensation, carried out by Mrs. Bonita Valien, of the first, published by the University of Chicago Press in 1939 (xxxii, 686 p.). Ernest W. Burgess, editor of the University of Chicago sociological series in which it appeared, described it as the most valuable contribution to the literature of the family since the publication, 20 years earlier, of Thomas and Znaniecki's Polish Peasant in Europe and America (no. 4495). As he remarks, the transplantation of the Negro from Africa to America, the transition from slavery to freedom, and the migration from the plantation to the metropolis produced uniquely great and sudden dislocations in the family life of a people, and so exhibit "a social institution subjected to the severest stresses and strains of social change." The special value of the study lay in its combination of such precise statistics as could be obtained with a multitude of personal narratives collected by the author from Chicago and Harlem Negroes. Since the tables have disappeared and the documentary material has been considerably reduced in the abridgement, many students will prefer the original edition. The four successive phases of the Negro family in America are defined by the author as primarily matriarchal, patriarchal, unstable, and equalitarian, but these abstractions give only a faint idea of the richness of his materials.

4442. Frazier, Edward Franklin. The Negro in the United States. Rev. ed. New York, Macmillan, 1957. xxxiii, 769 p. maps, diagrs., tables. 57-5224 E185.F833 1957

Bibliography: p. 707-752.

A comprehensive sociological treatment of the Negro race in the United States, originally published in 1949. It approaches the subject historically and emphasizes "the emergence of the Negro as a minority group and his gradual integration into American life." The Negro is regarded, not as an atomized individual, but "as a part of an organized (or disorganized) social life which forms a more or less segregated segment of American society." Of the historical sections, Part 1 on the slave régime emphasizes the Negro's role in the social organization of the plantation, in which role he was able to take over the culture of the whites. Part 2 dwells upon the racial conflict which developed during and following Reconstruction, eventuating in the establishment of a quasi-caste system. Part 3 analyzes "The Negro Community and Its Institutions" with respect to population, rural and urban communities, social and economic stratification, the family, the church, fraternal organizations, and business enterprise. Part 4, on "Intellectual Life and Leadership," describes educational institutions, the press and literature, social movements, and the Negro intelligentsia. Part 5 deals with "Problems of Adjustment," including crime, delinquency, and race relations. In conclusion, Dr. Frazier examines the "Prospects for Integration of the Negro into American Society" and finds that they have been improved by all recent social changes. The permanence of these changes is guaranteed by the international situation, for upon America's treatment of the Negro at home depends her "bid for the support of the colored majority in the world."

4443. Johnson, Charles S. Into the main stream, a survey of best practices in race relations in the South, by Charles S. Johnson and associates, Elizabeth L. Allen, Horace M. Bond, Margaret McCulloch [and] Alma Forrest Polk. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1947. xiv, 355 p. 47-30299 E185.61.J624

Dr. Johnson has been associated with Fisk University at Nashville since 1928 and its president since 1946. In this volume, however, he writes as Director of the Race Relations Division of the American Missionary Association, which conducted the survey upon which it is based. Seven hundred "responsible and informed" individuals in the South cooperated with the project, and Dr. Johnson credits "the main structure" of the volume to Miss McCulloch, who analyzed their contributions. The book is more general in scope than a strict interpretation of its subtitle would imply; the subject matter actually extends to the improving condition of the Southern Negro in most of the spheres of life: citizenship (including the use of the ballot and appointment to government service), employment, education (including college courses on the Negro or on race relations), the "moulding of attitudes" by a variety of media, public health, the churches, and the Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. In a number of sections the items of information follow no clear pattern of arrangement. In his Introduction Dr. Johnson points out the factors at present favorable to interracial harmony and concludes: "The totality of these incidents and programs undoubtedly suggests progress and a will to change, both of which have been accelerated by the war."

4444. Johnson, Charles S. Patterns of Negro segregation. New York, Harper, 1943. xxii, 332 p. 43-1802 E185.61.J625

Bibliographical footnotes.

"A study of social behavior in interracial contact situations in selected areas of the United States," for which a field staff of five conducted interviews in three counties of the rural South and five Southern cities, as well as in border and Northern cities. Part I is concerned with patterns of segregation and discrimination for, in the author's opinion, "there can be no group segregation without discrimination," and "in equity any segregation that is not mutual or voluntary is discrimination." The patterns are described for residential areas, educational institutions, recreational facilities, law enforcement, relief and welfare, public buildings, transportation, hospitals, hotels and restaurants, stores, places of amusement, professional services, and, at greater length, for occupations and industries. An important chapter describes "The Racial Etiquette in Public Contacts and Personal Relations," while another on "The Ideology of the Color Line" is based upon statements by white persons most of whom justified segregation. Southern state legislation enforcing segregation is analyzed, as well as the civil rights laws of several Northern states aimed against discrimination. Part II is concerned with the "Behavioral Response" of Negroes to these patterns, the interview material being classified into "Acceptance," "Avoidance," and "Hostility and Aggression." Dr. Johnson thinks that urbanization and industrialization have been the principal agents in eroding the old customs, and that they will continue to operate in the same direction. Comer Vann

Woodward's The Strange Career of Jim Crow (new and rev. ed. New York, Oxford University Press, 1957. 183 p. A Galaxy book, GB6) originated in James W. Richard lectures delivered at the University of Virginia in 1954. It convincingly demonstates that most of the patterns described by Dr. Johnson did not, as is generally supposed, originate at the time the South regained its autonomy in the 1870's, but nearly two decades later, as a weapon employed by the Bourbons to defeat the Populist movement of the 1890's, and that they were initiated in the western states of the South, and only graduallv spread to the Atlantic seaboard.

4445. Logan, Rayford W. The Negro in American life and thought: the nadir, 1877–1901. New York, Dial Press, 1954. 380 p.
54–6000 E185.61.L64

Professor Logan of Howard University assesses the status of the Negro and the opinion of the Northern press concerning the Negro between the Compromise of 1877, which withdrew Federal troops from the South, and the assassination of President McKinley. President Hayes had not meant to abandon the poor colored people of the South, but the "honorable and influential Southern whites" dishonored their side of the bargain and nullified the Reconstruction amendments. The nadir was reached with President McKinley's "callous disregard for the protection of the constitutional rights of Negroes." By 1900 "what is now called second-class citizenship was accepted by presidents, the Supreme Court, Congress, organized labor, the General Federation of Women's Clubs—indeed by the vast majority of Americans, North and South, and by the 'leader' of the Negro race [Booker T. Washington]." Yet from 1865 to 1900, as the author himself tells us, the Negro population doubled in numbers, increased in literacy from 18.6 percent to 55.5 percent, and began organizing its own banks (in 1888). The ideals of the Abolitionists and the Radical Republicans were obscured for the time being, but the record indicates slow and painful progress rather than any real nadir.

4446. Myrdal, Gunnar. An American dilemma; the Negro problem and modern democracy, by Gunnar Myrdal with the assistance of Richard Sterner and Arnold Rose. [9th ed.] New York, Harper, 1944. lix, 1483 p.
48–10226 E185.6.M95 1944

Bibliography: p. 1144–1180.

The Carnegie Corporation of New York was convinced by the late Newton D. Baker that it needed more and better organized knowledge of the American Negro of today before it could intelligently disburse its funds on his behalf. In 1938, therefore, it brought over an impartial Swedish social economist, Dr. Myrdal of the University of Stockholm and the Swedish Senate, as director of "a comprehensive study of the Negro in the United States, to be undertaken in a wholly objective and dispassionate way as a social phenomenon." Dr. Myrdal took much advice, and in 1939 engaged a staff of six, including Ralph J. Bunche and Dorothy S. Thomas, while some 70 other persons worked on special projects or as assistants to the principal investigators. In addition to the works by Johnson and Sterner listed in this section (nos. 4444 and 4448), two other of the resulting special studies were published by Harper: The Myth of the Negro Past, by Melville J. Herskovits (1941. xiv, 374 p.), and Characteristics of the American Negro, edited by Otto Klineberg (1944. 409 p.). The unpublished manuscripts of some 35 other studies were deposited in the Schomburgk Collection of the New York Public Library. The completion and publication of Dr. Myrdal's overall report were considerably delayed by the war, but since its appearance it has been generally accepted as the principal authority in its field. Summary is impracticable, but the titles of the eleven parts into which the 1,024 pages of the main text are divided give an idea of its comprehensiveness and organization: "The Approach," "Race," "Population and Migration," "Economics," "Politics," "Justice," "Social Inequality," "Social Stratification," "Leadership and Concerted Action," "The Negro Community," and "An American Dilemma." Dr. Myrdal's conclusion is that the progress of "social engineering" now permits the redemption of America's greatest failure and the realization of America's own innermost desire, the final integration of the Negro into modern democracy. The final quarter of the work consists of ten appendixes and over 250 pages of footnotes. Readers daunted by the massiveness of An American Dilemma may prefer the condensation prepared by one of Dr. Myrdal's assistants, Arnold M. Rose: The Negro in America (New York, Harper, 1948. xvii, 325 p.).

4447. Reid, Ira De A. The Negro immigrant, his background, characteristics and social adjustment, 1899–1937. New York, Columbia University Press, 1939. 261 p. (Studies in history, economics and public law, edited by the Faculty of Political Science of Columbia University, no. 449)
39–19999 H31.C7, no. 449
JV6895.NH4R4 1939a

Bibliography: p. 253–258.

A model study of the acculturation problems of a group of erstwhile members of a majority who must become members of a minority and find a place within the Negro class structure. At the time of writing, the Negro immigrants in the United States, nearly all of Caribbean origin, numbered some 100,000 persons, 60 percent of whom lived in New York City. Dr. Reid based his report on personal histories, government documents, and his own observations as a participant in the group life of these immigrants in New York City. His evidence shows that the members of the group tend to resent relegation to a minority status and adopt radical views with respect to increasing Negro rights in the United States. Native Negroes usually regard them with hostility as foreign competitors for jobs, and dub them "monkey-chasers." There are careful expositions of the number, sources, and background of the Negro immigration, its population characteristics, and the degree, form, patterns, and trends of its interracial and intraracial adjustment. A separate chapter contains excerpts from life histories.

4448. Sterner, Richard M. E. The Negro's share; a study of income, consumption, housing and public assistance [by] Richard Sterner in collaboration with Lenore A. Epstein, Ellen Winston, and others. New York, Harper, 1943. 433 p. incl. tables. 43–8019 E185.8.S8

One of the supplementary volumes in the study of the American Negro sponsored by the Carnegie Corporation of New York and planned by Dr. Myrdal (no. 4446). Dr. Sterner, a specialist on social questions in the service of the Swedish Government, came to the United States with Dr. Myrdal. The conditions reflected in this book are almost exclusively those of the 1930's, before the full employment which was created by wartime conditions and has outlasted them. Part I, concerned with "Living Conditions," deals with the Negro's flight from agriculture, his employment and unemployment, family incomes and expenditure, food consumption, and rural and urban housing. Part II, on "Social Welfare," endeavors to ascertain the Negro's share in various forms of public assistance. Dr. Sterner does not facilitate the reader's task by chapter summaries or general conclusions, and ordinarily one must go to his tables to discover the relative position of the Negro. Thus a sample group of Southern Negro nonrelief families had median income ranging from $445 to $870; white nonrelief families from the same areas ranged bewteen $1,133 and $2,356. None of the Negro groups approached the "so-called maintenance level" of $1,261. An up-to-date survey, which would document the general improvement of the last 15 years, is much to be desired.

4449. Washington, Booker T. Up from slavery, an autobiography. With an introd. by Jonathan Daniels. London, Oxford University Press, 1945, ©1901. 244 p. (The World's classics, 499) 49–39047 E185.97.W3162

4450. Mathews, Basil J. Booker T. Washington, educator and interracial interpreter. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1948. xvii, 350 p. 48–8652 E185.97.W249

Washington (1856–1915), the son of a slave woman and a white father, was, from 1881 to his death, the first "Principal" of Tuskegee Institute, Tuskegee, Alabama, which he made into a leading Negro educational center. After early years as a laborer and handyman, his formal education began at Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute in 1872. Washington's appointment to head the infant Tuskegee Institute was the pivot of his life since it enabled him to work for what he considered the most important goal of the newly freed Negroes: economic independence. Under Washington, Tuskegee became a training school where Negroes could learn practical agricultural and mechanical skills in a novel curriculum planned by him, with the students' work contributing to the upkeep of the school as well as to their own development. Outside the Institute he founded a number of associations for Negro professional men and women and raised large amounts of money for the Institute and other organizations benefiting the Negro. With his Atlanta speech of 1895 he won world-wide recognition as the spokesman and leader of the American Negro. His advocacy of the evolutionary betterment of Negro status won for him both praise and criticism from Negroes and whites alike. Much of his last 15 years was spent in travel, delivering lectures and organizing interracial conferences, both here and abroad. Up from Slavery is a classic autobiography, but in concentrating upon certain aspects of its author's career and message hardly tells the whole story, even down to its date of publication (1901). A fuller narrative is provided by Mr. Mathews' admiring biography, and even by Samuel R. Spencer's concise life in The Library of American Biography series: Booker T. Washington and the Negro's Place in American Life (Boston, Little, Brown, 1955. 212 p.).

4451. Weaver, Robert C. The Negro ghetto. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1948. xviii, 404 p. maps. 48–7373 E185.89.H6W4

Bibliography: p. 371–375.

The author confines his inquiries to the residential or spatial separation of the races in the North, which is the peculiar manifestation of Negro segregation in that part of the country. The concentration of migrated Negroes into segregated areas is of comparatively recent origin, a result of the general housing shortage during the depression of the 1930's. Mr. Weaver seeks to determine the economic and social patterns making for the solidification of Black Belt areas in Northern cities. Active opposition to the dispersal of Negroes in these cities, he shows, is led by building, real estate, and home-finance groups, and carried out by restrictive covenants and by inhospitable treatment and social ostracism on the part of white residents who fear an influx of Negroes into their neighborhoods. Mr. Weaver analyzes these fears, in which race prejudice and concern for property values are mingled, and appeals for the establishment of educational programs in interracial living and increases in the housing available to minorities. Much of the information is drawn from housing problems in Chicago.

F. Jews

4452. Commentary. Commentary on the American scene; portraits of Jewish life in America, edited by Elliot E. Cohen. Introd. by David Riesman. New York, Knopf, 1953. 336 p.
52–6413 E184.J5C65

4453. Ribalow, Harold U., ed. Mid-century; an anthology of Jewish life and culture in our times. New York, Beechhurst Press, 1955. 598 p.
54–10691 E184.J5R5

Commentary has been published under the auspices of the American Jewish Committee since the close of 1945 and is generally regarded as the leading American periodical for Jewish culture. In the first title its editor has drawn upon its department called "From the American Scene" for 20 pieces by 17 writers. Journalism in the best current American manner, they give vivid glimpses of Jewish life in a variety of aspects, such as "The Jewish Delicatessen" and "The Jewish College Student: New Model." The majority derive from the New York City area, but others describe San Francisco, Tulsa, a Chicago suburb, and an unnamed New England community. The editor of Mid-century has been editor of Congress Weekly and The American Zionist; his father, Menachem Ribalow, one of whose pieces is included, was until his death in 1953 "perhaps the most prominent Hebrew writer in the United States." It assembles 45 articles from 16 periodicals, including 7 from Commentary, 6 from Congress Weekly, and also 8 from non-Jewish periodicals, "by the most notable names in American-Jewish scholarship, theology, philosophy, culture, and journalism." They are grouped in four sections: "First Person Singular," "Belonging and Survival," "Culture," and "Zion." Some of the articles are concerned with Jewish problems in general, but the majority are in whole or part concerned with American Jewry. The volume closes with 9 pages of "Biographical Notes" on the 53 contributors.

4454. Edidin, Ben M. Jewish community life in America. New York, Hebrew Pub. Co., 1947. 282 p. 47–23471 E184.J5E27
"Selected bibliography": p. 273–277.

A comprehensive description of Jewish group life in the United States, in its structure, agencies, functions, problems, and aspirations, which takes its departure from the average local Jewish community rather than from American Jewry as a whole, and treats each topic in its historical development. Simply written, it is intended for students, teachers, parents, and group leaders, and is suitable for junior and senior high school classes or adult study groups. Chapters on the development of American Jewish communities are followed by analytical ones on the school, the synagogue, and the community center, which, although relatively a newcomer, now ranks with the other two "as one of American Jewry's three chief communal institutions." There follow descriptions of cultural activity, such as that of the Histadruth Ivrith, of social service, occupations, the struggle against anti-Semitic discrimination, and aid for Zionism. Miscellaneous community organizations, such as the B'nai B'rith, receive a long chapter, and the "year-round job" of raising funds another. American Jews still regard the community idea as essential to individual happiness, but "in every American Jewish community new ideas and methods are being tried."

4455. Handlin, Oscar. Adventure in freedom: three hundred years of Jewish life in America. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1954. 282 p.
54–10634 E184.J5H29

Written for the tercentenary of the first Jewish immigration to America, this is neither a complete history nor an assessment of "contributions," but an effort at interpretation of the main lines of development, particularly in their bearing upon the problems of the present. The flight of the Jews from Eastern Europe after 1870 rapidly altered the character of American Jewry and led to its bifurcation into two separate communities, only gradually reintegrated after World War I. Among the factors which promoted the reintegration of the Jewish community were "the free and fluid society of the United States," in which the rigid lines of social division tended to disappear, and the increasing virulence of anti-Semitism both in Europe and in America, where discrimination and exclusion in social life, education, and the professions were on the increase until World War II. The old anti-Semitism died in that war, and American Jews have become increasingly assimilated to the standards and tastes of American middle-class culture.

4456. Gordon, Albert I. Jews in transition. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1949. xviii, 331 p. 49–10489 F614.M5G67

The author served as a rabbi of Adath Jeshurun Synagogue during 1930–46 and used this opportunity to apply the "participant-observer technique" of social anthropology to the Jewish community of Minneapolis. His main theme is "the changes that have occurred in the beliefs, practices, and institutions of the European Jews" who settled there, and made adaptations in their original cultural patterns. For ten years he recorded the conversations and comments that he heard, not stenographically but in recollection, and has combined these oral materials with written ones such as synagogue records and the files of the American Jewish World, a Minneapolis weekly. He obtained substantial personal histories from four of the oldest members of the community, born in the 1860's; these comprise Part III of the book. "There is," he finds, "a decreasing emphasis upon ritual and form in the religious life" of the community, and "the dietary laws are gradually disappearing," even from the home, but some ceremonies and holidays have been revived or elaborated. The Jews of Minneapolis, although completely loyal to the United States, go on living in two cultures, and seem likely to continue doing so. They comprise only 4 percent of the city's total population, about the same proportion as the Jewish population of the whole United States.

4457. Janowsky, Oscar I., ed. The American Jew, a composite portrait. New York, Harper, 1942. xiv, 322 p. 42–23786 E184.J5J3

Partial Contents.—Historical background, by O. I. Janowsky.—Judaism and the synagogue, by D. de S. Pool.—Jewish education, achievements and needs, by I. B. Berkson.—The cultural scene: literary expression, by Marie Syrkin.—Hebrew in Jewish culture, by A. S. Halkin.—Structure of the Jewish community, by A. G. Duker.—Economic trends, by Nathan Reich.—Anti-Semitism, by J. J. Weinstein.—Current philosophies of Jewish life, by Milton Steinberg.—Zionism in American Jewish life, by Sulamith Schwartz.—Evaluation of the portrait of American Jewish living: The Jewish community and the outside world, by G. N. Shuster. The national being and the Jewish community, by H. M. Kallen.—Selected bibliography (p. [287]–298).

4458. Friedman, Theodore, and Robert Gordis, eds. Jewish life in America. New York, Horizon Press, 1955. 352 p. 55–11462 E184.J5F78

Partial Contents.—American Jewry: fourth century, by Robert Gordis.—Religion: American orthodoxy, retrospect and prospect, by Emanuel Rackman.—Jewish tradition in 20th century America: the conservative approach, by Theodore Friedman.—The temper of reconstruction, by H. M. Schulweis.—Reform Judaism in America, by S. S. Cohon.—Secularism and religion in the Jewish labor movement, by C. B. Sherman.—Culture: The East Side, matrix of the Jewish labor movement, by Abraham Menes.—American Jewish scholarship, by S. B. Freehof.—Hebrew culture and creativity in America, by Jacob Kabakoff.—Jewish literature in English, by Charles Angoff.—Yiddish literature in America, by N. B. Minkoff.—Jewish education in the United States, by W. B. Furie.—Jewish music in America, by H. D. Weisgall.—Visual arts in American Jewish life, by S. S. Kayser.—The community: Interfaith relations in the United States, by M. N. Kertzer.—Impact of Zionism on American Jewish life, by A. G. Duker.—The American rabbi: his changing role, by B. J. Bamberger.—Notes on the authors.

Of these two coöperative surveys of Jewish life in America, the earlier was begun as an educational project of Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America. The authors believed that a Jewish homeland in Palestine, where Jewish culture would not be ancillary to a majority culture, was indispensable under any circumstances; they were, nevertheless, according to Dr. Janowsky, "completely identified with American culture and the American way of life." The second survey, published 13 years later, originated in a tercentenary issue of the magazine Judaism and was sponsored by the American Jewish Congress. It assumes "the permanent framework of all forms of Jewish activities on the American locale," and the author who deals with Zionism believes that "it will have to fight for its place in the American Jewish community." The earlier survey is the more comprehensive; the later one is more detailed in its treatment of religion and culture, and offers, its editors think, "the kind of tempered appraisal of the mainstreams of American Jewish creativity rarely to be found in contemporary writing." The voting record of Jews during the 1952 presidential election is analyzed in Lawrence H. Fuchs' The Political Behavior of American Jews (Glencoe, Ill., Free Press, 1956. 220 p.) as part of an historical and sociopolitical study undertaken to determine why most American Jews are political liberals.

4459. The Jewish people, past and present. v. 4. 300 years of Jewish life in the United States. New York, Jewish Encyclopedic Handbooks, Central Yiddish Culture Organization (CYCO) 1955. 455 p. 46–7394 DS102.4.J4, v. 4

This large and handsomely produced volume results from the collaboration of eleven contributors, eight editors, and five translators. The section on general history is conventional enough, and the sections on religious movements and communal life present material readily available elsewhere. Jacob Lestschinsky's section on economic and social development presents much demographic information, with special attention to occupations and social structure. Philip Friedman on political and social movements traces the development of American Zionism. Mark Wischnitzer, in charting the impact of American Jewry on Jewish life abroad, describes rebuilding after World War I, and during the Nazi persecutions, and the United Jewish appeal. Abraham Menes, in describing the Jewish labor movement, places its golden age between 1901 and 1918, culminating in the "great revolt" of 1909—the strike of 60,000 cloakmakers. Samuel Niger deals with Yiddish culture, including the Yiddish theater of the 1880's, and Joshua Trachtenberg describes American Jewish scholarship, which includes not only Talmudics and Rabbinics, but also historical, sociological, and cultural studies. There are frequent halftone cuts of persons and buildings.

4460. Joseph, Samuel. Jewish immigration to the United States from 1881 to 1910. New York, Columbia University, 1914. 209 p. (Columbia University, Faculty of Political Science. Studies in history, economics and public law, v. 59, n. 4; whole no. 145) 14–15042 H31.C7, v. 59 JV6895.J6J6

Bibliography: p. 207–209.

In 1880 more than half of the Jews in the world were located within the Eastern European Pale, the majority, in Poland and Western Russia, subjects of the Czar, and large minorities in Galicia, a province of Austria-Hungary, and Moldavia, a province of Rumania. Their condition, which had in many respects improved during the reign of the liberal Czar Alexander II, took a drastic turn for the worse after his assassination in 1881. New and harsh laws were decreed, and "that combination of murder, outrage, and pillage—the pogrom" was unleashed against them. During the three decades 1881–1910, 1,562,800 Jewish immigrants came to America, constituting 8.8 percent of the total immigration. 71 percent of these Jews came from Russia, and most of the remainder from Austria-Hungary. This workmanlike dissertation compares the immigration from the three nations and describes the whole stream as essentially a family movement of permanent settlers largely concentrating in the North Atlantic States. The text is supplemented by 69 statistical tables (p. 158–196).

4461 Levinger, Lee J. A history of the Jews in the United States. [4th rev. ed.] Cincinnati, Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 1949. xxiii, 616 p. illus. (Commission on Jewish Education of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and the Central Conference of American Rabbis. Union graded series)

49–49296 E184.J5L664 1949

Bibliographical references at end of chapters or sections.

A textbook for classes of the high school level in Jewish schools, the first edition of which appeared in 1930. It is considerably more comprehensive and better balanced than a number of books on the subject written for adult Jews, and its very simplicity and methodical procedure make it a useful guide for the gentile reader. Rabbi Levinger organizes his text around the three main waves of Jewish immigration, the Sephardic Jews of Spain before 1840, the German Jews during most of the 19th century, and the Russian Jews after 1880. Emphasis is placed upon the development of Jewish religious, charitable, and educational institutions in the United States, and upon outstanding individuals from Judah Touro of Newport (1775–1854) to Governor Herbert H. Lehman. Bertram Wallace Korn's Eventful Years and Experiences (Cincinnati, American Jewish Archives, 1954. 249 p.) is an interesting collection of eight studies in American Jewish history mostly during the central decades of the 19th century. One is on the Jewish refugees of 1848, another is a panorama of "American Jewish Life in 1849," and a third tells the story of Maimonides College of Philadelphia, the first Jewish theological seminary in America (1867–73). A summary of local Jewish history and a guide to and description of places of Jewish interest in each state, the District of Columbia, and New York City and its environs is contained in A Jewish Tourist's Guide to the U. S., by Bernard Postal and Lionel Koppman (Philadelphia, Jewish Publication Society of America, 1954. xxx, 705 p.).

4462. McWilliams, Carey. A mask for privilege: anti-Semitism in America. Boston, Little, Brown, 1948. 299 p. 48-6011 E184.J5M16

In the summer of 1877 Joseph Seligman, a New York banker, was refused accommodation at a Saratoga Springs hotel—"one of the first major overt manifestations of anti-Semitism in the United States," which the author regards as proceeding from the triumph of a new generation of industrial tycoons and "the corrosion which the industrial revolution had brought about in the American scheme of values." Anti-Semitism in America differs from its European counterpart in that limitations have been imposed, not by the state, but "by our 'private governments'—industry and trade, banks and insurance companies, real estate boards and neighborhood associations, clubs and societies, colleges and universities." The book exhibits many personal views, elliptical arguments, and controversial acerbities, but it brings together a wide range of information on anti-Semitic utterances, "The System of Exclusion," the activities of "crackpot" agitators and associations, and recent anti-Semitic incidents. In Chapter 10, "No Ordinary Task," the author outlines a program of education, legislation, and other social action to eradicate this "most treacherous, deceptive, and tenacious of social prejudices," the appearance of which is invariably "a symptom of social sickness, a manifestation of social disorganization."

G. Orientals

4463. Chêng, Tê-ch'ao. Acculturation of the Chinese in the United States; a Philadelphia study, by David Te-chao Cheng. Philadelphia, 1948. 280 p. tables. A50-1331 E184.C5C47

"Printed in China."

Bibliography: p. [261]-274.

A University of Pennsylvania dissertation which studies the Race Street Chinatown of Philadelphia. The author is a Cantonese-speaking Chinese who worked there as a Christian missionary during 1940-44, and in 1942 undertook a study of its economic occupations, which was subsequently expanded to include its institutions as a whole, with emphasis upon culture contact and change. Nearly all its residents come from an area of 100 square miles along the southern coast of the province of Kwantung, and Part I describes the people of this part of China, their community life, and their philsophical outlook. Part II sketches the history of the Race Street Community, which dates from about 1870, and analyzes the occupations, the social organizations and customs, the education, and the family, religious, and recreational life of its members. In Part III the author draws up "A Balance Sheet of Acculturation" which indicates that, despite the ghetto-like segregation that has been the rule since 1894, the culture traits which the Philadelphia Chinese "have adopted from the American culture are definitely more than the culture traits which they have transplanted from the Old World and retained." Dr. Cheng's research terminated in 1944 and his preface is dated June 1946; his book reflects the wartime opening of "the door of racial and occupational discrimination," which he expected to be permanent.

4464. Coolidge, Mary (Roberts) Smith. Chinese immigration, by Mary Roberts Coolidge. New York, Holt, 1909. 531 p. tables. (American public problems, edited by Ralph Curtis Ringwalt) 9-23245 JV6874.C7

"Selected bibliography": p. 505-517.

This is an old book, but the Chinese immigration with which it deals had come to an end 27 years before its publication, and it remains the only comprehensive treatment of the subject. From the Gold Rush of 1849 until the opening of the transcontinental railways 20 years later manual labor was in heavy demand in California, and from 1852 Chinese coolies were imported in numbers, averaging 16,000 a year for three decades. With the opening of the railroads, however, a flow of white workers came from the East to glut the labor market and to begin an exclusionist agitation which extended to occasional riot and massacre. Mrs. Coolidge described this movement in some detail and emphasized that the exclusionist enactments of 1882-92 were clear violations of the Treaty of 1880 with China. China's resentment of American discrimination was shown by her failure to renew the Treaty of 1894 and by a boycott of American goods. The book reviews the Chinese background of the immigrants, and their ways of life in America, and contends that they were more industrious, better behaved, and no less assimilable than many groups of European immigrants.

4465. Ichihashi, Yamato. Japanese in the United States; a critical study of the problems of the Japanese immigrants and their children. Stanford University, Calif., Stanford University Press, 1932. 426 p. 32-22696 E184.J314

"Select bibliography": p. 409–417.

The author was professor of Japanese history and government at Stanford, and his book remains, after 25 years, the most comprehensive account of Japanese immigration to the United States. It is prefaced by an analysis of Japanese immigration in general, which was a drop in the bucket in comparison with Japan's rapid population increase, and of Japanese immigration to Hawaii, where nearly as many went as to the continental United States. Japanese immigration to the United States was negligible before 1890 and after 1908 was greatly reduced by the Gentlemen's Agreement. In the peak year, 1907, 9,948 Japanese entered, and the total Japanese population rose to 138,800 by 1930. The author describes the character, causes, and geographical distribution of the immigration; the employment of the Japanese in domestic service, city trades, and especially in agriculture; the movement toward and measures of exclusion; and the characteristics and problems of the American-born Japanese. They are taller, longer of limb, and heavier than Japanese children born and bred in Japan, and they are as intelligent and "as emotional as the average American." Their difficulties under discrimination, especially in the realm of employment, are objectively and effectively discussed.

4466. La Violette, Forrest E. Americans of Japanese ancestry; a study of assimilation in the American community. Toronto, Canadian Institute of International Affairs, 1946. 185 p.
A46–5078 E184.J3L3 1946

"Unpublished material" [theses and dissertations]: p. 181–182.

A University of Chicago dissertation based upon research in the Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, and Los Angeles areas begun in 1934, and continued at intervals until the evacuation of 1942. It emphasizes "the social context of the term nisei [the American-born second generation, exclusive of the kibei, sent back at an early age for education in Japan] as it has developed between the cessation of immigration in 1924 and Pearl Harbor in 1941, with the chief emphasis placed upon Japanese family and community life." It is through the family that the Nisei receive three sets of attitudes which link them most strongly to the ancestral culture: "submission and recognition of authority and prestige of the parents, acceptance of family responsibilities and maintenance of inviolate integrity of family status within the community," but the level of conformance is lower than is expected in Japan. The vocational problems of the Nisei, to whom only a limited variety of occupations and restricted opportunities within them have been available, and their marriage problems, such as too costly wedding receptions, are described. The author stresses the applicability of his studies to Canadian conditions, pointing out that Canada and the United States are the only two nations in the world concerned with assimilating so divergent a group, and that it is surprising "that the first generation of American-born children of Japanese parents have already progressed so far in this movement requiring a number of generations."

4467. Leong, Gor Yun. Chinatown inside out, by Leong Gor Yun. New York, B. Mussey, 1936. 256 p. 36–22486 E184.C5L56

An inside view, journalistic in style but based on wide personal knowledge, of New York's Chinatown, taken as typical of these segregated communities in a number of the larger American cities. Since the exclusion of Chinese immigration in the 1880's, these picturesque districts have remained static or dwindled, but their position as "the most exclusive of all the alien colonies in America" has altered little. The conditions described by Mr. Leong, however, are those of two decades ago, when he found that the ordinary residents of Chinatown, and especially the foreign-born, were exploited by the local "charitable and benevolent" association, a government within a government, and by the Tongs, some of which had turned into rackets. On the other hand, the average Chinese American received some assistance from his family association and from organizations for self-help, such as the Chinese Hand Laundry Association. Chinatown was a man's world, with a ratio of ten males to one female, and the most popular diversions, in order of favor, were gambling, resort to prostitutes, opium-smoking, and drinking. The author predicted the extinction of the old Chinatowns within a generation or two, but the process is as yet by no means complete. The volume is illustrated by excellent photographs, mostly taken for the purpose.

4468. Mears, Eliot Grinnell. Resident Orientals on the American Pacific coast; their legal and economic status. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1928. xvi, 545 p. tables, diagrs.
30–2364 E184.O6M33

"Select documents": p. [431]–526.

For practically as long as it has been occupied by the United States, "the Far West has sternly fought the coming of Oriental peoples to the American mainland." The present volume is concerned with the result as seen in the contrasting status of citizens, aliens eligible to citizenship, and aliens ineligible to citizenship in California, Oregon, and Washington. The author calls his study "one of laws, regulations, and judicial decisions and their actual operation," but in fact there is quite as much about the state of mind which produced the laws, and the actual economic and social condition of the Pacific coast Chinese and Japanese, as about the purely legal aspects. There is a discussion of the degree to which their nationals here have been protected by our treaties with Japan and China, and by the guaranties of the United States Constitution and its amendments. No specific Act of Congress denied citizenship to Orientals, but the Federal courts have more or less consistently interpreted the naturalization laws, originating in 1790, to that effect. The Pacific States have passed laws forbidding intermarriage, alien ownership of land, the public employment of Orientals, and even hunting and fishing by them. The author believed that in 1928 the West Coast was displaying a more friendly attitude toward both races than it had in the recent past.

4469. Thomas, Dorothy Swaine, and Richard S. Nishimoto. Japanese American evacuation and resettlement. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1946–52. 2 v. A47–1448 D753.8.T4

CONTENTS.—v. 1. The spoilage, by D. S. Thomas and R. S. Nishimoto.—v. 2. The salvage, by D. S. Thomas with the assistance of C. Kikuchi and J. Sakoda.

The most spectacular displacement of population in the whole of American history was the removal of nearly 110,000 persons of Japanese birth or ancestry from the Pacific coast early in 1942, and the internment of nearly all of them in ten "relocation centers," two of which were as far east as Arkansas. A group of social scientists at the University of California at once perceived the possibilities of such an upheaval for an intensive study of social processes, and with the financial backing of the University and three foundations were able to keep on foot, if not on so elaborate a scale as they had originally planned, an Evacuation and Resettlement Study from February 1942 through December 1945, "by which time the program of resettlement was about completed." The majority of the staff observers were recruited from among the evacuees, and their major task was "to record and analyze the changes in behavior and attitudes and the patterns of social adjustments and interaction" among the interned. The three major "laboratories" of the Study were the Poston center in Arizona, the Minodoka center in Idaho, and especially the Tule Lake center in northern California, but spot observations were made in five of the other seven centers, and from April 1943 the "associational life of the resettling evacuees" was studied from a Chicago office. Tule Lake forms the principal subject of The Spoilage; it soon came to be used for the segregation of persons classified as disloyal, in some cases on somewhat technical grounds, and it was here that the bulk of the complaints, strikes, threats, and murder and other violence took place, culminating in the renunciation of American citizenship by 70 percent of the citizens there interned. The Salvage consists of two parts, the first and briefer of which is "Patterns of Social and Demographic Change," wherein the consequences of the great upheaval are surveyed in the perspective of the whole history of the Japanese immigration to the United States. The net effect was "the dispersal beyond the bounds of segregated ethnocentered communities into areas of wider opportunity of the most highly assimilated segments of the Japanese American minority." Part II presents the life histories of fifteen persons who were resettled in the East or Middle West, selected for their representative character; Mrs. Thomas expresses her gratitude "for their willingness to relive, 'for the record,' the traumatic period following Pearl Harbor." Two other studies of the great evacuation have been published by the University of California: Removal and Return; the Socio-economic Effects of the War on Japanese Americans, by Leonard Bloom and Ruth Riemer (1949. 259 p.), and The Managed Casualty; the Japanese-American Family in World War II, by Leonard Broom and John I. Kitsuse (1956. 226 p.), The origins of the evacuation policy are tracked down by Morton Grodzins in Americans Betrayed; Politics and the Japanese Evacuation (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1949. xvii, 444 p.).

H. North Americans

4470. Burma, John H. Spanish-speaking groups in the United States. [Durham, N. C.] Duke University Press, 1954. 214 p. (Duke University Press sociological series [no. 9])

53–8273 E184.M5B8

Bibliography: p. [199]–209.

The Spanish-speaking is the one foreign-language group in the United States that has continued to increase since the Quota Act of 1921 and has now become the fourth largest in the country. Based upon a large monographic literature rather than personal investigation, this is the only work to treat the group as a whole and to consider its common cultural and religious core as well as the racial, historical, and social diversity of its component groups. The Hispanos, descendants of the Spanish colonists of New Mexico annexed in 1848, persist as inbred communities whose customs and social structures look back to the 16th century. The largest group are the Mexican-Americans, more Indian than Spanish in race, who can be found throughout the United States, but in the Southwest constitute a minority subject to varying degrees of discrimination. The Filipinos are Malays in race; as the smallest and most dispersed group, their minority problems resemble those of the Chinese. The Puerto Ricans as American citizens are not subject to the quotas and other restrictions hindering the entry of Filipinos and Mexicans; their problems arise from the facts that about a third are negroid, and nearly all have concentrated in the slums of New York City. They are the subject of a monograph by Charles Wright Mills, Clarence Senior, and Rose Kohn Goldsen: The Puerto Rican Journey; New York's Newest Immigrants (New York, Harper, 1950. 238 p.). The Filipino element was studied at a time when it was numerically more important than it is today, under the auspices of the Institute of Pacific Relations, in Bruno Lasker's Filipino Immigration to Continental United States and to Hawaii (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1931. xxii, 445 p.).

4471. Gamio, Manuel. Mexican immigration to the United States; a study of human migration and adjustment. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1930. xviii, 262 p.

30–15640 JV6798.M6G3

Bibliography: p. 249–256.

4472. Gamio, Manuel, comp. The Mexican immigrant, his life-story; autobiographic documents collected by Manuel Gamio. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1931. 288 p.

31–28581 JV6798.M6G28

Both volumes are the result of an investigation sponsored by the Social Science Research Council, with some assistance from the Mexican Government, during 1926–27. The author and his assistants visited the states of Guanajuato, Jalisco, and Michoacan in west central Mexico, from which the majority of the immigrants come, and the principal Mexican groups in the United States, in New York and the Middle West, especially Illinois and Indiana, as well as in California and the Southwest. The author found the official American statistics to be much inflated, since they failed to incorporate any adequate record of the large number of Mexicans who returned home. He viewed the whole transaction as an economic phenomenon motivated by the continuing misery of the Mexican lower classes, which made American wages and the relatively low cost of manufactured articles in the United States outweigh the hazards of illegal entry and any amount of discrimination—economic and social. The majority of immigrants did not desire citizenship, and those who did secure it remained attached "to the local Mexican-American culture such as prevails in many communities in the Southwest." However, the author believed that the Mexican revolutionary movement had been stimulated by immigrant contact with the standard of living in the United States. An unusual and revealing chapter presenting "The Songs of the Immigrant" affords a transition to Dr. Gamio's second volume, made up almost exclusively of 76 "guided interviews" and other personal statements by immigrants both male and female. They were translated into English by Robert C. Jones, and have evidently been classified into chapters each provided with a brief introduction by Robert Redfield of the University of Chicago. The headings include: "The Economic Adjustment," "Conflict and Race-consciousness," "The Leader and the Intellectual," "Assimilation," and "The Mexican-American."

4473. Hansen, Marcus Lee. The mingling of the Canadian and American peoples. v. 1. Historical. Completed and prepared for publication by John Bartlet Brebner. New Haven, Yale University Press; for the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Division of Economics and History, 1940. xviii, 274 p. maps (1 fold.) (The Relations of Canada and the United States [a series of studies prepared under the direction of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Division of Economics and History])

40–27389 E183.8.C2H27

4474. Truesdell, Leon E. The Canadian born in the United States; an analysis of the statistics of the Canadian element in the population of the United States, 1850 to 1930. New Haven, Yale University Press; for the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Division of Economics and History, 1943. xvi, 263 p. maps, tables, diagrs. (The Relations of Canada and the United States [a series of studies prepared under the direction of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Division of Economics and History])

A43–1238 HB3015.C3T7

Because of Professor Hansen's untimely death in 1938, his work had to be completed by Professor Brebner of Columbia University. It is a narrative history of the exchange of populations between the regions which are now the United States and Canada, from its colonial beginnings down to 1939. This exchange is interpreted as part of an integrated North American Westward Movement, motivated by the individual pioneer's land-hunger, and made possible by unrestricted mobility across the unfortified boundary. Significant shifts of population were brought about by the Revolutionary War, when Tories fled to Canada, the Canadian Insurrection of 1837, when Canadians sought political asylum in the United States, constant variations in economic conditions and land distribution, the availability of rich farm land at different times in the prairie states and provinces, the attraction of bounty money for enlistment in the Union Army during the Civil War, and the lure of high pay in the expanding industries of the United States. The companion volume, by a chief statistician of the U. S. Bureau of the Census, is built around 121 tables and 36 graphs. During the 80 years for which figures were available, the Canadian-born in the United States increased from 147,711, or 0.64 percent of the population, to 1,286,389, or 1.05 percent of the population. In 1930 they were concentrated in New England and New York City, about the Great Lakes, and in the cities of the Pacific coast. Some 77.3 percent, in fact, were living in urban areas. Nearly 30 percent were of French mother tongue, this being practically the same proportion as obtained in Canada itself. The increase since 1900 has been slower, "and the characteristics of the group as a whole have become those of a relatively static population." Another volume in the same series, The American-Born in Canada, by Robert H. Coats and Murdoch C. McLean (Toronto, Ryerson Press, 1943. xviii, 176 p.), offers a similar statistical analysis of a group which increased from 63,000, or 2.6 percent of the population, in 1851 to 344,574, or 3.3 percent of the population, in 1931, and was much more evenly distributed over the whole settled area.

4475. McWilliams, Carey. North from Mexico, the Spanish-speaking people of the United States. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1949. 324 p. (The Peoples of America series)
49–7084 F786.M215

This volume, which effectively synthesizes a mass of historical and sociological material, is primarily a presentation of racial and cultural conflict in the Southwest, inspired by the author's indignation on behalf of the underdog. He attacks what he describes as "The Fantasy Heritage," a sentimental emphasis upon the purely Spanish elements in the beginnings of the borderlands, at the expense of the living Mexican-Indian tradition, which is quite as important to the mixed cultural heritage of the Southwest. This attitude he regards as a part of the long-existing "determination to subordinate the Spanish-speaking minority in the Southwest," one of the means being "to drive a wedge between the native-born and the foreign-born and to cultivate the former at the expense of the latter." The only "Mexican Problem" which Mr. McWilliams recognizes is the stubbornness of the dominant Anglo-Saxons "in not recognizing the real character of the culture which prevails in the borderlands."

4476. Taylor, Paul Schuster. An American-Mexican frontier, Nueces County, Texas. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1934. 337 p. illus. 34–39877 F392.N8T3

The author climaxed a series of ten monographs on Mexican Labor in the United States (Berkeley, University of California Press, 1928–34. 3 v.) with this remarkably vivid and penetrating analysis of economic and social conditions in the Texas county which includes the city of Corpus Christi, upon which an army of cotton pickers converges each midsummer, and which led the counties of the entire United States in cotton production in 1930. He saw it as "the locus of long historical contacts and conflicts of four peoples—Indians, European (or American) whites, Negroes, and Mexicans." Here Spanish settlement began soon after the middle of the 18th century, and the first Americans established themselves in 1839. By 1859 all the original grantees had sold out to Americans; but by 1929 there were 29 Mexican laborers who had risen through tenancy to the proprietorship of very small farms, and 879 Mexicans owned town lots, some having achieved middle-class status. The original cattle industry had been completely replaced by short staple cotton culture, with Mexicans providing nearly all the year-round laborers and the majority of the transients. Mexicans and Negroes were once on easy terms, but now the Mexicans, in order to raise their standing, had been impelled "toward efforts to present themselves in the eyes of the whites, as a group dissociated from, and superior to, the Negroes." The author has the art of exhibiting large issues in a small setting.

I. Germans

4477. Faust, Albert Bernhardt. The German element in the United States with special reference to its political, moral, social and educational influence. New York, Steuben Society of America, 1927. 2 v. in 1. illus.
27–25840 E184.G3F3 1927

Bibliography: v. 2, p. [477]–562.

This work on an encyclopedic scale by Professor Faust of Cornell University won a prize awarded by the Germanic Department of the University of Chicago in 1907 for the best book on the subject, was first published by Houghton Mifflin in 1909, was awarded the Loubat prize by the Prussian Academy of Sciences in 1911, and was published in a German translation at Leipzig in 1912. The 1927 edition undertaken on the initiative of the Steuben Society is described as a complete revision, although most of the new material is incorporated in an Appendix (v. 2, p. [607]–730). Old-fashioned as the work is in its approach, it remains the most comprehensive treatment and indispensable to any serious student of the subject. Volume 1 contains descriptions of all German settlements in the Thirteen Colonies, beginning with the founding of Germantown, Pa., in 1683, and goes on to particularize the part taken by Germans in the Revolution, and in the Westward Movement through the settlement of California. Volume 2, after estimating the number of persons of German blood in the United States at 27½ percent of the total population, goes on to survey the achievement of individuals of German birth or descent in American agriculture, manufactures, politics, education, music, the fine arts, the theater, literature, and journalism. A concluding chapter on social and moral influence offers "the joy of living" and "care of the body" as Germanic benefactions, and identifies as Germanic traits law-abiding character, honesty, love of labor, sense of duty, etc.

4478. Hawgood, John A. The tragedy of German-America; the Germans in the United States of America during the nineteenth century—and after. New York, Putnam, 1940. xviii, 334 p. 40–35196 E184.G3H27

The author, who taught modern history at the University of Birmingham from 1931, studied in both Germany and the United States, and carried out his research for the present volume on grants from the Rockefeller Foundation in 1928 and 1934. It is primarily a study of the significance of the hyphen in the term "German-American," with its implication of resistance to Americanizing tendencies, which became so vexed an issue during World War I. After 1815 any concentration of German immigrants tended to retain a pride in their own culture and language, and to oppose "the strong Sabbatarianism and the growing temperance movement of the Yankee stock in the Middle-Western States," becoming distinctive "islands in a sea of Americanism." In addition there were concerted efforts by settlement societies or other agencies to plant communities wherein German civilization could remain independent of outside influences, and develop unhampered by the restrictions then obtaining at home; Part II describes such ventures in Missouri, Illinois, Texas, and Wisconsin. A crystallization resulted from the Know-Nothing onslaught of the 1850's, drawing the whole German-speaking body together in self-defense. "Germans in America between 1855 and 1915 lived not in the United States, but in German America, and lived and wrote for German America." It took World War I, "with its hatreds and its persecutions, its propaganda and its coercion," to bring this era and this mentality to an end.

4479. Wood, Ralph, ed. The Pennsylvania Germans. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1942. 299 p. 42–36243 F160.G3W66

Contents.—Pennsylvania, the colonial melting pot, by A. D. Graeff.—The Pennsylvania German farmer, by W. M. Kollmorgen.—The sects, apostles of peace, by G. P. Musselman.—Lutheran and Reformed, Pennsylvania German style, by Ralph Wood.—The Pennsylvania Germans and the school, by C. S. Stine.—Journalism among the Pennsylvania Germans, by Ralph Wood.—Pennsylvania German literature, by H. H. Reichard.—The Pennsylvania Germans as soldiers, by A. D. Graeff.—The Pennsylvania Germans as seen by the historian, by R. H. Shryock.—Appendix: The Pennsylvania German dialect, by A. G. Buffington.

4480. Klees, Frederic. The Pennsylvania Dutch. New York, Macmillan, 1950. 451 p. 50–11837 F160.G3K5

Bibliography: p. 445–451.

Mr. Wood's collection of ten papers by eight authors, some of whom are and some are not of Pennsylvania German descent, "tries to interpret the Pennsylvania Germans to their fellow Americans and to themselves." The editor remarks that "he was surprised to find that a common denominator developed spontaneously throughout all the chapters, namely, that the Pennsylvania German character was moulded by the fact that the Pennsylvania Germans were farmers practically and spiritually." Mr. Klees' volume is more detailed and more miscellaneous, but it is written with an evident affection for its subject which draws the reader on into the bypaths of Pennsylvania Dutch folkways and art. Mr. Klees, incidentally, regards "Dutch" as the traditionally correct term and enters a protest against the neologism, "Pennsylvania German." "Their strong concentration in a relatively small area enabled this people to stay Dutch," and "in preserving their own culture they succeeded in doing what no other non-English group in colonial America was able to do." The basis of their culture, however, he finds not in farming but in religion, with the three principal religious groups, "plain people" (Mennonites, Amish, Dunkards), "church people" (Lutherans, Reformed, United Brethren), and Moravians each forming a radically different cultural pattern of its own. Each chapter is headed by a neat pen-and-ink drawing by the author. The Maryland Germans, a History, by Dieter Cunz (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1948. 476 p.) tells the story of a related group who remained less isolated, but put a strong stamp upon the community in which they settled.

4481. Zucker, Adolf E., ed. The Forty-eighters, political refugees of the German Revolution of 1848. New York, Columbia University Press, 1950. xviii, 379 p. illus.
50–7743 E184.G3Z8 1950

CONTENTS.—The European background, by C. J. Friedrich.—The American scene, by O. Handlin.—Adjustment to the United States, by H. B. Johnson.—The Turner, by A. J. Prahl.—The Forty-eighters in politics, by L. S. Thompson and F. X. Braun.—The radicals, by E. W. Dobert.—The Forty-eighters in the Civil War, by E. Lonn.—Carl Schurz, by B. Q. Morgan.—Biographical dictionary of the Forty-eighters, by A. E. Zucker.

A volume planned in commemoration of the centenary of the Revolution, by "a number of us who had been working in this field," at the Philadelphia headquarters of the Carl Schurz Memorial Foundation in February 1948. A "Forty-eighter" is defined as "one who came to the United States from German-speaking territory as a result of his participation in the Revolution of 1848"; his actual arrival in the United States, of course, might be delayed until the latter 1850's. Their number cannot be precisely determined, since the great majority of German immigrants were coming for economic reasons, but was small—Dr. Zucker regards 4,000 as a conservative estimate. However, their influence was vastly greater than their numbers, and few immigrant groups have had so large a proportion of persons of distinction. Dr. Zucker's "Biographical Dictionary" of over 300 names is a compilation of permanent value. The average reader will find these interpretive essays more serviceable than the detailed volume on the same subject from a single pen: Carl F. Wittke's Refugees of Revolution (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1952. 384 p.). It is, however, a work of great learning, and has chapters with little or no counterpart in the symposium, such as "Non-German Forty-eighters," "The Politics of the Post-War Years," "The German Social Pattern," and "Learning and Letters." Dean Wittke has also written substantial biographies of two of the most remarkable personalities among the Forty-eighters: Against the Current; the Life of Karl Heinzen (1809–80) (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1945. 342 p.) and The Utopian Communist; a Biography of Wilhelm Weitling, Nineteenth-Century Reformer (Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1950. 327 p.).

J. Scandinavians

4482. Babcock, Kendric Charles. The Scandinavian element in the United States. Urbana, University of Illinois, 1914. 223 p. (University of Illinois studies in the social sciences, v. 3, no. 3)
15–8448 H31.I4, v. 3, no. 3
E184.S2B12

University of Illinois Bulletin, v. 12, no. 7.

"Critical essay on materials and authorities": p. 183–204.

A work, obviously outmoded in some respects, which retains value as one of the very few treatments of immigration from the three Scandinavian nations as a whole. In 1910–12, after a century of steady growth, the population of Sweden was only 5,600,000, of Norway 2,390,000, and of Denmark 2,775,000. The passage, therefore, of 2,200,000 Scandinavians to the United States between 1820 and 1912 was an extraordinary mass exodus. In none of the three were there the oppressive political, military, or social conditions to be found on the continent; the migration therefore was essentially an exchange of scanty economic resources and opportunities for the richer ones offered by the fertile prairies of the Mississippi Valley. Some information is offered concerning the Danish immigration, which totaled 278,277 between 1820 and 1913, or only about two-fifths of the Norwegian figure during the same period. "The Danish element in America has always lacked unity and solidity," a fact which the author attributes to the weak influence of the schism-ridden Danish Lutheran Church. During the same years 696,401 Norwegians entered the United States, as against 1,071,835 from more populous Sweden.

4483. Benson, Adolph B., and Naboth Hedin. Americans from Sweden. Foreword by Carl Sandburg. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1950. 448 p. (The Peoples of America series)
50–5150 E184.S23B328
Bibliography: p. [427]–434.

This work is in large part based on, or continues, the symposium which the authors edited, as well as contributed to, on the occasion of the New Sweden Tercentenary: Swedes in America, 1638–1938 (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1938. xvi, 614 p.). Part I, "Historical Background," is a somewhat conventional chronological sketch of Swedish groups, individuals, and movements in the United States. Part II, "Religious Life," considers the Swedish participation in five other churches as well as the Lutheran, including the Methodists and the Mission Friends, the pietistic wing of the Swedish state church. Part III, "Denominational Education" briefly reviews the history of seven institutions of Swedish origin, the largest of which is Augustana College, established at Rock Island, Illinois, in 1875 after a somewhat migratory existence since 1858. Part IV, "American Activities," calls the roll of a multitude of Swedish Americans of distinction in a variety of fields, such as architects and builders, health specialists, musicians and actors, aviators and airplane builders, and businessmen. Small pride seems to be taken in their major activity in America: agriculture.

4484. Blegen, Theodore C. Norwegian migration to America. Northfield, Minn., Norwegian-American Historical Association, 1931–40. 2 v. illus. (facsims.) maps, diagrs.
31–20308 E184.S2B6

4485. Blegen, Theodore C., ed. Land of their choice; the immigrants write home. [Minneapolis] University of Minnesota Press, 1955. 463 p. 55–9368 E184.S2B55

The two-volume work originated in the author's doctoral dissertation at the University of Minnesota, but was greatly amplified through a large collection of documentary material which he made as a Guggenheim Fellow in Norway during 1928–29. The whole is a vividly concrete social history of Norwegian immigration during the central decades of the 19th century. The first volume bears the limiting dates 1825–60; it "traces the genesis and early expansion of Norwegian immigration, explores the European backgrounds, and interprets the movement in a setting of international history." It describes two types of literature which had not previously received due emphasis: the "America books" and the "America letters." The first were handbooks of information for Norwegians on conditions in America; one of the earliest and most influential examples, which broadened the geographical scope of the movement in Norway, was Ole Rynning's True Account of America for the Information and Help of Peasant and Commoner, published at Christiana in 1838. "America letters" were written by immigrants to their relatives and friends at home, in increasing numbers from the mid-1830's, and were often published in the local press; "one gets the impression of a vast advertising movement." Land of Their Choice is an anthology of such letters in translations made by either Dean Blegen or his research assistant, Borge Madsen; many first appeared in the publications of the Norwegian-American Historical Association. Here they are arranged in groups of two kinds: letters from various individuals illustrating a particular topic, or series of letters from a single individual. The second volume of the larger work bears the subtitle The American Transition; it aims to present the dynamic process whereby the immigrant was merged into the life of the New World. The topical chapters into which it is organized pursue their subjects to various points in the later 19th century, but the bulk of the evidence presented falls before 1860. After years of study the author continued to think that Ole E. Rølvaag (no. 1720–1723), in his masterpiece Giants in the Earth and his other novels, recorded and interpreted the American transition "with deeper insight and greater effectiveness than any other writer."

4486. Nelson, Helge. The Swedes and the Swedish settlements in North America. Lund, C. W. K. Gleerup; New York, A. Bonnier; 1943. 2 v. (Skrifter utg. av Kungl. humanistiska vetenskapssamfundet i Lund, 37)
45–7045 E184.S23N35
Translated by Professor Nils Hammarstrand.
Bibliography: v. 1, p. [410]–418.
CONTENTS.—1. Text.—2. Atlas (73 maps).

The author of this unique work "took part in the great emigration investigation in Sweden during the first decade of the present century," and after becoming professor of geography at the University of Lund undertook a large-scale study of Swedish colonization in Canada and the United States from the geographical point of view. Receiving subsidies from the Swedish Government, the Swedish-American Foundation, and various Swedish learned bodies, he traveled widely in Canada and the United States in 1921, 1925, 1926, and 1933. The principal subject of his book is the changing geographical distribution of the Swedish stock in the United States, and from 1890, the first Census which broke down the numbers of the foreign-born by counties, he has been able to present a series of statistical maps for the states with the greatest Swedish concentration, and especially for Minnesota (19 maps). Other major concerns are the causes and conditions of settlement in particular areas and the economic occupations of the settlers. Of the 24 chapters, 13 are devoted to a geographical survey, region by region, of the actual settlements, with numerous maps and photographs, many of them taken by the author on his tours. He does not neglect the large urban concentrations of Swedes in Worcester, Mass., New York City, Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul, which are demographically treated. However, the Swedes have been less attracted by the cities than many other racial groups, and "the Swedish stock of the first and second generations alone no doubt owns more improved land in the United States than all the cultivated area of the Swedes at home."

4487. Qualey, Carlton C. Norwegian settlement in the United States. Northfield, Minn., Norwegian-American Historical Association, 1938. 285 p. illus., tables, diagr. (Publications of the Norwegian-American Historical Association)
38–6266 E184.S2Q8

Issued also as thesis (Ph. D.) Columbia University.

Bibliography: p. [253]–272.

A solidly documented narrative history of the dispersion and settlement of Norwegian immigrants in the Middle West from 1834 to about 1885, with some mention of settlement elsewhere and of earlier and later date. Separate chapters are devoted to Illinois, where the Fox River Settlement of 1835 constituted the first Norwegian community beyond the Appalachians; to Wisconsin, where Jefferson Prairie just across the Illinois line was settled in 1839; to Iowa, reached by Norwegians in the same year; to "the glorious new Scandinavia" which sprang up in Minnesota in the mid-1850's; to the Dakotas; and to Michigan. The three peaks of Norwegian immigration occurred in 1866–73, 1880–93—with 1882, when over 28,000 entered, as the peak year of all—and in 1900–1911. Chapter IX considers "Islands" of Norwegian settlement in other parts of the United States. Dot maps show the concentration of Norwegians in the United States in 1930, and in individual states at earlier dates from 1870 to 1900.

K. Other Stocks

4488. Berthoff, Rowland Tappan. British immigrants in industrial America, 1790–1950. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. 296 p. maps, diagrs. 53–6028 E184.B7B4

Bibliography: p. [213]–275.

Down to the 1850's immigration from Great Britain (as distinct from Ireland) to the United States was comparatively small, but from that decade through the 1920's a fluctuating but usually considerable stream crossed the Atlantic, reaching a peak of over 800,000 during the 1880's. Until the work of Mr. Berthoff, who is himself a Welshman, less was available to the ordinary reader on this than on any other major current of immigration, and his book illuminates a very important sector of our ethnic history. Making use of trade journals, labor union publications, state documents, and other primary sources, he has been able to display this influx as in great part one of skilled laborers, bringing with them experience and techniques which secured them prompt employment at high wages in the great American industrial expansion which began before the Civil War but was much accelerated after its close. These English, Scotch, and Welsh craftsmen played an important part in the development of the American textile, mining, and iron and steel industries, and one only quantitatively less important in our pottery, papermaking, quarrying, building, and maritime trades. In fact, "nearly the whole English silk industry migrated to America after the Civil War." These craftsmen also took their share in the organization of labor, and their relatively conservative outlook was reflected in the American Federation of Labor, a league of craft unions of skilled artisans. The immigrants themselves valued their national heritages and developed their own organizations, periodicals, sports, and amusements, but the second generation, with no linguistic or other serious obstacle to assimilation, speedily became indistinguishable from other Americans, and "the British-American community dwindled after the first World War." Wilbur S. Shepperson's British Emigration to North America: Projects and Opinions in the Early Victorian Period (Oxford, Blackwell, 1957. xvi, 302 p.) is based upon solid research in both British and American sources, but is limited to the period 1837–60, and is primarily concerned with organized efforts to promote emigration, and the discussions which they provoked at home.

4489. Ford, Henry Jones. The Scotch-Irish in America. New York, P. Smith, 1941. 607 p. 42–36197 E184.S4F9 1941

4490. Dunaway, Wayland F. The Scotch-Irish of colonial Pennsylvania. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1944. 273 p. 44–9454 F160.S4D8

Bibliography: p. 233–257.

Professor Ford's volume, originally published in 1915 by the Princeton University Press, was uncommonly successful in putting into perspective the extraordinary story of the Scotch-Irish, and in underlining their importance as a formative element in the development of the Thirteen Colonies. His starting-point is the Ulster Plantation of 1609, undertaken as a means of keeping Catholic Ireland in subjection, but largely filled up by an unanticipated migration, not of Englishmen, but of lowland Scots. In the 18th century Presbyterian Ireland shared the economic disabilities imposed by the London Parliament upon Catholic Ireland, and in bad times Ulstermen sailed for America in large numbers. The first wave of 1717–18 came to New England, where Presbyterians and Congregationalists often failed to see eye to eye; subsequent waves, from 1727 to 1773, went rather to Pennsylvania. Professor Dunaway is concerned with them there, but his book too has more than a merely provincial significance, for he considers the dispersion which took place from about 1735, when the Scotch-Irish advance reached the mountain barrier, and was deflected southwestward into the valleys of Maryland and Virginia, and the piedmont region of the Carolinas. Ford stresses the importance of the Scotch-Irish for American Presbyterianism and for American educational institutions, both preparatory to the ministry and providing popular education. Dunaway adds substantial accounts of their economic activities and their social life and customs, and has a chapter on their position in the politics, law, and government of provincial Pennsylvania. Ford has a fuller treatment of the very important contribution of this stock, alienated from the Crown by British policy toward Ireland, to the revolutionary movement.

4491. Graham, Ian Charles Cargill. Colonists from Scotland: emigration to North America, 1707–1783. Ithaca, N. Y., Published for the American Historical Association [by] Cornell University Press, 1956. 213 p. 56–58450 E184.S3G7

Bibliography: p. 191–206.

The importance of the migration of Ulster Scots to the Thirteen Colonies has long been understood; this volume provides for the first time a documented study of the migration from Scotland itself. This movement was only made possible by the union of the Scottish and English Parliaments in 1707, and remained small and sporadic until 1768, when there suddenly began a much larger stream which went steadily on until halted by the Revolutionary War. In 12 years, the author estimates, about 25,000 persons left Scotland, "a far greater loss of people than the country had ever known before." The greater number came from the Highlands, where to the chronic poverty of the peasantry was now added the outright evictions made by improving landlords, but economic depression and unemployment brought a substantial group from the Lowlands. The greatest concentration, about 5,000, settled in North Carolina. Unlike the Ulstermen, the Scots of Scotland remained loyal to the Crown with a unanimity and stubbornness exasperating to the Patriots, and not a few of the immigrants of 1768–75 in the next decade removed to Canada, thenceforward the focus of Scots emigration. Chapter VI considers the Scottish-born merchants who resided in the coastal cities of the Colonies throughout the 18th century, and were of particular importance in the tobacco trade of the Chesapeake region.

4492. Halich, Wasyl. Ukrainians in the United States. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1937. 174 p. 37–28719 E184.U5H3

Bibliography: p. 163–168.

The Ukraine, the black-soil steppes north of the Black Sea drained by the Dniester and the Dnieper, is inhabited by millions of people who speak a separate Slavic language, and have in recent times aspired to a separate national status, although they have never enjoyed actual independence save for a brief period during 1919–20. American immigration statistics did not distinguish them from other Russian nationals until 1899, but from that year through 1914, when their numbers entering had reached a peak, about 250,000 came to the United States. By far the largest number went to Pennsylvania, where the majority became coal miners, and other large groups settled in New Jersey, Ohio, and Illinois. The present volume is strongly colored by Ukrainian nationalism (there is, it seems, a "pro-Russian faction"), but gives a clear account of the Ukrainian participation in American industry, agriculture, business, and the professions, and describes Ukrainian ethnic organizations, the Ukrainian Catholic (Uniate) Church, the Ukrainian press, and a variety of social activities in various parts of the United States. "Their social and economic improvement, although a slow, hard climb, has been a steady one."

4493. Lucas, Henry S. Netherlanders in America; Dutch immigration to the United States and Canada, 1789–1950. Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1955. xix, 744 p. (University of Michigan publications. History and political science, v. 21) 55–8647 E184.D9L8

Between 1820 and 1949 265,539 Netherlanders came to the United States and 70,000 to Canada. Mr. Lucas' purpose is to tell their story from their own point of view, since his lifelong interest in Dutch immigration has led him to accumulate primary source material in the form of interviews with surviving pioneers, as well as other personal memorabilia relating to the Dutch settlements and their internal life and structure. The emphasis of the study is upon Dutch settlements in the Middle West and particularly in Michigan, where the author grew up. It was, in fact, the centenary in 1947 of the founding of Holland, Michigan, by the Seceders from the established Reformed Church of the Netherlands which embarked Professor Lucas, a grandson of one of the settlers of 1847, upon this volume. "Religion determined the pattern of Dutch settlement in America," and the Dutch communities remained self-contained cultural and ethnic islands until the 20th century, when Dutch immigration fell off sharply and the expansion of American cultural and economic activity began to impinge upon all isolated groups, with World War I, as usual, constituting a turning point. This definitive volume provides information on every Dutch settlement in the country and, when possible, the reasons for its success or failure. Topical chapters deal with religion, education, and the press and politics of the Dutch communities.

4494. Pellegrini, Angelo M. Americans by choice. New York, Macmillan, 1956. 240 p.
56–1241 E184.I8P39

Dr. Pellegrini, whose Immigrant's Return (New York, Macmillan, 1951. 269 p.) presented his own life story as well as his impressions of an Italian journey, here sketches the lives of six representative West Coast Italian-Americans of an older generation. La Bimbina, a peasant mother, who found life in America no less toilsome, but rewarding instead of merely futile, and died at 70 "at the end of the day's labor," is the author's own mother, recalled in respect, gratitude, and affection. The sketch of a "dean of winegrowers" in the Napa Valley conveys a variety of information on the conditions of viniculture on California soil. Other sketches concern the rise and fall of a big-town bootlegger; the mother of a family of winegrowers who had kept a first-class boarding house in her younger days and excelled in her Italian cuisine; an itinerant swindler from the petty bourgeoisie who had "done a little of everything—except work"; and a contracting ditchdigger—"at sixty-nine years of age he was still in the ditch eight hours a day," but he had established his sons when he dropped dead digging to clear his own vineyard. The mingled candor, strength, and tenderness which the author has put into this gallery of sketches promote his purpose of mutual understanding.

4495. Thomas, William I., and Florian Znaniecki. The Polish peasant in Europe and America. [2d ed.] New York, Knopf, 1927. 2 v. (2250 p.)
27–25039 DK411.T5 1927

This famous work was first published during 1918–20 in five smaller volumes; this second edition has the same text, with a few errors corrected, but is rearranged and provided with a brief index. It owes its unique reputation and influence to its inclusion, on an unprecedented scale, of social documentary materials, usually translated from Polish into English. In volume 1 are no fewer than 50 series of peasant letters, each series provided with an introduction in which the circumstances of the correspondents are described and the persons mentioned are identified. The series have been placed in three main groups, identified as between members of family-groups, between husbands and wives, or as exhibiting personal relations outside of marriage and the family. Volume 2 concludes with the largest single document in the work, the autobiography of Wladek Wiszniewski (p. 1915–2226), who progressed from Lubotyn in the Province of Kalisz to the Chicago stockyards, but did not much like them. Many chapters in the rest of the work consist in whole or part of translated documentary material. Serious readers have always received a powerful impression from this exceptional mirror into the minds of an immigrant group. The authors begin with a sketch of Polish social organization; in volume 2 they analyze social "Disorganization and Reorganization in Poland," and pass on to "Organization and Disorganization in America" (p. 1467–1827). This contains their epoch-making description of the Polish-American community and its "super-territorial" organization. It also contains a large section on the "Disorganization of the Immigrant," in which the "decay of the personal life-organization of an individual member of a social group" is regarded as eventuating in the break of the conjugal relation, murder, the vagabondage and delinquency of boys, or the sexual immorality of girls, with abundant documentary evidence on each head. It must be remarked that at times the gap between the flesh and blood of the documents and the abstract theorizing of the professors is glaringly wide.

4496. Williams, Phyllis H. South Italian folkways in Europe and America; a handbook for social workers, visiting nurses, school teachers, and physicians. New Haven, Published for the Institute of Human Relations by Yale University Press, 1938. xviii, 216 p. 38–16630 E184.I8W6

4497. Federal Writers' Project. New York (City). The Italians of New York; a survey prepared by workers of the Federal Writers' Project, Works Progress Administration in the City of New York. Sponsored by the Guilds' Committee for Federal Writers' Publications. New York, Random House, 1938. xx, 241 p. (The American guide series) 38–27087 F128.9.I8F4

Bibliography: p. 227–230.

In the absence of any solid and large-scale treatment of the great Italian immigration to the United States—some 4,650,000 persons in the century after 1820—these two titles will do duty as concrete views of limited but representative aspects of the field. Miss Williams' book is based on her "contact for eleven years with over five hundred Italian and Italian-American families" resident in the metropolitan area of New Haven, Conn. Most of them came from Sicily or the five southernmost provinces of the Italian peninsula, and were peasants and fishing folk at home. She goes into most of the spheres of everyday life, such as housing, diet and household economy, recreation and hospitality, religion and superstition, and death and mortuary practices, and in each describes first the folkways that obtained in Italy, and next the modified ones that she has found in America. Her outlook is consistently that of a social worker, but of a well-informed and shrewd one, and she warns that superstitions and other "deep-seated customs, if swept aside at all, are dissipated gradually." The Italians of New York [City] is a slighter compilation, but it is well illustrated with photographs taken for the Writers' Project group who produced it, and it passes in review the public aspects of one of the largest Italian-American communities. "Their Share in Building and Developing New York" describes the varieties of economic occupations which maintain them, and there are chapters on religious life, civic and social life, intellectual and cultural life, the professions, creative work in art and literature, and specifically Italian amusements and entertainments.

4498. Wittke, Carl F. The Irish in America. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1956. 319 p. 56–6199 E189.I6W5

Bibliography: p. 295–306.

This work on the southern or Catholic Irish as distinct from the Ulstermen or Protestant Scotch-Irish is not offered as a definitive study, but aims to fill a gap in the literature of immigration history by applying proper standards of historical objectivity to "the major aspects of Irish immigration to the United States and with the repercussions from America upon Ireland in the long struggle for Irish independence from England." Some attention is given to the political exiles of 1798, but in the main the book takes its departure from the increased migration of the 1820's. Chapters are devoted to the Irish as canal-building and railroad-building laborers, as firemen and policemen, and as farmers. Their special relationship to the Catholic Church and to urban and national politics is described. "The Fenian Fiasco," Anglophobia, and Irish Nationalism culminating in the State of Eire are among the international aspects of the subject. "There are American Irish who have never escaped from the slums. . . . The majority, however, have attained middle-class respectability."

XV

Society

A.	Some General Views	4499–4513
B.	Social History: Periods	4514–4522
C.	Social History: Topics	4523–4534
D.	Social Thought	4535–4545
E.	General Sociology; Social Psychology	4546–4558
F.	The Family	4559–4573
G.	Communities: General	4574–4578
H.	Communities: Rural	4579–4585
I.	Communities: Urban	4586–4599
J.	City Planning; Housing	4600–4613
K.	Social Problems; Social Work	4614–4627
L.	Dependency; Social Security	4628–4638
M.	Delinquency and Correction	4639–4660

THIS chapter lists works which deal with American society, and necessarily exhibits all the difficulties which go with that concept: it is in part an abstraction and in part a residue—what is left when political and economic phenomena have been removed. The titles below include much that is professional or academic sociology, and much that is not. The "General Views" of Section A are in part some famous perspectives of the past, and in part some more recent volumes which seemed not out of place standing beside them. The two social history sections may seem quite inadequate to represent a subject which has received so much recent emphasis, but here, as in Chapter XI, many of the titles which a social historian would unhesitatingly claim as his own are, for our purpose, subject to a more precise classification and appear elsewhere. There is of course nothing absolute about the division into "Periods" and "Topics"; it is merely a convenient way of indicating that in the titles of the first group there is a wider coverage of social phenomena over a relatively limited period, and in those of the second a more limited coverage over a relatively longer period. Again our social histories cannot be sharply divided from a number of works in general history (Chapter VIII) and intellectual history (Chapter XI). Some users would perhaps prefer a single chronological arrangement for all of them, and for political and economic history as well; but in this alternative, periods would be found to overlap as much as do categories, and the works on contemporary situations in each realm would lack specific background.

The majority of works in Section D deal with academic sociology, and the remainder of the chapter, for the most part, consists of the writings of professional sociologists or social workers. In the main our arrangement follows the Library of Congress classification (HM–HV), but our Section J completes the treatment of urban phenomena with works on city planning which the Library classifies under Fine Arts (NA) and on housing which it classifies under Economics (HD), as it does the works on social security in Section L.

Concerning the technical literature written almost exclusively by the faculties of the departments of sociology in American universities, several points should be made in elucidation of our selections. The most frequent objective of this literature, it is fair to say, is to arrive at universal rules of social behavior. The bulk of this literature is great, but the greater part of it is concerned with man as man and not with man in the United States of America. Some books ostensibly universal in subject matter turn out on examination to be in fact wholly concerned with American examples, and such have been unhesitatingly selected if they meet our requirements in other respects.

A large proportion of sociological literature consists of textbooks written for college courses which, like all such textbooks, are more remarkable for their similarities than for their differences. We can, of couse, give only an example or two of each type, and our selection never implies that any text has an absolute superiority over its numerous competitors.

A recent tendency in academic sociology has been the identification of scientific method with measurement, the devising of means for measuring such things as attitudes, and the production of monographs consisting very largely of figures. While far from disputing the interest of such studies for other professionals, or their importance in developing knowledge about society, we have in most cases found that their limited scope and frequently tentative conclusions have stood in the way of their selection for a general guide of this kind.

American sociology has from its beginnings been of rationalistic, diagnostic, and reformist if not reconstructionist temper or outlook. The core of the curriculum has normally been a course in American social problems wherein attention is concentrated upon areas of disorganization, maladjustment, and failure. This tendency is naturally reflected in the works available for selection in this chapter, and so inevitably in the works selected. In consequence, to some this chapter may seem to emphasize the negative aspects rather than the positive achievements of American civilization, but this has not been because of any bias in this direction on the part of its compilers.

A. Some General Views

4499. Bryce, James Bryce, viscount. The American commonwealth. London and New York, Macmillan, 1888. 2 v.
9–13055 JK246.B9 1888

This classic surpassed in elaboration and penetration any studies which Americans had produced on their own government and politics, and at once became a standard text for courses in these subjects. Its author went on to a distinguished career in British politics, but succeeded in bringing out new editions in 1893 and (with the help of Charles A. Beard) in 1910. However, we list the original edition as the best worth reading. It inaugurated the serious study of American political parties. It is, nevertheless, a more comprehensive work, as appears from its Parts IV, V, and VI. Part IV is an elaborate treatment of public opinion, in both its failures and its successes. Part V is a miscellany including discussions of the supposed and true faults, and the strength of American democracy, as well as its availability for European imitation. Part VI deals with social institutions, and has chapters on the bar, railroads, Wall Street, the position of women, and the pleasantness of American life. Bryce's American Commonwealth: Fiftieth Anniversary, edited by Robert C. Brooks (New York, Macmillan, 1939. 245 p.), a symposium sponsored by the American Political Science Association, is naturally political in emphasis.

4500. [Crèvecoeur, Michel Guillaume St. Jean de, called Saint John de Crèvecoeur] Letters from an American farmer; describing certain provincial situations, manners and customs . . . and conveying some idea of the late and present interior circumstances of the British colonies in North America. Written for the information of a friend in England, by J. Hector St. John. London, T. Davies, 1782. 318 p. 2–6756 E163.C82

4501. Crèvecoeur, Michel Guillaume St. Jean de, called Saint John de Crèvecoeur. Letters from an American farmer. Reprinted from the original ed. with a prefatory note by W. P. Trent and an introd. by Ludwig Lewisohn. New York, Boni, 1925. xxxvii, 355 p. 26–24569 E163.C827

After a wandering existence Crèvecoeur settled on his farm, Pine Hill, in Orange County, N. Y., in 1769, and in the years before the Revolution is thought to have produced his vivid sketches of the husbandman's life. He is one of the first to view America "as the asylum of freedom, as the cradle of future nations, and the refuge of distressed Europeans," and an even greater pioneer in pointing out that altered conditions of life were producing a new man, the American. Some materials not used in the edition of 1782 were rediscovered and published as Sketches of Eighteenth Century America (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1925. 342 p.).

4502. Croly, Herbert D. The promise of American life. New York, Macmillan, 1909. 468 p. 9–28528 HN64.C89

The American nation "is committed to the realization of the democratic ideal; and if its promise is to be fulfilled, it must be prepared to follow whithersoever that ideal may lead." The essence of the American achievement is that its "economic, political, and social organization has given to its citizens the benefits of material prosperity, political liberty, and a wholesome natural equality." On these premises the author conducted a searching inquiry into the quality of American civilization, and worked out principles of reconstruction in the spirit of individual emancipation and constructive individualism. Much of it is of present pertinence as well as of historical interest.

4503. Fortune. U. S. A., the permanent revolution, by the editors of Fortune in collaboration with Russell W. Davenport. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1951. xvii, 267 p. 51–10804 E169.1.F75

"Originally published as the February, 1951, issue of Fortune magazine."

A closely argued and somewhat overemphatic volume which seeks to demonstrate that the American way of life is founded upon and generated by principles of universal application. The present-day working of this "American system" of liberty, equality, and constitutionalism is illustrated in the spheres of business, politics, labor, and local community affairs. These conclusions can be generally applied to the problems of present day civilization, and used to dissolve the caricature of American life which prevails abroad, and to promote a positive American foreign policy.

4504. Nef, John U. The United States and civilization. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1942. xviii, 421 p. ([Chicago. University] Charles R. Walgreen Foundation lectures) 42–1619 B57.N4

A diagnostic interpretation of American society in the light of the development of Western Civilization since the Middle Ages and its present material, moral, and intellectual crisis. The overemphasis of means, in the enormous expansion of science, technology, industrialism, and economic life since about 1450, has led to the neglect and decay of the ends of civilization: humanism, religion, moral philosophy, and art. Among the expedients suggested are a return to the humanities in education, the endowment of noneconomic institutions, and the strengthening of government within constitutional and democratic limits.

4505. Siegfried, André. Les Etats-Unis d'aujourd'hui. Paris, Colin, 1927. 326 p. (Bibliothèque du musée social) 27–26676 E169.1.S56

4506. Siegfried, André. America comes of age, a French analysis. Translated from the French by Henry H. Hemming and Doris Hemming. New York, Harcourt, Brace. 1927. 358 p. 27–9637 E169.1.S57

4507. Siegfried, André. Tableau des Etats-Unis. Paris, Colin, 1954. 347 p. 54–34192 E169.1.S56813

4508. Siegfried, André. America at mid-century. Translated by Margaret Ledésert. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1955. 357 p. 55–7422 E169.1.S568

M. Siegfried's concise survey of American social, economic, and political life in the age of Coolidge was instantly acclaimed, by Europeans and Americans alike, for its interpretative virtuosity, its clear delineation of what "oft was thought but ne'er so well expressed." The translators' title, however, was singularly misleading, for maturity was quite lacking in the America Siegfried envisaged: a welter of races in the melting-pot, with the older strains rather desperately striving to keep America Protestant and "Anglo-Saxon." The second volume, issued 27 years later, is not a revision, "but a completely new book." It lacks the clarity and concentration of the old, and while it contains many fine aperçus, it has received no such general admiration. The underlying outlook of the two volumes remains the same: in 1927 the chief contrast between Europe and America was that "between industrial mass production which absorbs the individual for its material conquests, as against the individual considered not merely as a means of production but as an independent ego." By 1954 there is no longer anything French intellectuals can do about it: "The classical tradition will survive, but the American will be a highly developed Homo faber rather than the Homo sapiens as conceived by Socrates."

4509. Tocqueville, Alexis C. H. M. C. de. De la démocratie en Amérique. Paris, Gosselin, 1835. 2 v. MB

4510. Tocqueville, Alexis C. H. M. C. de. Democracy in America. Translated by Henry Reeve. London, Saunders & Otley, 1835–40. 4 v. 9–21576 JK216.T7 1835

4511. Tocqueville, Alexis C. H. M. C. de. Democracy in America. Translated by Henry Reeve. Edited with notes, the translations rev. and in great part rewritten, and the additions made to the recent Paris editions now first translated by Francis Bowen. Cambridge, Mass., Sever & Francis, 1862. 2 v. 9–21574 JK216.T7 1862

4512. Tocqueville, Alexis C. H. M. C. de. Democracy in America. The Henry Reeve text as rev. by Francis Bowen, now further corr. and edited with introd., editorial notes, and bibliographies by Phillips Bradley; foreword by Harold J. Laski. New York, Knopf, 1945. 2 v. 45–3119 JK216.T7 1945

"Editions of Democracy in America": v. 2, p. 385–391. "A bibliography of items relating to Democracy in America and its author": v. 2, p. 392–401.

De Tocqueville traveled in the United States in 1831–32, studying American penitentiaries on behalf of Louis-Phillippe's Ministry of Justice. He used the opportunity to observe American democracy, not only as a system of government, but as the basic characteristic of an entire society, and so to forecast for Europeans the shape of things to come. Even the first part, which appeared in 1835, goes far beyond a mere study of government; it discusses the advantages which American society derives from a democratic government, the consequences of the unlimited power of the majority, the causes which mitigate it, and the factors which tend to perpetuate democracy. The second part, which followed in 1840, is primarily a sociological inquiry into the implications of democracy, in the spheres of intellect, feeling, and manners. Here he raises, for the first time, such enduring topics as the addiction of Americans to practical rather than to theoretical science, the taste for physical well-being in America, and the creation of an industrial aristocracy. Much is abstract, and much obsolete, but few books of social observation have remained so obstinately contemporary. Tocqueville's American visit is thoroughly documented in George W. Pierson, Tocqueville and Beaumont in America (New York, Oxford University Press, 1938. 852 p.).

4513. Years of the modern; an American appraisal. John W. Chase, ed. New York, Longmans, Green, 1949. 354 p. 49–11770 E169.1.Y4

CONTENTS.—Portrait of the American, by H. S. Commager.—American freedom: a method, by A. Barth.—The genius of the radical, by W. Hamilton.—The faith of a skeptic, by A. Johnson.—The saving remnant: a study of character, by D. Riesman.—The American economy: substance and myth, by J. K. Galbraith.—Education under crossfire, by P. Miller.—Of science and man, by H. Brown.—Americans and the war of ideas, by E. D. Canham.—Our armed forces; threat or guarantee, by C. T. Lanham.—Peace: our greatest challenge, by S. Welles.—An adventure in ideals, by N. Cousins.

A symposium of twelve interpretative essays, on selected but essential aspects of American life, each by an authority in his field chosen for his ability to relate it to the rest of life, and to phrase his convictions with clarity and force. "It might be called a creative inventory of our times."

B. Social History: Periods

4514. Allen, Frederick Lewis. The big change: America transforms itself, 1900–1950. New York, Harper, 1952. 308 p. 52–8455 E169.1.A4717

An optimistic interpretation of American social evolution during the first half of the 20th century. At the turn of the century the gulf between wealth and poverty was immense. Fifty years later the gap had been effectively narrowed, and there had also been a narrowing of the gap in ways of living, and the emergence of an "all-American standard" for the whole population. Business had found a new frontier in the purchasing power of the poor, and new-style corporations were concerned with the social benefits of their policies. In short, the United States was evolving, not toward socialism but past socialism.

4515. Billington, Ray A. The Protestant Crusade, 1800–1860; a study of the origins of American nativism. New York, Rinehart, 1952, ©1938. 514 p. 52–14020 BX1406.B5 1952

Bibliography: p. 445–504.

Charts a popular upheaval through the 30 years of its violence, and traces its roots back to the English Reformation and the defensive nationalism of the Elizabethan Age. Its manifestations are pursued in religious controversy and propaganda for mass consumption, and in overt violence; in political organization leading to the establishment of a separate party, the Know-Nothings; and in the transfer of hostility from the Catholic Church to the immigrants in general. Well-documented, it achieves a notable synthesis.

4516. Branch, Edward Douglas. The sentimental years, 1836–1860. New York, Appleton-Century, 1934. 432 p. 34–36082 E166.B82

A view of the various facets of a people's life during the quarter-century between Jackson and Lincoln, which becomes, the author thinks, "a social discussion of the first generation of the American middle class." Sentimentalism, his key to the period, he regards as "the immature phase of the Romantic Movement" in which reality is neither recognized nor judged. A lively panorama of such developments as feminism, the temperance movement, phrenology, spiritualism, and Perfectionism is presented, with the author intent on making the worst of everything.

4517. Bridenbaugh, Carl. Myths and realities; societies of the colonial South. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1952. 208 p. (The Walter Lynwood Fleming lectures in southern history, Louisiana State University) 52–13024 F212.B75

"Bibliographical note": p. [197]–200.

In 1776 there was no South or Southerners, but three or even four distinct social patterns, if the North Carolina one which the author mentions but does not describe be included. He analyzes the Chesapeake Society of Virginia and Maryland, where the planters had consistently lived beyond their means but furnished a distinguished leadership in political and religious liberalism; the Carolina Society where a genuinely prosperous "planting plutocracy arose on the basis of fortunes amassed in rice and indigo or in trade and sought to transform itself into an aristocracy after the Old World pattern"; and the Back Settlements, a land of "amazing antitheses" where conventions were thinner and a rough sort of equality was maintained, and which largely disappeared after the Revolution.

4518. Kraus, Michael. Intercolonial aspects of American culture on the eve of the revolution, with special reference to the northern towns. New York, Columbia University Press, 1928. 251 p. (Columbia University. Faculty of Political Science. Studies in history, economics and public law, no. 302) H31.C7, no. 302 28–23641 E163.K9

"List of authorities": p. 227–244.

A careful investigation of a field largely neglected or even denied existence in earlier histories: "the many influences, subtle or obvious, which were creating for the colonists a common fund of experience," and so preparing the intercolonial coöperation which took place after 1765. These factors, as apparent in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, are traced in the spheres of business, social relationships, religion, printing, education, art, medicine, and science. The special interest does not prevent a faithful mirroring of colonial society in general.

4519. Morris, Lloyd R. Not so long ago. New York, Random House, 1949. xviii, 504 p. 49–11404 E169.1.M83

Three agencies, the motion pictures, the automobile, and the radio, in their essential development and their social effects since 1896. "Probably never before in human history have three instruments of such incalculable social power been developed in so short a time. All three were perfected in the United States, within the memory of a generation still active today. Yet, together, they have completely transformed our society, civilization and culture." The author is particularly concerned to trace the effects of these inventions on manners and morals.

4520. Riegel, Robert E. Young America, 1830–1840. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1949. 435 p. 49–50089 E338.R5

Aims to present a cross-view of civilization in a transitional decade, excluding only the well-known political events of the age of Jackson. The great majority of the references are to strictly contemporary sources. "The effort has been to present a comprehensive view of how people earned their livings, how they amused themselves, and what were their thoughts and their ideals." There are chapters on business, the wage earner, woman, reformers, doctors, scientists, and sports. The United States, he concludes, was well embarked on the "revolutionary project of developing an entire people rather than only a few selected groups."

4521. Stewart, George R. American ways of life. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1954. 310 p. 54–7323 E169.1.S84

Realistic surveys of various aspects of American social life from 1607 to the present day, including such comparatively neglected topics as food, drink, clothing, sex, play, and holidays. "Personal names" is based on extensive research by the author in original records, and is a field which he has practically to himself. Originally prepared for an Athenian audience, much of the matter will be quite as enlightening to the author's own countrymen.

4522. Tyler, Alice (Felt) Freedom's ferment; phases of American social history to 1860. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1944. 608 p. A44–463 BR516.T9

Bibliography and notes: p. 551–589.

The religious and reform movements of the early Republic are here presented as twin manifestations of the desire to perfect human institutions. "The American reformer was the product of evangelical religion, which presented to every person the necessity for positive action to save his own soul, and dynamic frontier democracy, which was rooted deep in a belief in the worth of the individual. The result was a period of social ferment, sometimes a little mad, a little confused about directions, but always full of optimism, of growth, and of positive affirmation." Within this framework are straightforward accounts of Transcendentalism and Mormonism, religious and secular utopias, reform movements in education, penology, and welfare, and the temperance, peace, feminist, and anti-slavery crusades.

C. Social History: Topics

4523. Asbury, Herbert. The great illusion; an informal history of prohibition. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1950. 344 p.
50–10358 HV5089.A74

Develops the antecedents of Prohibition at reasonable length, and finds the crucial decision in the elections of 1916, well before wartime conditions prevailed or "our boys" were off in Europe. "At most the war may have hastened ratification by a few years . . . The American people wanted prohibition and were bound to try it; for more than a hundred years they had been indoctrinated with the idea that the destruction of the liquor traffic was the will of God and would provide the answers to most, if not all, of mankind's problems." Prohibition's fairest flower was an appalling moral collapse, the almost complete breakdown of law enforcement throughout the United States, and the taking over of the importation, manufacture, and distribution of illegal liquor by the underworld. An opinionated but well-documented record.

4524. Benson, Mary Sumner. Women in eighteenth-century America; a study of opinion and social usage. New York, Columbia University Press, 1935. 343 p. (Columbia University. Faculty of Political Science. Studies in history, economics and public law, no. 405) H31.1. C7, no. 405
35–6356 HQ1416.B4 1935a

"Bibliographical essay": p. 317–333.

A study of the status of women during a crucial century, primarily as set forth by theorists both in Europe and America, but also "as reflected in legislation, in the activities of women themselves, and in the comments of prominent Americans and travellers." Franklin and Rush were American innovators who wrote effectively in favor of wider opportunities and responsibilities for women, but the bulk of American writing reflected European ideas. In society itself, American conditions had modified the European tradition: upper class women had a greater part in economic activity; lower class women received better treatment. Definite advances were made during the century, but at its close the fear of radicalism was restricting further developments.

4525. Bestor, Arthur E. Backwoods utopias; the sectarian and Owenite phases of communitarian socialism in America, 1663–1829. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1950. 288 p.
50–6447 HX654.B4

At head of title: American Historical Association.

"Bibliographical essay": p. 245–268.

This work defines with a new precision the Communitarian point of view: it aimed to produce a small, voluntary, experimental community, which would accomplish an immediate root-and-branch reform, and provoke general imitation in the great world outside. The "holy commonwealths" are inventoried, beginning with Plockhoy's established on the Delaware in 1663; there were 34 of them prior to 1825, and 130 before the Civil War. Robert Owen's communitarian proposals made a wider appeal than any predecessors, because free of all narrow sectarian restrictions. But after Owen's complicated and expensive failure, the sectarian communities went prosperously on until the Civil War turned them into economic backwaters.

4526. Curti, Merle E. The roots of American loyalty. New York, Columbia University Press, 1946. 267 p. A46–2131 E169.1.C89

"Bibliographical note": p. [249]–256.

An examination of the sources and nature of American patroitism, particularly during the formative century which followed 1776. The subject is inseparable from the development of American nationalism, and the author emphasizes the manner in which particular groups, such as Negroes or immigrants from continental Europe, have developed a sense of participation in the national life. A great variety of printed sources have been ransacked for evidence—including the usually ignored Fourth of July oration, which, "for all its bombast and platitudes, epitomized the whole pattern of American patriotic thought and feeling."

4527. Habenstein, Robert W., and William M. Lamers. The history of American funeral directing. Milwaukee, Bulfin Printers, 1955. 636 p. 55–12014 GT3150.H3

This work, sponsored and copyrighted by the National Funeral Directors Association of the United States, devotes its first 200 pages to a description of the pre-Christian, medieval, and early English background, and then embarks upon an analysis of American developments as objective as it is massive. No grim detail is slighted: the evolution of the coffin (which became the casket in the course of the 1860's), of the hearse, and of the embalmer's art are concretely charted. The authors pause at intervals to reconstruct the typical funeral of the period. The later chapters emphasize the rise of the professional spirit, the differentiation of the embalmer from the funeral director, and the development of national associations in the field. There are numerous illustrations from contemporary sources, happily more often comic than gruesome. The volume is thoroughly documented. A related subject is presented in Charles L. Wallis' Stories on Stone; a Book of American Epitaphs (New York, Oxford University Press, 1954. 272 p.), a classified anthology of inscribed tombstones of originality, character, and humor, conscious or unconscious.

4528. Krout, John Allen. The origins of prohibition. New York, Knopf, 1925. 339 p. 25–16666 HV5089.K75

Bibliography: p. 305–328.

A social history of the "temperance movement," largely impelled by the power of evangelical Protestantism, down to 1851. The temperance societies which sprang up locally, and were federated in the American Society for the Promotion of Temperance in 1826, became racked by dissension over the consumption of wine and malt liquors. In the 1840's came the Washingtonian or total abstinence movement, but also a growing conviction that persuasion would never be adequate and must be replaced by legal coercion. The first result was the Maine Law of 1851. Chapter 10 surveys the huge literary output of the temperance reformers.

4529. Langdon, William Chauncy. Everyday things in American life. New York, Scribner, 1937–41. 2 v. 37–34608 E161.L32

Bibliography: v. [1], p. 335–340; v. [2], p. 383–384.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. 1607–1776.—v. 2. 1776–1876.

A simple and straightforward presentation of the development of material culture in America, with copious illustrations. The first volume, because of simpler subject matter, is a more unified production than the second. Transportation and manufacture, as well as domestic equipment, are included.

4530. Mann, Arthur. Yankee reformers in the urban age. Cambridge, Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1954. 314 p. 54–5020 HN80.B7M3

"Bibliographical note": p. [245]–248.

Boston is utilized as a case study in urban social-reform thinking during the two seminal decades, 1880–1900. While the author emphasizes that the reformers were only an articulate minority, and the mass of the citizens remained indifferent or hostile to liberalism, the book leaves rather an impression of a multiplicity of workers engaged in intense activity. Irish Catholic liberals, radical rabbis, Protestant social gospelers, academic dissidents, radical free-lance intellectuals, trade-union "collective individualists," and feminists contributed their strands of criticism and vision. John Boyle O'Reilly, Frank K. Foster, Frank Parsons, and Vida D. Scudder are among the leaders who "rejuvenated the languishing spirit of reform to meet the problems of the modern, urban-industrial culture."

4531. Rawson, Marion (Nicholl) Of the earth earthy; how our fathers dwelt upon and wooed the earth. New York, Dutton, 1937. 414 p. 37–23647 E161.R285

Suggestive and nostalgic essays on vanished forms of our material culture, with pen-and-ink illustrations by the author. Here one finds the forms and functions of those mysterious entities so frequently encountered in our early literature: the lime-kiln, the hop-yard, the malt-house, saltpetre beds, the shot-tower, the salt-yard, the seine loft and field, sail and rigging lofts, the ropewalk, the charcoal pits, the peat bog, and many others. The author has written a number of other books in similar vein, such as Forever the Farm (New York, Dutton, 1939. 380 p.), but none so original as this.

4532. Schlesinger, Arthur M. Learning how to behave, a historical study of American etiquette books. New York, Macmillan, 1946. 95 p. 46–8112 E161.S25

A concise survey of a copious branch of American writing. Domestic manuals replaced imported ones with the advent of Jacksonian democracy, and provided a means for social groups rising out of peasantry or poverty to assimilate an old heritage of social refinement. After the Civil War, an etiquette of heightened formal convention provided a special form of display for the new rich and their imitators.

This artificiality disappeared quite suddenly after World War I, leaving a vacuum which has been very imperfectly filled.

4533. Wecter, Dixon. The hero in America, a chronicle of hero-worship. New York, Scribner, 1941. 530 p. 41–5177 E176.W4
Bibliography: p. 493–513.
Aims "to look at a few of those great personalities in public life—Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, Lee, Theodore Roosevelt—from whom we have hewn our symbols of government, our ideas of what is most prizeworthy as 'American'." Equally significant as signposts of folk approval are minor heroes and hero types—Johnny Appleseed, the Unknown Soldier, Lindbergh. The author notes the absence of women, artists, scholars, and saints, as well as physicians and lawyers, from the heroic register.

4534. Wecter, Dixon. The saga of American society; a record of social aspiration, 1607–1937. New York, Scribner, 1937. 504 p. 37–15575 E161.W43
"A note on bibliography": p. 485–493.
A lively panorama of Society with a capital S, defined as "the overt manifestation of caste," active, conspicuous, articulate, specialized. A chapter is devoted to the assimilation of plutocracy to aristocracy, a vital problem of society since the rise of the great industrial fortunes. The Blue Books, and other means of limiting and recognizing the socially elect, are analyzed. Other topics are the gentleman's club, the predominance of women, the society page as a power and not merely a picture, and marriage with titled Europeans. The author is critical and often ironical, but never contemptuous or denunciatory.

D. Social Thought

4535. Barker, Charles A. Henry George. New York, Oxford University Press, 1955. 696 p. 55–6251 HB119.G4B3
To Prof. Barker, George's Progress and Poverty (1879) is "a moral Mount Whitney in American protest." While the book is primarily "a devastating attack on land monopoly," it is just as effective "against monopolism in any form, unless that monopolism be truly necessary in economics and truly public in administration." "No other book of the industrial age, dedicated to social reconstruction and conceived within the western traditions of Christianity and democracy, commanded so much attention." These convictions animate the author's immense researches in primary materials, and justify the extremely detailed narratives of the evolution of George's ideas, his participation in California and New York politics, and his campaigns of propagandism in the British Isles and at home. A final chapter deals with the "triple legacy of Georgism," in the single tax doctrine, in municipal reformism, and in "moral and intellectual Georgism." Readers desiring a more concise presentation of George's life and thought will find it in Albert J. Nock's Henry George, an Essay (New York, Morrow, 1939. 224 p.), and a treatment largely limited to ideas in George R. Geiger's The Philosophy of Henry George (New York, Macmillan, 1933. 581 p.).

4536. Bernard, Luther L., and Jessie Bernard. Origins of American sociology; the social science movement in the United States. New York, Crowell, 1943. 866 p. 43–10237 HM22.U5B4
The chief predecessor of the modern academic discipline, sociology, was the social science movement, originally transplanted to the United States as an ardent practical democratic idealism, but in the course of time losing most of its futile utopianism, acquiring greater logical and scientific discipline, and falling into line with respectable scientific method. The period covered is approximately 1840–90, and the major topics are the associationist phase, the influence of Comte, the systematizing phase (G. F. Holmes, James O'Donnell, R. S. Hamilton, and R. J. Wright), the nationalist or Carey School, the neo-classical school, and the American Social Science Association (1865–1909). "Social Science" itself is regarded as a transitional stage embodying residual theological and metaphysical elements. A cumbersome volume, but full of information for intellectual history.

4537. Chugerman, Samuel. Lester F. Ward, the American Aristotle; a summary and interpretation of his sociology. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1939. 591 p. 39–22560 HM22.U6W22
Bibliography: p. 559–560.

Ward (1841–1913) worked out his doctrines of sociology during the 40 years he was a government official in Washington, laboring for 14 years on the production of his first book, Dynamic Sociology (1883). Only during the last seven years of his life did he profess the subject at Brown University. Mr. Chugerman disposes of Ward's biography in one chapter, and devotes the rest of his book to a systematic presentation of Ward's ideas and his claims to greatness as a thinker. Ward was the Yankee Aristotle because, like the Greek thinker and also like Comte and Spencer in his own day, he worked out a massive synthesis of the sciences and the naturalistic philosophy of his age. To Ward evolution was the key to the cosmos, and sociology the crown of the sciences and the only sure instrument of progress through social reconstruction. American sociology has ever since retained the naturalistic and reformist stamp which Ward gave to it.

4538. Dorfman, Joseph. Thorstein Veblen and his America. New York, Viking Press, 1934. 556 p. 34–39873 HB119.V4D6

"Bibliography of Thorstein Veblen": p. 519–524.

Veblen (1857–1929), the son of Norwegian immigrants, was an economist whose very original views soon led him to transcend the orthodox boundaries of his subject and make striking and controversial contributions to social theory. This detailed biography utilizes the lecture-notes taken by his students and includes summaries of his principal writings, among which The Theory of the Leisure Class (New York, Macmillan, 1899. 400 p.) and The Theory of Business Enterprise (New York, Scribner, 1904. 400 p.) are the best known.

4539. Jandy, Edward C. Charles Horton Cooley, his life and his social theory. New York, Dryden Press, 1942. 319 p. 42–22102 HM22.U6C65

Bibliography: p. 270–281.

Cooley (1864–1929) was professor of sociology at the University of Michigan and one of the founders of American academic sociology, and in particular of social psychology. The author of this Michigan dissertation devotes his first two chapters to Cooley's life, and the remaining four to an exposition of his social theory. In summarizing, the author declares that while Cooley's abstract and philosophical approach, his tendency to generalize on the basis of scant data, and his "ethico-religionism" are things of the past, his view of "the interdependent nature of the individual and society," his emphasis on public opinion, and his analyses of social institutions pervade more recent literature, and assure him an enduring place in the history of sociology.

4540. Odum, Howard W., ed. American masters of social science; an approach to the study of the social sciences through a neglected field of biography. New York, Holt, 1927. 411 p. 27–8909 HM22.U6O4

Contents.—Pioneers and masters of social science, by H. W. Odum.—John William Burgess, by W. R. Shepherd.—Lester Frank Ward, by J. Q. Dealey.—Herbert B. Adams, by J. M. Vincent.—William Archibald Dunning, by C. E. Merriam.—Albion Woodbury Small, by E. C. Hayes.—Franklin Henry Giddings, by J. L. Gillin.—Thorstein Veblen, by P. T. Homan.—Frederick Jackson Turner, by C. Becker.—James Harvey Robinson, by H. E. Barnes.

Sketches of nine "masters," who include political scientists, historians, and economists as well as sociologists, are presented primarily as "an approach to teaching and research in the social sciences." The sketches present the subject's outlook and ideas as well as the facts of his life. While the careers of these men coincided with the periods during which their disciplines achieved autonomy in American higher education, the editor emphasizes their versatility, enabling them to range "over a broad field of social interest" and social statecraft.

4541. Odum, Howard W. American sociology; the story of sociology in the United States through 1950. New York, Longmans, Green, 1951. 501 p. 51–12390 HM22.U5O4 1951

A presentation of the professional and organizational aspects of its subject. The largest section is concerned with the careers and work of the successive presidents of the American Sociological Society, from Lester F. Ward in 1906–07, to Leonard Cottrell, the 40th, in 1950. The next largest lists, with some commentary of a general kind, college texts in sociology since 1883, both general and special. Chapter 23 describes American sociological journals and their editors. The concluding chapters, "Toward inventory," discuss a few trends but attempt no large synthesis or judgment. Rather a compendium of serviceable information than a definitive history of its subject.

4542. Page, Charles Hunt. Class and American sociology; from Ward to Ross. New York, Dial Press, 1940. 319 p. 40–8685 HM22.U5P3 1940a

Issued also as thesis (Ph. D.) Columbia University.

Contents.—The fathers and their times.—Lester Frank Ward.—William Graham Sumner.—Albion Woodbury Small.—Franklin Henry Giddings.—Charles Horton Cooley.—Edward Alsworth Ross.—

Conclusion.—Notes and bibliography (p. [255]–312).

A study of the concept of class in the work of six of the "fathers" of American sociology. All were concerned with the role of class forces in American life; after their day American sociology turned to detailed empirical research in problem areas of narrower scope. The present concern with class, not merely as a socio-economic aggregate, but as a socio-psychological phenomenon rooted in personal attitudes, is a return to their viewpoint. But "they were all, in one way or another, impressed by the anti-class elements of American democracy," and by the emphasis of our middle class "upon the common elements of a society and its negation of all separating barriers."

4543. Ross, Edward Alsworth. Seventy years of it; an autobiography. New York, Appleton-Century, 1936. 341 p.
36-27416 HM22.U6R6

Ross (1866–1951) after being expelled for his opinions from Stanford University in 1900, settled down to a long teaching career at the University of Wisconsin. He was one of the founders of our academic sociology, but little of his formal doctrine appears here; rather does it exhibit him in the role of stormy petrel. An uncompromising democrat, he fearlessly spoke out against all tendencies which might undermine the roots of American society in liberty and equality. His reminiscences are miscellaneous, and often naively bumptious, but they reflect his wide acquaintance with other societies, his indifference to fashionable currents of opinion, and his ability to penetrate to the essence of social tendencies.

4544. Starr, Harris E. William Graham Sumner. New York, Holt, 1925. 557 p.
25-11703 H59.S8S7

Sumner (1840–1910), the most stalwartly independent of all American social scientists, had a remarkably varied career, in the course of which his views altered from orthodox Congregationalism through classical economic doctrine to ethnological relativism. At all stages his complete honesty, clear expression, and uncompromising assertion made him a formidable factor in current discussion at various levels. This admiring but objective biography quotes at length from his correspondence and digests his doctrines in their several subjects and stages.

4545. White, Morton G. Social thought in America, the revolt against formalism. New York, Viking Press, 1949. 260 p.
49-48242 H53.U5W5

The subtitle defines the book's subject: the style of thinking which dominated America for almost half a century, an intellectual pattern compounded of pragmatism, institutionalism, behaviorism, legal realism, and economic determinism. Its major representatives were Justice O. W. Holmes, Thorstein Veblen, John Dewey, James Harvey Robinson, and Charles A. Beard. Their common ground was the rejection of abstractionism in favor of historicism and cultural organicism, although their following came rather from their apparent contribution to the advent of a more rational society. The treatment is critical as well as expository, but the balance is favorable: in spite of all their fuzziness and lack of logic, "their example should serve to encourage those social scientists who are more interested in achieving a good society than in measuring attitudes toward toothpaste."

E. General Sociology; Social Psychology

4546. Barnett, James H. The American Christmas; a study in national culture. New York, Macmillan, 1954. 173 p. 54-12566 GT4985.B3

According to the author, this "is a pioneer effort in the sociological study of American holidays," which seeks "to show how the past and the present, the religious and the secular, are fused in the pattern of the national festival so that it draws vitality from many and varied sources." Historically, this one is a recent development, its legal recognition by all the states and territories taking place between 1836 and 1890. Its intensive commercial exploitation falls after 1920. The social role of Santa Claus and the social content of Christmas art are developed. Christmas "has become a diffuse, popular cult," "nourished by the tie of family life, by affection for children, by a willingness to aid the needy, and even by the profit-seeking activities of modern business." In it even the secular-minded can readily participate.

4547. Caplow, Theodore. The sociology of work. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1954. 330 p. 54-8208 HM211.C3

The author defines his subject as "the study of those social roles which arise from the classification of men by the work they do," and proceeds upon the assumption that a complex society like the United States "is maintained by the mutual dependence of highly specialized and differentiated occupational groups." While he aims at generalized conclusions, his exposition depends upon American subject matter, with only an occasional introduction of foreign situations for contrast. His book, he says, is primarily an essay on the division of labor, and he has much to say concerning the measurement of occupational status, vertical and other kinds of mobility, occupational institutions, and occupational status. In the United States today, he observes, "poverty has come to mean the absence of status symbols rather than hunger and physical misery." This and many comparable insights add up to a penetrating exposition of the nature of jobs and of job-holding in present-day America, viewed as social rather than merely economic facts.

4548. Chapin, Francis Stuart. Contemporary American institutions; a sociological analysis. New York, Harper, 1935. 423 p. 35–11712 HN57.C5

Prof. Chapin's analysis proceeds from the principle that "social institutions are essentially psychological phenomena that consist of a configuration of segments of the behaviors of individuals." On this basis he describes the political and business institutions of the local community, the family, the school, the Protestant church in an urban environment, social welfare agencies, and even the New Deal. He gives many tables and diagrams illustrative of social situations. He concludes with various theories and projects of social measurement, typical of the direction sociological investigation was about to take, and indicating why his would be the last general survey of the kind.

4549. Cuber, John F., and William F. Kenkel. Social stratification in the United States. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1954. 359 p. 54–10606 HT609.C8

The authors attempt to supply a practical textbook for a field hitherto without one, although research output within it has been immense. "Part I is a semantic, theoretical, and methodological orientation to stratification literature." Part II consists of critical analyses of eight important field studies of social stratification in America, with special attention to the validity of the methods employed in each. Part III contains both theoretical and specific conclusions; there are, for instance, varying stratification systems in various American communities, rather than a single all-embracing system, and individuals have multiple statuses rather than a single well-defined one. In a final evaluation of the American stratification system, the authors discuss four often-heard negative judgments, and present four favorable factors, such as high vertical mobility, and rectification of some of the inequities in life-chances, but most of their conclusions remain quite tentative.

4550. Davis, Kingsley, ed. Modern American society; readings in the problems of order and change [by] Kingsley Davis, Harry C. Bredemeier [and] Marion J. Levy, Jr. New York, Rinehart, 1949. 734 p. 49–5542 HN57.D3

"All the materials in the book are designed to help the student understand what gives order and disorder, unity and disunity, to our society as a whole." The most convenient approach to this problem the editors find "in the relation between our system of values as it is expressed in the American ethos and as it is reflected in the actual functioning of our society." The selections from books and periodicals pursue those themes under the following headings: "The New Urban Environment", "The Economic Framework", "Our Class System", "Race Versus Democracy", "Education and Public Opinion", "The Separation of Church and Society", "Recreation: Leisure and Escape", "Modern Marriage and the Family".

4551. Ebersole, Luke E. American society, an introductory analysis. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1955. 510 p. 55–7274 HN57.E2

Designed for courses in introductory sociology and general social science, this is a much simpler treatment than Williams' (no. 4558), with far less employment of technical jargon. "It is hoped that it will be useful also in courses in the field of American studies." The main divisions are "People," "Communities," "Classes," and "Institutions." The first deals with population, immigration, and minorities. "Classes" discusses social stratification, identifying six social classes in the United States, and social mobility. Family, economic, governmental, educational, and religious institutions are described. A final chapter identifies ten processes which have been changing our society: invention, industrialization, urbanization, centralization, specialization, bureaucratization, stratification, mobility, secularization, and assimilation.

4552. Miller, Delbert C., and William H. Form. Industrial sociology; an introduction to the sociology of work relations. New York, Harper, 1951. 896 p. 51–9367 HD6961.M55

A large scale textbook which "seeks to introduce new research, integrate available materials, and provide a frame of reference for the study of work relations." In the authors' view, industrial sociology is a relatively new discipline based upon the recent "rediscovery that working cannot be divorced from living. It is now known that production, profit, and industrial peace depend in large measure on the recognition that industry is a complex of interacting groups and individuals." The largest sections of the book are devoted to the social organization of the work plant or factory, and the social adjustment of the worker through successive periods of his life, from the family to retirement. A final section is devoted to more general considerations on the interdependence of industry and community, and of industry and society.

4553. Mills, Charles Wright. White collar; the American middle classes. New York, Oxford University Press, 1951. xx, 378 p.
51–5298 HT690.U6M5

Bibliographical references included in "Acknowledgments and sources" (p. 355–363).

The "new middle class," made up of managers, salaried professionals, salespeople, and office workers, has grown up beside the older middle class of farmers, businessmen, and free professionals, and now outnumbers it by a substantial margin. This untechnical and often rather arbitrary book has the field to itself in seeking to characterize the outlook and the dilemmas of its several worlds. The business managers have become cogs in a business machinery that has routinized greed. Bureaucracy and commercialization are spreading through the professional world. In the great salesroom, "it is the salesmen who have put their personalities up for sale." In "the enormous file," the work has been "standardized for interchangeable, quickly replaceable clerks."

4554. Odegard, Peter H. The American public mind. New York, Columbia University Press, 1930. 308 p. 30–27934 E169.1.O23

Bibliography: p. 280–291.

"Why do we behave like Americans? Whence come our ideas and ideals?" A straightforward account of American public opinion as of its date, as influenced by family, church and school, the press, political and special interest propaganda, and the popular arts. The author hardly answers his own questions, but presents a lively view of surface phenomena.

4555. Riesman, David. The lonely crowd; a study of the changing American character. In collaboration with Reuel Denney and Nathan Glazer. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1950. xvii, 386 p. (Studies in national policy, 3)
50–9967 BF755.A5R5

4556. Riesman, David. Faces in the crowd; individual studies in character and politics. In collaboration with Nathan Glazer. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1952. 751 p. (Studies in national policy, 4) 52–5357 BF818.R5

Highly original studies in American social psychology, which attempt to isolate and illustrate some recent changes of high significance. As the United States has passed from a growing population to a more stationary one with lower birth and death rates, the older patterns of individual character, tradition-directed or inner-directed, have increasingly yielded to the other-directed pattern. This type, whose conformity rests on "sensitive attention to the expectations of contemporaries," pursues a fluctuating series of short-run goals and tends to live in a world largely made up of interpersonal relations. The habits of thought and action of the creators and brokers of prestige receive wide imitation. Varying attitudes in politics, work, and play are elaborated. The sequel presents 20 individual portraits, based on interviews some of which are presented in full. They seek to answer: "what sort of person is this, in terms of his character; how is his conformity secured, what is his political style—that is, how does he handle the political world as part of his total life-orientation?"

4557. Warner, William Lloyd. Democracy in Jonesville; a study in quality and inequality. New York, Harper, 1949. xviii, 313 p.
49–10212 HN57.W3

A study of social classes and social mobility in a small Illinois town [actually Morris, Grundy County] used as a laboratory for studying the social structure governing American capitalism. The emphasis is on the factors determining the rise and fall of families in the social scale. These elements are studied against the varying backgrounds of childhood, the mill, local associations and social clubs, the churches, the Norwegians as a distinct group, the high school, and party politics. The conclusion is that the American Dream is one thing, and the complexities of status another, but that without the Dream social mobility would stiffen into rigidity.

4558. Williams, Robin M. American society; a sociological interpretation. New York, Knopf, 1951. xiii, 545 p.
51–11055 HN57.W55

A pioneer attempt to obtain a systematic view of the total American social structure, which applies the basic concepts and approaches of sociology to kinship and the family, to social stratification, and to economic, political, educational and religious institutions. The results are cautiously and tentatively rather than dogmatically stated. Among the general characteristics of social organization in the United States are these: a relatively slight development of stable groups of Gemeinschaft character, an enormous proliferation of formally organized special-interest associations, and an increasingly strategic position of large-scale centralized organizations in the total structure. "Major value-orientations in America" are spelled out at length, from " 'achievement' and 'success' " through "material comfort" to "racism and related group-superiority themes."

677676 O–63–39

F. The Family

4559. Bossard, James H. S. The sociology of child development. Rev. ed. New York, Harper, 1954. 788 p. 53-9411 HQ781.B67 1954

The chief emphasis of this book is upon "the social situations in which children live and grow from infancy to maturity." While the primary interest is in child behavior, the social context to which it is related is regularly American. There are chapters on interaction among the siblings, the bilingual child, the role of the guest, the child and the class structure, growing out of the family, and children who reject their parents. The final section presents the changing status of childhood: in America children "are viewed in terms of equality with other members of the family and recognized as coequal personalities in the emerging democracy of the family."

4560. Calhoun, Arthur W. A social history of the American family from colonial times to the present. New York, Barnes & Noble, 1945. 3 v. in 1. 45-3936 HQ535.C23

"Copyright, 1917[-19] . . . Reprinted 1945."

Bibliography at end of each volume.

CONTENTS.—1. Colonial period.—2. From independence through the Civil War.—3. Since the Civil War.

Remains, after four decades, considerably the most detailed historical presentation of sex and family life in the United States. In substance it consists of extracts from contemporary sources strung together on a loose framework by a conventional and not too penetrating commentary. Since these subjects were discussed by our fathers in tones usually alarmist, and lapses from the writers' standards were noted rather than the contrary, the book is often a better guide to past opinion than to past fact.

4561. Cavan, Ruth (Shonle) The American family. New York, Crowell, 1953. 658 p. 53-5389 HQ535.C33

"Supersedes the author's . . . The Family [1942]."

A college text written from the socio-psychological point of view, and including charts and other quantitative matter. Part I presents the general issues and considers the family in relation to rural life, migration, and urbanism. Part II studies the family in relation to social classes and social mobility. Part III contains a detailed psychological treatment from adolescence to old age, with special attention to dating, sex expression, adjustment in marriage, and divorce. The author concludes that the process of family disintegration has passed its climax, and that a new reintegration of the family with other institutions has begun to take place.

4562. Furnas, Joseph C. How America lives. New York, Holt, 1941. 372 p. 41-51597 HN57.F87

First published in the Ladies Home Journal.

The patterns of life and the budgets of 16 American families, ranging from wealthy industrialists to persons on relief or colored sharecroppers in Mississippi. The treatment is marked by journalistic slickness and some optimism, but is nevertheless a very concrete sampling of actual family life in its economic context just before World War II. There are review chapters on American housekeeping, diet, fashion, "beauty culture," housing, and home decoration.

4563. Groves, Ernest R. The American woman; the feminine side of a masculine civilization. Rev. and enl. ed. New York, Emerson Books, 1944. 465 p. 44-2372 HQ1410.G73 1944

Regarding woman, from the scant attention she gets in American historical writing, as the forgotten sex, the author traces woman's advance in status in a setting of masculine dominance. He aims to follow the general movement that brought the average woman closer to the privileges and resources of men, rather than to catalogue the noted women of the past. This has come about in two related currents: an increasing encroachment upon masculine special privileges, led by aggressive and gifted women leaders, and the momentum of a material and intellectual progress that is making the equality of men and women more natural.

4564. Hollingshead, August de B. Elmtown's youth, the impact of social classes on adolescents. New York, Wiley, 1949. 480 p.
49–3279 HQ796.H65

"This study is one of a series made under the auspices of the Committee on Human Development of the University of Chicago."

A study of 735 adolescent boys and girls in a Middle Western Corn Belt community, in order to analyze the way its social system organizes and controls the social behavior of young people reared in it. The social structure is graded into five classes, and the different attitudes and behavior which each class displays are traced in high school life, in cliques and dates, religion, jobs, and recreation. The "withdrawees" who have left school before completing its work, are separately studied. The conclusion indicates that our class system, which revolves about the gospel of success and escapes legal regulation because it is extra-legal, "is far more vital as a social force in our society than the American creed."

4665. Kinsey, Alfred C. Sexual behavior in the human male [by] Alfred C. Kinsey, Wardell B. Pomeroy [and] Clyde E. Martin. Philadelphia, Saunders, 1948. xv, 804 p.
48–5195 HQ18.U5K5

"Based on surveys made by members of the staff of Indiana University, and supported by the National Research Council's Committee for Research on Problems of Sex by means of funds contributed by the Medical Division of the Rockefeller Foundation."

Bibliography: p. 766–787.

4566. Kinsey, Alfred C., and others. Sexual behavior in the human female, by the staff of the Institute for Sex Research, Indiana University. Philadelphia, Saunders, 1953. xxx, 842 p.
53–11127 HQ18.U516

Bibliography: p. 763–810.

Formally, Dr. Kinsey and his associates' statistical inquiry into the overt sexual activity of a sample of the whole American population is a study in human biology and so ineligible for this bibliography. Actually it furnishes much the largest body of concrete evidence concerning actual patterns of sex behavior at various social levels, in various environments, and at different ages, and is therefore a contribution to the description of American society.

4567. Kyrk, Hazel. The family in the American economy. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1953. xvii, 407 p. 53–12266 HQ535.K9

Bibliography: p. 395–398.

The family is also an economic unit, and this book analyzes the economic position of American families in terms of incomes, prices, and standards of living. Families are regarded, not as fixed units, but as groups of individuals living through life-spans during which they will have differing economic characteristics. Among the subjects discussed are the components of family income, contributors and claimants to such income, amount and adequacy of family incomes, provision for the future through saving and insurance, the economic position of homekeeping women, the cost of living, and the standard of living.

4568. Landis, Paul H. Adolescence and youth; the process of maturing. 2d ed. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1952. 461 p.
52–6542 HQ796.L27 1952

A study of the gap between childhood and adulthood which emphasizes "the infringement of the social processes on the developing organism" and treats adolescence "as a dynamic process which leads the growing organism through a molding series of social experiences," all in an American context. After more general considerations concerning the personality-forming process, the author analyzes what he takes to be the three critical phases of adjustment: attaining moral maturity, the transition to marital adulthood, and the struggle for economic adulthood. The concluding part studies the school as the major agency of social adjustment. The volume is liberally supplied with tables, graphs, and diagrams. The same author's Understanding Teen-Agers (New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1955. 246 p.) presents much the same material in abbreviated and more readable form.

4569. Lumpkin, Katharine Du Pre, and Dorothy (Wolff) Douglas. Child workers in America. New York, McBride, 1937. 321 p.
37–27309 HD6250.U3L85

Bibliography: p. 307–313.

The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 effected a major improvement in the field of child labor, and by the 1950's its worst abuses had largely disappeared. The present work retains historical value as a summary of a problem of long standing just before the turn of the tide, when much effort expended on reform seemed strangely futile. The nature of the constant pressures toward child exploitation, as well as the attitudes which made it possible, are here rather bitterly described together with efforts at amelioration through an entire century.

4570. Mudd, Emily (Hartshorne) The practice of marriage counseling. New York, Association Press, 1951. xix, 336 p.
A51-7952 HQ728.M83
Bibliography: p. 231-249.
Marriage counseling is a development of the last quarter-century which has enlisted a variety of professional skill channeled through a growing number of national and local organizations. The author, who has been director of the Marriage Council of Philadelphia since its establishment in 1932, discusses the objectives of these services, and gives sample cases, including both those in which counseling has helped and those in which it has failed. Appendix B is a series of reports from functioning services on their operations.

4571. Sirjamaki, John. The American family in the twentieth century. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. 227 p. (The Library of Congress series in American civilization)
53-6035 HQ535.S5
A condensed, integrated, and lucid essay which interprets the findings of social scientists for general readers. The present American family "is a small nuclear family centered largely upon its immediate members, settled in independent residence, dissociated from all but closely connected relatives, and lasting only through the adult years of its spouses and often not even so long." Its isolation from its larger kin group makes it more easily broken, but spouses work harder at their marriages because they know they have to. The concern for individualization of family members is large; wives have been brought near to legal parity, and children endowed with privileges. It is the family that best serves Americans' needs, and probably the one they want.

4572. Truxal, Andrew G., and Francis E. Merrill. Marriage and the family in American culture. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1953. 587 p.
53-10245 HQ536.T68
A standard college text in which the presentation of the family from the biological, psychological, and social aspects is regularly related to American conditions of today. The present edition has been extensively revised to include new materials derived from the scientific study of courtship and of personality. The sixth and final part, "The Dynamics of the Family," is largely concerned with the disintegrative tendencies of recent years, against which positive measures to stabilize and reorganize the family, such as marriage counseling and family life agencies, have been relatively ineffective.

4573. Wattenberg, William W. The adolescent years. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1955. 510 p.
55-2109 HQ796.W32
A textbook which surveys the physical and psychological phenomena of adolescence in their social setting—ostensibly in that of Western Culture but practically in that of the United States. The author aims to help the reader "deal more understandingly with young people and with the adolescent in himself and in every adult he knows." "Problem areas" isolated in the third section include sex, social relationships, ideals, concepts of self, power and mastery, vocational choices, and personality troubles. It relies less on quantitative and more on case history materials than Landis (no. 4568).

G. Communities: General

4574. Ferguson, Charles W. Fifty million brothers; a panorama of American lodges and clubs. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1937. 389 p.
37-1762 HS61.F4
"Selected list of sources": p. 361-380.
Popular and very sketchy, but the only book which brings into one view such diverse associational phenomena as the Masons, college fraternities, the Knights of Pythias, women's clubs, the "Fascist shirts" of the 1930's, chambers of commerce, Negro lodges, the D. A. R., the Elks, the Eastern Star, and many others. The author believes that these clubs and secret orders "have grown and multiplied simply because they provided the only natural basis for normal group life in a country historically deprived of it."

4575. Hillman, Arthur. Community organization and planning. New York, Macmillan, 1950. xviii, 378 p.
50-5240 HV40.H62
"The methods by which communities deliberately change their structure and way of life is the theme of this book." The planning of communities should develop as a rational process and a conscious art.

The major goal of planning is to substitute orderly processes of problem-solving for the remnants of anarchy in modern societies. Organized action in community life may proceed through community centers and community councils. Functional areas in which community planning takes place include services to children and youth, social work, recreation programs, and race-relations programs. The relationship between policymaking and administration, and between national and local planning, are considered.

4576. Kinneman, John A. The community in American society. New York, Crofts, 1947. 450 p. 47–5625 HM131.K5

Aims to arrive at the common elements in both rural and urban communities, and to show their interrelations and interdependence. Special attention is given to the relatively unexplored field of small but independent metropolitan centers, of from 25,000 to 100,000 population. Community is regarded as essentially a socio-psychic phenomenon, an expression of consciousness of kind or attachments to certain basic interests, and provides the web of consciousness by which institutions function. As criteria of community relationships, newspaper circulation and hospitalization are given special consideration. Later chapters discuss leadership, change, conflict, and crises in the community.

4577. Lundberg, George A., Mirra Komarovsky, and Mary Alice McInerny. Leisure: a suburban study. New York, Columbia University Press, 1934. 396 p. 34–27255 HN79.N4L9

"Selected bibliography": p. [387]–389.

A study of the employment of leisure time in Westchester County, N. Y., a suburban area which enjoys "a higher plane of living than has hitherto [1934] been approached in any time or place." 2,460 individuals supplied diaries covering some 4,460 days, from which it appeared that the average leisure hours per diem for the entire group was 7.4. The exact time spent by various classes in various activities is worked out: the average was 108 minutes for eating, 90 for visiting, 57 for reading, etc. The authors do not find that suburbia makes a very constructive use of recreation, and wish local government to provide facilities, opportunities, and leadership for more rewarding activities.

4578. Marden, Charles F. Rotary and its brothers; an analysis and interpretation of the men's service club. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1935. 178 p. 35–22591 HF5001.A2M3 1935a

This Columbia dissertation studies the luncheon clubs of business executives and professional men which call themselves service clubs and are joined in loose national or international federations—Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions' Clubs, etc. Their welfare activities are found to be of limited scope, and personal and sporadic in nature, while little concrete evidence has appeared for their claim to be active in elevating the ethical level of business enterprise. The clubs are interpreted as new bases of association, sought after the decline of traditional ones, among the professional and business class, and especially as a means of dignifying the dominant position of the business class.

H. Communities: Rural

4579. Baker, Oliver E., Ralph Borsodi, and Milburn L. Wilson. Agriculture in modern life. New York, Harper, 1939. 303 p. 39–27962 HD1761.B25

Preface signed: Baker Brownell, supervising editor.

This coöperative work grew out of a conference on distributive society and the possibilities of decentralization held at Northwestern University in 1938. Mr. Baker, whose section on "Our Rural People" is much the largest, is concerned with rural poverty, the drift of farm youth and wealth to the cities, and the difference between rural and urban birth rates. Mr. Borsodi offers "A Plan for Rural Life," and Mr. Wilson discusses "Science and Folklore in Rural Life." All are concerned with the salvage of the independent farm as a natural and self-sufficient way of life stable enough "to balance against the pressures of insecurity and dependency and statism and confusion that make this age so troubled."

4580. Burchfield, Laverne. Our rural communities, a guidebook to published materials on rural problems. Chicago, Public Administration Service, 1947. 201 p. 47–3889 HT421.B78

"General publications on rural affairs": p. 199–201.

Aims to furnish those "interested in the problems of rural America with brief factual statements about major areas of rural life and annotated bibliographies where they may gather additional information. Specialists will find somewhat elementary the statements in sections concerned with their own specialties." Each chapter consists, after the initial "statement," of a summary of the literature under subtopics, followed by a list of precise references in alphabetical order. The main topics include schools, the Agricultural Extension Service, library service, the church, medical care and health services, welfare services, housing, recreation, and community organization.

4581. Kolb, John H., and Edmund de S. Brunner. A study of rural society. 4th ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [1952] 532 p.
52–10515 HT421.K62 1952

A textbook on contemporary American rural society woven about the theme of the growing interdependence in modern society—country and town, agriculture and industry, American and other societies. It is organized into four main parts, on population, the agrarian basis of rural society, group relations, and social institutions—established and recognized ways of getting things done. There are numerous tables, graphs, charts, and diagrams. Chapters are devoted to rural communities, rural interest groups and classes, and rural-urban relationships. Foreign instances are introduced for comparison.

4582. Nelson, Lowry. American farm life. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1954. 192 p. (The Library of Congress series in American civilization) 54–9332 HN57.N46

A characterization of farm life in the United States for foreigners and city-dwellers, which emphasizes the increasing approximation of rural to urban living, and the consequent interdependence of these unequal segments of society. "The technological frontier" is the principal element of change: the permeation of farm life by machinery, agricultural research, and improved farm management, has profoundly affected rural life in its political, economic, and social aspects, and turned the "new farmer" into a kind of suburbanite.

4583. Rural life in the United States, by Carl C. Taylor [and others] New York, Knopf, 1949. xviii, 549, xii p. 49–7411 HT421.R8
Bibliography: p. 535–549.

Eight members of the U. S. Bureau of Agricultural Economics have combined to write a textbook in general rural sociology which deals with all important structural and functional aspects of rural society, all major geographic areas of the country, and all major problems of rural life. Part 2, on rural organization, has separate treatments of the home and family, education, religion, local government, health, welfare, and recreation and art. Part 3, on rural people, deals with population, occupational patterns, standards of living, and the special problems of landowners, tenants, and laborers. "Part 4 is unique in a book on rural sociology because it discusses seven different type-farming areas of the United States as if each were a cultural region," and "could well be considered a start toward the development of the cultural anthropology of American rural life."

4584. Smith, Thomas Lynn. The sociology of rural life. 3d ed. New York, Harper, 1953. 680 p. 53–5573 HT421.S55 1953

Attempts to assemble in a single volume, suitable for college sophomores, the essential facts and basic principles derived from the application of scientific method in the study of rural social relationships, with nearly all the subject matter drawn from the United States. The main topics are the rural population, rural social organization, and social processes in rural society. The processes analyzed and illustrated are competition and conflict, coöperation, accommodation, assimilation, acculturation, and social mobility. The most significant new factor is the improvement of communications by the telephone, telegraph, radio, television, automobile, and good roads, so that rural people are now in constant contact with one another and with townsfolk and city people, and the isolation and lagging change of rural communities are largely overcome. Abundantly illustrated with maps, photographs, charts, and tables.

4585. [Withers, Carl] Plainville, U. S. A. [by] James West [pseud.] New York, Columbia University Press, 1945. xv, 238 p.
A45–1863 HN57.W58

A cultural-anthropology approach to the life of a small and very rural Missouri town, which preserves a real sense of the human beings dealt with, and avoids both condescension and partisanship. The prevailing background is the persistent poverty which haunts such communities. The author's major interest is in discriminating the social classes and working out their attitudes toward each other. A chapter, "From Cradle to Grave," works out the typical life pattern of average Plainville people. There is much attention to the changes brought about by urban industrialism, and its draining off of Plainville's young people.

I. Communities: Urban

4586. Carr, Lowell Juilliard, and James Edson Stermer. Willow Run; a study of industrialization and cultural inadequacy. New York, Harper, 1952. xxii, 406 p.
51–11892 HN80.W5C3
Bibliography: p. 395–399.
In a mushrooming wartime community between Detroit and Ann Arbor the new Ford bomber plant produced 8,685 planes and an acute housing crisis. The authors seek to place responsibility for the latter, after thoroughly documenting the social consequences of deficient housing, and reject the devil theory, which blames the Ford Company, and the individual incompetence theory. Their solution blames gaps or blind spots in our industrial culture itself, such as the lack of any accepted method for defining a social community crisis, and of any accepted procedures for "structuring overall coöperation" in such a crisis. In short, "we have not yet learned how to live with social change."

4587. Hallenbeck, Wilbur C. American urban communities. New York, Harper, 1951. 617 p. 51–11920 HT123.H3
A rounded text on American urban sociology which has many quantitative illustrations but keeps them subordinate to the general exposition of the subject. It seeks to demonstrate that cities are the focal points in the dynamics of American society, and that rapid change demands a high degree of adaptability, which cities have failed to attain. Their hope lies in a more comprehensive planning, scientific and democratic in basis and purpose. "The Form and Structure of Cities," "Organized Life in Cities," and "Patterns of Urban Structure" form the major divisions of the text.

4588. Harrison, Shelby Millard. Social conditions in an American city; a summary of the findings of the Springfield survey. New York, Russell Sage Foundation, 1920. 439 p.
20–21201 HN80.S7S7
A condensation of one of the best-known examples of the older type of social survey, that of the capital of Illinois conducted in 1914 under the direction of the Department of Surveys and Exhibits, Russell Sage Foundation. Separate reports in nine fields—public schools, care of mental defectives, insane and alcoholics, recreation, housing, charities, industrial conditions, public health, the correctional system, and city and county administration—were published from 1914; these were eventually collected in two volumes, and with the present one as a third, published as The Springfield Survey (New York, Russell Sage Foundation, 1918–20. 3 v.). The age of the materials constitute them a suggestive guide to the spheres in which extraordinary improvement has taken place in the last four decades, and to those other spheres in which comparatively little progress can be assumed.

4589. Havighurst, Robert J., and Hugh Gerthon Morgan. The social history of a war-boom community. New York, Longmans, Green, 1951. xix, 356 p. 51–11494 HN80.S545H3
The authors tell what happened to the people and institutions of Seneca, Ill., a small town on the Illinois River, when it acquired a shipyard for LST vessels and saw its residents increase from 1,235 to 6,600 between 1942 and 1944. They hope thereby to study the adaptation of social institutions to rapid social change, the adaptation of people to new conditions of living, and the influence of a crisis on the long-time history of a community, and to record one significant bit of American life during wartime. Relations between old and new residents were kept to a minimum, temporary prosperity brought no change in the local business structure, and Seneca emerged from the war boom relatively unchanged, with the familiar basic characteristics of a midwestern rural town.

4590. Hayner, Norman S. Hotel life. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1936. 195 p. 36–7540 TX911.H37
"Selected bibliography": p. [183]–185.
Concerned with hotel life in general, but the great majority of the examples are American. Problems of urban culture are found in an accentuated form in the hotel. Its population is an aggregation of displaced individual units. Contacts are usually anonymous and casual. "The detachment, freedom, loneliness, and release from restraints that mark the hotel population are only to a lesser degree characteristic of modern life as a whole."

4591. Klein, Philip. A social study of Pittsburgh; community problems and services of Allegheny County, by Philip Klein and collaborators. New York, Published for the Social Study of Pittsburgh and Allegheny County by Columbia University Press, 1938. xxvi, 958 p.
38–3294 HN80.P6K5

A study made in 1934–36, under the auspices of the Citizens' Committee and financed by the Buhl Foundation of Pittsburgh, in order to render social services and agencies more effective. As the subtitle indicates, it is in two parts: the first (to page 347) describes social and economic conditions in city and county, building on the famous prior survey of 1907–8; while the second and larger investigates the state of social and health services. Their cost and support, planning and coördination, and personnel and facilities for training are studied. The services are then reviewed by type. The study made practical recommendations in each sphere, some of which had been made effective by the time of publication.

4592. Lynd, Robert S., and Helen Merrell Lynd. Middletown, a study in contemporary American culture. Foreword by Clark Wissler. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1929. 550 p.
29–26177 HN57.L8

Issued also as thesis (Ph.D.) Columbia University.

"The Institute of Social and Religious Research . . . financed the investigation."—Preface.

4593. Lynd, Robert S., and Helen Merrell Lynd. Middletown in transition; a study in cultural conflicts. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1937. xviii, 604 p. 37–27243 HN57.L84

The pioneer and classic "attempt to deal with a sample American community after the manner of social anthropology." A small middle western city of 35,000 population was chosen (it is now common knowledge that Middletown is Muncie, Indiana); in ten years it had increased to 50,000. The investigation for the first volume was carried out in 1924–25, and that for the sequel in 1935–36. The Lynds arrived at a six-fold analysis of social data, the first, dominant and largely determinant of the others being "Getting a Living." This was also found to be the field most subject to rapid change. The other heads are: "Making a Home," "Training the Young," "Using Leisure," "Engaging in Religious Practices," and "Engaging in Community Activities." The second most obvious area of rapid change was leisure, where traditional recreations were much reduced by the automobile, cinema, and radio. Middletown in Transition reports on the effects of a decade of boom followed by depression. For the most part, these had but continued the trends clearly perceptible in 1925. The volume concludes with a reconstruction of "the Middletown Spirit" dominated by the business mentality, and a meditation on its ineffectiveness in grappling with the real problems of the community.

4594. Peterson, Elmer T., ed. Cities are abnormal. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1946. xvi, 263 p. 46–4670 HT123.P45

Contents.—Cities are abnormal, by E. T. Peterson.—The ecology of city and country, by P. B. Sears.—It was not always so, by W. S. Thompson.—What we are and what we may become, by P. L. Vogt.—Biological truths and public health, by Jonathan Forman.—An architect protests, by H. H. Kamphoefner.—Social man and his community, by J. J. Rhyne.—Economic verities by S. C. McConahey.—Government of the people, by H. C. Nixon.—To clear the dross, by Louis Bromfield.—A farm reporter looks ahead, by Ladd Haystead.—The atomic threat, by W. S. Thompson.—Moral and cultural aspects of decentralization, by R. L. Smith.—No blueprint for Utopia, by E. T. Peterson.

From various angles and by various hands, the case for "an orderly decentralization under a diverse pattern" for America is presented. There is no virtue in bigness, or in efficiency when it damages the human mechanism, or in relying upon government for all positive action, or in increasing interdependence, which is simply "dependence multiplied by ten or ten thousand." The clinching argument is that an urban manpower surplus becomes parasitical, while no such surplus develops on self-sufficient farms.

4595. Thorndike, Edward L. Your city. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1939. 204 p.
39–27415 HT123.T5

"Data and sources": p. 172–187.

This unique book records the results of a three-year statistical study of 310 American cities. Many of the statistics used come from the census of 1930, a year of severe depression. Over a million separate items were handled in constructing a calculus for rating the general goodness of life in different cities. While the results heavily favor suburban cities such as Pasadena, Evanston, and Montclair, and equally disfavor Southern cities with their depressed Negro populations, there are yet significant differences when these classes are both excluded. "At least four-fifths of the difference of cities in goodness is caused by the personal qualities of the citizens and the amount of their incomes."

4596. Voss, Joseph Ellis. Summer resort: an ecological analysis of a satellite community. Philadelphia, 1941. 152 p.
A41–4069 HN80.O3V6

Thesis (Ph. D.)—University of Pennsylvania, 1941.

Bibliography: p. 140–144.

Ocean City, N. J., was founded to serve as a Summer Methodist Camp Meeting in 1880, went through a frenzied boom and crash during the 1920's and is now "a relatively conservative and efficient seaside resort community." "During the winter months, there are more than two dwellings for every individual in the community, while in the summer there are more than two persons for every room on the island." Mr. Voss studies the business of recreation, "the family resort family," and the nature of government, education, and cultural relations in this hybrid urban-rural community dependent for its existence upon seasonal migrations from other communities.

4597. Waterman, Willoughby Cyrus. Prostitution and its repression in New York City, 1900–1931. New York, Columbia University Press, 1932. 164 p. (Columbia University. Faculty of Political Science. Studies in history, economics and public law, no. 352)
32–18865 HQ146.N7W35 1932a
H31.C7, no. 352

"Bibliography of sources quoted": p. 160–162.

One of the very few objective and documented studies in this obscure field. It reviews the several measures strengthening the confusing and overlapping laws applicable to prostitution. In surveying action by the police and the courts, attention is drawn to the creation of a headquarters Vice Squad in 1924, and improvements in the technique of investigation. Privately organized groups, such as the Committee of Fifteen and of Fourteen, operated on public opinion throughout the period. The results are seen as a probable reduction in the overall quantity, the elimination of soliciting and "parlor houses," and a great shift in methods and loci.

4598. Whyte, William F. Street corner society; the social structure of an Italian slum. Enl. [2d] ed. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1955. xxii, 366 p.
55–5152 HV6439.U5W5 1955

"Cornerville" in "Eastern City" has been an Italian neighborhood since 1915, and the younger generation of its "little guys" divide into corner boys, who center their social activities upon particular street corners, with their adjoining barbershops, lunchrooms, poolrooms, or clubrooms, and college boys, a small group of young men who have risen above corner-boy level through higher education. The author lived with Doc and his gang of Nortons, and with Chick and his Italian Community Club, long and intimately enough to understand both groups from the inside, and he has traced the relationships of both groups to the gambling, racketeering, and the politics of the area. His appendix gives a lively picture of the investigator's experiences and dilemmas.

4599. Zorbaugh, Harvey Warren. Gold coast and slum; a sociological study of Chicago's Near North Side. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1929. xv, 287 p. 29–12607 F548.5.Z89

A sociological analysis of Chicago's "Lower North Side" which presents urban contrasts, urban disintegration, and the pathology of urban life in singularly concentrated and dramatic form. In this area the physical distances and the social distances do not coincide: people who live side by side cannot become neighbors. The life of the apartment-dwellers of the Gold Coast is set against "the world of furnished rooms" which lies next to it.

J. City Planning; Housing

4600. Abrams, Charles. The future of housing. New York, Harper, 1946. xix, 428 p.
46–8659 HD7293.A62

Bibliography: p. 415–419.

A searching individual study of the housing problem which finds the abuses of the home-building industry responsible for shoddy city planning, poor construction, inadequate repairs, recurrent housing shortages, and the slum problem. Neither wage increases nor shelter cost reduction will resolve the dilemma of the low-income family, which calls for public action. A detailed criticism is offered of Federal housing measures and administration, and ten aims set up for a national housing program, including a revitalized industry, urban redevelopment, adequate rental housing, a sound mortgage system, and stabilization of the real estate pattern.

4601. Bridenbaugh, Carl. Cities in the wilderness; the first century of urban life in America, 1625–1742. [2d ed.] New York, Knopf, 1955. 500 p. 55–8593 E191.B75 1955

Bibliography: p. 483–486.

4602. Bridenbaugh, Carl. Cities in revolt; urban life in America, 1743–1776. New York, Knopf, 1955. xiii, 433, xxi p. 55–7399 E162.B85

"Bibliographical note": p. 427–[434].

Five representative towns—Boston, Newport, New York, Philadelphia, and Charleston—are selected, and 1742 made the terminus "because in many respects it seems definitely to mark the end of an era in colonial town life." Colony records, and municipal records when available, are ransacked in order to present a detailed picture of development along four lines: physical aspects, economic life, urban problems, and social life. The author believes that colonial cities, although never holding more than 10 percent of the total population, "exercised a far more important influence on the life of early America than historians have previously recognized."

The sequel traces, through an eventful 33-year period, the "astonishing expansion" of the five cities in population and municipal services. In the same years, their inhabitants "discarded forever their 17th-Century traditions and fatefully and irrevocably accepted the symbols and ways of modernity." He is not concerned to tell the story of the movement for independence, but rather to illustrate the enlightenment of the public mind, through which "decades before independence the cities became the birthplace of American nationality."

4603. Burton, Hal. The city fights back; a nationwide survey of what cities are doing to keep pace with traffic, zoning, shifting population, smoke, smog, and other problems. Narrated and edited by Hal Burton from material developed by the Central Business District Council of the Urban Land Institute. New York, Citadel Press, 1954. 318 p.
54–9343 NA9030.B95
Bibliography: p. 313–318.

The Central Business District Council of the Urban Land Institute has been organized to offer information and guidance to any community which seeks to rehabilitate its own central business district. This is one area where money and coöperation have been readily forthcoming to implement planning, and this book is able to present many successful programs to eliminate congestion and decay. The prize example is Pittsburgh, where the 400 acres of the Golden Triangle "have been taken apart and put together again in the years just past."

4604. Churchill, Henry S. The city is the people. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1945. 186 p. 45–6336 NA9090.C5

A condensed presentation of city development, the accumulation of urban disorder, and the case for city planning on the widest scale. America has been able to plan new towns, but has had no success in the re-planning of existing cities, for "slum clearance" programs disregard all collateral planning problems. Physical and economic planning have meaning only in reference to social objectives—"the end is a livable city, suited to modern technologies of living."

4605. Colean, Miles L. Renewing our cities. New York, Twentieth Century Fund, 1953. 181 p. 53–9616 NA9108.C6

A closely knit little book which organizes the problems of American city structure and planning under the concept of renewal. The essential problem, of assuring a continuity of renewal, "can be solved only by devising means for preventing the accumulation of worn-out-parts and avoiding stagnation within an otherwise dynamic urban structure." Renewal is a distinct problem, considerably larger than slum clearance, desirable as the latter may be. Current strivings toward renewal in various cities are described, and the essentials of an effective program outlined.

4606. Gallion, Arthur B. The urban pattern; city planning and design. In collaboration with Simon Eisner. New York, Van Nostrand, 1950. 446 p. 50–13672 NA9030.G26 1950
Bibliography: p. 419–433.

"This book attempts a critical examination of the processes by which cities are planned and built, appraises some of the results, describes some of the defects, and poses a few suggestions . . ." The first part presents the evolution of the city pattern in western civilization, and some European innovations are described in the last part, but the central bulk of the book is concerned with the problems of city pattern and city planning in the United States. Hope lies in the formulation of a Master Plan, to provide a pattern for future development of each metropolitan area in the United States. A wealth of illustrations, diagrams as well as photographs, assist in understanding the factors involved.

4607. Lewis, Harold MacLean. Planning the modern city. New York, Wiley, 1949. 2 v.
49–7402 NA9030.L393

Based on The Planning of the Modern City, by Nelson P. Lewis, first published in 1916 (New York, Wiley. 423 p.).

The most comprehensive manual of planning for American cities, in which foreign instances are introduced when found useful. The six principal elements of a city plan are identified as: (1) the transportation system in and out of the city; (2) the intra-urban transit system; (3) the street system; (4) park and recreation facilities; (5) the location of public buildings; (6) the pattern of land uses, effectuated primarily through comprehensive zoning. Part 5 in volume 2 considers such special problems as airports, parking, and planning for the urban region, and the final part is devoted to the legal, economic, and administrative aspects of physical planning.

4608. Straus, Nathan. Two-thirds of a nation; a housing program. New York, Knopf, 1952. xiii, 291, xvii p. 51–11991 HD7293.S77

Two-thirds of all the families in the United States have incomes of less than $80 a week. The hard core of the housing problem is the fact that "there is practically no new housing produced by private enterprise at a figure the average American family can afford." "In America, millions of well-paid, well-dressed families live in slums." This up-to-date discussion analyzes the elements of housing costs, criticizes FHA policies, and offers many constructive suggestions on the individual and the civic levels toward the reasonable goal of a comfortable home for every American family.

4609. Tunnard, Christopher, and Henry Hope Reed. American skyline; the growth and form of our cities and towns. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1955. 302 p. 55–6553 HT123.T85

The "American townscape" has at all times reflected our people and history, and its patterns have been molded by economic, social, and political forces. The authors review this causal relationship throughout American history and distinguish seven eras of the American city pattern: colonial, to 1776; the Young Republic, to 1825; romantic, to 1850; the age of steam and iron, to 1880; the expanding city, to 1910; the city of towers, to 1933; and the regional city since 1933. There are numerous plans, sketches, and photographs.

4610. Twentieth Century Fund. Housing Committee. American housing, problems and prospects. The factual findings by Miles L. Colean. The program by the Housing Committee. New York, The Twentieth Century Fund, 1944. xxii, 466 p. 44–4203 HD9715.U52T9

Bibliography: p. 441–455.

Results of an over-all survey of the housing problem in the United States, the first of its kind and still unreplaced. The survey found that while traditional subdividing practices had created much waste and disorder, and while traditional forms of the house could receive simplified layout, composition and structure, the crux of the problem lay elsewhere. "The disorganized and warring group of organisms known euphemistically as the building industry," and the intricate and disorganized nature of the market result in a situation where the benefits of mass production do not become available to the consumer. Government intervention has avoided basic solutions. "No halfhearted attack can clear away the traditional obstacles in the housing industry." A detailed program of improvement on all fronts is suggested.

4611. U. S. President's Advisory Committee on Government Housing Policies and Programs. Recommendations on Government housing policies and programs, a report. Washington, 1953. 377 p. 53–63272 HD7293.A587

This Committee was established by Executive Order on Sept. 12, 1953, divided its work among five subcommittees, and reported three months later. Its primary objective was to ensure "that every action taken by Government in respect to housing should be for the purpose of facilitating the operation of" a strong, free, competitive economy. The numerous specific recommendations have as their more general objectives: (1) to provide special aids to local communities and property owners in conserving and renewing decaying neighborhoods; (2) to maintain and improve the existing housing supply by loans for modernization or repair; (3) to encourage private building activity; (4) to facilitate the free operation of the mortgage market by creating a National Mortgage Marketing Corporation; (5) to provide housing for low-income families, especially those displaced by redevelopment programs; and (6) to improve the organization of Federal housing activities.

4612. Walker, Mabel L. Urban blight and slums; economic and legal factors in their origin, reclamation, and prevention. With special chapters by Henry Wright, Ira S. Robbins [and others] Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1938. xvi, 442 p. (Harvard city planning studies, no. 12) 38–9281 HD7293.W3

"References": p. [429]–442.

The first major study of urban blight, the state of deterioration which attacks residential areas and leads to slums. Blighted areas are marked by high but falling land values, congested but decreasing population, obsolete and unfit housing on which improvements and repairs are no longer being made, a large proportion of abandoned buildings and rental vacancies, etc. Typical blight situations in American cities of various sizes are concretely analyzed. The writer thinks that project planning, zoning, and building regulation and taxing policies on the part of the local government can do much to help, but that the core of the problem is the creation and rationalization of a large-scale home-building industry which can produce houses which the lower-income third of the urban population can afford.

4613. Woodbury, Coleman, ed. The future of cities and urban redevelopment. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1953. xix, 764 p. 53–7679 NA9030.W64

This coöperative volume is one of the results of the Urban Redevelopment Study carried out in 1948–51 under the auspices of Public Administration Clearing House and other organizations, and directed by Coleman Woodbury. Urban redevelopment is defined as "those policies, measures, and activities that would do away with the major forms of physical blight in cities and bring about changes in urban structure and institutions contributing to a favorable environment for a healthy civic, economic, and social life for all urban dwellers." In addition to more general materials, this volume contains substantial sections on the relation of urban redevelopment to industrial location, to the urbanite (including results of the Attitude Survey), and to local government organization in metropolitan areas. Mr. Woodbury warns that progress in the field calls for many more able leaders and a higher degree of community subgroup morale than are present today. A companion volume, Urban Redevelopment: Problems and Practices (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1953. 525 p.) is of a more technical nature, something of a manual for redevelopers.

K. Social Problems; Social Work

4614. Addams, Jane. Forty years at Hull-House; being "Twenty years at Hull-House" and "The second twenty years at Hull-House." With an afterword by Lillian D. Wald. New York, Macmillan, 1935. 462, 459 p. 35–27460 HV4196.C4H73

A classic which combines autobiography, an account of the establishment, operations, and growth of the largest and most famous settlement house in the United States, and the writer's concern with various reform movements, particularly feminism and pacifiism. In The Second Twenty Years, indeed, the latter aspects have come to displace the settlement as the center of interest: Hull-House is but the seat of a woman of international fame who seeks to exert a national and an international influence on behalf of her favorite causes.

4615. Andrews, Frank Emerson. Philanthropic giving. New York, Russell Sage Foundation, 1950. 318 p. 50–10963 HV91.A7

The large extension of government services to the less fortunate has not been paralleled by a corresponding decline in private giving. Philanthropic contributions fell to a low of $715,000 in 1933, but have since climbed steadily, reaching a record figure of over 4 billions in 1948. The present volume is the result of an extensive fact-finding inquiry and presents tabular and other information concerning the sources and the destination of these vast sums. Special attention is given to fund-raising enterprises, religious agencies, education and the arts, the financing of research, and the effect of tax laws. Practical advice is given in chapters on avoiding charity rackets, and on the interrelations of recipient and donor.

4616. Andrews, Frank Emerson. Corporation giving. New York, Russell Sage Foundation, 1952. 361 p. 52–11787 HV95.A76

Corporation giving is a new factor in American philanthropy, having risen to its recent level of more than 200 million dollars only in 1944. The motives are various, but that of tax savings is only one among many, while the corporation's sense of duty to its community is most frequently avowed. While only 5 percent of total philanthropic giving, corporation giving is "actually a very significant factor, and sometimes the chief reliance, in the areas in which corporations are accustomed to give." On a survey of 326 foundations, it was found that 44.3 percent of their gifts were to welfare agencies, 26.6 percent to health agencies, and 21.2 percent to education. A new development is the corporation foundation, nine of which were found in the survey sample.

4617. Barnes, Harry Elmer. Society in transition. 2d ed. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1952. 878 p. 52–7578 HN15.B23 1952

A textbook which surveys American social problems within the frame of reference of "cultural lag," i. e., it regularly assumes that institutional development has fallen behind technological, and that wholesale remodeling of social forms and habits is both possible and desirable. The author states that he has provided "the most complete survey of important social problems to be found in any book in the field," as well as "illuminating historical perspectives on each" of them. In a single volume he has assembled a very large body of facts and representative opinions in such problem areas as population, immigration, race contacts, health, marriage, housing, poverty, mental disease, and crime.

4618. Bruno, Frank J. Trends in social work as reflected in the Proceedings of the National Conference of Social Work, 1874–1946. New York, Columbia University Press, 1948. xvi, 387 p. 48–2295 HV91.B75

In 1874 a handful of public charity officials from four states met in New York and organized the National Conference of Social Work; it has since grown to a body of 7,000 members. The original concerns were dependency, mental disease, delinquency, and problems of health; these have been widened to include the whole field of the public and private social services. The emergence of new issues and the shifting of points of view are seen clearly in the subjects before the Conference, as it turns to the protection of children, the organization of charity, or the problem of transiency, and the whole serves as a mirror of practical social thinking in the United States over a 75-year period.

4619. Cuber, John F., Robert A. Harper, and William F. Kenkel. Problems of American society: values in conflict. 3d ed. New York, Holt, 1956. 510 p. 56–6080 HN57.C8 1956

Among the many college textbooks on American social problems, this one is unique in that it adopts a clear-cut frame of reference, and employs it with much consistency throughout. The authors adopt the principle which they attribute to the late Richard C. Fuller, "that social problems arise in a society because ends, objectives, or values fostered by various persons and groups run at cross-purposes." The sociologist thereby adopts the role of interpreter of values rather than that of value advocate. The opposing values leading to opposing attitudes are identified in 17 major fields, including mental health, crime, adolescence, social class, race, populations, etc. The authors question the value of the concept of social disorganization as currently used by sociologists, it being a value-judgment applied to social change. Inasmuch as the authors regularly approve "rational" as against traditional ("extra-logical") values, their attitudes are seldom as neutral as they imply.

4620. Dulles, Foster Rhea. The American Red Cross, a history. New York, Harper, 1950. 554 p. 50–8717 HV577.D8

"Bibliographical notes": p. 540–543.

The new emphasis of the armed forces on current history led to the establishment of a Historical Division by the American Red Cross, and the production of a series of monographs available at its national headquarters. This work digests these monographs into a unitary history for the general reader, with special emphasis on the period since 1939. In origin an international organization for war relief, the American Red Cross has always been distinctive for the equal emphasis on relief of domestic disasters on a large scale. Notwithstanding its humanitarian purpose, the American Red Cross has had a somewhat stormy and controversial career, which aspect is not slighted here.

4621. Fink, Arthur E., Everett E. Wilson, and Merrill B. Conover. The field of social work. New York, Holt, 1955. 630 p. 55–6052 HV40.F5 1955

A comprehensive introduction to the subject. The first two chapters dispose of public welfare and social security, and the third presents a history of the private and voluntary agencies which engage in social work. The bulk of the book considers the major categories of social work: family social work, welfare services for children, school, psychiatric and medical social work, the correctional services, and social group work. Most of these chapters have specially contributed case histories appended. Concluding chapters deal with methods of organizing communities for all-round service, and with social work as a profession with its own standards, organizations, training, and literature.

4622. Fosdick, Raymond B. The story of the Rockefeller Foundation. New York, Harper, 1952. 336 p. 51–11913 HV97.R6F6

The president of the Foundation from 1936 to 1948 summarizes its principles and achievements in a history intended for laymen. Emphasis is placed on the role of Frederick T. Gates, the former Baptist Minister who served as the elder Rockefeller's adviser in philanthropy from 1892. A national charter was sought for the Foundation in 1910, but a storm of obloquy broke out, and a New York incorporation was substituted in 1913. The four associated trusts spent nearly $822,000,000 through 1950. During the first 15 years public health and medical education were chiefly cultivated, but since 1928 a multitude of projects in the natural sciences, agriculture, social science, and the humanities have been subsidized. The personal philanthropies of the younger Rockefeller, which reflect an extraordinary range of cultivated interests in the spheres of art, archaeology, city development, education, and libraries, are modestly but effectively described in Mr. Fosdick's John D. Rockefeller, Jr., A Portrait (New York, Harper, 1956. 477 p.).

4623. Glenn, John M., Lilian Brandt, and F. Emerson Andrews. Russell Sage Foundation, 1907–1946. New York, Russell Sage Foundation, 1947. 2 v. 47–12385 HV97.R8G55

Early in 1907 Mrs. Margaret Olivia Sage established the Russell Sage Foundation with a capital of $10,000,000, the income to be applied "to the improvement of social and living conditions in the United States." Its first Director, John M. Glenn (1907–31), took a part largely advisory and supervisory in the preparation of these volumes. During its first 41 years covered here, the Foundation spent $21,000,000, $9,000,000 in grants and $12,000,000 in research and other direct work of its own. The narrative covers the administrative development of the Foundation, and its activities at various periods in such realms as recreation, child hygiene, charity organization, remedial loans, industrial studies, etc. Appendixes list all grants and all but minor publications. The result is a detailed picture of one of the most intelligently conducted and successful foundations for social purposes.

4624. Kennedy, Albert J., and others. Social settlements in New York City, their activities, policies, and administration, by Albert J. Kennedy, Kathryn Farra and associates. New York, Published for the Welfare Council of New York City by Columbia University Press, 1935. xix, 599 p. (Studies of the Research Bureau of the Welfare Council, no. 2) 35–3613 HV4196.N6K4

A survey begun in the winter of 1927–28 by the Research Bureau of the Welfare Council of New York City at the request of United Neighborhood Houses. It covers the 80 settlements which existed at the outset, although the number had been reduced to 73 by the time of publication. Of these 2 were in the Bronx, 15 in Brooklyn, and 63 in Manhattan, especially on the Lower East Side. Chapters by several hands cover types such as boys' or women's clubs, functions such as music or the teaching of English and citizenship, publications, membership, and administration. Considerably the most detailed body of information on this special form of social work.

4625. Merrill, Francis E. Social problems on the home front, a study of war-time influences. New York, Harper, 1948. 258 p. 48–1366 HN57.M37

"Sponsored by the Committee on War Studies of the Social Science Research Council."

A study, based on statistics whenever available, "of the role of World War II in initiating, intensifying, or modifying certain social problems in the United States." It is not found to be true that war merely intensifies the maladjustments of peacetime society; in bringing about virtually full employment and a high collective morale, the War had many unanticipated positive consequences, such as the rise in the marriage and birth rates, the decline in the number of suicides, and the decrease in prostitution. Social problems might be transformed: "Never before were so many American families broken for so long," leading to modifications in family roles not easily assessed. "World War II had a differential effect upon social problems, intensifying some, alleviating others, and creating still others in a society made more dynamic by the pressures of total war."

4626. Watson, Frank Dekker. The charity organization movement in the United States, a study in American philanthropy. New York, Macmillan, 1922. 560 p. 22–25386 HV91.W38

Thesis (Ph. D.)—University of Pennsylvania, 1911.

"Selected bibliography": p. 543–553.

Charitable societies were formed in the cities during the second half of the 18th century, and one of modern type, the New York Society for the Prevention of Pauperism, appeared in 1817. The panic of 1873 and the prolonged depression that followed revealed unemployment as a national problem, and demonstrated that the simple old ways of helping the needy were almost incredibly wasteful and inefficient. Organizational experiments were made in Germantown and Boston, but the Buffalo Charity Organization Society launched at the end of 1877 was the first to achieve city-wide integration, and was widely copied. In 1905 came the Field Department of the Charity Organization Society of New York City, followed four years later by the Charity Organization Department of the Russell Sage Foundation, which offered technical guidance and training to all local societies.

4627. Weaver, William Wallace. Social problems. New York, Sloane, 1951. 791 p. 51–12929 HN15.W4

A textbook for college courses which gives less emphasis "to theoretical or systematic treatment of problem situations in general," but concentrates on the problems themselves in their American settings. These are grouped under the headings of personal crises (mental disorders, alcoholism, prostitution, etc.), family discord (including illegitimacy), group tensions, and insecurity (unemployment, old age, war, etc.). The conclusion on public policy is grave in outlook; in addition to the old obstacles to progress, the parsimony of nature, the limitations of human endowment, and cultural inertia, there are now world ferment and the insatible demands of modern war.

L. Dependency; Social Security

4628. Best, Harry. Blindness and the blind in the United States. New York, Macmillan, 1934. xxii, 714 p. 34–1429 HV1795.B4 1934

"The present work is a revision and expansion of The Blind: Their Condition and the Work Being Done for Them in the United States [1919]."—Foreword.

A complete treatise on this class of the handicapped, with abundant statistical tables. It covers the causes of blindness and the possibilities of preventing it; the general condition of the blind as to numbers (about 100,000 in 1930), education, economic condition, and legal treatment; the provision of education for blind children; intellectual and material provision for the adult blind; and interested organizations. For all his objective data, the author believes that "there is no such thing as a 'problem of the blind;' there are as many problems as there are blind persons to be dealt with."

4629. Best, Harry. Deafness and the deaf in the United States, considered primarily in relation to those sometimes more or less erroneously known as "deaf-mutes." New York, Macmillan, 1943. xix, 675 p. 43–17957 HV2545.B42 1943

"A revision and expansion of The Deaf: Their Position in Society and the Provision for Their Education in the United States, published in 1914."—Foreword.

The distinction in the subtitle is made because a large proportion of the deaf can be taught more or less perfect articulation. The book is a treatise as comprehensive as its author's work on the blind. It deals with the nature and causes of deafness, the possibilities of its prevention, and the separate problem of the hard of hearing. The numbers of the deaf (57,000 in 1930) and their economic condition and legal treatment are described. Organizations for and of the deaf are inventoried. The education of deaf children is studied at length, with chapters on the history and methods of such training.

4630. Brown, Josephine Chapin. Public relief, 1929–1939. New York, Holt, 1940. xvii, 524 p. 40–34168 HV91.B7

Bibliography: p. 477–511.

As a result of the depression of 1929, "a system of local poor relief which had remained practically unchanged for a century and a half was superseded not only by new methods but by a new philosophy of governmental responsibility for people in need." This work, based largely on Government documents, reviews the old methods prevailing in 1929, their makeshift extension followed by complete breakdown in the years 1929–33, and their replacement by the vast administrative machinery of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration and, after 1935, the Works Progress Administration.

4631. Burns, Eveline M. The American social security system. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1949. xviii, 460 p. 49–5180 HD7125.B86

——— ——— The Social security act amendments of 1950, an appendix. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1951. 447–481 p. HD7125.B86 Appx.

A treatise concerned primarily with income security programs, which aim to assure a certain minimum of income to some or all, especially through cash payments. The Social Security Act of 1935, as amended in 1939, 1946, and 1950 (these last changes are described in the separately published Appendix) leaves much to local regulation, and excludes three programs created by separate federal laws: Railroad Retirement, Railroad Unemployment Insurance, and Veterans' Security. The treatment throughout is analytical, by type of insurance or beneficiary. The conclusion is concerned with suggestions toward a rational system; one has by no means been achieved as yet.

4632. Creech, Margaret. Three centuries of poor law administration; a study of legislation in Rhode Island. Introductory note by Edith Abbott. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1936. xxii, 331 p. (Social service monographs, no. 24) 36–11511 HV75.R43C7 1936 Issued also as thesis (Ph. D.) University of Chicago.

Appendixes: 1. List of laws of Rhode Island relating to the poor.—2. List of judicial decisions under the poor law.—3. Select documents relating to the history of poor relief in the colonial period and the late eighteenth century.—4. Thirteen case histories, 1644–1724.—5. Select documents relating to the history of poor relief in the modern period.

Chronologically the most extensive review of State action in alleviation of poverty and dependency. Rhode Island early took over the Elizabethan poor law and provided for the appointment of overseers of the poor. A major factor from the beginning was the efforts of towns to prevent the settlement of persons who might become dependents, continued in later times by the enforcement of rigid residential requirements. As late as 1936 there remained "a poor law with general principles unchanged, administered by governmental units a few miles in area, with limited taxing power and without provisions for skilled service or for uniformity of standards."

4633. Gagliardo, Domenico. American social insurance. Rev. ed. New York, Harper, 1955. 672 p. 55-6775 HD7125.G34 1955

Aims to give a reasonably full-length picture of the American social insurance movement, complex and undergoing change as it is. Describes what we have, how we got it, and what the results have been, in four major fields: old age, unemployment, occupational disability, and health. Imperfections in the system as it has evolved are pointed out. The author, a professor of economics at the University of Kansas, includes 72 statistical tables.

4634. Gillin, John Lewis. Poverty and dependency; their relief and prevention. 3d ed. New York, Appleton-Century, 1937. 755 p. 37-2328 HV31.G4 1937

Bibliography: p. 679-735.

Remains the most systematic general treatment of these related problems, which signify "lack of adjustment between the people composing a population and the economic and social circumstances in which they live." The enormous extent and expense of the problems are estimated. The conditions, physical and socio-economic, are analyzed and pronounced removable. A historical section traces the institutions and methods of dealing with dependents, including Old World antecedents of American practices. The classes of dependents, from the aged to the unemployed, are separately considered. Finally, preventive agencies and methods are described, and a generally melioristic viewpoint and program outlined.

4635. Industrial Relations Research Association. The aged and society. Ed.: Milton Derber. Champaign, Ill., 1950. 237 p. (Its Publication no. 5) 51-1473 HQ1060.I455

"The United States is experiencing the impact of greater life expectancies more than any other nation, for the typical life span of its population is the longest . . . If greater length of life, so avidly desired by the individual, is not to become a curse to society, effective accommodations must be made to it." The fifteen papers in this "research symposium" are concerned with the statistical bases of the problem, the older worker in industry, security in old age, and a variety of problems of psychology and adjustment, such as "The Politics of Age."

4636. Irwin, Robert B. As I saw it. New York, American Foundation for the Blind, 1955. 205 p. 55-2408 HV1792.I7A3

Dr. Irwin (1883-1951) lost his sight at the age of five, but went on to complete his education at Washington and Harvard Universities, and devoted his life to bettering the condition of all handicapped like himself. After his retirement as director of the American Foundation for the Blind in 1949, he planned a history of work for the blind to be called Fifty Years of Progress. The portions completed at the time of his death are published in this handsome memorial volume, and include concise accounts of such developments as libraries for the blind, the talking book, braille periodicals, and the American Foundation for the Blind. Of special interest, from the pen of this indomitably independent man, are "Earning a Living without Benefit of Sight" and "The Importance of Power to Move about at Will," an appreciation of the "seeing eye" dogs.

4637. Kessler, Henry H. Rehabilitation of the physically handicapped. Rev. [i. e. 2d] ed. New York, Columbia University Press, 1953. 275 p. 53-10047 HV3011.K42 1953

Rehabilitation, originally identified with the needs of the war disabled, has been extended to the larger requirements of the civilian, and has evolved from the idea of isolated and fragmentary assistance to "the modern concept of integrated and continuous service." The author, who has served in rehabilitation work since 1919, reviews the types of disability, defines the principles of rehabilitation, including vocational guidance and training and selective placement, summarizes recent legislation, and outlines a national program. The bibliography which appeared on p. [253]-261 of the first edition (1947) has been replaced in the second with a directory of "Major Centers and Agencies for the Handicapped" (p. [253]-258). A somewhat more journalistic approach to the subject will be found in the work of two medical men attached to The New York Times: Howard A. Rusk and Eugene J. Taylor, New Hope for the Handicapped (New York, Harper, 1949. 231 p.).

4638. Riis, Jacob A. How the other half lives; studies among the tenements of New York. With illustrations chiefly from photographs taken by the author. New York, Scribner, 1890. xv, 304 p. 4-11775 HV4046.N6R55

A classic of social reporting, which so effectively thrust under genteel American noses the state of the tenements and the slum-dwellers of lower Manhattan that the issue could no longer be ignored. The human squalor and degradation which were the consequences of over half a century of unregulated industrialism, hitherto noted in statistical reports and official documents, were now set forth in vivid human terms. Several sequels from Riis' pen followed this: The Children of the Poor (1892), The Battle with the Slum (1902), and Children of the Tenements (1903).

M. Delinquency and Correction

4639. Barnes, Harry Elmer, and Negley K. Teeters. New horizons in criminology. 2d ed. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1951. 887 p.
51–14541 HV6025.B3 1951

A comprehensive and detailed textbook in criminology and penology which the authors describe as "an exercise in informed crusading for a more rational, humane, and effective handling of the whole problem of crime." A section on factors favorable to criminality opens with a disclaimer of dogmatism: the most unfavorable conditions will not inevitably drive a given person to crime, or the most favorable ones absolutely insure him against it. Capital punishment is pronounced a barbarous survival, and the cruelty and futility of the modern prison developed at length. The new edition emphasizes the "revolution in crime" during the war decade: the development and political infiltrations of syndicated gambling and criminality, and the growth of rural and juvenile crime. Against this may be set progress in rehabilitative treatment inside and out of institutions.

4640. Bates, Sanford. Prisons and beyond. New York, Macmillan, 1936. 334 p.
36–32878 HV8665.B33

The author, after heading the Massachusetts Department of Correction for nine years, became the first chief of the new Federal Bureau of Prisons. He takes the average American county jail to be the antithesis of everything desirable in a reformatory institution. He argues that we can improve our prisons, with new and more adequate buildings, decent living conditions, improved diet, better qualified guards, and educational facilities, and yet deter the potential criminal. An adequate system must be "built around the concept that all its prisoners must be returned to society, and that society is not protected unless they are returned more efficient, more honest, and less criminal than when they went in."

4641. Clemmer, Donald. The prison community. Boston, Christopher Pub. House, 1940. 341 p.
40–14007 HV9466.C55

The result of a study of the inner life of a prison containing 2300 inmates carried out in 1931–34 by a sociologist of the Illinois Department of Public Welfare. He presents it as "the 'Middletown' of American prisons," with observations on social relations, social groups, leadership, leisure time, the sexual pattern, prison labor, etc.

4642. Deutsch, Albert. The trouble with cops. New York, Crown Publishers, 1955. 243 p.
55–7239 HV8138.D4

Mr. Deutsch is an experienced social scientist who from time to time undertakes journalistic inquiries into specific problems, which he handles forcefully but not sensationally. The present volume was expanded from a series of articles in Collier's and deals with the "police crisis" of 1952–54 evidenced in a nation-wide series of front-page scandals brought to light in one metropolitan force after another. There is much here concerning participation in rackets, brutality and other illegal treatment of suspects, blackmail and "entrapment" by vice squad members, and other prevalent abuses. The basic cause is found in the fact that "the generality of America's 200,000 local police officers remain undertrained, underpaid, unappreciated, with meager chances for advancement." The development of training, standards, and incentives that will turn the "flatfoot" into a professional require a wiser attitude toward police problems on the part of our urban democracies.

4643. Dressler, David. Probation and parole. New York, Columbia University Press, 1951. 237 p.
51–10476 HV9278.D73

A director of the New York State Division of Parole seeks to articulate a rationale of probation and parole, and to provide in one volume a full-length statement on the philosophy, administration, and processes of each. He defines them as services designed to benefit society and the maladjusted individual in society, which must be recognized as casework functions with a law-enforcement orientation and responsibility. The first and crucial factor is selection, which, if poorly done, can render all subsequent supervision and treatment ineffectual. Mr. Dressler has provided anecdotes and lessons from his own professional career in his Parole Chief (New York, Viking Press, 1951. 310 p.).

4644. Ellingston, John R. Protecting our children from criminal careers. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1948. 374 p. 48–3450 HV9069.E56

During 1938–40 the American Law Institute carried out the task of redesigning the pattern for the administration of criminal justice for youth, arriving at a model Youth Correction Authority Act. In 1941 California set up its Youth Authority on this basis, and after six years was imitated by Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Massachusetts. Mr. Ellingston's book is a vigorous denunciation of traditional methods; jails, state schools, reformatories, and prisons are so many schools for crime and depravity. The schools and camps of the California Authority are praised as breaking the stagnant pattern of children's institutions. The State Authority is seen as a lever for effecting the reform of delinquency control at the community level.

4645. Glueck, Sheldon. Crime and justice. Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1945. 349 p. A45–4442 HV8665.G55 1945

"Based on eight lectures delivered to a lay audience at the Lowell Institute, Boston, in the spring of 1935."—Pref.

A comprehensive diagnosis of the entire American system of criminal justice, whose ills primary result from the fact that "society is attempting to enforce the laws and to control crime with instruments largely outworn." One major improvement could be effected by drafting "a more realistic criminal code to replace the existing tangle of legislative and judge-made law." There is also needed a unified, centrally directed system of justice, administered by a Department of Justice within each state. No reform can become effective unless there is a greatly improved personnel of well-trained officials devoted to the public weal. Furthermore, "far-reaching and deep-probing attacks are necessary along the entire front of social pathology," but especially in the realm of family disintegration.

4646. Glueck, Sheldon, and Eleanor T. Glueck. 500 criminal careers. New York, Knopf, 1930. xxvii, 365, xvi p. 30–2673 HV6793.M4G5

4647. Glueck, Sheldon, and Eleanor T. Glueck. Later criminal careers. New York, The Commonwealth Fund, 1937. 403 p. 37–11838 HV6793.M4G52

4648. Glueck, Sheldon, and Eleanor T. Glueck. Criminal careers in retrospect. New York, The Commonwealth Fund, 1943. 380 p. (Harvard Law School studies in criminology) 43–17001 HV6783.G5

These three volumes study the life histories of the 510 prisoners released from the Massachusetts Reformatory whose sentences expired in 1921 and 1922, and follow them up at 5, 10, and 15 years after the original release. The first volume provides background material on the reformatory movement and the Massachusetts reformatory and parole system. The second studies recidivism among the 454 survivors and suggests that maturation is the underlying influence in reform. The third considers the response of offenders to peno-correctional treatment and explores the possibilities of predicting individual behavior.

4649. Glueck, Sheldon, and Eleanor T. Glueck. Five hundred delinquent women. With an introd. by Roscoe Pound. New York, Knopf, 1934. xxiv, 539 p. 34–34029 HV6046.G6

An investigation of 500 cases whose paroles from the Massachusetts Reformatory for Women at Framingham expired between 1921 and 1924. It was undertaken at the instance of Mrs. Jessie S. Hodder, superintendent of the Reformatory for some two decades, who introduced many reforms and desired some evaluation of her years of effort. The authors offer eleven case-histories in detail and proceed to an analysis of pre-commitment data concerning family background, childhood and adolescence, sexual and marital life, and legal entanglements. The regime of the Reformatory and the circumstances of parole and of behavior after release are examined. The methodology of the study is fully set forth in Appendix A. The whole remains considerably the largest body of concrete information concerning women offenders in the United States.

4650. Glueck, Sheldon, and Eleanor Glueck. Unraveling juvenile delinquency. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1950. xv, 399 p. (Harvard Law School studies in criminology) 50–10259 HV9069.G55

4651. Glueck, Sheldon and Eleanor Glueck. Delinquents in the making; paths to prevention. New York, Harper, 1952. 214 p. 51–11917 HV9069.G552

Of this pair of publications the first is a full statistical and methodological account, and the second a summary of results for the general public, of a major ten-year study. A group of 500 delinquent boys were elaborately compared with a group of 500 non-delinquent boys, so chosen that matching in pairs could be carried out. As a group, the delinquents proved to be "mesomorphic" in physique, energetic and aggressive in temperament, hostile and suspicious in attitude, concrete and unmethodical in intellect, and reared in homes of little affection or stability. The authors have worked out a series of prognostic tables offered as usable at the point of school entrance.

4652. Hamilton, Charles, ed. Men of the underworld; the professional criminals' own story. New York, Macmillan, 1952. 336 p.
52–4275 HV6785.H3

There is a surprisingly large literature of personal narratives by American criminals of one kind or another, produced with varying degrees of assistance from another party or parties. This anthology gives a fair sampling, with sections on the "underworld," racketeering, prison life, and the road back from prison. Unfortunately the editor's commentary is journalistic in tone and his extracts are unaccompanied by proper dates and citations. However, his sources are listed in his bibliography (p. 327–330).

4653. Lewis, Orlando F. The development of American prisons and prison customs, 1776–1845, with special reference to early institutions in the State of New York. [Albany?] Prison Association of New York [1922] 350 p.
23–5484 HV9466.L4

Bibliography: p. 347–350.

4654. McKelvey, Blake. American prisons; a study in American social history prior to 1915. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1936. xiv, 242 p. (University of Chicago. School of Social Service Administration. Social service series)
37–1625 HV9466.M3

"Bibliographical note" at end of each chapter.

Mr. Lewis went minutely through contemporary sources, especially state documents, in order to present a detailed picture of prisons and imprisonment during the first seven decades of the Republic. It is, of course, largely a record of horrors. Dr. McKelvey, building on Lewis' presentation of "the institutional side," is chiefly concerned with new theories of penology and movements of reform based upon them. He pauses, however, to review "the state of prisons in the nineties." The two works, taken together, provide a fairly rounded history of American penological development down to World War I.

4655. Smith, Bruce. Police systems in the United States. Rev. and enl. New York, Harper, 1949. 351 p. 49–48594 HV8138.S58 1949

There are about 40,000 separate and distinct public police agencies in the United States, and the coördination of these into a united and effective front against crime is a complex business. This treatise, noteworthy for taking into account the varying viewpoints of the professional police officer, the civilian administrator, and the general public, places these systems against the two major problems of crime and traffic, and then discusses the systems by category: federal agencies, state forces, city police, etc. Separate chapters are given to State-Federal relationships, police control and leadership, principles and types of organization, and the central services developed since 1893 by the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

4656. Tannenbaum, Frank. Crime and the community. Boston, Ginn, 1938. 487 p.
38–13156 HV6025.T3

Bibliography at end of each chapter except chapter 20.

A thoroughly social interpretation of crime in the United States which rejects all single-factor theories. "American criminal activity has persisted because it was called into being and perpetuated by those complex and overlapping social strains which have characterized the growth and development of American life. Not until the American community changes profoundly will the character and the amount of crime in it also change." Among the chapters in which criminal behavior is very realistically fitted into its social setting are "Education for Crime," "Organized Crime," "Politics and Crime," "Politics and Police," and "The Philosophy of the Professional Criminal." The two concluding parts of the book present well-documented and strongly critical accounts of the administration of criminal justice, and of "Punitive Processes."

4657. Teeters, Negley K., and John Otto Reinemann. The challenge of delinquency; causation, treatment, and prevention of juvenile delinquency. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1950. 819 p. 50–12402 HV9069.T375

Bibliography: p. [739]–783.

A professor of sociology and the probation officer of a Philadelphia court unite to produce a college text which presents the history of its subject, an appraisal of theories of causation, and a description and evaluation of the existing social machinery. No single theory of causation is found to be satisfactory; a "multiple causation" theory is considerably more cautious, although no given set of unfavorable conditions will necessarily produce delinquency, or their opposites necessarily prevent it. Under "Control and Treatment," juvenile courts, probation, and various types of commitment are described. The final section discusses community programs of prevention, and an appendix presents 15 case histories.

4658. Thrasher, Frederic M. The gang; a study of 1,313 gangs in Chicago. 2d rev. ed. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1936. xxi, 605 p. 36–35233 HV6439.U7C4 1936

"Selected bibliography": p. 554–580.

The gang has grown considerably more lethal in the past two decades, but Dr. Thrasher's study of Chicago gangs carried out in the early 1920's remains the most thorough study of a regular urban phenomenon. The gang, a symptom of disorganization in the larger social framework, offers a substitute for what society fails to give, and provides relief from suppression and distasteful behavior. Various aspects of gang life such as its playgrounds, "junking," gang warfare, and sex, are illustrated. Gang structure, action, and leadership are analyzed, and the gang is considered in its relation to organized crime and to politics.

4659. Vollmer, August. The police and modern society. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1936. 253 p. (Publications of the Bureau of Public Administration, University of California) 36–27477 HV8138.V65

Bibliography: p. 238–241.

A review of police problems "as the policeman on patrol daily encounters them," by the long-time Chief of Police of Berkeley, Calif., also a distinguished criminologist. These problems are considered in four main groups: major crimes, vice, traffic, and general service. There is much room for improvement in the realm of personnel; by improved standards of selection and training, "police work can attain the full dignity of a profession." The author believes that our services have traveled as far toward crime control as they have been permitted to; but "the police are undermined, demoralized, and unsupported by the very public that they are paid to protect."

4660. Wilson, Orlando W. Police administration. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1950. 540 p. 50–12455 HV7935.W48

A substantial textbook by the dean of the School of Criminology at the University of California, written for the critical student of police problems. It analyzes the organization structure, administrative practices, and operating procedures of police forces in this country. In view of widely divergent police patterns, it describes what the author regards as superior practices in all branches and at all levels of police service—"we do not progress so long as we sit on the fence." There are sections on patrol, traffic, records, buildings and equipment, personnel, discipline, and public relations. An "administrative check list" of 300 questions provides a ready-made inquiry into the efficiency of any police department (p. 513–528).

XVI

Communications

A. The Post Office; Express Companies 4661–4671
B. Telegraph, Cable, Telephone 4672–4681
C. Radio, Television: Broadcasting 4682–4698
D. Radio, Television: The Audience 4699–4705
E. Government Regulation 4706–4711

IN THIS chapter books have been selected which tell the story of telecommunication in the United States as various media have successively emerged to influence the economic, social, and intellectual development of the Nation. The expansion of the postal system from an intercolonial service on the eastern seaboard into a medium for transcontinental communication followed the westward migration of settlers, and with the help of the short-lived Pony Express dispelled the notion of the Rocky Mountains and the deserts as impassable barriers between the two sections of the country. By the middle of the 19th century the postal service was rivaled by the growing network of telegraph wires, which in the two decades before 1852 reached 23,283 miles, and the merchant, banker, journalist, and men of other callings had discovered the value of the telegraph in their business ventures. Invented by Alexander Graham Bell, the telephone emerged as a big industry during the last quarter of the 19th century, as a potent modifier of everyday habits, and as an instrument of industrial and social expansion.

In spite of the influence of these media of communication, there is a scarcity of literature, suitable for this bibliography, on the Post Office, the Express Companies, and the Telegraph, Cable, and Telephone (Sections A and B). This is by no means the case with the more recent arrivals, Radio and Television (Sections C and D). In the first two sections the items listed represent most of the historical literature available in book form on those subjects, while the items in Sections C and D are merely typical of a much larger body of literature that reflects the development of broadcasting. Books have been selected for their illustration of the profound effect that both of these agencies of mass communication are exerting on the social, educational, and moral qualities of their audiences. Because of the rapid development of radio and television into time-consuming, ubiquitous influences in American life, as well as into big industries with associated careers, a few production handbooks that will probably be of interest to others as well as those who may consider such careers, have been included. The omission of any title is not to be considered as criticism, but may mean only that the selection had to be limited in order to maintain proportion and balance.

A. The Post Office; Express Companies

4661. Chapman, Arthur. The Pony Express; the record of a romantic adventure in business; illustrated with contemporary prints and photographs. New York, Putnam, 1932. 319 p.
32–9124 HE6375.C4

Bibliography: p. 311–314.

The Pony Express was a by-product of the controversy between the proponents of the southern and central routes for the overland mail to California. It was inaugurated on April 3, 1860, by William H. Russell of the freighting firm of Russell, Majors and Waddell, to demonstrate the practicability of the central route for year-round travel. Only one trip was missed in its 18 months of weekly and semi-weekly service. The excessive cost of operation, the failure to obtain an enlarged mail contract, and the joining of the telegraph lines from the East and West in October 1861 brought the Pony Express to an end. The writer, a newspaper reporter, magazine editor, and author of other books on the West, concludes that the Pony Express contributed to the development of the West by speeding up the news service to and from the Pacific, disproving the theory that the Rocky Mountains formed an impassable barrier in winter, and minimizing the terror of the desert.

4662. Chu, Pao Hsun. The Post Office of the United States. 2d ed. New York, 1932. 148 p. 33–2965 HE6371.C55 1929
Thesis (Ph. D.)—Columbia University, 1929.
Bibliography: p. 139–148.

The footnote references and bibliography indicate the scholarly nature of this history of the Post Office. The author, a Chinese student who came to the United States on a government scholarship, regards the Post Office as an agency for the collection and dissemination of human thought and thereby one of the active contributors to the speed and solidarity that mark the growth of civilization. He traces the development of the English postal system as the forerunner of the American, the emergence of the modern Post Office in the 17th century, the origin of the Federal postal monopoly, and the reforms which have fundamentally changed the theory and practice of postal finance.

4663. Cushing, Marshall H. The story of our Post Office; the greatest Government department in all its phases. Boston, A. M. Thayer, 1893. 1034 p. 9–16667 HE6371.C98

The author utilized his experience as a journalist, congressional secretary, and private secretary to Postmaster General John Wanamaker to give a detailed account of the complicated machinery that underlay the business of the Post Office Department. A description of the buildings occupied by the Department, the duties of the Postmaster General, the various functions of his assistants, the publications of the Department, the establishment of routes and offices, the equipment, pay and work of clerks, money orders and supplies, free delivery, the Dead Letter Office, inspectors and smuggling, brief biographies of postmasters and other personalities as well as statistics and anecdotes have their places in this vivid picture of the Post Office as it was in the last decade of the 19th century.

4664. Fowler, Dorothy (Ganfield) The Cabinet politician; the Postmasters General, 1829–1909. New York, Columbia University Press, 1943. 344 p. 43–10238 HE6499.F6
Manuscripts: p. [309]–311. Bibliography: p. [313]–323.

The Postmaster General became a Cabinet officer in 1829. During the next 80 years the tradition was established whereby "this Cabinet position has been given to the foremost politican of the Party. He has usually been the manager of the new President's campaign for the nomination and election and has frequently been the chairman of the national committee, for the Presidential nominee has, since 1896, selected that officer." Mrs. Fowler describes the Post Office as an agency of political patronage and reviews the political activities of its heads from William T. Barry to George von Lengerke Meyer.

4665. Geddes, Virgil. Country postmaster. New York, Austin-Phelps, 1952. 230 p. 52–12228 HE6385.G4A3

This book by a little-theater playwright presents the human interest side of the postal system. It relates in anecdotal style the experiences of the author as postmaster for ten years in a New England village. It pictures the life of the people as viewed from a post office window, the small town politics, the enforcement of postal regulations, the illegal use of the mails, and the maintenance of rural routes. "Where else," asks the author, "could one, who constantly enjoys the study of humanity, have such a laboratory as the post office in a small town?" He concludes that, "what holds the great postal system together is not the postal laws and regulations, however important they may be, but the spirit of democracy in both those who work within it and those who patronize it."

4666. Hafen, LeRoy R. The overland mail 1849–1869; promoter of settlement, precursor of railroads. Cleveland, A. H. Clark, 1926. 361 p. 26–17618 HE6375.H3
"Bibliography of references cited": p. 333–341.

The trek of the Mormons to Utah in 1847 and the discovery of gold in California in 1849 accelerated the demand for extension of the mail service overland to the Pacific. The author tells the story of the transportation of the mails by stage coach and Pony Express on all available routes to the West during the 20 years that preceded the driving of the Golden Spike at Promontory Point on May 10, 1869. He relies on Government documents, contemporary newspapers, and the personal narratives of travelers and other participants in the events which have been described.

4667. Harlow, Alvin F. Old waybills; the romance of the express companies. New York, Appleton-Century, 1934. 503 p. 34–7001 HE5896.H3

Bibliography: p. 489–[497].

This is the author's third book in his series on American communication and transportation. The history of the Adams, American, Southern, and Wells, Fargo Express Companies, which reached their zenith in the early 1890's and combined in 1918 to become the American Railway Express Company, is interwoven with stories of the colonial expressmen, the rise and fall of smaller companies, the stage coach and Pony Express, and the impact of these modes of communication on society.

4668. Kelly, Melville Clyde. United States postal policy, by Clyde Kelley. New York, Appleton, 1931. 320 p. 31–22448 HE6371.K4

In this review of the development of the policies underlying the U. S. postal service, a member of the House of Representatives for 20 years, who had served on its Post Office Committee, describes the postal establishment as the "keystone in the arch of American unity." Through service it "helps to obliterate sectional lines and to neutralize class prejudice."

4669. Rich, Wesley E. The history of the United States Post Office to the year 1829. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1924. 190 p. (Harvard economic studies . . . v. 27)
24–22903 HE6371.R5

Thesis (Ph. D.)—Harvard University, 1917.

Bibliography: p. 175–181.

This dissertation is a scholarly history of the beginnings of the postal service in the colonies under British rule, its unification under Benjamin Franklin as the first national Postmaster General (1775), and its extension from 1789 to 1829, the year in which the Postmaster General became a Cabinet officer. Chapters describe the Post Office as a public service and its internal organization, financial operations, and postal policies. A chapter traces the growing political importance of post office patronage. The appendixes contain biographical notes on the Postmasters General, and tables showing the growth, appropriations, receipts and expenditures of the Department from its inception until 1829.

4670. Roper, Daniel C. The United States Post Office, its past record, present condition, and potential relation to the new world era. New York, Funk & Wagnalls, 1917. xvii, 382 p.
17–24056 HE6371.R6

Bibliography: p. 374–375.

The author, who served as First Assistant Postmaster General from 1913 to 1916, has written a general history of the U. S. Post Office, whose mission he describes in its rural, urban, and international aspects as "social, commercial and intellectual." He tells the story of the postal service from its colonial beginnings to 1917 when, he says, World War I marked the "end of an old and the beginning of a new era." The American story is prefaced by a chapter on "Postal Service and Civilization." The Appendix contains a glossary, a list of officials of the Post Office Department, 1775–1917, and a chronology of postal events.

4671. U. S. Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government (1947–1949) The Post Office; a report to the Congress, February 1949. [Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off.] 1949. 21 p.
49–45781 HE6331 1949.A523
JK643.C47A55, no. 4

Issued also as House document no. 76, 81st Cong., 1st sess.

Established by a law approved July 7, 1947, the Commission, through its Chairman, the Honorable Herbert Hoover, transmitted the report of its findings concerning the Post Office Department to the Congress less than two years later. As Appendix I to this Report, Robert Heller and Associates, Cleveland, published the results of their study for the Commission under the title Management Organization and Administration of the Post Office Department ([Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off.] 1949. 74 p.). The basic diagnosis of the Commission: "Although the Post Office is a business-type establishment, it lacks the freedom and flexibility essential to good business operation." The Heller task force recommends legislation "to establish the Post Office Department as a revolving fund agency of the Executive Branch . . . accountable to the Congress but with methods more in accord with modern business practice." Greater flexibility in expenditures and reasonable freedom from restrictive laws and regulations are indicated changes.

B. Telegraph, Cable, Telephone

4672. Barbash, Jack. Unions and telephones; the story of the Communications Workers of America. New York, Harper, 1952. 246 p.
52–8460 HD6515.T33B3

The Communications Workers of America were established as recently as 1939, and did not arrive at any great numbers or influence until World War II was over. Mr. Barbash, a Washington economist, tells its story in order "to give CWA members a sense of pride in CWA traditions and history," as well as "to tell the general reader interested in the labor movement something about a union which reflects most of the main currents of union development in this generaiton." His book is included here for the incidental light which it frequently throws upon the organization and operations of the telephone industry, and for its Chapter 9, "Telephones and Corporations," which concisely presents the economics of the industry from the union point of view.

4673. Danielian, Noobar R. A. T. & T.; the story of industrial conquest. New York, Vanguard Press, 1939. 460 p.
39–29705 HE8846.A55D3

The results which may be achieved by the various systems of industrial control are emphasized by the author, sometime financial and utility expert for the Federal Communications Commission. The Bell Telephone System has been selected as typical of the industries which have experienced periods of uncontrolled monopoly, competition without regulation, the protection of state regulation, Federal "ownership" during World War I, and regulated monopoly. The book is based, to a great extent, on the record of the Telephone Investigation authorized by Congress in 1935 and conducted by the Federal Communications Commission (no. 4710).

4674. Dilts, Marion May. The telephone in a changing world. New York, Longmans, Green, 1941. xiv, 219 p.
41–51774 HE8731.D5 1941

Bibliographical references in "Notes": p. 197–210.

Since the telephone was first successfully demonstrated in 1876, it has become a universal medium for the exchange of ideas between individuals. Communication between persons in neighboring cities had developed into transcontinental service by 1915, and transoceanic telephone service between New York and London was established in 1927. This nontechnical history, written by a former member of the technical staff of the Bell Laboratories, traces the economic and social impact of that development on this and other countries. The book includes chapters on "Telephone Operators" and "Telephone Directories."

4675. Harlow, Alvin F. Old wires and new waves; the history of the telegraph, telephone, and wireless. New York, Appleton-Century, 1936. xiv, 548 p. 36–27399 TK5115.H3

Bibliography: p. 527–538.

Although this is a history of the three great means of communication, more than two-thirds of the book is devoted to the development of the telegraph. It contains chapters on Samuel F. B. Morse, the inventor, Henry O'Reilly, who extended "the wires over a vaster field than any which promoters had yet dared to contemplate," and the first Atlantic cable. The evolution of the telephone and Alexander Graham Bell's struggle over patents, and the story of wireless communication are traced up to the organization of the big radio broadcasting chains. The author relates deeds of heroism accomplished by means of wire and wave during peace and war, which add human interest to the story.

4676. Mabee, Carleton. The American Leonardo, a life of Samuel F. B. Morse; with an introd. by Allan Nevins. New York, Knopf, 1943. xix, 420, xv p. 43–1967 TK5243.M7M3

Thesis (Ph. D.)—Columbia University, 1942.

References: p. 381–420.

A young scholar, who had access to a collection of Morse letters, diaries, photographs, and paintings, portrays his subject not only as the inventor of the telegraph, but also as an artist whose career in painting began in his youth and continued with varying success until 1837 when he gave it up to devote his energies to the development of the telegraph. Allan Nevins, in the Introduction, says that "Morse was something better than a great inventor; he was one of the great representative Americans of his time, a leader in many activities, and a man who enriched the national culture in various ways." The theme of Morse as an artist has been further explored by Oliver W. Larkin in Samuel F. B. Morse and American Democratic Art (Boston, Little, Brown, 1954. 215 p.).

4677. McDonald, Philip B. A saga of the seas; the story of Cyrus W. Field and the laying of the first Atlantic cable; illustrated from contemporary prints and portraits. New York, Wilson-Erickson, 1937. 288 p. 37–21616 TK5611.M3

Bibliography: p. 281–282.

The story of life in the United States during the latter half of the 19th century has been interwoven with the biography of an enthusiastic, energetic promoter whose foresight and courage inspired capitalists and scientists on both sides of the Atlantic to use their money and talents to produce a material link between the Old World and New. The author describes the influence of the Atlantic cable on international commerce, diplomacy, and news service; and the interest of Cyrus Field, in later years, in the transit system of New York, the laying of a Pacific cable, and other projects of public benefit. In the Preface, the author mentions the letters and autobiographical notes printed in Cyrus W. Field, edited by his daughter, Isabella Field Judson (New York, Harper, 1896. 332 p.) as being "the best source of original documents."

4678. Mackenzie, Catherine D. Alexander Graham Bell, the man who contracted space. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1928. 382 p.
28–28948 TK6143.B4M3

A narrative of the career of the versatile inventor of the telephone, who was also the oustanding genius of his generation in the education of the deaf, the financier of the Volta Bureau, the founder of the Aerial Experiment Association, and the guiding spirit in the establishment of the magazine Science. The author was for ten years Mr. Bell's secretary and the custodian of his papers. Out of that experience and the many conversations of those years she tells with enthusiasm and directness the story of his life "in terms of the work he did and the way he did it."

4679. Rhodes, Frederick Leland. Beginnings of telephony. New York, Harper, 1929. xvii, 261 p.
29–22388 TK6015.R5

"Sources of information consulted": p. 239–244.

Associated with the American Bell Telephone and the American Telephone and Telegraph Company as an electrical engineer, the author is well known for important work in connection with standardization of materials, apparatus, and practice in overhead and underground wire systems. In this book he makes available to students and workers interested in the early history of the telephone and in the field of electrical communications, the information which he has gathered from experience and original sources. The emphasis is on the origin and early development of such technical devices as the microphone transmitter, the telephone cable, and the switchboard. The Appendixes include a "List of the Most Important Law Suits Arising out of the Infringement of Alexander Graham Bell's Telephone Patents, with a Brief Description of the Circumstances of Each Suit;" "Early Uses of the Word Telephone;" and a "Numerical List of United States Patents Cited."

4680. Thompson, Robert L. Wiring a continent, the history of the telegraph industry in the United States, 1832–1866. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1947. xviii, 544 p.
47–12502 HE7775.T5

Thesis—Columbia University.

Bibliography: p. [518]–526.

The idea of an electromagnetic telegraph crystallized in the mind of Samuel F. B. Morse in 1832, and the Western Union Telegraph Company emerged in 1866 from a consolidation of all the individual companies that had sprung up during the years between. The author tells the story of men and events connected with those companies as he has found them in such sources as the John Dean Caton Papers, which he describes as "invaluable for an insight into the telegraph wars of the 1850's and 1860's"; the Samuel F. B. Morse Papers, which deal with the inception of the telegraph and patent controversies; and the Henry O'Reilly Papers, "the most important manuscript collection on the telegraph in existence."

4681. Ulriksson, Vidkunn. The telegraphers, their craft and their unions. Washington, Public Affairs Press, 1953. 218 p.
52–12861 HD6515.T325U5

Bibliography: p. 210–211.

The author, now on the faculty of the University of Wisconsin, has been a member of the Order of Railroad Telegraphers since 1918, and writes out of the conviction that the labor movement "has been and will continue to be one of the main bulwarks of our democratic way of life." Following a brief chapter on "Early Telegraph History," the evolution of unionism in the industry is sympathetically traced from the organization of the National Telegraph Union in 1863 down to 1951. A final chapter on "The Telegraph Fraternity" describes some of the interests and attitudes of a group who "have for the most part always regarded themselves as belonging in the professional category.

C. Radio, Television: Broadcasting

4682. Abbot, Waldo, and Richard L. Rider. Handbook of broadcasting; the fundamentals of radio and television. 4th ed. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1957. 531 p. illus.
56–9620 PN1991.5.A2 1957

"Glossary": p. 461–470.

Bibliography: p. 516–520.

Designed to give students "basic knowledge of every activity in a broadcasting station from announcing to producing, from writing to the technical operation," this Handbook has been used for twenty years as a textbook for elementary classes in the field of broadcasting. In this new edition Richard L. Rider, supervisor of television and motion pictures at the University of Illinois, has collaborated with the original author to expand the data on television. Those chapters and sections that deal with the fundamentals basically the same for both media have been retained, with supplementary information concerning TV, so as "to create a combined text which would be valuable for . . . students of radio and television." In 1951 Edgar E. Willis undertook "to provide a foundation on which advanced courses in specific phases of radio and television can be based; and to serve as a general introduction to broadcasting for those students who will take no other courses in the field," in Foundations in Broadcasting: Radio and Television (New York, Oxford University Press, 1951. 439 p.).

4683. Archer, Gleason L. Big business and radio. New York, American Historical Co., 1939. 503 p. 39–29972 TK6548.U6A82

An organizational history of the rise of the great broadcasting companies from 1922 to 1929, with the following decade much more sketchily treated. The author has been allowed access to the files of the Radio Corporation of America and the General Electric Company, and so documents the struggle between the "Radio Group" and the "Telephone Group" for the control of radio more thoroughly than is common for recent business history. The achievements of William S. Paley, "the magician who has built the great Columbia network," and of David Sarnoff, who completed the unification of R. C. A., are acclaimed. Subsequent chapters deal with the Government's antitrust suit against R. C. A. and the consent decree of Nov. 21, 1932, the effects of the depression on the industry, and the beginnings of television.

4684. Barnouw, Erik. Handbook of radio production; an outline of studio techniques and procedures in the United States. Illustrated by Victor Barnouw. Boston, Little, Brown, 1949. 324 p. 49–612 TK6570.B7B29

The author, who is now (1956) Editor, Center for Mass Communication, Columbia University Press, points out that since the air is the property of the people to be used only with the consent of the Federal Communications Commission and for public service, American radio is distinguished from other mass media by the wide participation of national and local groups in the production of programs. More than 60 percent of his handbook is devoted to the coördinated work of the production team. He describes the talents and techniques used by the actor, the sound man, the musician, the announcer and speaker, and the engineer and director. Excerpts from various programs and a script, with production notes, are given to illustrate the problems of the team, with a "Production Directory" at the end. It is a companion volume to the author's Handbook of Radio Writing, rev. ed. (Boston, Little, Brown, 1947. 336 p.).

4685. Callahan, Jennie (Waugh) Television in school, college, and community. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1953. 339 p. illus. 53–8992 LB1044.7.C33

Bibliography: p. 295–322.

During 1952–53 educators and other leading citizens filed petitions with the Federal Communications Commission to reserve some 209 frequencies for noncommercial television stations with educational purposes. This book has been written for those who have the responsibility for establishing educational TV stations, and writing and producing the programs. The list of sources includes materials available from TV producing groups, listed by states, as well as from the Joint Committee on Educational Television, the National Association of Educational Broadcasters, and the U. S. Office of Education. For other books and serials on educational television, by Charles A. Siepmann and others, see Chapter XXI, Section F, on Methods and Techniques of Education.

4686. Chester, Giraud, and Garnet R. Garrison. Television and radio, an introduction. 2d ed. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1956. 652 p. illus. 56–7206 TK6550.C43 1956

"Glossary of studio terms": p. 619–625.

Bibliography: p. 627–636.

The authors, who have had experience in radio and television teaching and research as well as in broadcasting, have made important changes in this enlarged edition "to reflect the new facts and new interests" which have developed since the first edition appeared in 1950 under the title Radio and Television. However, the basic intention of the authors is the same: "to provide a comprehensive, up-to-date textbook for introductory courses in broadcasting" which are offered in several hundred colleges and universities. Part I deals with the social aspects of radio and television, including "Educational Radio and Television" and "Standards of Criticism." Part II is devoted to studio practices and technique—station organization, talking on the air, types of programs, acting, directing, and "Broadcasting as a Career." Script excerpts are provided for practice so that the text may be used as a "working handbook."

4687. Commission on Freedom of the Press. The American radio, a report on the broadcasting industry in the United States, by Llewellyn White. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1947. xxi, 259 p. 47–19380 HE8698.C67
"Note on sources": p. 252–255.

One of a series of studies prepared by the Commission, which "was created to consider the freedom, functions, and responsibilities of major agencies of mass communication in our time." The author, who served as the assistant director of the Commission, points out the defections of the radio industry in fulfilling its obligations to the public, redefines the responsibilities of the industry within the framework of Federal regulation, and makes recommendations to the broadcasters, the FCC, and the public. "Freedom and accountability," the Commission concludes, "must represent the joint achievement of the industry, of community groups, and of government, acting in proper relation to one another."

4688. Cumming, William K. This is educational television. [Ann Arbor? Mich.] 1954. 264 p. illus. 54–62768 LB1044.7.C85

Dr. Cumming of the Department of Journalism at Michigan State College, and more recently Television Producer-Coordinator of its station WKAR–TV, believes that "television has the potential for becoming a highly significant tool in the total educational process." As a guide to educators and public service leaders still in doubt as to their course, he has made this survey of the actual achievements of the leading colleges and universities in the educational TV field, including, of course, his own, and has sought to describe and appraise their presentations. "Material for the book was gathered, in large degree, from personal interviews conducted across the country and from observation and participation in television operations." Statistics showing the "Enrollments for Educational Television Programs that Teach" appear in the Appendix. Directories of "Colleges Offering Courses in Television," and "Technical Schools for Television," appear in Edwin B. Broderick's Your Place in TV; Handy Guide for Young People (New York, McKay, 1954) p. 113–124.

4689. De Forest, Lee. Father of radio; the autobiography of Lee De Forest. Chicago, Wilcox & Follett, 1950. 502 p. 50–9446 TK5739.D4A3

Radios in some 50 million homes in 1955 are the contribution which the inventive genius of Lee De Forest has made to civilization. He completed his new "grid Audion" in 1906; 41 years later Charles F. Kettering said, "The spectacular growth of electronics to an enormous industry employing over a million workers and benefiting untold millions of people in all parts of the world may be said to have begun with that event." Believing that he knows better than anyone else many circumstances of the early history of radio and television, Mr. De Forest describes for the first time many episodes in their development. He tells of his youth in Iowa and Alabama, his literary, musical, and scientific education, his early inventions, and his experiments with wireless preceding the Audion. His narrative covers the beginnings of radio broadcasting, of sound films, and of television. There is also much detail concerning the organization of his companies, and the litigation which followed.

4690. DeSoto, Clinton B. Two hundred meters and down; the story of amateur radio. West Hartford, Conn., American Radio Relay League, 1936. 184 p. 37–376 TK6547.D4
"This work is publication no. 13 of the Radio Amateur's Library, published by the League."—Verso of t.-p.

By the year 1908 considerable numbers of amateurs were taking up wireless telegraphy as a hobby, and their interference with regular channels of communication led to the Radio Act of 1912, which confined them to wavelengths of 200 meters or less. Within this limit the "ham" flourished, and made the transition to radio, so that there were in 1936 "approximately 46,000 licensed amateur transmitting stations." The amateurs' organization into the American Radio Relay League and the International Amateur Radio Union, their contributions to the improvement of apparatus and communications, and their volunteer work in emergencies, are among the topics presented in this unusual volume, which certainly ought to be brought up to date.

4691. Ewbank, Henry L., and Sherman P. Lawton. Broadcasting: radio and television. New York, Harper, 1952. 528 p. 52–5432 PN1991.5.E9
Selected bibliography: p. 504–515.

The principal aim of the authors is "to describe our radio and television systems, consider the public service responsibilities of these important mass media, and suggest standards for evaluating broadcast programs." Government and nongovernmental control of broadcasting; the preparation and direction of various types of programs, including those for special audiences; methods of audience measurement; and the economic and social effects of listening are presented in nontechnical language, especially for college students and for program staff members of radio and television stations.

4692. Hutchinson, Thomas H. Here is television, your window to the world. With ninety-four illus. [Completely rev. ed.] New York, Hastings House, 1950. xvi, 368 p.
51–61 TK6630.H87 1950
Glossary: p. 365–368.

The author taught what was perhaps the first college class in television programming in 1940 at the Washington Square Writing Center of New York University, and has had much practical experience in producing and directing TV programs. In this textbook, originally published in 1946, he describes in detail "The Tools of Television"—the studio, the camera, sound, the control room, the projection booth, the transmitter, and the receiver—representative types of "Television Programs," and "The Commercial Aspect"—advertising programs and "spots," large and small-station operation, networks, theater television, and jobs. The final chapter summarizes the progress of TV in England, Holland, Germany, France, and America.

4693. Maclaurin, William Rupert. Invention & innovation in the radio industry, by W. Rupert Maclaurin with the technical assistance of R. Joyce Harman. With a foreword by Karl T. Compton. New York, Macmillan, 1949. xxi, 304 p. illus. (Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Studies of innovation) 49–8314 TK6547.M28
Bibliography: p. 292–298.

The author has chosen the radio industry as the subject of the first in a projected series of books on the consequences of technological changes in a number of industries. He traces the story of radio through the lives of the Europeans who did the fundamental research, to the advance engineering techniques developed in the industrial laboratories of the United States and applied to the industry. Chapters are devoted to patent litigation, and to the rise of industrial research in the fields of television and frequency modulation. Dr. Maclaurin concludes that technological innovation has positive effects on our economy, and that the rational handling of industrial research prepares the Nation not only to fight a war but to fight a depression.

4694. O'Meara, Carroll. Television program production. New York, Ronald Press, 1955. 361 p. illus. 55–6091 PN1992.5.O6

The author, a former producer-director for NBC–TV in Hollywood and New York, bases this book on notes gathered while he was being trained in television production by NBC. It is a practical manual for the TV producer, often technical but regularly concrete and clear, which deals both with his means—camera, title devices, film and slides, lighting, etc.—and with standard types of programs in the studio and "remote telecasts" outside it, such as sports events. Concluding chapters introduce color TV and censorship problems.

4695. Phillips, David C., John M. Grogan, and Earl H. Ryan. Introduction to radio and television. New York, Ronald Press, 1954. 432 p. illus. 54–7650 PN1991.5.P5

A book for those who want a general understanding of radio and television, as well as for those who plan careers in the two media and will pursue further specialized courses. It contains chapters on "Regulation of Radio and Television," "Films for Television," "Educational Television," and "Audience Measurement." Appended are a "Glossary of Radio and Television Terms" and specimen "Radio and Television Scripts."

4696. Seehafer, Eugene F., and Jack W. Laemmar. Successful radio and television advertising. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1951. 574 p.
51–2828 HF6146.R3S4

American business has practiced selling through the medium of the radio for over 30 years, and through TV since its large-scale introduction. In the course of this experience certain well-established principles have emerged, upon which "creative thinking" in broadcast advertising can proceed. This text, originally issued in mimeographed form in 1947, aims to formulate these principles, and to illustrate their operation throughout both media. The techniques of the retail advertising campaign, the problems of the national advertiser, and the art of selling time, are essentially the same, whether radio or TV is employed. The appendixes include a "Timing Table for Radio Commercials" and a glossary.

4697. Stasheff, Edward, and Rudy Bretz. The television program; its writing, direction, and production. [2d ed.] New York, Hill and Wang, 1956. 356 p. illus.
56–13991 PN1992.5.S8 1956

Although television is often regarded as being a new form of art, one of its principal functions has been the broadcasting of dramatic entertainments originally devised for media of longer standing. The essential differences between television and its forerunners—theater, films, and radio—are pointed out in order to emphasize how directors, writers, actors, and production personnel must adjust their techniques to the new medium. Technicalities are illustrated from original scripts, including a photographic reproduction of one complete director's script for a [Dave] "Garroway at Large" program. The chapter on "Marketing the Script," as well as a book by Max Wylie, Radio and Television Writ- ing, rev. and enl. (New York, Rinehart, 1950. 635 p.), will interest those who would like to write for television.

4698. Waller, Judith C. Radio, the fifth estate. 2d ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1950. 482 p. illus. (Houghton Mifflin radio broadcasting series) 50–9766 HE8698.W3 1950
Bibliography: p. 455–468.
The author is Director of Public Affairs and Education of the National Broadcasting Company's Central Division. Her book naturally stresses religious, agricultural, children's, and other types of public service programs, as well as educational broadcasting. It is, however, a rounded treatment of the subject as a whole, and for the general reader is probably the most serviceable introduction to radio as it was at its peak. The original publication was in 1946, and this revision includes only a six-page section on television.

D. Radio, Television: The Audience

4699. Bogart, Leo. The age of television; a study of viewing habits and the impact of television on American life. New York, Ungar Pub. Co., 1956. 348 p. 56–12046 HE8698.B6
Written for viewers who are interested in the effect of television on people rather than with its technical aspects, this book is based mostly on studies "which have used the interview method of asking people what television has meant in their lives." Following chapters on the growth of TV and the nature of its audience appeal, the author explores the content of TV programming, and analyzes its effect on reading, the movies, spectator sports, advertising, politics, and juvenile audiences. "The Status of TV Research" is summarized in an appendix, which observes that "remarkably little is known about the broadcasters themselves."

4700. Chappell, Matthew N., and Claude E. Hooper. Radio audience measurement. New York, Daye, 1944. xvi, 246 p. illus. 44–5827 HE9713.C5
The development of the radio as an advertising medium early impressed on the industry the need for measuring listening habits to determine the effectiveness of various types of programs on the buying habits of audiences. The data obtained from sampling measurements, made by major audience service organizations in 1929, 1934 and 1943, have been supplemented through surveys conducted by the major networks, by advertising agencies carrying radio accounts, and by other research groups. In this book the writers examine separately each method used in collecting such information, and the effectiveness of the method for the segment of the population chosen for study.

4701. Columbia University. Bureau of Applied Social Research. Radio listening in America; the people look at radio—again. Report on a survey conducted by the National Opinion Research Center of the University of Chicago, Clyde Hart, director; analyzed and interpreted by Paul F. Lazarsfeld and Patricia L. Kendall. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1948. 178 p. 49–450 HE8698.C654
A second survey of listening habits sponsored by the National Association of Broadcasters to determine the public's attitude toward radio. The first study, conducted under the direction of Harry H. Field and Paul F. Lazarsfeld, was published by the University of North Carolina Press in 1946: The People Look at Radio (158 p.). Seventy percent of the audience gave radio in general a rating of excellent or good; serious criticism was confined to a relatively small minority.

4702. Parker, Everett C., David W. Barry, and Dallas W. Smythe. The television-radio audience and religion. New York, Harper, 1955. xxx, 464 p. diagrs., tables. (Studies in the mass media of communication) 55–8526 BV656.3.P3
"This volume has grown out of the first serious effort to understand the effects of religious programs broadcast over radio and television. But it is also far more than that: because it undertakes to trace effects within the setting of a concrete community and in the lives of particular individuals, this study reveals a great deal about the total impact of newer methods of communication on an American city and its inhabitants." Conducted by the Communications Research Project supervised by the Yale University Divinity School under the chairmanship of Liston Pope, it analyzes the "church-relatedness" of families in New Haven, Connecticut, and the attitudes of ministers towards broadcasting. It surveys television and radio set ownership and contrasts the personality traits of the audiences that listen with those that do not listen to religious programs. The authors believe that its central and most important finding is "that in programming for religious use of the mass media, the ingenuity and flexibility of the planners must match the complexity of needs and circumstances of the potential audience." It will serve as a pilot study for those who desire to apply the techniques of the survey to a similar study of other communities.

4703. Siepmann, Charles A. Radio, television and society. New York. Oxford University Press, 1950. 410 p. 50–8505 HE8698.S529

Chapter bibliographies included in "Appendix VII": p. [389]–398.

"The first purpose of this book is to bring the general reader the history of a cultural revolution and to show what has been discovered by research concerning the effects of radio and television upon our tastes, opinions, and values. The second purpose is to deal with broadcasting as a reflection of our time and to throw light upon the problems of free speech, propaganda, public education, our relations with the rest of the world, and upon the concept of democracy itself." The author emphasizes ascertained facts, and is cautious in generalization and criticism, but suggests that "the greatest threat to our culture results from the general underestimation, in mass communication, of the public's potentialities." Materials for further study of the effect of TV on family life, public life, and children; its role in advertising and education; and the standards of American broadcasting will be found in the collection of readings: Television and Radio in American Life, edited by Herbert L. Marx, Jr. (New York, Wilson, 1953) and published as volume 25, no. 2, of The Reference Shelf series. It includes an extensive bibliography.

4704. Stewart, Raymond F. The social impact of television on Atlanta households. [Emory University, Ga.] 1952. 137 p. 52–41391 HE8698.S78

Bibliography: p. 135–137.

This is representative of several studies based on interviews that have been made in widely separated areas of the United States on the influence of television on children and on family life in general. This study includes a survey of television ownership in Atlanta, the owners' "interaction with society," and the patterns of behavior within the television family. The owners reported that they went out less in the evening, went to bed later, and engaged in less family conversation.

4705. Wylie, Max. Clear channels; television and the American people, a report to set owners. New York, Funk & Wagnalls, 1955. 408 p. 54–9743 HE8694.W87

A book concerned with the place of television in American society, by an author who has been a radio and television producer, a college teacher, and an advertising agency executive. He criticizes the critics of television and defends its effects on education, adult reading habits, and the morals of children. He raises the controversial issues of televising sports and governmental functions; challenges educators to learn the techniques of TV broadcasting and to take advantage of the channels reserved by the FCC for cultural programs; and points to television as a medium for the improvement of public health in the United States.

E. Government Regulation

4706. Edelman, Jacob M. The licensing of radio services in the United States, 1927 to 1947; a study in administrative formulation of policy. Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1950. 229 p. (Illinois studies in the social sciences, v. 31, no. 4) 50–63485 HE8693.U6E4 H31.I4, v. 31, no. 4

Bibliography: p. 224–226.

The development of the body of rules and decisions that has governed radio broadcasting since the organization of the Federal Radio Commission in 1927 is traced through its first two decades, with the leading policy developments of 1947–50 described in footnotes. The author thinks that, on the whole, regulation by independent commission has proved "an adequate device for maintaining a continuing surveillance" over an area of rapid change and many controversial issues. Certain "striking departures from declared policy" by the Commission, usually in the direction of greater profitability of broadcast operation, have resulted from the fact that at its hearings the industry is strongly represented, while "groups that represent listeners are rare, and those that do arise become impotent with impressive regularity." Laurence F. Schmeckebier in The Federal Radio Commisison; Its History, Activities and Organization (Washington, Brookings Institution, 1932. 162 p. Institute for Government Research. Service monographs of the United States Government, no. 65) describes in detail the regulatory functions of that body, which was superseded in 1934 by the Federal Communications Commission.

4707. Herring, James M., and Gerald C. Gross. Telecommunications; economics and regulation. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1936. 544 p. illus. 36–23240 HE206.H4

The economic and public service aspects of the telegraph, including submarine telegraphy, telephone, and radio industries, are traced in this book from the beginnings of those industries to the passage of the Communications Act of 1934. To this end chapters deal with revenue and expenditures, criteria for rate adjustments, concentration of ownership, and State, National, and international regulation. The authors believe that the Act of 1934 laid the groundwork for the accomplishment of its central purpose: so to regulate communication by wire or radio as to make available to the people of the United States a rapid, efficient, nation-wide, and world-wide service with adequate facilities at reasonable charges. The book is now considerably out-of-date, but remains quite unreplaced.

4708. Rhyne, Charles S. Municipal regulations, taxation and use of radio and television. Washington, National Institute of Municipal Law Officers, 1955. 84 p. ([National Institute of Municipal Law Officers, Washington, D. C.] Report no. 143) 55–24929 JS351.N3, no. 143

Most cities are themselves users of radio frequencies, regularly in their police and fire departments, and sometimes in municipal programs and stations. They are called upon to take regulatory action about such problems as interference with radio and television reception, the erection of transmitters and antennas, community television systems, the examination and licensing of TV and radio repairmen, and even program content. They have also to secure some contribution from commercial radio and TV stations to the cost of municipal government. This handbook attempts to bring together information on the present state of municipal action in these fields and prints some typical ordinances and regulations in an appendix.

4709. Robinson, Thomas Porter. Radio networks and the Federal Government. New York, Columbia University Press, 1943. 278 p. A 43–2030 HE9711.U5R6 1943

Thesis (Ph. D.)—Columbia University, 1943.
Bibliography: p. [265]–267.

Between 1937 and 1941 Congress and the Federal Communications Commission investigated the three great radio networks—the National Broadcasting Company and the Columbia and Mutual Broadcasting Systems—as a form of monopolistic control of individual stations. This dissertation draws upon the hearings of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee and of the Commission to illustrate the operation of network control in such matters as artist contracts, station rates, and the rejection of programs, and emphasizes the relationship between the Commission and NBC. Convinced that network organization is economically inevitable, the author takes exception to a number of the new regulations which the Commission promulgated subsequent to the investigations.

4710. U. S. Federal Communications Commission. Investigation of the telephone industry in the United States. Letter from the Chairman, Federal Communications Commission, transmitting a report of the Federal Communications Commission on the investigation of the telephone industry in the United States, as unanimously adopted by the Commission . . . Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1939. xxv, 661 p. illus., tables, diagrs. (76th Cong., 1st sess. House. Document 340) 39–26969 HE8803.A5 1939

Referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered printed with illustrations June 14, 1939.

This report resulted from a joint resolution of the Congress, approved by the President on March 15, 1935. The investigation took four years and naturally focused upon the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, whose officials exert "effective nation-wide control" over the Bell Telephone System, and of which the Western Electric Company is the manufacturing department. It covers such aspects of the industry as corporate and financial history; capital structure; intercompany relationships; service contracts; accounting methods; apportionment of investment, revenues, and expenses between state and interstate operations; methods of competition; the effect of monopolistic control upon telephone rates and charges; and the reasons for failure to reduce rates and charges during years of declining prices. The Commission concluded that this investigation had provided it "with basic data to serve as the foundation for the inauguration and development of continuous and efficient administrative processes in the highly technical field of telephone regulation." "During the course of the investigation, and as a result of the direct efforts of the investigatory staff, telephone-rate reductions now aggregating in excess of $30,000,000 were effected in the interest . . . of the American telephone-using public."

4711. U. S. President's Communications Policy Board. Telecommunications, a program for progress; a report. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1951. 238 p.

51–60572 HE7763.A44 1951

A summary of the information concerning the radio, telephone, and telegraph services gathered during a year's study by the President's Communications Policy Board. The five problems examined are: policies and plans for reconciling the conflicting interests and needs of Government and private users of the spectrum space; management of the total telecommunications resources to meet the changing demands of national security; a national policy for international telecommunications agreements; maintaining a sound telecommunications industry; and strengthening the Government's own organization to cope with those issues. Concerning the last problem, the principal recommendation of the Board was the establishment "in the Executive Office of the President a three-man Telecommunications Advisory Board to advise and assist the President in the execution of his responsibilities in the telecommunications field."

XVII

Science and Technology

A.	General Works	4712–4730
B.	Particular Sciences	4731–4741
C.	Individual Scientists	4742–4760
D.	Science and Government	4761–4779
E.	Invention	4780–4792
F.	Engineering	4793–4803

THE recognition of science as a determining factor in American economic and social progress has been furthered by its decisive influence on the political future of the United States as shaped by two world wars. A comparison of this chapter with others in this bibliography makes it clear that the history of the physical sciences and their application has been somewhat neglected by the historical profession. Several reasons have been advanced for this—the difficulty of sorting the purely American contributions from the larger framework of world science, neglect in preserving the letters and papers of scientists, the hesitation among historians to invade specialized fields, and the apparent indifference of scientists to interpreting the achievements of science in relation to other aspects of American life. The books in Section A by Hindle (no. 4718), Jaffe (nos. 4721, 4722), Johnson (no. 4723), and Struik (no. 4730) show that a start has been made toward the coverage of certain periods and geographical areas, although much remains to be done in the basic sciences to fill up the outline provided by Oliver in his History of American Technology (no. 4727). Section B indicates that certain sciences have received more attention than others, and that the complete history of mathematics, physics, and other branches remains to be written. To round out the picture, histories of representative scientific societies, and collective biographies of scientists in general, or of scientists working in a particular branch, have been added to the first two sections. Section C contains a selection of biographies of individual scientists, many of whom are great names reflecting major advances in their fields, while others are probably more representative than great. The publications in Section D describe the interrelations that have developed between science and government, especially the Federal Government, in the service and defense of human welfare. It includes histories of major organizations such as the Smithsonian Institution (no. 4775) and the National Science Foundation (no. 4778, annotation), and surveys of Federal aid to scientific research and resources in terms of manpower and materials, as well as treatments of certain Government agencies whose functions are primarily scientific. In Sections E and F histories of invention and engineering science, and biographies of inventors and engineers have been assembled to illustrate the application of science in technological achievements which fulfill human needs. However, the technological aspects of medicine, agriculture, and the graphic arts will be covered in other chapters.

A. General Works

4712. American men of science; a biographical directory. 9th ed. Edited by Jaques Cattell. Lancaster, Pa., Science Press., 1955–56. 3 v.
6–7326 Q141.A47

American Men of Science originated as a manuscript reference list for the Carnegie Institution of Washington. The latest edition has been divided into three volumes to accommodate "a phenomenal recent expansion in almost every field of science." The first volume, "Physical Sciences," includes biographical sketches of living scientists in the fields of the physical, mathematical, chemical, and geological sciences. Volume II, "Biological Sciences," includes those in the fields of zoology, botany, medical research, and affiliated areas. Volume III, "The Social & Behavioral Sciences," contains names and fields not previously found in American Men of Science. To the biographies of those in the fields of psychology, geography, and anthropology, which appeared in the earlier editions, have been added many names in other branches of the social sciences such as economics, sociology, and government. The three volumes form an outstanding reference tool in all fields of science. In 1951 the U. S. Department of Labor published as its Bulletin no. 1027: Employment, Education, and Earnings of American Men of Science, by Theresa R. Shapiro and Helen Wood (Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off. 48 p.), which is a statistical analysis based upon a questionnaire sent out to gather information for a "roster of key scientists for use by the National Research Council, the Department of Defense, and other agencies concerned with our supply of scientific personnel, and to provide data for the 1949 edition of The Biographical Directory of American Men of Science."

677676 O–63–41

4713. Bates, Ralph S. Scientific societies in the United States. New York, Wiley, 1945. 246 p. 45–5801 Q11.A1B3

"A publication of the Technology Press, Massachusetts Institute of Technology."

Bibliography: p. 193–220.

As the first extensive history of the work of American scientific societies, this book fills "a gap in the literature dealing with the intellectual history of our country." It traces their growth and influence from the organization of Benjamin Franklin's Junto in 1727, which laid the foundation of the American Philosophical Society, the oldest scientific society now in existence in America, to the year 1944. Recognized as "outstanding agencies for increasing and diffusing the world's store of knowledge," national, state, and local scientific bodies proliferated during the period of "National Growth, 1800–1865," which witnessed the founding of the National Academy of Sciences to furnish technical advice to the government in the prosecution of the Civil War. Specialization was the dominating idea of the years 1866 to 1918, which saw the foundation of national societies in the various branches of science and technology. During the period 1919 to 1944 American scientists found their places in international scientific organizations; the National Research Council and other councils coordinated, directed, and initiated scientific projects; and American science reached a maturity that created interest in its own history.

4714. Bell, Whitfield J. Early American science, needs and opportunities for study. Williamsburg, Va., Institute of Early American History and Culture, 1955. 85 p. 56–211 Q127.U6B35

Sponsored by the Institute of Early American History and Culture, this is the first in a series of studies in several specialized fields that have been inadequately investigated. Of its two parts, the first surveys, and documents with bibliographical footnotes, the categories in which further study is needed. The second part is a bibliography, classified in sections on "The General History of Science"; "History of Science in America (to about 1820)"; "Periodicals, Devoted to, or Often Publishing Contributions to, the History of Science"; and "Fifty Early American Scientists (to about 1820)." Titles cited in the first part are as a rule not repeated in the second. The author hopes that the study will suggest to students new subjects and materials that should be explored in every aspect of the history of early American science. To assist them, "the staff of the Institute will gladly provide, when it can, further specific suggestions for research on any of the topics mentioned here or on others like them."

4715. A Century of science in America, with special references to the American journal of science, 1818–1918. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1918. 458 p. (Yale University. Mrs. Hepsa Ely Silliman memorial lectures) 19–218 Q127.U6C3

Contains bibliographies.

Fourteen scientists contribute chapters in the areas of their competence to this volume commemorating the centennial of the founding of the American Journal of Science, "the only scientific periodical in this country to maintain an uninterrupted existence since that early date." The chapters throw light on the scope of the papers published in the Journal, and the development of the particular branches of science as they emerged from 1818 to 1918. Four chapters on various phases of geology by Charles Schuchert, Herbert E. Gregory, Joseph Barrell, and George Otis Smith, reflect the prominent place which geological notes and papers have occupied in the Journal since its inception. Other chapters are devoted to Paleontology, by Richard Swann Lull; Petrology, by Louis V. Pirsson; Mineralogy, by William E. Ford; the Geophysical Laboratory of the Carnegie Institution of Washington, by R. B. Sosman; Chemistry, by Horace L. Wells and Harry W. Foote; Physics, by Leigh Page; Zoology, by Wesley R. Coe; and Botany, by George L. Goodale. The increase in the amount of periodical scientific literature during the century under discussion indicates the growing place of scientific investigation in the intellectual life of the period.

4716. Coleman, Laurence V. Company museums. Washington, American Association of Museums, 1943. 173 p. 43–51215 T179.C6

The director of the American Association of Museums points out that 80 business companies in the United States—manufacturing corporations, commercial houses, railroads, public utilities, newspapers, banks, and insurance companies—are known to have museums of their own. He gives a brief history of the museum movement in business, which had its beginning in the 19th century, and describes the usefulness of museums as builders of company morale, as reference tools, and as vehicles for good public relations. He discusses all phases of museum work—management, quarters, collecting, exhibition, and interpretation of the collection to visitors. The field work for this study was carried out in 1942 by Carl C. Curtiss, who also compiled the descriptive directory of "Company Museums in the United States" which appears in the Appendix. Organizers and managers of such museums will find this book a useful guide, and for the student of American technological development it contains a wealth of suggestions and sources.

4717. Fairchild, Herman Le Roy. A history of the New York Academy of Sciences, formerly the Lyceum of Natural History. New York, The Author, 1887. 190 p. 1–617 Q11.N67

Founded in 1817 for the study of natural history, "particularly as it relates to the illustration of the physical character of the country we inhabit," the New York Academy of Sciences is the fourth oldest scientific society in the United States. In 1836 it opened its own Lyceum Building at 561–65 Broadway, only to lose it 8 years later as a consequence of the financial panic of 1837. In 1876 it adopted its present name in order to accommodate "those working in all departments of science." Ten years later the Academy's recording secretary put together this modest account of its first seven decades from its minutes and other records, and included chapters on its foundation, original members, officers, collections, library, and publications, as well as biographical notices of its leading members. The Academy's second 70 years, even more productive than the first, remain unchronicled.

4718. Hindle, Brooke. The pursuit of science in Revolutionary America, 1735–1789. Chapel Hill, Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture, Williamsburg, Va., by University of North Carolina Press, 1956. 410 p. 56–4168 Q127.U6H5

"Bibliographical note": p. 387–392.

The author's interest in this subject began with his doctoral dissertation, The Rise of the American Philosophical Society, 1766–1787 (Philadelphia, 1949. 66 l.). Of the book's three parts, the first depicts the group in America, England, and on the Continent who studied the natural history of the colonies, and through correspondence and exchange of specimens created intercolonial and international bonds. The second period (1763–75) is characterized by the rise of scientific societies and the publication of astronomical observations which impressed Europeans with a new maturity in American scientific thought. In the third period, the men, the institutions, and the interrelations that had sustained science were disrupted by the Revolution. However, such statesmen as Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, and Adams were determined that science should flourish in America, and that the spark which had been kindled should not die. The "unprecedented richness of modern America is a monument to the faith of the Revolutionary generation in the power and beneficence of science, just as its form of government is a monument to their faith in man's capacity to govern himself."

4719. Hornberger, Theodore. Scientific thought in the American colleges, 1638–1800. Austin, University of Texas Press, 1945. 108 p. A46–1632 Q181.H77

Published as Project no. 67 of the University Research Institute.

Of the 27 colleges which existed in the United States prior to 1800, the author gives some information about 16, although only Harvard, Yale, William and Mary, Princeton, Columbia, Pennsylvania, Brown, and Dartmouth had enough of a history by that date to make it proper to speak of their cultural influence. From 1640 to 1690 geometry, physics, and astronomy held a very minor place in the curriculum. During the next 50 years "natural philosophy," botany, zoology, and chemistry emerged as regular subjects, and experimental demonstrations with "philosophical apparatus" in the classroom became the rule. An analysis of the attitudes of representative alumni toward science leads the author to conclude that those of the first period shared an enthusiasm for the "new science" which, in the years 1690 to 1740, gave way to a growing sense of conflict between science and religion. However, "by the end of the 18th century . . . 'science' had become a word to conjure with." A beautifully illustrated book by I. Bernard Cohen, Some Early Tools of American Science (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1950. 201 p.), describes in detail the "philosophical apparatus" at Harvard University from 1764 to 1825 and, in certain aspects, is also a history of science as taught at Harvard during that period.

4720. Industrial research laboratories of the United States. 10th ed. Comp. by James F. Mauk. Washington, National Academy of Sciences, National Research Council, 1956. 560 p. (National Research Council Publication 379)
21-26022 T176.I65, no. 379

A directory of 4,834 nongovernmental research laboratories including those maintained by commercial firms and trade associations, independent commercial laboratories, and independent nonprofit laboratories. Testing and university laboratories are not included. The addresses, names of presidents, and, in some cases, of other executive officers are given, and the size, makeup, and activities of the research staff are described. The great increase in the number of laboratories listed since the first edition appeared in 1920 is an indication of the growing dependence of business and industry on research.

4721. Jaffe, Bernard. Men of science in America; the role of science in the growth of our country. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1944. xl, 600 p.
44-5618 Q127.U6J27

"Sources and reference material": p. 555-571.

CONTENTS.—1. Thomas Harriot (naturalist and mathematician), bringing the seeds of science to America.—2. Benjamin Franklin (natural philosopher), the first fruit of American science.—3. Benjamin Thompson (physicist), science faces the tumult of the American Revolution.—4. Thomas Cooper (chemist), science advances slowly in the newborn Republic.—5. Constantine Samuel Rafinesque (botanist), American science ventures out across new frontiers.—6. Thomas Say (entomologist), science caught in the first uprush of an industrial revolution.—7. William T. G. Morton (anesthetist), American makes medical history.—8. Joseph Henry (physicist), the United States government establishes a new incubator for science.—9. Matthew Fontaine Maury (hydrographer), America contributes to the science of the sea.—10. Louis J. R. Agassiz (biologist), the repercussions of Darwinism in the United States.—11. James Dwight Dana (geologist), Federal and state surveys aid the advances of science.—12. Othniel Charles Marsh (paleontologist), dinosaurs and other fossils of our gilded age.—13. J. Willard Gibbs (mathematical physicist), America in the new world of chemistry.—14. Samuel Pierpont Langley (aeronautical engineer), American science gives men wings.—15. Albert Abraham Michelson (physicist), America participates in the revolution of modern physics.—16. Thomas Hunt Morgan (geneticist), American science come of age.—17. Herbert McLean Evans (anatomist), American science pioneers in two new related fields.—18. Edwin Powell Hubble (astronomer), giant instruments and huge foundations for American science.—19. Ernest Orlando Lawrence (nuclear physicist), the turn of the tide in world science.—20. Future of science in America.

"With a view to finding possible relationships between the kind of science which developed in America and the type of civilization which has flourished here," the author bases his selection of 20 scientists on the significance of their contributions as pioneer research, with emphasis on the pure sciences and the workers' awareness of the social scene in which they worked. He thereby illustrates the interdependence between scientific progress and political and social history in the United States.

4722. Jaffe, Bernard. Outposts of science; a journey to the workshops of our leading men of research. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1935. xxvi, 547 p.
35-31946 Q127.U6J3

"Sources and reference material": p. 517-529.

Selecting 13 Americans eminent for scientific research in as many different fields, the author interviewed them, visited their laboratories, and studied their scientific papers. Seeking to "give the average reader some idea of the tremendous activity going on behind the doors of the laboratories of science," he outlines the development of their specialties and against this background presents the significance of their specific achievements. Separate chapters describe and evaluate the work of Thomas Hunt Morgan in genetics, Aleš Hrdlička in anthropology, William H. Welch in bacteriology and immunology, Maud Slye in cancer research, John Jacob Abel in endocrinology, Adolf Meyer in psychiatry, Elmer V. McCollum in nutrition, Leland O. Howard in entomology, Robert A. Millikan in atomic physics, Arthur H. Compton in radiation, George Ellery Hale in astrophysics, Charles G. Abbot in meteorology, and Richard C. Tolman in astronomical cosmology. All of these scientists save Morgan, who died soon after his interview, reviewed and approved Jaffe's account of their work. The volume gives a vivid panorama of American scientific investigation two decades ago.

4723. Johnson, Thomas Cary. Scientific interests in the Old South. New York, Appleton-Century, for the Institute for Research in the Social Sciences, University of Virginia, 1936. 217 p.

(University of Virginia. Institute for Research in the Social Sciences. Institute monograph no. 23)
36–28317 Q127.U6J6

This is "a study of the attitude of the planters, politicians, and professional men of the Cotton Kingdom and of their wives and daughters toward the natural sciences." The author analyzes the faculties, curriculum, and apparatus found in the colleges and "female academies" in order to illustrate the interests of teachers and students in scientific writing, societies, and study. The appearance of articles on chemistry, physics, astronomy, and botany in the newspapers and periodicals; the popularity of lectures on the natural sciences; attempts to establish museums; and the formation of circles bent on scientific investigation witness to the South's awareness of the achievements of science. The author includes chapters on scientific developments in cities as wide apart, traditionally and culturally, as Charleston and New Orleans, and concludes that "the common assumption that the Old South was a gloomy region cut off from the scientific light of the Occidental world seems to be unsustained by the evidence."

4724. Jordan, David Starr, ed. Leading American men of science. New York, Holt, 1910. 471 p. 17 port. (Biographies of leading Americans, edited by W. P. Trent) 10–26275 Q141.J7

CONTENTS.—Benjamin Thompson, Count Rumford, physicist, by Edwin E. Slosson.—Alexander Wilson [and] John James Audubon, ornithologists, by Witmer Stone.—Benjamin Silliman, chemist, by Daniel Coit Gilman.—Joseph Henry, physicist, by Simon Newcomb.—Louis Agassiz, zoologist, by Charles Frederick Holder.—Jeffries Wyman, anatomist, by Burt G. Wilder.—Asa Gray, botanist, by John M. Coulter.—James Dwight Dana, geologist, by William North Rice.—Spencer Fullerton Baird, zoologist, by C. F. Holder.—Othniel Charles Marsh, paleontologist, by George Bird Grinnell.—Edward Drinker Cope, paleontologist, by Marcus Benjamin.—Josiah Willard Gibbs, physicist, by Edwin E. Slosson.—Simon Newcomb, astronomer, by Marcus Benjamin.—George Brown Goode, zoologist, by D. S. Jordan.—Henry Augustus Rowland, physicist, by Ira Remsen.—William Keith Brooks, zoologist, by E. A. Andrews.

"Short and sympathetic biographies of [17] leaders in American science, each one written by a man in some degree known as a disciple." Dr. Jordan chose the subjects and the authors, but was compelled to turn the remainder of the editorial work over to Dr. Slosson. Simon Newcomb, author of the sketch of Joseph Henry, died while the work was still in progress, and was promptly added to the list of subjects. American scientific progress for more than a century is largely summed up in the work of these men, whose lives span the years 1753 to 1909.

4725. Knapp, Robert H., and Hubert B. Goodrich. Origins of American scientists; a study made under the direction of a committee of the faculty of Wesleyan University. Chicago, University of Chicago Press for Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., 1952. xiv, 450 p. 52–14611 Q127.U6K55

This book may be considered, in part, an attempt to answer some of the questions raised by the President's Scientific Research Board in its report (no. 4779) which indicated a shortage of scientific personnel in relation to the probable requirements of the American nation. This study is the result of a statistical analysis of several hundred institutions in an attempt to establish their effectiveness in the education of scientists, and intensive case studies of 22 smaller colleges (Appendix, p. 299–431). It sets up criteria for the selection of students by colleges and recommends colleges of "broad intellectual emphasis" to students. The information regarding types of institutions which have been most successful in training scientists should be helpful to all who plan a scientific education. The authors also evaluate comparable studies of scientific personnel, pointing out the limitations of some. Special weight is given to Stephen S. Visher's Scientists Starred, 1903–1943, in "American Men of Science" (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1947. 556 p.), which studies the education, birthplace, distribution, background, and developmental factors of those regarded by their colleagues as outstanding scientists.

4726. A Memorial of George Brown Goode, together with a selection of his papers on museums and on the history of science in America. Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1901. 515 p. 110 port. (Annual report of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution . . . 1897. Report of the U. S. National Museum, pt. 2)
14–19898 Q11.U5 1897, pt. 2

The memorial meeting was held February 13, 1897, in the lecture room of the United States National Museum, under the auspices of the Joint Commission of the Scientific Societies, and in cooperation with the patriotic and historical societies of Washington.

Report of the meeting held in commemoration of the life and services of George Brown Goode, with a memoir by Samuel P. Langley: p. 1–61.

Papers by George Brown Goode (p. 63–477): Museum-history and museums of history.—The genesis of the United States National Museum.—The principles of museum administration.—The museums of the future.—The origin of the national scientific and educational institutions of the United States.—The beginnings of natural history in America.—The beginnings of American science.—The first national scientific congress (Washington, April, 1844) and its connection with the organization of the American Association.

The published writings of George Brown Goode, 1869–1896. By R. I. Geare: p. 479–500.

Dr. Goode, although cut off by pneumonia in his 46th year, accomplished more than most men during his life (1851–96). He was an authority on fishes, and co-author of the monumental Oceanic Ichthyology (Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1895. 2 v.). Since 1887 he had been Assistant Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, in charge of the National Museum, and was the outstanding museum administrator of his day. Many of the papers collected here are still, after six decades or more, among the most valuable writings on their subjects.

4727. Oliver, John W. History of American technology. New York, Ronald Press, 1956. 676 p. 56–6269 T21.O45

"The distinction of this volume is that it represents the first comprehensive historical account of American technology and invention as a basic contribution to the nation's culture," says Guy Stanton Ford in a brief foreword. Largely a compilation from secondary authorities, it derives its value from its systematic inclusiveness, and from its regular emphasis on the technological foundations of economic developments which are in other respects well known. Even in the 17th century the American colonists designed new tools, and devised new methods of cultivating the soil, tanning leather, and processing wool and flax: already "American technology was born." "The 'homespun' age was on its way out during the second decade of the 19th century." In America's industrial revolution, unlike England's, the workers, farmer-mechanics trained in the workshops of New England, welcomed the machine. As early as 1798 Eli Whitney evolved "the system of interchangeable parts and thus paved the way for America's unique contribution to world technology—mass production." By 1850 America had become "a nation alert to science" as the principal agency of social progress. The author pursues his subject with unflagging enthusiasm through the age of steel and the electrical age, and concludes with an optimistic glance at the potential effects of automation. The footnote references at the end of each chapter are supplemented when necessary by a bibliographical note.

4728. Scientific and technical societies of the United States and Canada. 6th ed. Washington, National Academy of Sciences, National Research Council, 1955. 447 p. 27–21604 AS15.H3

This handbook appeared first in 1908, and further editions were published between 1927 and 1948. In this edition entries are limited to "membership group organizations," and other categories, such as trade associations with research activities, have been eliminated. The data on Canadian associations have been supplied by the National Research Council of Canada. In addition to the address, names of officers, and date of organization, the purpose, number of members, frequency of meetings, size of library, research funds, medals awarded, and publications of the societies are given.

4729. Special Libraries Association. Science-Technology Division. Handbook of scientific and technical awards in the United States and Canada, 1900–1952. Edited by Margaret A. Firth. New York, Special Libraries Association, 1956. xxiv, 491 p. 56–7004 Q141.S63

A "selected listing of the most important awards presented by certain of the scientific and technical societies in the United States and Canada to individuals in recognition of their meritorious achievement in scientific fields." Awards granted by foundations, universities, publishers, and companies are not included. The separate listings for the United States and Canada are arranged alphabetically under the names of the societies. The recipients are listed chronologically under the names of the societies. Personal name, award title, and subject indexes permit of ready reference. Through 1928 only the names of recipients are supplied. Reference to published sources of information about their lives and the circumstances of the awards are cited from 1929.

4730. Struik, Dirk Jan. Yankee science in the making. Boston, Little, Brown, 1948. xiii, 430 p. 48–8195 Q127.U6S8 1948

Bibliography: p. [387]–416.

A professor of mathematics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology investigates science and technology in the stable community of New England between 1780 and 1860, on the premise that the history of science "must include its sociology." The colonial and revolutionary periods are briefly treated in two preliminary chapters. In 1780 New England had only a few scientists, with interests limited to astronomy, medicine, or agronomy, and this situation was not greatly altered during the Federalist period. Only with the Jacksonian period, opening about 1830, did there arise "a mass interest in science and technical questions." Major scientific institutions were founded, civil engineering became an influential profession, and technological advances permitted modern industries to assume their shapes. By 1863, when President Lincoln organized the National Academy of Sciences, "New England science had grown into American science." Sketches of many significant figures in pure science and technology are incorporated in the narrative.

B. Particular Sciences

4731. Browne, Charles Albert, and Mary Elvira Weeks. A history of the American Chemical Society, seventy-five eventful years. Washington, American Chemical Society, 1952. 526 p. 53–238 QD1.A58

Includes bibliographies.

PARTIAL CONTENTS.—Precursors.—Beginnings.—The secession period.—The new order.—The twenty-fifth anniversary, before and after.—Specialization and dangers of disunion.—Strivings for consolidation.—International relations, 1876–1914.—The American Chemical Society and the First World War.—The Society completes its first half century.—The start of the Society's second half century.—The American Chemical Society during the Second World War.—The postwar reorganization.—Growth and readjustment.—Increasing professional consciousness.—International relations, 1918–1951.—Contributions of the Divisions.—Publications.—Awards, memorial lectures, and research foundations.—The diamond jubilee.

Dr. Browne, historian of the American Chemical Society from 1945 until his death in 1947, completed only nine chapters of this history. Dr. Weeks of the staff of the Kresge-Hooker Scientific Library at Wayne University completed the unfinished chapters and supplied the supplemental material. The Preface is, for the most part, a memorial to Dr. Browne.

4732. Chittenden, Russell H. The development of physiological chemistry in the United States. New York, Chemical Catalog Co., 1930. 427 p. (American Chemical Society. Monograph series, no. 54) 30–32722 QP514.C5

The American Chemical Society, by arrangement with the Interallied Conference of Pure and Applied Science (1919), undertook the production of a series of scientific and technological monographs of which this study is one. The author's association with the first laboratory of physiological chemistry in America at the Sheffield Scientific School, Yale University, where he was professor of the subject from 1882 to 1922, has given him exceptional competence to write this history. He traces the development of physiological chemistry in the United States from 1870 to the late 1920's in the scientific laboratories and investigations, the personalities and writings, and the universities and experimental stations which have contributed to the "knowledge of the chemico-physiological processes of the animal body."

4733. Fairchild, Herman Le Roy. The Geological Society of America, 1888–1930. A chapter in earth science history. New York, The Society, 1932. xvii, 232 p. 32–24464 QE1.G218F3

At the request of the Council of the Geological Society of America, the secretary of the Society from 1891 to 1906, who also served as president in 1912, has written a history of the Society from its formal organization by himself and twelve Fellows, since deceased, on December 27, 1888, to 1930. The story of the Society and its offshoots—the Paleontological Society, the Mineralogical Society of America, and the Society of Economic Geologists—is preceded by an historical sketch of geological science from its Greco-Latin beginnings during the five centuries before Christ, to its development in Western Europe and America through the year 1888. While this history was in the press the Society was bequeathed some four and a quarter million dollars, which placed it among the wealthiest scientific societies in the United States.

4734. Geiser, Samuel W. Naturalists of the frontier. [2d. ed., rev. and enl.] Dallas, University Press, Southern Methodist University, 1948. 296 p. 48–7357 QH26.G42 1948

"Principal sources": p. 264–269.

CONTENTS.—The naturalist on the frontier.—Jacob Boll.—In defense of Jean Louis Berlandier.—Thomas Drummond.—Audubon in Texas.—Louis Cachand Ervenberg.—Ferdinand Jakob Lindheimer.—Ferdinand Roemer, and his travels in Texas.—Charles Wright.—Gideon Lincecum.—Julien Reverchon.—Gustaf Wilhelm Belfrage.—Notes on scientists of the first frontier.

The beginnings of science in the Southwest, especially Texas, and the struggle for economic survival on the frontier are presented in the biographies of these early naturalists. The second edition contains one biography and a chapter on scientific study in the Old South prior to 1850 which did not appear in the first (1937). The author says that the men whose lives have been sketched here are but a handful compared with the scores of workers "who during the frontier period contributed to our cultural and scientific advance," and appends a "Partial List of Naturalists and Collectors in Texas" (p. 270–284), which gives some biographical information and references to sources. Joseph A. Ewan suggests that his Rocky Mountain Naturalists (Denver, University of Denver Press, 1950. 358 p.) may be used as a companion piece to Geiser's book. It contains biographical sketches of Edwin James, John C. Frémont, Charles C. Parry, Edward L. Greene, Thomas C. Porter, Harry N. Patterson, Marcus E. Jones, Eugene Penard, and Theodore D. A. Cockerell; a 200-page roster of Rocky Mountain naturalists (1682–1932); and bibliographical notes.

4735. Haynes, Williams. Chemical pioneers; the founders of the American chemical industry. New York, Van Nostrand, 1939. 288 p.
39–17461 TP139.H38

Originally published serially in Chemical Industries, and projected as a two-volume work, the second volume of which apparently has not been published. After describing the pioneer efforts of John Winthrop, Jr., in 17th-century Massachusetts, the volume outlines the lives of 15 men born between 1801 and 1865 whose activities extended from pure research to the development of practical processes and the organization of complex manufacturing enterprises. The progress of a new technology and a new industry is illustrated in these sketches of George D. Rosengarten, Martin Kalbfleish, Alexander Cochrane, James Jay Mapes, Eugene R. Grasselli, George T. Lewis, Lucien C. Warner, Edward Mallinckrodt, August Klipstein, Ernest C. Klipstein, Martin Dennis, Jacob Hasslacher, John F. Queeny, and Frank S. Washburn.

4736. Meisel, Max. A bibliography of American natural history; the pioneer century, 1769–1865; the rôle played by the scientific societies; scientific journals; natural history museums and botanic gardens; state geological and natural history surveys; federal exploring expeditions in the rise and progress of American botany, geology, mineralogy, paleontology and zoology. Brooklyn, N. Y., Premier Pub. Co., 1924–29. 3 v. 24–30970 Z7408.U5M5

CONTENTS.—v. 1. An annotated bibliography of the publications relating to the history, biography and bibliography of American natural history and to institutions, during colonial times and the pioneer century, which have been published up to 1924; with a classified subject and geographic index; and a bibliography of biographies.—v. 2. The institutions which have contributed to the rise and progress of American natural history, which were founded or organized between 1769 and 1844.—v. 3. The institutions founded or organized between 1845 and 1865. Bibliography of books. Chronological tables. Index to authors and institutions. Addenda to v. 1.

This work presents in a convenient form so much information concerning the sciences, persons, and institutions with which it is concerned that it is far more than a bibliography. It traces "bibliographically the rise and progress of natural history in the United States, from the formation of an active American Philosophical Society at Philadelphia in 1769, to the close of the Civil War in 1865," and is an invaluable guide for all those who are interested in the several branches of natural history which, otherwise, have very limited representation in this chapter. In volumes 2 and 3, the institutional bibliographies, arranged according to date of foundation, are each preceded by a brief history of the organization in question.

4737. Merrill, George P. The first one hundred years of American geology. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1924. xxi, 773 p.
24–21175 QE13.U6M6

The author was Head Curator of Geology, U. S. National Museum, from 1897 until his death in 1929. This was his third and most comprehensive book on the history of North American geology up to the end of the 19th century. Progress during that century, according to Merrill, was "due almost wholly to the accumulation of observed facts and the conclusions drawn therefrom," large deductive hypotheses and synthetic research being impossible until toward its close. Chapter I deals with a period dominated by the Scottish-born William Maclure who made the first geological map of the United States (1809, rev. 1817), described as "the first map of its scope in the history of geology." Chapter II describes the influence of Amos Eaton, "the most prominent worker as well as the most profuse writer of the decade." Chapters III to VIII outline the work of State surveys during the five decades from 1830 to 1880, and the national surveys which culminated in the establishment of the U. S. Geological Survey in 1879. The former are documented in even greater detail in Merrill's Contributions to a History of American State Geological and Natural History Surveys (Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1920. 549 p.). The book concludes with a discussion of the age of the earth as variously estimated by a number of geologists and other scientists.

4738. Smallwood, William Martin. Natural history and the American mind. In collaboration with Mabel Sarah Coon Smallwood. New York, Columbia University Press, 1941. xiii, 445 p. illus. (Columbia studies in American culture, no. 8) 41–16864 QH21.U5S5

Bibliography: p. [355]–424.

"Broadly speaking, natural history included all the concrete sciences," but usually in the form of composite observations without the application of rigorous deductive method. The authors trace this habit of mind in the writings of explorers and travelers in the new continent, and its occasional penetration into the curricula of the colonial colleges. In the course of the 18th century natural history became a serious avocation in Charleston, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, where it stimulated the establishment of museums, societies, and scientific journals. One chapter deals with the part played by the microscope, and the last records the passing of the exploring naturalist, whose place was taken first by the classifying naturalist, and then by the scientific specialist. The authors have selected for inclusion in this book those individuals who seem typical of the "naturalist's period" (1725 to 1840 or 50). The extensive bibliography indicates the wide-spread research that has gone into this study which, like natural history itself, is miscellaneous and scattering, but contains many interesting glimpses of early American culture.

4739. Smith, David Eugene, and Jekuthiel Ginsburg. A history of mathematics in America before 1900. Chicago, Published by the Mathematical Association of America with the cooperation of the Open Court Pub. Co., 1934. 209 p. (The Carus mathematical monographs, no. 5)
34–9605 QA27.U5S6

The monographs in this series are intended for teachers and students specializing in mathematics, for scientific workers in other fields, and for laymen who wish to increase their knowledge without prolonged study. Here the authors are primarily interested in original research in higher mathematics. They consider the racial inheritance of the colonists, and their limited needs even for applied mathematics. The development of college work, the formation of scientific societies, and the publication of a few mathematical articles in journals still left "modern mathematics . . . substantially unknown in America in the 18th century." The third chapter surveys the work of the 19th century down to 1875, largely "a time of preparation for action." The final chapter, nearly half the book, covers the last quarter of the century, which "saw laid the foundations upon which the scholars of today have so successfully built." It points out the original work then accomplished in algebra, theory of functions, quantics or forms, transformations, calculus, differential equations, theory of numbers, probability, geometry, and other branches.

4740. Smith, Edgar F. Chemistry in America; chapters from the history of the science in the United States. New York, Appleton, 1914. xiii, 356 p. 14–5967 QD18.U6S6

By the end of the 18th century chemistry was already a part of the curriculum of the University of Pennsylvania and the American Philosophical Society (1743), although devoted to other subjects, did not exclude chemistry from its interests. "The earliest chemical contribution from this country, bearing the date September 10, 1768, appears on the pages of the Transactions of this Society" [in vol. 1, 1789]. From that beginning, the author has brought together a miscellany of original materials such as lectures, monographs, and letters, with brief biographies of Benjamin Silliman, Robert Hare, J. Lawrence Smith, M. Carey Lea, Oliver Walcott Gibbs, and others, illustrating the development of chemistry in America for more than a hundred years. Several quite long pieces, such as Thomas P. Smith's Sketch of the Revolutions in Chemistry (Philadelphia, 1798), are reprinted in full. The result is an unsystematic source book rather than "chapters of history."

4741. Welker, Robert Henry. Birds and men; American birds in science, art, literature, and conservation, 1800–1900. Cambridge, Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1955. 230 p.
55–11608 QL681.W4

Selected bibliography: p. [213]–220.

The birds of North America have been described in the writings of explorers, naturalists, and literary men since Columbus, but modern ornithology in the United States began at the opening of the 19th century, when the pioneer specialist, Alexander Wilson (1766–1813), made his tour of the eastern cities, the Ohio and Mississippi Valley frontier, and the Deep South in search of material for his American Ornithology (Philadelphia, 1808–14. 9 v.). Mr. Welker's book is a guide to our 19th-century ornithological literature, and to its interrelations with American belles-lettres, painting, and popular attitudes. In addition to chapters on Wilson and Audubon, the bird artist who was unknown until discovered by Wilson, there are discussions of the place of birds in the writings of Thoreau, Emerson, Whitman, Burroughs, and others. By the end of the century groups for the study and protection of birds had organized the fights against bird-destroying "boys, pot-hunters, women," in a movement for state and federal protection laws which became wide-spread early in the 20th century. A well selected series of plates illustrates the steady progress in drawing birds, and some instances in which Audubon helped himself to Wilson's sketches.

C. Individual Scientists

4742. [Agassiz] Marcou, Jules. Life, letters, and works of Louis Agassiz. New York, Macmillan, 1895. 2 v. illus. 4-17043/2 QH31.A2M3

His reputation already established by his work on the classification of fishes, the geological distribution of fossil fish, and the glacial theory of the earth, Louis Agassiz (1807–1873) came to the United States in 1846 to deliver a series of Lowell Institute lectures, and remained to become a leader among American naturalists. The author was "the last survivor of the small band of European naturalists who came to America with him," and strove to temper admiration with justice. The quotations are limited to "letters of Agassiz, addressed to practical naturalists, his contemporaries, working on kindred subjects," but include none used by Mrs. Elizabeth Cary Agassiz in her life of her husband (1885). The first volume covers Agassiz' life from his birth in a village in French Switzerland to his arrival in Boston 39 years later. The second narrates his life in the United States—his professorship at Harvard, his association with scientific organizations and expeditions, and his relations to the intellectual society of the period. "By far the most important contribution of Agassiz to natural history during his life in America," Marcou thought, was the Essay on Classification published in 1857 as the introduction to a massive work on the natural history of the United States which was left incomplete after four volumes had appeared. An annotated list of publications concerning Agassiz and a catalog of his scientific writings appear in the Appendixes. Louis Agassiz, Scientist and Teacher, by James D. Teller (Columbus, Ohio State University Press, 1947. 145 p.) discusses "the effect that his personality and vigorous method of attacking the unknown had on the development of teaching and research in America."

4743. [Audubon] Herrick, Francis H. Audubon the naturalist, a history of his life and time. 2d ed. New York, Appleton-Century, 1938. 2 v. in 1. illus. 38-27162 QL31.A9H4 1938

"Original documents": v. 2, p. [313]–379.

Bibliography: v. 2, p. 401–461.

The son of a French planter in Santo Domingo, John James Audubon (1785–1851) left France in 1803 for his father's American estate, Mill Grove, located along Perkiomen Creek in Pennsylvania. It was there that he became interested in American bird life and carried out the first "banding" experiment, repeated a hundred years later by the Bird Banding Society, "in order to gather exact data upon the movements of individuals of all migratory species in every part of the continent." From about 1805 he was more or less constantly engaged in drawing or painting birds, which he continued after his removal to Kentucky in 1807, and even after financial disaster overtook him in 1819. He eventually found a London engraver and publisher for The Birds of America, which appeared in 87 numbers of 5 plates each during the years 1827–38. The 435 hand-colored copper-plate engravings were finally bound into four elephant folio volumes, at $1,000 the set. The venture was supported by 82 American and 79 European subscribers. Audubon's text explanatory of the engravings was separately published at Edinburgh as Ornithological Biography (1831–39. 5 v.). The present life, the first edition of which appeared in 1917, is crowded with biographical detail, in part derived from a "unique and extraordinary collection of Audubonian records" which the author discovered in a small French town. Audubon has become the patron saint of American nature students and wildlife conservationists: the numerous State and local Audubon societies bear his name; Mill Grove has been made into a memorial and sanctuary; and 1951 was designated as the Audubon Centennial Year.

4744. [Baird] Dall, William Healey. Spencer Fullerton Baird; a biography, including selections from his correspondence with Audubon, Agassiz, Dana, and others. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1915. xvi, 462 p. 15-11472 QL31.B25D2

Baird (1823–1887) was the second Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution (1878), who also became the first U. S. Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, and organized the work of the Commission, the predecessor agency of the present Fish and Wildlife Service. This biography is based on data collected and arranged by his daughter, Lucy Hunter Baird, Baird's original journal extending from 1838 to 1887, and a quantity of miscellaneous material collected by Herbert A. Gill, an associate in the Fish Commission. The greater part of its text consists of letters written to or by other scientists, which afford an intimate and lively view of the scientific life in mid-century. As an officer of the Smithsonian Institution from 1850, Baird developed and maintained the National Museum, and as Commissioner of Fisheries he won international recognition through his scientific research into the maintenance of food-fish populations.

4745. [Bartram] Earnest, Ernest P. John and William Bartram, botanists and explorers, 1699–1777, 1739–1823. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1940. 187 p. (Pennsylvania lives) 41–86 QK31.B3E3

Bibliographical note: p. 181–182.

John Bartram, described by Linnaeus as the "greatest natural botanist in the world," established a botanical garden on his farm on the Schuylkill River as early as 1729 or 1730. He won a reputation before Franklin, whom he willingly joined in creating a scientific and cultural center in Philadelphia. He became one of the nine founders of the American Philosophical Society. By correspondence and exchange of plants, by traveling throughout the colonies and publishing their observations, John Bartram and his son William made the natural history of America known to Europeans. Here the author attempts to clear up some problems that still remain concerning William, but deals more fully with John, "because of his pioneer work, his great originality, and the lack of any complete study of his life and work." See also nos. 4236–4238, 4247–4250.

4746. [Bowditch] Berry, Robert Elton. Yankee stargazer; the life of Nathaniel Bowditch. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1941. 234 p. 41–28345 QB36.B7B4

"Among the sources": p. 225–227.

The author has used Nathaniel Bowditch's sea journals and notebooks, the memoirs of his sons and friends, and the diaries of contemporaries to produce this biography of the New England astronomer and mathematician. Bowditch (1773–1838) had little formal schooling, but read scientific books during his years in a cooper shop and a ship chandlery. Life on the Salem water front aroused his interest in navigation, and his ability to make calculations impressed Captain John Gibaut, who offered him a chance to go to sea. Six of the twelve chapters describe Bowditch's experiences on the five voyages which he made between 1795 and 1803, and the observations which led to his publications on celestial navigation. The New American Practical Navigator (1802), known as "the seaman's bible," or more simply as "Bowditch," became the textbook in private schools of navigation, and standard equipment in most sea chests. Regularly reprinted, it has been published since 1868 by the U. S. Government. In later years Bowditch published his translation of the Mécanique céleste, and "made an epoch in American science by bringing the great work of Laplace down to the reach of the best American students of his time." Bowditch modestly disclaimed comparison with seminal minds like Laplace and Newton, but his works have been "the greatest single influence on United States navigation and seamanship."

4747. [Compton] Compton, Arthur Holly. Atomic quest, a personal narrative. New York, Oxford University Press, 1956. 370 p. 56–11114 QC773.A1C65

This book is at once a history of atomic energy and the personal narrative of one of the outstanding scientists responsible for initiating and carrying through the wartime atomic project in the United States. The author (b. 1892) describes the research that led to the release of atomic energy in useful amounts, the proposal of an atomic weapon to the government, the preparation of the atomic explosives, and the decisions which preceded their use in World War II. In view of the unprecedented destructiveness of atomic weapons, the author concludes that "we can see the powers that shape our destiny working with us toward the elimination of war." Dr. Compton's early life is briefly narrated in Chapter 3. From 1945 to 1953 he was chancellor of Washington University in St. Louis, where he sought to go beyond the traditional education program, and to create a "new vision of world affairs" and "an enduring civilization where men and women can rise to the best that is in them." George O. Robinson's And What of Tomorrow (New York, Comet Press Books, 1956. 178 p.) combines a narrative of "the atomic adventure" of the Manhattan Project with many human interest stories illustrating the devotion of the scientists and other workers to their task. The names of universities and other organizations participating in long-term research programs for the adaptation of atomic energy to peacetime uses suggest the possibilities opening before us.

4748. [Cope] Osborn, Henry Fairfield. Cope: master naturalist; the life and letters of Edward Drinker Cope, with a bibliography of his writings classified by subject; a study of the pioneer and foundation periods of vertebrate paleontology in America. With the co-operation of Helen Ann Warren. Illustrated with drawings, and restorations by Charles R. Knight under the direction of Professor Cope. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1931. xvi, 740 p. 31–11875 QH31.C8O72

Edward Drinker Cope (1840–1897) was the rival of Othniel C. Marsh in the field of vertebrate paleontology, and the controversy between the two continued for 25 years. The appearance of this biography of Cope hastened the publication of Schuchert's life of Marsh (no. 4754). The author has had access to the lifelong correspondence of Cope with his family, which throws "new light on his personality" and "forms a priceless picture of the United States in the Civil and post-Civil War period." The years of exploration and discovery (to 1880), the period of research, publication, and interpretation (to 1889), and Cope's professorship in the University of Pennsylvania are described in detail. Chapter 7 tells how Cope applied "his wonderful powers of generalization and induction" to shine "forth as a creative thinker alike in Herpetology, Ichthyology, Geology, Mammalogy," as well as in vertebrate paleontology, and so deserves the title of "Master Naturalist." The classified bibliography of Cope's principal papers fills 150 pages (591–740).

4749. [Dana] Gilman, Daniel C. The life of James Dwight Dana, scientific explorer, mineralogist, geologist, zoologist, professor in Yale University. New York, Harper, 1899. 409 p.
99–5509 QE22.D26G4

Bibliography of Dana's writings: p. 385–394.

Dr. Gilman, famous as the first president of Johns Hopkins University, had been a colleague of Dana at Yale, where he taught geography until 1872. He calls his life of Dana (1813–1895) "personal rather than scientific." However, Dana's "Scientific Correspondence" forms Part II of the book (p. 219 ff.) and more than a hundred pages are devoted to the U. S. Exploring Expedition under Captain Charles Wilkes (1838–42). It was his reports as the mineralogist and geologist of that expedition, published between 1846 and 1854, which established Dana's position in those fields at home and abroad. As editor of the American Journal of Science, as author of A System of Mineralogy (1837) and a Manual of Geology (1862) which went through numerous editions, and as the first Silliman Professor of Natural History (later changed to Geology and Mineralogy) at Yale, he remained at the head of his profession, and received many academic honors and scientific medals.

4750. [Franklin] Franklin, Benjamin. Benjamin Franklin's Experiments; a new edition of Franklin's Experiments and observations on electricity. Edited, with a critical and historical introd., by I. Bernard Cohen. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1941. xxviii, 453 p.
A41–4483 QC516.F85 1941

"Bibliographical table": p. 158–161.

Benjamin Franklin (1706–1790) was able to devote only six or seven years to concentrated scientific inquiry, but they brought him enduring fame as the world's foremost "electrician." During the years 1747–49 "he laid the foundations of modern electrical science," and in his book he introduced much of its enduring terminology. In characteristic 18th-century style, Franklin put his scientific writings into the form of letters; those collected in his Experiments and Observations on Electricity were addressed to Peter Collinson, Ebenezer Kinnersley, and others of scientific bent, and are supplemented by a number of letters to Franklin commenting upon his theories. Mr. Cohen's text is in part based upon Franklin's manuscript letters, which are fuller than the printed versions. His long and scholarly introduction deals with Franklin's scientific interests in general, electrical knowledge before Franklin, the nature and significance of Franklin's electrical discoveries, and the editions and translations of Experiments and Observations which appeared between 1751 and 1774.

4751. [Gibbs] Wheeler, Lynde Phelps. Josiah Willard Gibbs; the history of a great mind. Rev. ed. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1952. 270 p.
52–14822 QA29.G5W5 1952

Bibliography: p. [251]–256.

The scion of an old Connecticut family, Willard Gibbs (1839–1903) received the fifth doctorate conferred by Yale, the first American university to recognize graduate study, and was professor of mathematical physics there from 1871 until his death. The author, a former student of Gibbs, evaluates the work of his teacher as an exponent of thermodynamics, statistical mechanics, and optics, and describes him as a quiet, unassuming scholar completely devoid of the eccentricities usually ascribed to genius. But a genius he was, with "a mind which proceeded from ascertained facts to their utmost implications by such rigorous logic that not one of his conclusions has ever been found in error." Gibbs' influence was exerted almost entirely through his writings, which received early recognition and interpretation abroad. The publication (1876–78) of his paper "On the Equilibrium of Heterogeneous Substances," which was something of an act of faith on the part of the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, proved a landmark in the development of modern physics and in the spread of Gibbs' fame. The enduring importance of his work dealing with the relations of heat to other forms of energy was emphasized by Yale University on the 100th anniversary of his birth in a brochure prepared by the President's Committee on University Development: A Professor's Theory and Its Practical Uses: The Work of J. Willard Gibbs and Some Applications to Industry. Its calls Gibbs "one of the great scientists of modern times, and one of the architects of the industry which is so important a part of our civilization."

4752. [Henry] Coulson, Thomas. Joseph Henry, his life and work. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1950. 352 p.
50–7249 QC16.H37C6

Bibliography: p. 344–346.

The director of museum research, Franklin Institute of the State of Pennsylvania, has written the first full-length biography of this 19th-century physicist in order to establish his rightful place among America's great men of science. Henry (1797–1878) lost his own papers by fire in 1865, so the author has relied heavily on the letters found among the manuscript records of the Smithsonian Institution for glimpses into his life and work. The first half of the book is devoted, for the most part, to Henry's experiments during his tenure as professor at Albany Academy, and at Princeton. About 1830 he discovered the principles of electromagnetic induction which, with his ten other basic discoveries in the electrical realm, have been essential to practically every commercial application of electricity, including the telegraph, telephone, and radio. The last half of the book describes Henry as the first director of the Smithsonian Institution (from 1846), and as a protagonist in the "telegraph controversy" with Samuel F. B. Morse, as to their respective shares in its invention. It summarizes his place in science as a discoverer, an organizer, and an exponent of the value of collective research.

4753. [Jefferson] Martin, Edwin T. Thomas Jefferson: scientist. New York, Schuman, 1952. 289 p. 52–7559 E332.M33

References: p. 261–283.

Thomas Jefferson (1743–1826) "enjoyed a high contemporary repute both as a statesman of broad culture and as a scientist, who applied 'philosophy' for the good of his native country and the general human welfare." His correspondence reveals his dual devotion to science and to public service. This is the most extensive analysis to date of Jefferson's broad and insatiable interest in science. It is not only a study of the man—his scientific characteristics, attitudes, practices, and principles—but also a history of American scientific development during his age—inventions, the study of fossils, geology, meteorology, etc. Jefferson's eagerness to refute the misrepresentations of America made by Buffon, DePauw, Raynal, and other Europeans, led to the publication of his Notes on the State of Virginia (1781–82) (nos. 150–153). Chapter 9 on "Politics, Religion, and Science" quotes from contemporary sources to illustrate how Jefferson was assailed by his political opponents because of his concern for science. Dr. Charles A. Browne's study of the sources of some of Jefferson's scientific opinions: Thomas Jefferson and the Scientific Trends of His Time ([Waltham, Mass., Chronica Botanica Co.] 1944. [363]–423 p.), reprinted from volume 8, number 3 of the Chronica Botanica, is conveniently brief.

4754. [Marsh] Schuchert, Charles, and Clara Mae LeVene. O. C. Marsh, pioneer in paleontology. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1940. xxi, 541 p. 40–14583 QE707.M4S32

Dr. Schuchert made the acquaintance of Marsh in 1892, and in 1904 succeeded to his chair of paleontology at Yale; Miss LeVene, as a staff member of Yale's Peabody Museum of Natural History, processed the Marsh Papers. Othniel C. Marsh (1831–1899) was a nephew of the eminent philanthropist George Peabody, who presented Yale with the Museum in 1866. In the same year the Yale Corporation established the first American chair of paleontology for the nephew, but attached no salary to it until 1896. Professor Marsh therefore felt free to put his major efforts into exploring the Far West for fossil remains, with results summed up in his two great monographs published by the U. S. Geological Survey in 1896: The Dinosaurs of North America and Vertebrate Fossils [of the Denver Basin]. In 1882 he became the vertebrate paleontologist of the U. S. Geological Survey, which did compensate his services, and obtained much of his later collections. Marsh was the originator of the "authentic skeletal restorations" of the dinosaurs, which caught the public eye and brought him contemporary fame. The volume concludes with a "List of Marsh Genera" (p. 495–501) and a chronological list of some 300 titles written by Marsh (p. 503–526).

4755. [Millikan] Millikan, Robert A. Autobiography. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1950. xiv, 311 p. 50–7302 QC16.M58A3

To the names of the world-renowned physicists who have been awarded the Nobel prize, that of Robert A. Millikan (1868–1953) was added in 1923, "for his work on the uniform electric charge and the photo-electric effect." His fame was first established by his experimental measurements of the electric quantum of elements, which he succeeded in determining within one-thousandth of a degree of exactitude. Appointed professor of physics at the University of Chicago in 1902, Millikan served as director of the Norman Bridge Laboratory of Physics and executive head of the California Institute of Technology from 1921 until 1945. Written in a style "not beyond the comprehension of a twelfth-grade student who has had an elementary course in physics," Millikan's autobiography reflects the impact of the physical sciences on modern life. It narrates such episodes in his life as the experimental proof of the existence of the photon, the organization of the National Research Council, the mobilizing of science for both World War I and II, and the building of Caltech into a great research center for science and engineering. The reader is conscious throughout of Dr. Millikan's views on the relationship between science and religion, and on the responsibility of the United States for the maintenance of world peace.

4756. [Newcomb] Newcomb, Simon. The reminiscences of an astronomer. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1903. 424 p. 3–24278 QB36.N5

Simon Newcomb's (1835–1909) important investigations in planetary and lunar motion brought him honorary membership in more than forty scientific organizations in some eighteen nations, and honorary degrees from at least seventeen universities in ten nations. The results of his investigations have been adopted, more or less completely, by all nations for use in their nautical almanacs. A century after his birth he became the first astronomer to be elected to the American Hall of Fame. Newcomb tells in a simple, direct fashion the story of his coming from Nova Scotia to the United States as a teacher, his chance meeting with Joseph Henry, his work as an astronomer and mathematician at the Naval Observatory, and his superintendence of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac. He describes his interests in such diverse subjects as psychical research, education, and political economy. More than an autobiography, his Reminiscences portray the status of science and the work of scientists at home and abroad during the last half of the 19th century.

4757. [Powell] Darrah, William C. Powell of the Colorado. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1951. 426 p.

51–11671 Q143.P8D25

Bibliography: p. [401]–412.

The author, a paleobotanist and engineer interested in the history of American science, spent ten years gathering the materials for this biography of a man who was both a distinguished geologist and a great public servant. It emphasizes his struggle to conserve the natural wealth of the West, to record the history of the American Indian, and to promote scientific research by the Government. After engaging in privately financed explorations in 1867–69, John Wesley Powell (1834–1902) made a thorough survey of the Colorado region on behalf of the Department of the Interior. In the report, Exploration of the Colorado River of the West and Its Tributaries, compiled by Powell for the Smithsonian Institution, he pointed out that the formation of canyons is due to corrosive action of rivers on rocks, and coined phrases which have become part of every geologist's vocabulary. With his position as a geologist established, Powell took a leading part in the movement which in 1879 consolidated the overlapping government ventures into the U. S. Geological Survey. The Bureau of American Ethnology was established at the same time; Powell was put at its head, and in the following year took over the Survey, administering both agencies until 1894, when ill health compelled him to relinquish the Survey. Other recent publications reflect a lively interest in "the Major": in 1954 appeared another full-length biography, by Wallace Earle Stegner (q. v.). Paul Meadows' John Wesley Powell: Frontiersman of Science is number 10 in the new series of University of Nebraska studies, July 1952 (106 p.).

4758. [Rittenhouse] Ford, Edward. David Rittenhouse, astronomer-patriot, 1732–1796. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1946. 226 p. (Pennsylvania lives)

46–5428 QB36.R4F6

This is the first full-length biography of Rittenhouse (1732–1796) since the Memoirs, by his nephew, William Barton, appeared in 1813. Born near Germantown, Pa., of Mennonite stock, Rittenhouse at 11 received an uncle's legacy of tools and books which aroused his interest in mathematics and mechanics. As a farmer, maker of clocks and mathematical instruments, he spent the first 35 years of his life at Norriton. During 1767–71 he built two brass orreries, working models of the solar system, which went to the Colleges of New Jersey and of Philadelphia, and were among the wonders of their day, greatly enhancing the reputation of their maker. He interrupted this labor in order to prepare for and make observations of the transit of Venus on June 3, 1769, with the aid of specially designed instruments, which earned him a place among the world's astronomers. After moving to Philadelphia in 1770, Rittenhouse began a daily record of weather data which he kept up until his death. He was frequently engaged on boundary and canal surveys during the colonial period. He served on the Committee of Safety during the American Revolution, became a member of the General Assembly, state treasurer, and first Director of the U. S. Mint.

4759. [Silliman] Fulton, John F., and Elizabeth H. Thomson. Benjamin Silliman, 1779–1864, pathfinder in American science. New York, Schuman, 1947. 294 p. (Life of science library)

47–11526 Q143.S56F8

Historical Library, Yale University School of Medicine, Publication no. 16.

"Bibliography and sources": p. 279–284.

Born in Fairfield, Connecticut, during the American Revolution, Benjamin Silliman reached maturity at a period when a widespread interest in chemistry was emerging. When only 23 he was elected to the newly created chair of chemistry and natural history at Yale, where he taught for more than half a century. Silliman made few original contributions to science, but won distinction as an "ambassador of science" through effective teaching, and by founding a medical school, a department for postgraduate study, and in 1847, the original chairs of the Sheffield Scientific School. His influence was extended outside the University by his founding of the American Journal of Science (1818), which was "intended to embrace the circle of the physical sciences with their applications to the arts and to every other useful service," and, after 1833, by public lectures in cities as far away as Pittsburgh and New Orleans. This, the first comprehensive biography of Silliman since 1866, is based on family letters as well as on manuscript materials in Yale University and other repositories.

4760. [Torrey] Rodgers, Andrew Denny. John Torrey; a story of North American botany. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1942. 352 p. 42–19817 QK31.T7R6

Bibliography: p. [316]–333.

The history of American botany of the 19th century has been written by the author, a grandson of Sullivant, in this and two other books: "Noble Fellow," William Starling Sullivant (New York, Putnam, 1940. 361 p.), and American Botany, 1873–1892: Decades of Transition (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1944. 340 p.), which deals particularly with Asa Gray and his associates. The taxonomic work of John Torrey (1796–1873), botanist and chemist, influenced all those who followed him, although his reputation was eventually eclipsed by Asa Gray (1810–1888). Much of the information in this book derives from Torrey's own correspondence, never before collected. Torrey spent most of his life in New York City, and some of his best known works are on the flora of his native state. He collaborated with Asa Gray in compiling the Flora of North America (New York, 1838–43), which describes all indigenous and naturalized plants growing north of Mexico, arranged according to "the natural system." He prepared botanical catalogs for the United States Exploring Expedition under Captain Wilkes, the Frémont Exploring Expedition to the Rocky Mountains, and others.

D. Science and Government

4761. Baxter, James Phinney. Scientists against time. Boston, Little, Brown, 1946. 473 p. 46–7204 Q127.U6B3

The Office of Scientific Research and Development was created in 1941 "for the purpose of assuring adequate provisions for research on scientific and medical problems relating to the national defense." In this official history of the OSRD, the president of Williams College tells the story of the transition in methods of warfare up to the use of the atomic bomb. He describes the race for superiority in new weapons in World War II, the new devices that were developed, the contributions of chemical research to the prosecution of the war, the discovery and use of new medicines for the treatment of military personnel, and the selection and training of scientists. A series of volumes, Science in World War II, covers in much greater detail the operations of OSRD. In that series Irvin Stewart's Organizing Scientific Research for War (Boston, Little, Brown, 1948. 358 p.), an administrative history of the Office, is of special interest for the relationship between government and science during a period of emergency. The OSRD was terminated by Executive Order in December 1947, and its liquidation entrusted to the National Military Establishment (now the Department of Defense).

4762. Brookings Institution, Washington, D. C. Institute for Government Research. Service monographs of the United States Government. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1919–28. 10 v. JK421.A1B6

The Institute for Government Research was established in 1916 as an "independent institution to consider the problems of public administration, and particularly those of the National Government, for the purposes of making known the most scientific practical principles and procedures that should obtain in the conduct of public affairs." Financed from the outset by the late Robert S. Brookings, in 1927 it was combined with two other such enterprises to form the Brookings Institution. As the basis for a comprehensive study of the organization and operation of the National Government, the Institute published this series of monographs describing the history, activities, and organization of some 55 United States Government agencies. Each monograph contains a bibliography which lists relevant Government documents and other sources. The following have been selected as being particularly pertinent to the interrelations of science and Government. Numbers 1 and 9 were published by D. Appleton and Company, New York.

4763. 1. The U. S. Geological Survey . . . 1919. 163 p. 19-9267 QE76.B7

4764. 9. The Weather Bureau . . . by Gustavus A. Weber. 1922. 87 p. 22-19464 Q875.U7W4

4765. 10. The Public Health Service . . . by Laurence F. Schmeckebier. 1923. 298 p. 23-8224 RA11.B19S3

4766. 16. The Coast and Geodetic Survey . . . by Gustavus A. Weber. 1923. 107 p. 23-8296 QB296.U85 1923

4767. 31. The Patent Office . . . by Gustavus A. Weber. 1924. 127 p. 24-4936 T223.P2W4

4768. 32. The Office of Experiment Stations . . . by Milton Conover. 1924. 178 p. 24-8456 S21.E9C6

4769. 35. The Bureau of Standards . . . by Gustavus A. Weber. 1925. 299 p. 25-23707 QC100.U58 1925

4770. 39. The Naval Observatory . . . by Gustavus A. Weber. 1926. 101 p. 26-9845 QB82.U85

4771. 42. The Hydrographic Office . . . by Gustavus A. Weber. 1926. 112 p. 26-15570 VK597.U5W4

4772. 52. The Bureau of Chemistry and Soils . . . by Gustavus A. Weber. 1928. 218 p. 29-2042 S585.W4

4773. Gellhorn, Walter. Security, loyalty, and science. Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1950. 300 p. (Cornell studies in civil liberty) 50-14649 UB270.G42

The contributions of science toward winning a war, and the expanding reliance of national defense on scientific developments have restricted, in some areas, the exchange of ideas between scientists whose individual freedoms have been curtailed in the national interest. Made possible by a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation, this is one of Cornell's series of studies of "the impact upon our civil liberties of current governmental programs designed to ensure internal security and to expose and control disloyal or subversive conduct." It deals with the administration of security policies in "sensitive" areas of scientific research. Chapter 8 emphasizes the need for fair procedures, and the author's "Concluding Thoughts" warn that "the focus upon opinion as a measure of loyalty tends to discourage the holding of any opinion at all."

4774. National Academy of Sciences, Washington, D. C. A history of the first half-century of the National Academy of Sciences, 1863-1913. Edited by Frederick W. True. Washington, 1913. 399 p. 13-35434 Q11.N286

"To afford recognition to those men of science who had done original work of real importance and thereby to stimulate them and others to further endeavors; and to aid the Government in the solution of technical scientific problems having a practical bearing on the conduct of public business," Congress chartered the National Academy of Sciences in 1863. The story of the Academy's accomplishments during its first 50 years includes a chapter on "The Academy as the Scientific Adviser of the Government." In that role its studies have shaped the creation of various Government agencies such as the U. S. Forest Service and the Geological Survey. In addition to its many publications in the several sciences, the National Academy, since 1877, has published a series of Biographical memoirs which often contain information concerning American scientists not otherwise available. The National Research Council originated in 1916, when the National Academy addressed President Wilson, offering to coördinate the non-governmental scientific and technical resources of the country with the military and naval agencies of the Government in the interest of national security. The Council was reorganized on a permanent basis in 1919. A History of the National Research Council, 1919-1933 (Washington, The Council, 1933. 61 p.) has been published as no. 106 of the Council's Reprint and circular series.

4775. Oehser, Paul H. Sons of science; the story of the Smithsonian Institution and its leaders. New York, Schuman, 1949. xvii, 220 p. (Life of science library) 49-526 Q11.S8O4

Selected bibliography: p. 205-208.

A concise history by the chief of the Smithsonian's Editorial and Publications Division. Built and organized with funds provided by the will of James Smithson (1765-1829), English scientist, "for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," the Smithsonian Institution was incorporated in 1846. It may well be thought of as the first American foundation of national scope, for "it enjoys the advantages of a privately endowed institution and at the same time is an establishment of the United States government." The history of the Institution is here organized around the careers of its secretaries, all of whom have been scientists: Joseph Henry, physicist (to 1878); Spencer Fullerton Baird, biologist (to 1887); Samuel Pierpont Langley, physicist and astronomer (to 1907); Charles Doolittle Walcott, geologist (to 1928); Charles Greely Abbot, astrophysicist (to 1945); and Alexander Wetmore, biologist (to 1952). The growth of the Institution is also traced in an increasing diversity of function and complexity of organization. The ten subordinate bureaus added from time to time include the National Museum, the Bureau of American Ethnology, the International Exchange Service (for scientific publications), the Astrophysical Observatory, the National Zoological Park, the National Gallery of Art, and the National Air Museum. The author supplies a "Chronology of Principal Events," 1826–1948 (p. 187–203) and 39 well-chosen illustrations in gravure.

4776. Price, Don K. Government and science, their dynamic relation in American democracy. New York, New York University Press, 1954. 203 p. (James Stokes lectureship on politics)
54-8164 Q127.U6P7

The author, after serving with several research organizations and government agencies, including the Research and Development Board of the Department of Defense, of which he was deputy chairman, became vice president of the Ford Foundation in 1954. He draws upon this varied experience for the present "series of essays," based upon lectures delivered at New York University in 1953. In them he suggests "that the activities of scientists, which had always been unusually influential in the public policies of the United States, were becoming responsible for significant changes in the nature of the American governmental system," and that "a whole series of most profound and most neglected problems" were thereby created. He concludes that there is a necessity for "creating the kind of responsible political and administrative systems within which free science will have its fullest opportunity for public service." The only hope for such a system, according to Mr. Price, "is to build in part on the generalist with a background in general management and general public affairs, and in part on the man who has become a generalist after a thorough grounding in one of the specialized sciences or in its engineering or managerial application." Chapter II, "Freedom or Responsibility," deals with the organization of the National Science Foundation, "the only general-purpose science agency in the government."

4777. U. S. National Resources Committee. Science Committee. Research—a national resource. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1938–41. 3 v. 39-26187 Q180.U5U45

Volumes 2–3 prepared for the Science Committee of the National Resources Planning Board.

Volume 1 issued also as House document 122, 76th Congress, 1st session.

CONTENTS.—1. Relation of the Federal Government to research. Report of the Science Committee of the National Resources Committee.—2. Industrial research. Report of the National Research Council.—3. Business research. Report of an advisory committee of the Social Science Research Council.

Proceeding on President Franklin Roosevelt's postulate that "research is one of the nation's very greatest resources," the Science Committee, composed of members designated by the National Academy of Sciences, the Social Science Research Council, and the American Council on Education, conducted this study of Federal aid to research, and of the place of research, including natural and social science, in the Federal Government. Each volume contains a summary of findings and recommendations for improvements in the area covered by the volume. A number of these called for greater coöperation between Government and private research agencies.

4778. U. S. Office of Scientific Research and Development. Science, the endless frontier. A report to the President by Vannevar Bush. July 1945. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1945. 184 p. 45-36413 Q127.U6A53 1945

In 1944 President Roosevelt requested Dr. Vannevar Bush, Director of the Office of Scientific Research and Development (1941–46), to recommend means of applying its wartime experience in times of peace, "for the improvement of the national health, the creation of new enterprises bringing new jobs, and the betterment of the national standard of living." Among Dr. Bush's recommendations was the creation of a national research foundation to develop a national policy for scientific research and scientific education. After five years of congressional debate, an act embodying compromises to satisfy divergent views was passed in 1950, creating the National Science Foundation. On March 17, 1954, President Eisenhower issued Executive Order 10521 concerning Government scientific research and the responsibilities of the National Science Foundation and other Federal agencies. The text of the order is given in Appendix V of the National Science Foundation's Annual Report for 1954 (Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off.), which also outlines the "Current Aspects of American Science," and the "Program Activities of the National Science Foundation."

4779. U. S. President's Scientific Research Board. Science and public policy. A report to the President by John R. Steelman. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1947. 5 v.
47–46212 Q180.U5A47

"The administration of research; a selective bibliography": v. 3, p. 253–324.

In an Executive order issued October 17, 1946, the Chairman of the President's Scientific Research Board, with the assistance of the Board, was instructed "to investigate and report upon the entire scientific program of the Federal Government." Social science research was omitted from this study, as well as the content of the research programs of the War and Navy Departments. Volume I, "A Program for the Nation," sketches the country's position in scientific research, and makes recommendations by which the Government can assure maximum benefits to the Nation. Volume II, "The Federal Research Program," reviews the details of the Government's scientific work, agency by agency, and discusses typical projects. Volume III, "Administration for Research," analyzes the Government's administration of its own research programs, points out problems and policy issues, and makes recommendations for modernizing procedures. Volume IV, "Manpower for Research," deals with the shortage of scientists and teachers, and its threat to progress. Volume V, "The Nation's Medical Research," discusses progress in medical and allied sciences, outlines the Federal program, and makes recommendations for its administration.

E. Invention

4780. Amdur, Leon H. Patent fundamentals. New York, Boardman, 1948. 305 p. illus.
T223.T2A55 1948

First published in 1941.

A main objective of this book "is to enable the layman and the student to attain a rapid, yet sound, understanding of the U. S. Patent System." The author explains in simple language the nature of inventions that, according to law, can be patented, the legal protection afforded the patentee, and the preparation and prosecution of an application for a patent. Concrete examples illustrate the procedures. The book includes the first "full and clear exposition" of the grant of patents on new and distinct varieties of plants, which became part of the patent law in 1930. A final chapter considers patents as transferable property, and briefly compares the patent system of the United States with those of foreign nations. George V. Woodling's Inventions and Their Protection, 2d ed. (New York, Boardman, 1954. 496 p.) brings developments in the patent system up to date (1953).

4781. Berle, Alf K., and Lyon Sprague De Camp. Inventions and their management. 3d ed. Scranton, International Textbook Co., 1951. xxv, 742 p.
51–14958 T212.B43 1951

Bibliography: p. 671–673.

Presents in one volume the principles and practices that control the technical, legal, and business procedures of invention. The authors' purpose has been to keep their book, originally published in 1937, up to date by providing information of service to inventors and business men who are undertaking creative work in the field of inventions and their management. In addition to explaining the whole process of patents and patent law, the book contains chapters on trade-marks and copyrights, and legal cases illustrating more than half of the topics. Chapter 4 is a concise description of the organization and functions of the U. S. Patent Office. There is a substantial "Glossary" (p. 679–701) of legal terms and words used in a special sense in patenting. Floyd L. Vaughan explores the developments which have circumvented the original objectives of the patent law, and suggests remedies in his United States Patent System (Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1956. 355 p.).

4782. Bryan, George S. Edison, the man and his works. New York, Knopf, 1926. 350 p.
26–19839 TK140.E3B7

Bibliography: p. 331–337.

"The Wizard of Menlo Park" became, for the American popular mind, the embodiment of American inventive genius, and almost a figure of American folklore, other men's inventions being readily attributed to him. Nevertheless, Edison's fame is not undeserved, for he has hardly a parallel in the duration, continuity, and multiplicity of his inventive activity. His first patent was applied for in 1868, in his 22d year, and he continued to invent, adapt, and improve until the failure of his health a year or two before his death in 1931. His methods were peculiarly adapted to the expanding American economy of the post-1865 period, for he sought devices that could be converted to wide public use and manufactured in quantity. To Edison the act of invention was but the prelude to an industrial organization for exploiting the result, and he was able to exploit other men's inventions as well as his own. Bryan's biography is a clear outline by a wholehearted admirer; one by Frank L. Dyer and Thomas C. Martin, Edison, His Life and Inventions (New York, Harper, 1929. 2 v.) was originally published in 1910, and was only partially revised when it was brought up to date 19 years later; but it is a great repository of information, much of it deriving from Edison himself.

4783. Burlingame, Roger. March of the iron men, a social history of union through invention. New York, Scribner, 1938. xvi, 500 p. illus. 38-27712 T21.B8

The author, a biographer, historian, and editor, traces the influence of invention on American society from the 17th century to the close of the Civil War. The early settlers were immersed in the necessities of building, agriculture, and communication, and the first American inventor was Benjamin Franklin. Inventions during the period of the American Revolution improved the materials of war—gunpowder, small arms, etc. Later inventions were geared to the growing industrial economy and produced the steamboat, cotton gin, power loom, electro-magnetic telegraph, reaper, vulcanized rubber, and many other products. It is the author's belief "that the instruments invented in this phase were the instruments of our eventual union and that . . . they made that union a fact before, politically, it was recognized." Engines of Democracy, Inventions and Society in Mature America (New York, Scribner, 1940. 606 p.) deals with the period after 1865, but not in chronological arrangement: "events did not follow one another in orderly sequence." In these books Mr. Burlingame has sought to present technical developments in common terms intelligible to the layman. Each book contains a list of "Events and Inventions," and a bibliography.

4784. Flexner, James T. Steamboats come true; American inventors in action. New York, Viking Press, 1944. 406 p. 44-7758 VM615.F63

"Bibliography of principal sources": p. 379-381.

This account of American inventors of the steamboat is scholarly, yet written in a style appropriate for the layman. It deals primarily with John Fitch, the pioneer, his contemporary, James Rumsey, and Robert Fulton, the promoter, in their individual contributions to the application of the steam engine to water transportation, described as "the first American invention of world-shaking importance." A brief survey of their forerunners is crowded into the first chapter. In the last it is pointed out that Robert Fulton's importance was not his originality but his ability to build a steamboat on principles evolved from the experiments of many who had tried unsuccessfully to produce finished and working products. In 1912, when the centenary of the introduction of navigation by steam was being celebrated in Europe, Henry W. Dickinson, Assistant Keeper of the Science Museum, South Kensington, produced from the archives of England and France and from original sources in the United States, a life of Robert Fulton, Engineer and Artist (London, New York, John Lane, 1913. 333 p.), one of the few examples of a biography of an American by an English writer.

4785. Holland, Maurice, and Henry F. Pringle. Industrial explorers. New York, Harper, 1938. 347 p. 28-29154 T39.H6 1928

Maurice Holland, Director of Engineering and Industrial Research, National Research Council (1923 to 1942), and Henry F. Pringle, writer, cooperate to sketch the careers of 19 of the nation's leaders of industrial research. They outline Willis R. Whitney's research in the field of electrical engineering, William H. Miller's improvement of design theory and methods in aeronautical engineering, Samuel C. Prescott's experiments in the chemistry of the roasted coffee bean, John A. Mathew's development of high-speed and noncorrosive steels, E. C. Sullivan's tests in the glass laboratories that produced Pyrex, and George D. McLaughlin's improved methods of tanning. The biographies of these and 13 other scientists describe the research which has led to many products now commonplace in daily life.

4786. Iles, George. Leading American inventors. New York, Holt, 1912. xv, 447 p. illus. (Biographies of leading Americans, edited by W. P. Trent) 12-27835 T39.I5

CONTENTS.—John and Robert Livingston Stevens.—Robert Fulton.—Eli Whitney.—Thomas Blanchard.—Samuel Finley Breese Morse.—Charles Goodyear.—John Ericsson.—Cyrus Hall McCormick.—Christopher Latham Sholes.—Elias Howe.—Benjamin Chew Tilghman.—Ottmar Mergenthaler.

Brief and eulogistic biographical sketches of 13 American inventors, who, within little more than a century, conceived and perfected inventions which have profoundly altered our ways of living.

4787. Kaempffert, Waldemar B., ed. A popular history of American invention . . . with over five hundred illus. New York, Scribner, 1924. 2 v. 24–25794 T21.K5

A group of editors of scientific journals, teachers, and scientists have contributed chapters to this history of American invention through the first quarter of the 20th century. Volume I deals with the development of "Transportation" by railroad, inland waterway, electric car, automobile, and airplane; "Communication" through the printed word, telegraph, telephone, radio, camera, motion picture, and phonography; and "Power" through steam and electricity. Volume II deals with devices and techniques for "Exploiting Material Resources," such as iron, steel, copper, oil, coal, and lumber, and with "Automatic Labor-Saving Devices." Written in a style that appeals to the layman as well as to the scientist, the work provides a standard account up to the date of its preparation, and needs only to be brought up to date by incorporating the developments of the last three decades.

4788. Kelly, Fred C. The Wright brothers; a biography authorized by Orville Wright. New York, Farrar, Straus, & Young, 1951. 340 p. 51–11660 TL540.W7K4 1951

The author's aim in this life, first published in 1943, has been "to satisfy the curiosity of the average, non-technical reader regarding the work of the Wright brothers, and to do so as simply as possible." Wilbur (1867–1912) and Orville Wright (1871–1948) interested themselves in aeronautics in 1896 and progressed steadily to the first successful powered flight at Kitty Hawk, N. C., on December 17, 1903. The last two chapters include "Patent Suits," and an explanation of "Why the Wright Plane was Exiled." In 1951 the author edited a selection of letters from the Wright manuscripts deposited in the Library of Congress and not generally available until 1960: Miracle at Kitty Hawk: The Letters of Wilbur and Orville Wright (New York, Farrar, Straus, & Young. 482 p.). Appealing again to the general reader, the book contains those letters which reveal the achievements and personalities of the Wright brothers, and omits those dealing with highly technical problems. More recently Oberlin College on the Wilbur-Orville Wright Memorial Fund sponsored the publication of The Papers of Wilbur and Orville Wright, Including the Chanute-Wright Letters and Other Papers of Octave Chanute, edited by Marvin W. McFarland (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1953. 2 v.), which was prepared for the press with notes, appendixes, and bibliography by the Aeronautics Division of the Library of Congress. These papers, arranged chronologically, include the technical correspondence of the Wright brothers from 1899 to 1948.

4789. Mirsky, Jeannette, and Allan Nevins. The world of Eli Whitney. New York, Macmillan, 1952. xvi, 346 p. 52–4520 TS1570.W4M5

Bibliography: p. 317–337.

This "first modern study of an American genius" is based primarily on the collection of Whitney's (1765–1825) papers in the Yale University Library, which fully document his business career but yield only fragmentary bits of information concerning his personal life. It describes the influence of the cotton gin on the agriculture of the South, where it revitalized the plantation system and slavery, and emphasizes, more fully than has been done before, the impact of his manufacture of firearms on the economic and industrial life of the whole country. The authors quote from Whitney's letters to illustrate his concept of the processes of the machine tool industry which made him the "father of mass production" and "changed the social and economic growth of the North and gave it its industrial might." He wanted, he wrote, tools "similar to an engraving on copper plate from which may be taken a great number of impressions perceptibly alike." Constance McLaughlin Green in her recently published Eli Whitney and the Birth of American Technology (Boston, Little, Brown, 1956. 215 p.), which presents much the same story in concise form, and acknowledges its indebtedness to Miss Mirsky, describes Whitney as "the forerunner of the specialist of the business age," with "a completely single-track mind" and a "passion for efficiency" uncharacteristic of his own day.

4790. Prout, Henry G. A life of George Westinghouse. New York, Scribner, 1922. 375 p. 23–26510 T40.W4P7 1922

George Westinghouse (1846–1914) left no private letters, journals or note-books. The material for this book has been gathered from business records, and from the memories and impressions of contemporaries who were close to him, "some of them almost from the beginning of his active life." The author has had the aid of a committee of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers in digesting and coordinating this data. The diversity of Westinghouse's inventions and business enterprises has determined the division of the book into chapters each dealing fully with one topic, with preliminary and concluding chapters describing Westinghouse's personality and his influence on the development of America. The Appendix contains a list of more than 375 patents. Outstanding among them in social effect are the invention of the air brake and its application to railroading, and the use of alternating current for electric power transmission.

4791. Pupin, Michael I. From immigrant to inventor. New York, Scribner, 1923. 396 p. 23–13553 TP40.P8A3

Pupin (1858–1935), a peasant's son born in a Bosnian village, came to America at the age of 16, and became professor of electromechanics at Columbia University and the inventor of many improvements in telegraphy, telephony, and the x-ray. His autobiography, the kind of success story that can only happen here, was a best-seller in its day and received a Pulitzer prize.

4792. Thompson, Holland. The age of invention; a chronicle of mechanical conquest. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1921. 267 p. (The Chronicles of America series, Allen Johnson, editor . . . v. 37) 21–15265 E173.C55, v. 37 T19.T5

Abraham Lincoln edition.

Bibliographical note: p. 247–254.

Sometime editor-in-chief of the Book of Knowledge, and contributor to many encyclopedias and journals, Holland Thompson outlines the personalities of some of the outstanding American inventors from Benjamin Franklin to the Wright brothers, and points out the significance of their achievements in the development of the United States. However, he avoids giving undue importance to the work of individuals by grouping together the "Pioneers of the Machine Shop," "The Fathers of Electricity," and others whose progress was mutually interdependent.

F. Engineering

4793. American Institute of Chemical Engineers. Twenty-five years of chemical engineering progress; silver anniversary volume, . . . edited by Sidney D. Kirkpatrick. New York, Published by the Institute and for sale by D. Van Nostrand Co., 1933. 373 p. 33–16724 TP20.A5

CONTENTS.—Chemical engineering research.—Acids and heavy chemicals in retrospect.—Organic chemical industries.—Solvents.—Petroleum refining.—Electrochemical industries.—Electrometallurgical industries.—Pulp and paper manufacture.—Coal processing.—Sugar industries.—High pressure synthesis—basis of new chemical engineering industries.—Soap and glycerine industries.—Chemical and engineering advances in the rubber industry.—Paints, varnishes and lacquers.—Modern plastics.—Vegetable oil production.—Lime industry.—Glass manufacture.—Fractional distillation.—Evaporation in the United States in theory and practice.—Bibliography of articles on evaporation (p. 277–279).—Continuous mechanical separations.—Purification of water for sanitary and industrial uses.—Stream pollution and waste disposal.—A statistical survey of the chemical engineering industries, 1908–1933.—Chemical engineering education.

Advances in chemical engineering, between the founding of the American Institute of Chemical Engineers in 1908, and 1933, are described by "leading authorities in the fields which they represent." World War I furnished the impetus which chemical engineering needed to make it a recognized profession, and the statistical survey of the industries involved in Chapter 24 measures the progress made during the quarter-century.

4794. Anderson, Oscar E. Refrigeration in America; a history of a new technology and its impact. [Princeton] Published for the University of Cincinnati by Princeton University Press, 1953. 344 p. 52–13148 TP494.U5A7

"Bibliographical note": p. 321–325.

The author describes his book as an introductory survey of the relation of refrigeration to our national development and points out the need for further detailed research. He records the main trends in technological progress, describes the uses of refrigeration, explains resistance to its application, and gives some indication of its social and economic effects. The application of refrigeration to food supply and the manufacture of ice falls into three periods: the years prior to 1890, 1890 to 1917, and 1917 to 1950. Chapters are devoted to improvements in refrigerated transportation, the introduction of frozen foods, and the wider use of locker plants and home freezers. In the last chapter the Tennessee Valley Authority is selected as an illustration of the potentialities of refrigeration in relieving the problems of large distressed rural areas.

4795. Bathe, Greville, and Dorothy Bathe. Oliver Evans; a chronicle of early American engineering. Philadelphia, The Historical Society of Pennsylvania, 1935. xviii, 362 p. illus., maps, facsims. 36–585 T40.E9B3

"Books and principal pamphlets, written and published by Oliver Evans between the years 1792 and 1819": p. 344–345.

The scattered and little-known facts concerning Oliver Evans (1755–1819) are here brought together and many of his letters and papers printed in full. Unbroken by chapters, this first full-length biography of a pioneer in the construction of high-pressure engines throws much light upon the functioning of the early patent laws, and the primitive engineering equipment of the period. Born in Delaware, by 1793 Oliver Evans moved to Philadelphia, where in succeeding years he was a constructor of mills, a burr-millstone manufacturer, and a dealer in bolting cloth and plaster of Paris. For nearly 30 years he went on improving the mechanism of his engines and boilers. His correspondence with Tobias Lear, Robert Livingston, and Thomas Jefferson concerning his improvements in their mills indicates that he was better known in his own day than he has been since. As the authors point out, his life span fell just a few years too early for his talents to achieve their potential social effect.

4796. Bishop, Joseph Bucklin, and Farnham Bishop. Goethals, genius of the Panama Canal; a biography. New York, Harper, 1930. xiv, 493 p. 30–22571 TA140.G58B5

The elder Bishop, Secretary of the Isthmian Canal Commission from 1905 to 1914, died before finishing the fifth chapter of this authorized biography of his close friend, and his son completed the task. Graduating from the Military Academy in 1880, George Washington Goethals (1858–1928) served in the Engineer Corps in all grades from second lieutenant to colonel. In 1907 President Roosevelt appointed Goethals to construct the Panama Canal, and to assume all responsibilities for the government of the Canal Zone. Having opened the Panama Canal to world shipping in 1914, Goethals was made a major general and remained as governor of the Canal Zone until he retired late in 1916. Recalled to active duty in December 1917, Goethals became director of purchase, storage, and traffic, in charge of the transport of supplies and the movement of all troops within the United States and overseas. Returning to the retired list in 1919, Goethals served as consulting engineer on many important waterway projects. The tributes after his death praised his inflexible justice as strongly as his professional and administrative abilities.

4797. Blake, Nelson M. Water for the cities; a history of the urban water supply problem in the United States. Syracuse, N. Y., Syracuse University Press, 1956. 341 p. (Maxwell School series, 3) 56–13576 TD223.B5

This original study started out as an investigation of how New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston came to recognize the vital importance of water supply to the health and functioning of those communities and took steps to provide it during the years 1790 to 1860. It has been expanded to include brief accounts of such developments in other cities, and, in the last two chapters, the accomplishments of water supply engineering from 1860 to the present day. Progress in private and public control of urban water supply are traced from the time when American cities drew their water almost exclusively from springs, wells, and cisterns, to the building of great reservoirs such as those created by the Hoover and Parker dams across the Colorado River. In the background is the story of municipal growth and the political struggle that usually accompanies expansion in public works. The references (p. 288–331) indicate an extensive use of state and municipal documents supplemented by newspapers.

4798. Copley, Frank Barkley. Frederick W. Taylor, father of scientific management. New York, Harper, 1923. 2 v. 23–17530 T58.T42C6

An admiring and thoroughly documented life of Frederick W. Taylor (1856–1915), the first to apply scientific method to the manufacture of a given product from a certain amount of raw material with minimum waste and friction. In 1878 he entered the Midvale Steel Company as an apprentice, and rose from gang boss to foreman of the machine shop, to master mechanic, chief draftsman, and finally chief engineer within a period of six years. At Midvale he laid the foundation of his system of scientific management, and from 1898 gave it more concrete form at the Bethlehem Steel Company, which employed him to analyze its operations. Taylor devoted the latter years of his life to promoting scientific management or "Taylorism," as it became popularly known. His principal book, The Principles of Scientific Management (New York, Harper, 1911. 144 p.), within two years was translated into French, German, Dutch, Swedish, Russian, Lettish, Italian, Spanish, and Japanese. He was also the inventor of a number of industrial machines and processes, such as the heat treatment of high-speed tool steel.

4799. Fraser, Chelsea C. The story of engineering in America. New York, Crowell, 1928. 471 p. 28–24165 TA23.F8

Bringing together in one volume historical landmarks and typical processes in the construction of roads, railroads, bridges, tunnels and subways, dams and reservoirs, canals, harbor improvements, lighthouses, mines, and buildings, this book is aimed at the nontechnical reader interested in the accomplishments of American engineering from colonial days through the first quarter of the 20th century. Written in a simple style, it contains many drawings of typical constructions.

4800. Hoover, Theodore Jesse, and John Charles Lounsbury Fish. The engineering profession. 2d ed. Stanford, Stanford University Press, 1950. xv, 486 p. 50–12642 TA157.H56 1950
Includes bibliographies.

Two outstanding educators and consultants in the fields of civil and mining engineering have prepared a vocational guide for those considering one of the branches of engineering as a profession, and a "progress report" to the experienced engineer on the characteristics of engineering. It describes the qualifications and duties of civil, mining, mechanical, electrical, chemical, and other engineers. Changes in practice since the first edition appeared in 1941 have necessitated extensive revision, especially in the sections on municipal engineering and electronics. There are chapters on the education of an engineer and the new opportunities for participating in community welfare, as well as tables showing salaries, and the functional, industrial, and geographic distribution of engineers. The chapters on engineering education and salaries in Esther L. Brown's The Professional Engineer (New York, Russell Sage Foundation, 1936. 86 p.) afford comparisons evidencing progress in training and in opportunities. The recent edition of Lowell O. Stewart's Careers in Engineering: Requirements, Opportunities, 3d ed. (Ames, Iowa State College Press, 1956. 105 p.), furnishes much practical information in brief compass.

4801. Steinman, David B. The builders of the bridge; the story of John Roebling and his son. 2d ed. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1950. 457 p. 50–8862 TA140.R7S8 1950
Bibliography: p. 421–445.

The author is himself an experienced bridge engineer who, three years after the first edition of this book (1945), was put in charge of the reconstruction of the Brooklyn Bridge. Its original builders were John August Roebling (1806–1869) and his son, Washington Augustus Roebling (1837–1926). The father, educated as a civil engineer at Berlin, Prussia, came to America in 1831. In 1841 he introduced the first wire cable, and in 1845–46 at Pittsburgh he constructed first a canal aqueduct and next a bridge, both on the suspension principle. The whole of Part 3 is devoted to the construction of the Brooklyn Bridge between 1867 and 1883. An unlucky accident caused John Roebling's death while the survey was still under way in July 1869. His son carried it to completion, but in 1872 was paralyzed by the caisson disease which had already killed three workmen, and thenceforward had to direct the work from his sickroom. The opening of the bridge on May 24, 1883, a landmark in civic and engineering history, was marked by a triumphal celebration. The book, as the author tells us, "has been a labor of love, in the truest sense, with no counting the cost."

4802. Turnbull, Archibald Douglas. John Stevens, an American record. New York, Century, 1928. xvii, 545 p. 28–12356 VM140.S7T8

Stevens (1749–1838) of Hoboken, N. J., an amazingly versatile engineer and inventor best remembered for his improvements in steam transportation by sea and land, also designed tunnels, bridges, and projectiles. He was likewise a competent entrepreneur and the founder of a great fortune. This detailed biography is based on Stevens' own papers and incorporates many extended excerpts from them.

4803. Yost, Edna. Modern American Engineers. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1952. 182 p. 52–5172 TA139.Y65

CONTENTS.—Robert Ernest Doherty, engineering educator.—Ralph Edwards Flanders, mechanical engineer.—Arthur Ernest Morgan, civil engineer.—Vannevar Bush, electrical engineer.—Scott Turner, mining engineer.—J. Brownlee Davidson, agricultural engineer.—Harold Bright Maynard, industrial engineering consultant.—Ole Singstad, civil engineer—John Robert Suman, petroleum engineer.—Carl George Arthur Rosen, research engineer.—Stanwood Willston Sparrow, automotive engineer.—Harold Alden Wheeler, radio and television engineer.

Each of the 12 men whose biographies make up this book was selected by the author, with help from the staffs of various national engineering societies and other authorities in the profession, "as an engineer recognized by his peers as a man of high achievement." Some of the engineering fields omitted in this book are covered in the author's Modern Americans in Science and Invention (Philadelphia, Stokes, 1941. 270 p.).

XVIII

Medicine and Public Health

A.	Medicine in General	4804–4817
B.	Physicians and Surgeons	4818–4832
C.	Psychiatry	4833–4840
D.	Other Specialties	4841–4844
E.	Hospitals and Nursing	4845–4854
F.	Medical Education	4855–4861
G.	Public Health	4862–4881
H.	Medical Economics	4882–4891

THE literature of American medicine is of course enormous, but we are here concerned only with that fairly limited portion of it which is intelligible to the layman, and displays the subject in its historical development and its relationships to the larger social fabric. Section A includes a few general histories, and the later ones a number of more specialized historical treatments; but, in the main, it is fair to say that the historical exploration of the development of American medicine is only very imperfectly accomplished. Until the 19th century, that development is primarily of interest to the American social historian, but in the course of that century the United States becomes one of the major sources of medical discovery, and begins to take the lead in medical organization. Behind all progress, however, stands the individual physician, and medical biography and autobiography is a branch of the literature which has proliferated amazingly in the last two or three decades. The sampling presented in Section B could be indefinitely expanded, for every year sees a new crop of personal narratives, each with its own angle of vision, and seldom devoid of interest or instruction.

The prominence given to psychiatry, which occupies Section C, follows almost inevitably from the prevalence of the subject in contemporary thought and writing. The entries could have been readily increased to three or four times their present number, which is by no means the case with Section D, in which the other medical specialties are gathered. There remains to be done much research and writing concerning the origin and development of these offshoots from the main trunk of American medicine.

The two following sections reflect the remarkable development of two institutions, the hospital and the medical school, from their modest 18th-century beginnings. The increasing number, size, and complexity of both have brought their special problems, discussions of which take their place beside more purely historical works in each section.

Section G on public health includes some titles on the early American epidemics, the most potent stimulus to activity in the field, and on the problem of disease in general. Other works discuss the beginnings of the movement, its professional aspects, and the extent of the public health resources presently available to the American people.

The increasing efficiency of medical care has concurrently increased its expense, so that the cost of treatment and hospitalization bears heavily or even crushingly upon the average family budget. This has led to various proposals for distributing the burden throughout the community, and these again to much controversy, reflected in a large and growing body of publication, of which we can present only a sampling.

A. Medicine in General

4804. Burrage, Walter L. A history of the Massachusetts Medical Society, with brief biographies of the founders and chief officers, 1781–1922. [Norwood, Mass.] Priv. Print., 1923. 505 p. 23–18826 R15.M5B8

Chartered by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in 1781 "to promote medical and surgical knowledge . . . as well as to make a just discrimination between such as are duly educated . . . and those who may ignorantly and wickedly administer medicine," the Massachusetts Medical Society is the oldest medical society in the United States with a continuous record of its meetings from its founding to the present. The Secretary of the Society utilizes its manuscript records to tell the story from 1765, when efforts were first made to form a state medical society, to 1922. Notwithstanding the leadership exercised by Pennsylvania men of medicine, the Medical Society of the State of Pennsylvania was not organized until more than 75 years later. The story of that Society has been edited by Dr. Howard K. Petry: A Century of Medicine, 1848–1948; the History of the Medical Society of the State of Pennsylvania ([Harrisburg?] 1952. 404 p.).

4805. Cannon, Ida M. On the social frontier of medicine; pioneering in medical social service. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952. 273 p. 52–8215 HV687.5.U52M33

Notes and references: p. 261–266.

Dr. Richard Clarke Cabot was one of the first to recognize the relationship between the social and economic background of patients and their medical problems. He made a great contribution to medical progress when he secured the appointment of a social worker in the Out-Patient Department of the Massachusetts General Hospital in 1905, and thereby laid the foundation for the growth of medical social service in the United States. The author, who for 31 years was the Chief of the Social Service Department of the Massachusetts General Hospital, traces the evolution of that service through the years of resistance on the part of the medical staff to its final, full acceptance and establishment as an official department of the Hospital. She goes on to describe the spread of social service to other hospitals and public health services, and the advances in medical science during the first half of the 20th century which have changed the hospital care of patients.

4806. Fishbein, Morris. Fads and quackery in healing; an analysis of the foibles of the healing cults, with essays on various other peculiar notions in the health field. New York, Covici, Friede, 1932. 384 p. 32–28086 R710.F55

The American Medical Association has long prosecuted its war against certain methods of healing and has attacked them from time to time in the pages of its Journal. The long-time editor of that Journal (1924–1949) traces the evolution of medical fads from the earliest time in this series of essays, many of which had already appeared in his Medical Follies (1925. 223 p.) and New Medical Follies (1927. 235 p.), published by Boni & Liveright. Chapters are devoted to such subjects as homeopathy, eclecticism, mind healing, osteopathy, chiropractic, naturopathy, and food and drinking fads of the Americans.

4807. Fishbein, Morris. A history of the American Medical Association, 1847 to 1947; with the biographies of the presidents of the association, by Walter L. Bierring, M. D.; and with histories of the publications, councils, bureaus and other official bodies [by various authors] Philadelphia, Saunders, 1947. 1226 p. Med 47–46 R15.A55F5

The increase in the number of medical colleges during the first half of the 19th century gave rise to a demand for standardization of the curriculum. Through the efforts of Dr. Nathan Smith Davis of Binghamton, New York, delegates and members of the medical profession from different parts of the United States met in the Academy of Natural Sciences in Philadelphia in May 1847, and organized the national association "for cultivating and advancing medical knowledge; for elevating the standard of medical education; for promoting the usefulness, honor, and interests of the medical profession; for enlightening and directing public opinion in regard to the duties, responsibilities, and requirements of medical men; for exciting and encouraging emulation and concert of action in the profession, and for facilitating and fostering friendly intercourse between those engaged in it." Dr. Fishbein writes and edits a centennial history of the Association and its influence on medical progress in the United States during its first hundred years.

4808. New York Academy of Medicine. Committee on Medicine and the Changing Order.

Medicine in the changing order. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1947. 240 p. (Its Studies)
Med 47-1014 R723.5.N4

This Committee was appointed by the Council of the New York Academy of Medicine in December 1942 to explore the effect of changes which are taking place in our economic and social life on medicine in its various aspects. In this report the Committee makes recommendations concerning the improvement of medical care in both urban and rural areas through the extension of hospital services, and a wider distribution of public health and nursing services. The pros and cons of voluntary prepayment plans and compulsory insurance in a free society are canvassed.

4809. Packard, Francis R. History of medicine in the United States. New ed. New York, P. B. Hoeber, 1931. 2 v. 32-13 R151.P12 1931
Bibliography: v. 2, p. [1241]-1266.

The editor of the Annals of Medical History (1917-1942) tells the story of medicine in the United States to the closing years of the 19th century, venturing into the 20th century in only a few cases. The incidence of epidemics in the colonies, the rise of medical legislation, the founding of hospitals, medical schools and periodicals, and the development of medical practice are interwoven with the lives of the physicians, surgeons, and medical specialists who participated in and influenced those events. The chapters on "The Medical Department of the Army from the Close of the Revolution to the Close of the Spanish-American War," by Col. Percy M. Ashburn; and "The History of the Medical Department of the U. S. Navy," by Lt. Cmdr. Robert P. Parsons, are of special interest. In 1929 Col. Ashburn published a comprehensive History of the Medical Department of the United States Army (Boston, Houghton Mifflin. 448 p.).

4810. Pickard, Madge E., and Roscoe Carlyle Buley. The Midwest pioneer, his ills, cures, & doctors. Crawfordsville, Ind., R. E. Banta, 1945. 339 p. S G 45-165 R151.P5
"Bibliographical note": p. [307]-324.

This is "a nontechnical account of pioneer medicine" in the Middle West prior to 1850. It describes the "afflictions" that had followed the settlers West, the home remedies, the bleeding, purging and blistering of the doctors, the growth of irregular medical sects, and the rise of the drug trade. Against this background of the pioneers' struggle to find relief from pain, the authors trace the development of medical schools, societies, literature, and legislation under the leadership of Daniel Drake, the Samuel Grosses and others. The bibliographical note at the end is supplementary to the more important medical books which have been mentioned in the text and the notes, and is "intended in part to round out a brief guide to the study of early mid-western medicine."

4811. Reed, Louis S. The healing cults; a study of sectarian medical practice: its extent, causes, and control. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1932. 134 p. (Publications of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care, no. 16)
32-26695 R152.C65, no. 16
RM700.R38

"References" at end of each chapter.

The Committee on the Costs of Medical Care was "organized to study the economic aspects of the prevention and care of sickness, including the adequacy, availability, and compensation of the persons and agencies concerned." This publication of the committee describes the evolution of osteopathy, chiropractic, naturopathy, Christian Science, and certain types of faith healing, as well as the number, geographical distribution, economic and legal status of the practitioners, in order to complete the picture of medical services available in the United States.

4812. Shafer, Henry Burnell. The American medical profession, 1783 to 1850. New York, Columbia University Press, 1936. 271 p. (Columbia University. Faculty of Political Science. Studies in history, economics and public law, no. 417)
36-20187 H31.C7, no. 417
R151.S45 1936a

Bibliography: p. 250-257.

A study of medical progress during more than half a century following the American Revolution, a period in which the foundation was being laid for the scientific growth of the medical profession which followed the discovery of anesthesia in the 1840's. The author, a historian rather than a member of the medical profession, describes in detail the status of American medicine at the close of the 18th century, the founding of medical colleges and societies, the increase in the publication of medical literature, the growing awareness of the varying value of the remedies and methods employed, and the development of a code of medical ethics during those years of "transition from medieval customs to modern methods."

4813. Shryock, Richard H. American medical research, past and present. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1947. 350 p. (New York Academy of Medicine. Committee on Medicine and the Changing Order. Studies)
Med 47-2507 R737.S48

Notes and References at end of chapters.

Although medical practice, medical education, and hospitals had become a part of the American scene by the close of the 18th century, they depended on the medical sciences developed by the British, the French, and the Germans. The impetus given to medical research by William Henry Welch in his pathological laboratory in 1878 and later at the Johns Hopkins Medical School, was bearing fruit by 1895 when American medicine began to "emerge on a level of cultural independence." Dr. Shryock, a historian who has increasingly specialized in medical history, traces the advances in medical research through the era of private support, the period of great philanthropies, and the gradual development of public-supported research programs. The last chapter summarizes the impact of World War II on medical research and some early post-war programs. The integration of research, teaching, and practice is examined in Medical Research: A Mid-century Survey, published for the American Foundation (Boston, Little, Brown, 1955. 2 v.).

4814. Sigerist, Henry E. American medicine; translated by Hildegard Nagel. New York, Norton, 1934. 316 p. 34–40281 R151.S52

Bibliography: p. 289–304.

The author, professor of medicine at the University of Leipzig, and more recently the William H. Welch Professor of the History of Medicine at Johns Hopkins University, presents a historical sketch of American medicine from the colonial period to the early 1930's. It is based on four years of intensive study, and a tour through the United States during which he visited medical schools, laboratories, and hospitals, and observed the conditions of medical practice and public health service. Dr. Sigerist, with some misgivings concerning his American audience, portrays for Europeans the America which he foresees as the center of gravity of the medical sciences. His book has not been replaced as the most convenient brief introduction to its subject.

4815. Stern, Bernhard J. American medical practice in the perspectives of a century. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1945. 156 p. ([New York Academy of Medicine. Committee on Medicine and the Changing Order. Studies])

SG45–126 R723.5.S8

Bibliographical footnotes.

The first in a series of studies made under the auspices of the Committee established by the Council of the New York Academy of Medicine. The author, a teacher of sociology rather than a medical man, looks at medicine not as an isolated science, but as a segment of life which is affected by and contributes to the economic, social, and technological changes of the period. Chapters on the specialist and the general practitioner, the income of physicians, and the distribution of doctors and medical services, are illustrated by statistics and cases so as to show the effect on the profession and the general welfare. The study concludes with the thought that the "problems of medical practice that are agitating the public today are primarily concerned with the provision of a high quality of curative and preventive medical service to all people," regardless of income, race or geographical location.

4816. Thatcher, Virginia S. History of anesthesia, with emphasis on the nurse specialist. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1953. 289 p.

53–9092 RD79.T49

Research in the use of gases as anesthetics was begun in England before 1800, but successful experiments in the administration of ether were finally made in the United States in the 1840's. This was America's first great contribution to the medical profession—the means of painless surgery. The author, editor of American Association of Nurse Anesthetist Publications, says that her purpose is "to extend the knowledge of anesthetists about themselves beyond the framework of personal reference and of already published histories." The place of the nurse as an anesthetist and the organization, history, and sphere of influence of the National Association of Nurse Anesthetists are described in detail.

4817. Truman, Stanley R. The doctor, his career, his business, his human relations. Baltimore, Williams & Wilkins, 1951. 151 p.

51–2566 R727.T7

The transition from medical student to practicing physician is a neglected phase of medical training, according to the author. He has written this book to interpret, within the framework of the "Principles of Medical Ethics of the American Medical Association" (Appendix A), the professional problems as well as the patient-physician relations, public relations, and interprofessional situations which confront the young doctor. Selection of a community in which to practice medicine, planning a functionally efficient office, selection of assistants, maintenance of records, and insurance and savings are discussed, and also summarized at the end in a "Check List of Things To Do When You Start in Practice." One part of the author's theme receives more detailed treatment in James E. Bryan's Public Relations in Medical Practice (Baltimore, Williams & Wilkins, 1954. 301 p.).

B. Physicians and Surgeons

4818. [Beaumont] Myer, Jesse S., comp. A new print of Life and letters of Dr. William Beaumont. With an introd. by Sir William Osler. St. Louis, C. V. Mosby, 1939. xxxi, 327 p.
39–16649 R154.B35M8 1939

"Literature references and abstracts of cases of gastric fistulae prior to that of St. Martin": p. 308–312; "Summary of literature consulted": p. 313–315.

Born in Vermont in 1785, William Beaumont served his medical apprenticeship there until 1812, when he left for Plattsburg, New York, and joined the army as surgeon's mate. Ten years later, Beaumont was stationed at Fort Mackinac when he was called to treat a young French Canadian, Alexis St. Martin, who had been accidentally shot, leaving a cavity in his abdomen which would not heal. This afforded Beaumont the opportunity to observe the functioning of the digestive system, to conduct experiments with the gastric juices, and to gain preëminence in the advancement of physiology through the publication of his keen and methodical observations. Dr. Myer's biography was first published in 1912 on the one hundredth anniversary of Beaumont's entry into the pracice of medicine, and is based on a collection of manuscript memoranda, diaries, letters, etc., in possession of Beaumont's daughter, Mrs. Sarah Keim of St. Louis. This reprint contains several hitherto unpublished letters written by Alexis St. Martin, and a "Present-day Appreciation of Beaumont's Experiments on Alexis St. Martin," by Dr. Andrew C. Ivy, which does not appear in the earlier printing. At at meeting of the International Congress of Physiologists in 1929, William Beaumont was "figuratively canonized as the patron saint of American Physiology," and in 1953, one hundred years after his death, the Michigan State Medical Society issued the Beaumont Memorial Number of its Journal (February 1953) in which the projected Beaumont Memorial on Mackinac Island, where he carried out some of his first experiments, is described.

4819. [Billings] Garrison, Fielding H. John Shaw Billings; a memoir. New York, Putnam, 1915. 432 p. 15–9723 R154.B59G3

"Bibliography of the writings of Dr. John S. Billings, by Miss Adelaide R. Hasse": p. 411–422.

Billings (1838–1913) stands out in the world of medicine as the organizer of the tools of medical research. As a student at the Medical College of Ohio he became conscious of the need for a great medical library in the United States. His opportunity came at the close of the Civil War when unused hospital funds were diverted to the Surgeon General's Library and he was placed in charge. The first volume of Dr. Billings' monumental work, the Index Catalogue, appeared in 1880. The first issues of its companion publication, Index Medicus, planned as a monthly guide to current medical literature, had appeared in 1879. He represented American medicine at the meeting of the International Medical Congress at London in 1881, where his address, Our Medical Literature, was received with enthusiasm. Dr. Billings' experiences as a medical officer during the Civil War, his part in the construction and organization of the Johns Hopkins Hospital and Medical School and the New York Public Library, as well as his activities in the fields of hygiene and sanitary engineering, and vital and medical statistics, are also treated in this Memoir by the assistant librarian of the Surgeon General's Library (1889–1922), a pioneer American historian of medicine.

4820. [Blackwell] Ross, Ishbel. Child of destiny, the life story of the first woman doctor. New York, Harper, 1949. 309 p.
49–10905 R154.B623R6

Bibliography: p. 295–298.

The education of women as physicians in the United States had its beginning in October 1847 when the Geneva Medical School of western New York accepted the application of the ambitious and tenacious but modest Elizabeth Blackwell (1821–1910), who, in 1832, had emigrated from Britain to the United States with her parents. After graduating and pursuing her studies abroad, Elizabeth Blackwell returned to New York where she opened the New York Infirmary, for "providing and furnishing medicines and medical and surgical aid to such persons as may be in need thereof, and unable by reason of poverty to procure the same; also the training of an efficient body of nurses for the service of the community; and also the employment of medical practitioners of either sex, it being the design of this Institution to secure the services of well qualified female practitioners of medicine for its patients." The New York Infirmary, rising ten stories high on Stuyvesant Square, is now a superb general hospital, which celebrated its 100 years of service in 1954. So influential was the example of Elizabeth Blackwell that by the turn of the century 7,387 women were practicing medicine in the United States.

4821. [Cushing] Fulton, John F. Harvey Cushing, a biography. Springfield, Ill., Thomas, 1946. 754 p. (Yale University. School of Medicine. Yale Medical Library. Historical Library. Publication no. 13) Med 46–151 R154.C96F8

Dr. John F. Fulton, Sterling Professor of the History of Medicine at Yale University, and Harvey Cushing's literary executor, has interwoven the story of Cushing's life with selections from family papers, diaries, and case histories, with their caricatures and meticulous drawings, to produce a biography of the eminent brain surgeon which appeals to laymen as well as to medical students. As Resident in Surgery at Johns Hopkins Medical School in the late 1890's, Cushing (1869–1939) was surrounded by such men as William Henry Welch, William Osler, and William S. Halsted, Surgeon-in-Chief, who profoundly influenced his career as a surgeon. A paper on trigeminal neuralgia, which Cushing read before a joint meeting of the Philadelphia Neurological Society and the College of Physicians in April 1900, stands as an important landmark in the history of neurosurgery because of the unusual detail and illustrations. In this, and later writings, Cushing's illustrations set a standard which has left a mark on American surgery, and his methods established neurological surgery as a recognized specialty of prime importance to the medical profession throughout the world. In 1950, a less monumental but competent biography entitled Harvey Cushing: Surgeon, Author, Artist, by Elizabeth H. Thomson (New York, Schuman. 347 p.) was published as one of the books in The life of science library.

4822. Flexner, James Thomas. Doctors on horseback; pioneers of American medicine. New York, Garden City Pub. Co., 1930. 370 p. 39–25572 R153.F5 1939

Contents.—Seer and Continental soldier: John Morgan, 1735–1789.—Saint or scourge: Benjamin Rush, 1745–1813.—A backwoods Galahad: Ephraim McDowell, 1771–1830.—Genius on the Ohio: Daniel Drake, 1785–1852.—Two men and destiny: William Beaumont, 1785–1853 [and Alexis St. Martin].—The death of pain: Crawford W. Long, 1815–1878; William T. G. Morton, 1819–1868.—Selected bibliographies (p. 355–359).

The author, who collaborated with his distinguished father in writing the biography of William Henry Welch (no. 4831), writes these six sketches for the general reader to show how "in the settlements of a new nation there appeared doctors of genius, explorers who, without laboratories or instruments of precision or even any formal training, made great discoveries that helped usher in the age of modern medical science."

4823. [Gorgas] Gibson, John M. Physician to the world; the life of General William C. Gorgas. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1950. 315 p. (Duke University publications) 50–10881 RA424.5.G6G5

Bibliography: p. [295]–307.

As a sanitarian Gorgas (1854–1920) applied the principles established by the Reed Commission to free Havana and the Panama Canal Zone of mosquitoes and yellow fever, and as Surgeon General of the U. S. Army during World War I he safeguarded the health of the largest body of men ever to wear the American uniform up to that time. "His vision and his initiative translated the known scientific facts concerning yellow fever into practical accomplishment, thereby making possible the control of this scourge of the tropics and the building of the Panama Canal." Presenting an honorary degree from Johns Hopkins University, Dr. William Welch described Gorgas as a "physician and sanitarian of the highest eminence, who, by his conquests over pestilential diseases, has rendered signal service to his profession, to his country, and to the world." The author of this admiring biography is a journalist, a State health department official, and, like his subject, an Alabamian.

4824. Gross, Samuel D. Autobiography of Samuel D. Gross, M. D. . . . emeritus professor of surgery in the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia. With sketches of his contemporaries. Edited by his sons. Philadelphia, G. Barrie, 1887. 2 v. 15–9084 R154.G77A3

As a surgeon, teacher, and author, Samuel D. Gross (1805–1884) was one of the most influential physicians in 19th-century America, and one of the earliest to create American medical literature of importance. He writes the story of his life with the hope of stimulating the ambitious to work for the advancement of science and the amelioration of human suffering. Born in Pennsylvania, Gross graduated from Jefferson Medical College in Philadelphia, to which he returned to occupy the chair of surgery between 1865 and 1882. Among his contributions were his surgical handbook entitled A System of Surgery; Pathological, Diagnostic, Therapeutique, and Operative (Philadelphia, Blanchard & Lea, 1859. 2 v.) which went through many editions, and the Lives of Eminent American Physicians and Surgeons (Philadelphia, Lindsay & Blakiston, 1861. 836 p.) which he edited and published "to popularize the profession, and to place its services and claims more conspicuously, than has yet been done, before the American people." The founding of the American Surgical Association by Dr. Gross in 1880, "to foster surgical art, science, education and literature," is typical of his continuing interest in the development of surgery in America.

4825. Hertzler, Arthur E. The horse and buggy doctor. New York, Harper, 1938. 322 p.
38–27572 R154.H39A3

Arthur Emanuel Hertzler (1870–1946), surgeon, teacher, founder of a hospital, and author, has taken time out from his scientific monographs on surgical pathology and other medical subjects, to record for posterity one phase in American life, which through the development of better communications, hospitals, and specialization, is fast becoming a tradition. Set in Kansas, and interspersed with human incidents, Dr. Hertzler's own story is typical of that which might be told by any doctor-surgeon who practiced his profession in a small community and its surrounding countryside during the latter part of the 19th century and the first quarter or more of the 20th. Dr. Hertzler pictures the difference between the medical education available to him and to the students of the 1930's; the changes in modes of transportation from horse and buggy to automobile; the contrasts between the bedside doctor and the office physician, the kitchen operation and hospital surgery, and between the days of epidemics and those of immunity, and he summarizes the effects of such changes on medical care in the United States.

4826. [Mather] Beall, Otho T., and Richard H. Shryock. Cotton Mather, first significant figure in American medicine. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1954. 241 p. (Johns Hopkins University. Institute of the History of Medicine. Publications. 1st ser.: Monographs, v. 5)
54–8009 F67.M4218

Reprinted from volume 63 of the Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society.

The cultural significance of medical thought in the English colonies at the beginning of the 18th century is illustrated in the life of Cotton Mather (1663–1728), whose role in medical history is fully told for the first time. He recognized in medicine "an immediate opportunity to apply science to the welfare of mankind," and his activity during the smallpox epidemic of 1721 is his major contribution to medical practice. His use of inoculation "was the first positive achievement in preventive medicine." See also item no. 40.

4827. [Mayo] Clapesattle, Helen B. The Doctors Mayo. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1941. xiv, 822 p.
41–52031 R154.M33C3

Bibliographical notes: p. 717–799.

The Mayo Clinic is a living, world-renowned memorial to Dr. William W. Mayo (1819–1911) and his two sons, who molded it as deftly as their skills have shaped the techniques, the teaching, and the practice of surgery since the end of the 19th century. The author, editor of the University of Minnesota Press, has had access to correspondence and other manuscripts, newspaper clippings, and transcripts of interviews for the basis of her life of the Mayos, which is also the story of the Midwest as it emerged from pioneer days, and of medicine as it developed from the horse-and-buggy period to the age of clinicians. Her book was translated into several foreign languages, and reprinted in 1943 by the Garden City Publishing Company (Garden City, N. Y., 822 p.); a second edition, condensed for quick reading, was published in 1954. The Mayos' contribution to medicine began in surgery, but, in the words of the author, "their reputation rests upon the integrated, cooperative form of medical practice and education they developed," which "is part of the heritage of all medicine and of every American."

4828. [Mitchell] Earnest, Ernest P. S. Weir Mitchell, novelist and physician. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1950. 279 p.
50–8063 R154.M66E3

The list of institutions and individuals who permitted Dr. Earnest to use their collections of Mitchell papers, and the "Notes" (p. 245–274) indicate the extensive research that has gone into this biography of Silas Weir Mitchell (1829–1914) of Philadelphia, who gained prominence in his own day for his work on injuries of the nerves, his "rest cure" for nervous diseases, his discovery of the nature of rattlesnake venom, and his writings, both scientific and fictional. Treating nerve wounds during the Civil War, Mitchell gave impetus to the infant science of neurology, and his critical address before the 50th annual meeting of the Medico-Psychological Association, in 1894, stimulated the movement for improved institutions for the care of the mentally ill. Like Oliver Wendell Holmes, and more recently Somerset Maugham and A. J. Cronin, Mitchell drew on his medical experiences in touch with the intimate lives of his patients to produce novels. In 1952 David M. Rein published a study of those novels: S. Weir Mitchell as a Psychiatric Novelist (New York, International Universities Press. 207 p.). Both Earnest and Rein agree that Mitchell's "accomplishments deserve to be recalled more widely and wrought into the tradition of American culture."

4829. [Osler] Cushing, Harvey W. The life of Sir William Osler. London, New York, Oxford University Press, 1940. xviii, 1417 p. 40–27751 R489.O7C8 1940

"Originally published in 1925 in a two-volume edition."—Foreword.

William Osler (1848–1919) was born in Canada and spent the last 15 years of his life in England, but the fruitful interlude of 21 years in the United States entitles him to a place among those who laid the foundations of modern American medicine. Becoming professor of clinical medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1884, his bedside instruction was an innovation in the Philadelphia school. Through the influence of William H. Welch, Osler was appointed Physician-in-Chief of the new Johns Hopkins Hospital in 1886, and was primarily responsible for the organization of the clinic. During 16 years of assocation with the Johns Hopkins Hospital and Medical School, Osler published his magnum opus, The Principles and Practice of Medicine, (which reached its 16th edition in 1947) and investigated the etiology of typhoid fever, malaria, pneumonia, and other major diseases, so that his "greatest professional service was that of propagandist of public health measures." In 1926 Cushing received the Pulitzer prize for this Life, which is regarded as one of the great medical biographies.

4830. [Rush] Goodman, Nathan G. Benjamin Rush, physician and citizen, 1746–1813. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1934. 421 p. 34–33318 R154.R9G65

Bibliography: p. [377]–406.

This is the first full-length biography of one of the most versatile figures in 18th-century America. Becoming a professor in the first medical school in the colonies in 1769, Rush through his lectures and writings exerted an influence on the medical profession that was still apparent at the close of the century. As a physician he started the practice of medicine among the underprivileged of Philadelphia, in whose welfare he always maintained a keen interest; introduced new theories concerning the cause and cure of diseases which antagonized some of his colleagues; led the fight against epidemics, and championed the humane treatment of the mentally ill. Benjamin Rush threw his energies behind the cause of independence and became a member of the Continental Congress, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and an influence in the medical department of the Continental Army during the Revolution. His published writings, which Mr. Goodman has listed in his bibliography, and the more recently published collection of the Letters of Benjamin Rush, edited by Lyman H. Butterfield, and published for the American Philosophical Society as volume 30, parts 1–2, of its Memoirs (Princeton, N. J., Princeton University Press, 1951. 2 v.) show that he was a prolific writer, and fearless in expressing his opinions on any topic in which he was interested.

4831. [Welch] Flexner, Simon, and James Thomas Flexner. William Henry Welch and the heroic age of American medicine. New York, Viking Press, 1941. 539 p. 41–20339 R154.W32F6

"Source references" included in Appendix C; Notes to the text, p. 466–524.

This biography is also the story of developments in medical sciences from the 1870's to the 1930's as shaped by William Henry Welch (1850–1934), who is often called the "Dean of American Medicine." He was born in Connecticut, the son and grandson of physicians; and educated at Yale, at the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Columbia University, and abroad. Impressed by the advances in histology, chemistry, physiology, and pathology which he observed in Germany, Dr. Welch founded America's first pathological laboratory at Bellvue Hospital Medical College in 1878, and pioneered in the growth of American medical research. As professor of pathology in Johns Hopkins University, he helped to organize the Hospital in 1889 and the Medical School in 1893 as great medical centers for teaching, research, and clinical medicine. Known at home and abroad for his experiments in pathology and bacteriology, his interest in public health and sanitation, and his association with the Rockefeller Institute of Medical Research and the Journal of Experimental Medicine, Dr. Welch was the recipient of many honors and awards on both sides of the Atlantic. At the time of his 80th birthday, Dr. Welch took pride in his thought that "America is now paying the debt which she owed so long to the Old World by her own active and fruitful participation in scientific discovery and the advancement of the science and art of medicine and sanitation." Donald H. Fleming in his recent brief biography, William H. Welch and the Rise of Modern Medicine (Boston, Little, Brown, 1954. 216 p.), places the work of the Flexners first on his list of "Acknowledgments."

4832. Young, Hugh H. Hugh Young, a surgeon's autobiography. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1940. 554 p. 40–33117 R154.Y63A3

Dr. Young's story of his life (1870–1945) opens with his early years in Texas, and his education in Virginia and Maryland, and closes with a description of his civic activities, his travels, and his hobbies. The central portion reviews the development of urology as one of the early medical specialties in the United States, and the author's service at home as director of the Brady Urological Institute of Baltimore, and overseas as director of the A. E. F.'s Division of Urology. Dr. Young's researches in the field of his preëminence continued as long as he lived; he submitted an article for publication in the November 1945 issue of the Journal of Urology, just one month before his death. The book has numerous stories of cases, simply presented, and a series of remarkable technical drawings; it should appeal to both the layman and the physician.

C. Psychiatry

4833. American Psychiatric Association. One hundred years of American psychiatry. New York, Published for the American Psychiatric Association by Columbia University Press, 1944. xxiv, 649 p. A44–1921 RC435.A6

The publication of this volume commemorates the 100th birthday of the American Psychiatric Association, which was founded in Philadelphia on October 16, 1844, by thirteen physicians, all of them superintendents of hospitals for the mentally ill. Thirteen authorities in the field have contributed chapters on the history of psychiatry, and of the Association; the story of mental hospitals, and of psychiatric research, literature, and therapies; the development of mental hygiene; military psychiatry; psychology in relation to American psychiatry; the growth of psychiatry as a specialty; its legal aspects; and its influence on anthropology in America. Psychiatry, according to Dr. Gregory Zilboorg, who writes the Foreword, "touches on every aspect of the psychological and sociological problems which make up our civilized living, healthy and diseased. This volume is therefore intended to represent a survey of psychiatry as a growing cultural force." It contains bibliographical footnotes, a list of "Some important books in American psychiatry published in the last twenty-five years": p. [266]–269, and a list of American psychiatric periodicals": p. 269–271.

4834. Beers, Clifford Whittingham. A mind that found itself; an autobiography. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1935. 434 p. 35–6068 RC439.B4 1935

This is the "twenty-fifth anniversary edition" of Clifford Beers' autobiography, first published in 1908. Certain pages which have served their purpose have been deleted from this edition, but interesting letters and an account of important work that has grown out of the publication of the book have been appended. As a young business man Beers suffered a severe mental upset, and in his story he describes the condition and treatment of the mentally ill as he experienced them in several institutions in which he was a patient. Its publication heralded the beginning of a new era in the management of the mentally ill, second only to that which Dorothea Dix had instigated in the middle of the 19th century. In 1909 Beers helped to found the National Committee for Mental Hygiene, which broadened its scope to include activities outside of hospitals, and guided mental-hygiene activities for forty years. The establishment of the Phipps Clinic for psychiatry at Johns Hopkins, through the influence of Dr. William Welch and the philanthropist, Henry Phipps, illustrates the interest which the autobiography stimulated. The American Foundation for Mental Hygiene, founded by Beers in 1928 to raise funds for the National Committee, and for state and other agencies in the field, is a memorial to Beers' achievements.

4835. Bryan, William A. Administrative psychiatry. New York, Norton, 1936. 349 p. 37–27130 RC439.B885

Bibliography: p. 339–341.

Dr. Bryan was for years superintendent of the State Hospital at Worcester, Mass., which was established in 1832, and has often led in new methods. In this book he describes the organization and problems of a psychiatric hospital for those who wish to prepare for the specialty of administration. Chapters are devoted to building the staff, the nursing programs, the standards of care; medical, surgical, and psychiatric services; the social worker, the teaching program, and research; the clinic with its mental hygiene program as a factor in preventive medicine, and the relation of the administrator and staff to community groups. Under improved and skilled administration, the author foresees "the mental hospital of the future as a powerful and leading factor in the public health of the community."

4836. Deutsch, Albert. The mentally ill in America; a history of their care and treatment from colonial times. 2d ed., rev. and enl. New York, Columbia University Press, 1949. xx, 555 p. 49–7527 RC443.D4 1949

Bibliography: p. [520]–537.

The first edition, published in 1937, was made possible by the American Foundation for Mental Hygiene. In the second edition the author adds a review of recent trends toward prevention and better treatment of mental illness in the United States including the National Mental Health Act of 1946 authorizing the Federal Government to give substantial support to research, to training psychiatric personnel, and to expansion of services for those who do not require hospitalization. The subject is approached from the standpoint of the social historian, who illustrates how improvements in personnel, techniques, and institutions follow changes in social attitudes. This is the story of another episode in American life illustrating the combined efforts of doctors, social workers, philanthropists, and governmental units to improve the well-being of a less fortunate segment of the population.

4837. Deutsch, Albert. The shame of the States. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1948. 188 p.
48-9247 RC443.D415

Believing that civilization in the United States will be judged, to a great extent, by the public's attitude toward the care and treatment of the mentally ill, Deutsch attempts to revitalize the crusade started by Dorothea Dix by publishing the results of his survey of existing conditions in certain psychiatric hospitals in selected areas. The author considers the action taken by the American Psychiatric Association in 1946, in urging every state mental hospital superintendent to take the lead in exposing to public view any bad conditions within his knowledge, as a milestone toward attaining a higher level of institutional care. The last chapter is devoted to Deutsch's idea of an "ideal state mental hospital," which he believes will become a reality through the efforts of an enlightened and aroused public.

4838. Greenblatt, Milton, and others. From custodial to therapeutic patient care in mental hospitals; explorations in social treatment. New York, Russell Sage Foundation, 1955. 497 p.
55-11724 RC439.G82

Bibliography, compiled by Frederic L. Wells: p. 431-484.

This book is the result of a project sponsored by the Russell Sage Foundation to study patient care in mental hospitals, and to explore the utilization of the whole environment—the physical resources as well as the social interaction between doctors, nurses, aides, and patients—in the cure or improvement of the patient. Considered by the Foundation as among the "best of those teaching and research institutions that are concerned with the advancement of psychiatric treatment," the Boston Psychopathic Hospital was selected to estabish coöperative relations with the Bedford V. A. Hospital and the Metropolitan State Hospital in Waltham, "in order to test the applicability of principles and practices such as those used by it." Part I traces the evolution of practices developed at the Boston Psychopathic Hospital, and Parts II and III comprise the report on improvements achieved at the other two hospitals. William L. Russell in The New York Hospital; a History of the Psychiatric Service, 1771-1936 (New York, Columbia University Press, 1945. 556 p.) describes the progress of that institution's Bloomingdale Asylum and Payne Whitney Clinic. The theory of social structure is the basic thesis of Alfred H. Stanton and Morris S. Schwartz in The Mental Hospital, a Study of Institutional Participation in Psychiatric Illness and Treatment (New York, Basic Books, 1954. 492 p.). The indication is that a transition is rapidly being made from custodial restraint of the insane in asylums to the curative treatment of the mentally ill, through improvement of the social environment, in hospitals.

4839. Marshall, Helen E. Dorothea Dix, forgotten samaritan. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1937. 298 p.
37-9815 HV28.D6M3

Bibliography: p. [271]-287.

This scholarly dissertation on the life of Dorothea Dix, published 50 years after her death, tells the story of one of America's great pioneer social workers, which is also a chapter in the development of institutional treatment of the mentally ill in the United States. Following a survey of the county jails, almshouses, state penitentiaries, and other institutions, Dorothea Dix presented memorials to the state legislatures, and to Congress in 1848, in which she represented the mentally ill as "wards of the nation"—a broadened concept of governmental responsibility. Dorothea Dix erected her own monument in service to her fellow man through the 32 hospitals which were established by her efforts in the United States, as well as several abroad. Her childhood, and her work as Superintendent of Nurses during the Civil War, are other episodes of great interest.

4840. White, William Alanson. William Alanson White; the autobiography of a purpose. With an introd. by Ray Lyman Wilbur. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1938. xix, 293 p.
38-13677 RC439.W5

Bibliography: p. [275]-293.

William Alanson White (1870-1937) was one of the founders of modern psychiatry. An exponent of what has been labeled the genetic concept in psychiatry, he emphasized the importance of environment and adequate research into the problems of each individual patient as essential to treatment. He turned to occupational therapy, hydrotherapy, and psychotherapy as methods of dispensing with restraint. Advocating coöperation between the legal profession and psychiatry in dealing with criminals, his interest in forensic problems led in 1934 to the organization of a Section on Forensic Psychiatry of the American Psychiatric Association. Much of the Autobiography deals with his years in Washington as administrator of Saint Elizabeths Hospital, which he helped to make one of the leading mental hospitals in the country. He broadened the area of his influence through courses in nervous and mental diseases and psychiatry at Georgetown and George Washington Universities. His book, Outlines of Psychiatry, first published in 1907, reached its fourteenth edition in 1935, and has been called a "classic, particularly from the pedagogic standpoint." The William Alanson White Psychiatric Foundation was created by a group of friends and associates in 1933 to perpetuate Dr. White's work.

677676 O-63-43

D. Other Specialties

4841. American Academy of Pediatrics. Committee for the Study of Child Health Services. Child health services and pediatric education; report of the Committee for the Study of Child Health Services, the American Academy of Pediatrics, with the cooperation of the United States Public Health Service and the United States Children's Bureau. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1949. xxv, 270 p. 49–2785 RJ42.U5A62

References: p. 257–258.

——— ——— Supplement: Methology and tabulations on services. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1949. 1. v. (various pagings) RJ42.U5A62 Suppl.

By the end of the 19th century the American Pediatric Society had been founded; the organ of the profession, Pediatrics, established; and a considerable literature on the diseases of childhood published in the United States. Pediatrics had taken its place among the early specialties of the medical world. The organization of the American Association for the Study and Prevention of Infant Mortality in 1909, the creation of the U. S. Children's Bureau in 1912, the White House Conferences of 1919, 1930, and 1940, the passage of the Social Security Act in 1935, and the inauguration of a nationwide study of child health services by the American Academy of Pediatrics in 1944, of which this volume is the report, are all milestones in the development of the child health movement. Part I of this study surveys the pediatric aspects of private practice, hospitals, and community health agencies, while Part II is an evaluation of facilities for training physicians who are responsible for child health care. The study aims to promote the Academy's objective: "preventive, diagnostic, and curative medical services of high quality, which, when used in cooperation with other services for children, will make this country an ideal place for children to grow into responsible citizens."

4842. Carr, Malcolm Wallace. Dentistry, an agency of health service. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1946. xxiv, 219 p. (New York Academy of Medicine. Committee on Medicine and the Changing Order. Studies) SG46–319 RK34.U6C3

"References" at end of most of the chapters.

The development of dentistry as an autonomous profession is traced during more than a century of growth. The first 75 years were devoted to improving techniques through research and discovery, and to establishing an educational system, and a code of practice. More recently, and especially since the passage of the Social Security Act in 1935 made funds available for dental divisions in state health departments, the American Dental Association has been directing the profession toward a place in the public health program and stimulating communities to concern themselves actively with their local dental problems. This proceeds from the profession's growing consciousness of its responsibility in a changing society, and of its responsibility for coöperation with community groups in improving the nation's health. The problem has also been explored by Alfred J. Asgis in Professional Dentistry in American Society; a Historical and Social Approach to Dental Progress (New York, Clinical Press, 1943. 260 p.).

4843. Horner, Harlan H. Dental education today. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1947. 420 p. Med 47–610 RK91.H6

The author is secretary of the Council on Dental Education of the American Dental Association, and his study is based on a survey of dental schools in the United States conducted by the Council principally in 1942–43, with a view toward standardization and accreditation. The chapters deal with organization and plans, financial management and support, faculties, students, curriculum, teaching, and auxiliary agencies. Pointing out defects and limitations as well as accomplishments, the author concludes that American dental schools have clearly won world leadership. In his words, "the great challenge of the future to all agencies of dentistry in common—schools, examining boards and practitioners—lies in the inescapable responsibility of carrying to humankind the fruits of the science and of the art the profession already possesses."

4844. Hubbell, Alvin A. The development of ophthalmology in America, 1800 to 1870; a contribution to ophthalmologic history and biography; an address delivered in abstract before the Section of Ophthalmology of the American Medical Association, June 4, 1907. Rev. and enl. Chicago, American Medical Association Press, 1908. 197 p.
8–8140 RE30.U6H9

George Rosen in his doctoral dissertation, The Specialization of Medicine with Particular Reference to Ophthalmology (New York, Froben Press, 1944. 94 p.), says that "ophthalmology and otology were among the very first specialties to appear . . . As a result these fields of practice have an older tradition as specialties and enjoy the prestige of established achievement." Dr. Hubbell, professor of clinical opthalmology in the University of Buffalo, describes the American contribution to that tradition in brief sketches of institutions and the individuals who, through research and clinical observation, have developed ocular surgery and other techniques, and have disseminated their findings in publications on the anatomy, physiology, and pathology of the eye. A chapter is devoted to the transition period during which the treatment of diseases of the eye passed from the general physician and surgeon to the ophthalmological specialist, whose position was well established by 1870.

E. Hospitals and Nursing

4845. Chesney, Alan M. The Johns Hopkins Hospital and the Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine, a chronicle. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1943. 318 p. SG44–2 R747.J62C5

With approximately 30 years of service at the Johns Hopkins Hospital and School of Medicine, where he progressed from student, instructor, and associate professor to dean, Dr. Chesney has combined his years of experience with the official records of both institutions to write their history from the incorporation of the University and the Hospital in 1867 to the opening of the School of Medicine in 1893. This first volume was published on the 50th anniversary of the opening of the School of Medicine, but the second volume, interrupted by the war years, has not appeared. Dr. Chesney tells the story of the unusual trust created by Johns Hopkins, and the careers of great figures of American medicine—John Shaw Billings, William H. Welch, William Osler, William S. Halsted, Franklin B. Mall, and others—as they assisted in the organization and development of a University unique in the medical annals of the United States. Richard H. Shryock in his brochure, The Unique Influence of the Johns Hopkins University on American Medicine (Copenhagen, Munksgaard, 1953. 77 p.), tells how well the foundation had been laid for future growth in these words: "To Hopkins . . . the country was indebted after 1890 for a veritable revolution in the nature and status of medical sciences—with all that this implied for human welfare. This was a development of major importance in the social and cultural life of the nation, and the meaning of the Hopkins epic is missed if these wider relationships and consequences are ignored. Here is a tradition which should and will be maintained, no doubt in changing forms adapted to changing circumstances." The history of The Johns Hopkins School of Nursing, 1889–1949, by Ethel Johns and Blanche Pfefferkorn (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1954. 416 p.), rounds out the story of this medical center.

4846. Columbia University. New York State Hospital Study. A pattern for hospital care; final report . . . by Eli Ginzberg. New York, Columbia University Press, 1949. xxiv, 368 p.
49–50231 RA981.N7C6 1949

This study is a report by Columbia University to the Joint Survey and Planning Commission on the present and potential financial position of the voluntary general hospital in New York State. Requests from leaders of voluntary hospital groups for State aid, and the responsibility of the Commission "for developing a long-range construction program to provide facilities which would insure adequate hospital, clinic, and related services for all the people of the State," gave impetus to the study. It seeks to provide a basis for the allocation of Federal funds to construct, expand, or rebuild hospitals in designated areas. In addition to questions concerning the financial position of voluntary general hospitals, the study explores the major challenges which confront those hospitals within the next few years, the role of municipal hospitals, and the problems of providing care for patients suffering from chronic diseases, tuberculosis, or mental diseases. It suggests action that can be taken on an individual, communal, and State level to improve the present system and to insure its sound development. In the last chapter the responsibilities of the various organizations in New York State for hospital care are outlined and suggestions offered for an integrated program.

4847. Commission on Hospital Care. Hospital care in the United States; a study of the function of the general hospital, its role in the care of all types of illness, and the conduct of activities related to patient service, with recommendations for its extension and integration for more adequate care of the American public. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1947. xxiv, 631 p.
Med 47–56 RA981.A2C57

Includes bibliographies.

In October 1944 the American Hospital Association organized its Commission on Hospital Care in order to make a comprehensive survey of hospitals and determine their part in the postwar life of America. Its report discusses the trends in administration and organization that underlie the future development of hospital service, and describes the factors which affect the size and use of hospital facilities and the need for them. It analyzes the physical, service, and financial aspects of existing hospitals. From the pilot project set up in Michigan to serve as a pattern for study in other states, it derives suggestions for the integration of specialized services in the general hospital, and an estimate of additional facilities necessary to provide adequate service to the public. A final section presents methods of financing hospital care, the legal status of hospitals, and their interrelations with governmental and voluntary health agencies. The U. S. Public Health Service cooperated with the Commission in collecting the data for this survey: "The arrangement was unique in that it established a means whereby a voluntary and a governmental agency collaborated in the study and analysis of a public problem." As a sequel to this work the Commission on Financing of Hospital Care was established in November 1951, "to study the costs of providing adequate hospital services and to determine the best systems of payment for such services." The results of that study were published as Financing Hospital Care in the United States (New York, Blakiston, 1954–55. 3 v.). Volume 1 deals with "Factors Affecting the Costs of Hospital Care;" volume 2, "Prepayment and the Community;" volume 3, "Financing Hospital Care for Nonwage and Low-Income Groups."

4848. Corwin, Edward H. L. The American hospital. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1946. 226 p. (New York Academy of Medicine. Committee on Medicine and the Changing Order. Studies.) SG 46–293 RA981.A2C6

"References" at the end of each chapter.

The adaptation of anesthesia to operative procedures in the 1840's, the development of new techniques and clinical laboratories, the concentration of population in cities and the popular acceptance of hospitalization insurance plans, and the accumulation and distribution of wealth have all stimulated the growth of general and specialized hospitals. From 178 in 1873, the year in which the first list of hospitals in the United States was published, the number had increased to 6,655 in 1943, the year in which the Committee on Medicine and the Changing Order began its study. The author, who was executive secretary of the Committee on Public Health Relations of the New York Academy of Medicine, examines all phases of the American hospital—ownership, finance, geographical distribution, training of nurses and interns, organization of medical services including outpatient departments, and hospital architecture. The American hospital, he concludes, "has not adjusted itself adequately to the income levels of all groups of people or to the needs of all geographic areas. It has not uniformly reached the level of excellence it is potentially capable of achieving." In his final chapter he offers a whole series of practical suggestions calculated to promote these ends.

4849. McGibony, John R. Principles of hospital administration. New York, Putnam, 1952. 540 p. 52–11467 RA971.M247

The chief of the Division of Medical and Hospital Resources, U. S. Public Health Service (1949–53) describes, among other functions of hospital administration, methods of measuring community needs for hospital services, and raising funds for construction. The principles of functional hospital design and organization will be of special help to those interested in efficient operation. The book fills a need in hospital literature for trustees, administrators, doctors, nurses, and students.

4850. Morton, Thomas G. The history of the Pennsylvania Hospital, 1751–1895. Publication authorized by the contributors at their annual meeting, May 1893, and directed by the Board of Managers. Philadelphia, Times Print. House, 1895. 575 p. 9–1727 RA982.P5P47

The Pennsylvania Hospital in Philadelphia, founded in 1751, is the oldest institution intended solely for the care of the sick and injured in the United States. The idea of establishing a hospital was conceived by Dr. Thomas Bond, who, with the assistance of Benjamin Franklin and others, raised funds among their fellow citizens for the support of the hospital. Compiled from original documents, the History contains a chapter on the treatment of the mentally ill whose cause was championed by Benjamin Rush. The maintenance of a community hospital by public subscription provided a pattern for the future development of hospitals in the United States.

4851. New York Academy of Medicine. Committee on Public Health Relations. Infant and maternal care in New York City; a study of hospital facilities. Edward H. L. Corwin, general director of study. New York, Columbia University Press, 1952. xv, 188 p. 52–11549 RG962.N4N4 1952

This study illustrates the concern of a metropolitan community for the health and welfare of its children. A team consisting of an obstetrician, a pediatrically trained nurse, and a pediatrician visited 104 hospital maternity services in New York City. This report presents the facts which they obtained concerning every aspect of the lying-in and nursing services in the hospitals of the city. Specific shortcomings are summarized in the last chapter as a basis for the improvements to be desired.

4852. Roberts, Mary M. American nursing; history and interpretation. New York, Macmillan, 1954. 688 p. 54–12563 RT4.R6

Bibliographies at end of chapters.

The author, editor emeritus of the American Journal of Nursing, selects 1900, the year of the Journal's founding, and 1952, when the unification of several nursing associations was completed, as the termini of her history of American nursing. The first two chapters picture the American scene at and before the turn of the century and describe the influence of Florence Nightingale, and certain military and religious groups, on the profession in the United States. The transition from private duty to public health nurse, the growing recognition of the practical nurse as part of the nursing profession, the genesis and growth of nursing schools and professional organizations, and wartime duties and peacetime services are interpreted against changes in economic and social concepts, and scientific improvements. The part nurses play in the World Health Organization and international health programs is the subject of the last chapter. The author points out that the development of international nursing activities is a challenge to those nurses who believe that "anything that contributes to the exchange of creative ideas across boundary lines contributes to the welfare of mankind."

4853. Washburn, Frederic A. The Massachusetts General Hospital; its development, 1900–1935. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1939. 643 p. 39–17718 RA982.B7M53

Officers of the Massachusetts General Hospital: p. 576–633.

The director emeritus of the Massachusetts General Hospital tells its story during the period of its greatest growth, relating events that occurred prior to 1900 only when they have not appeared in earlier histories, or have been found pertinent to developments that followed the turn of the century. The General Hospital, which cared only for the poor in 1900, expanded its plant by the addition of the unique Baker Memorial for the benefit of people of moderate means, and the Phillips House for those well able to pay more than the cost of their care. By 1935, with its Out-Patient Department and its services for the mentally ill at McLean, the Hospital was caring for all groups in the community. Changes in administration which provided a more functional organization are described, with the consequent growth of research, the formation of special clinics, and the improvement of facilities for patients, for the investigation of disease, and for the teaching of medicine. Dr. Washburn has written not only an interesting account of the Hospital, but also a "vital chapter in the history of the progress of medical science and administration."

4854. Yost, Edna. American women of nursing. Rev. ed. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1955. xxiii, 197 p. 55–3216 RT34.Y7 1955

Contents.—M. Adelaide Nutting.—Lillian Wald. Annie M. Goodrich.—Isabel M. Stewart.—Sister M. Olivia Gowan.—Estelle Massey Osborne.—Florence G. Blake.—Anne Prochazka.—Theodora A. Floyd. —Lucile Petry Leone.

Modern nursing in the United States was inspired by the services of Florence Nightingale in the Crimean War. Supported by the democratic action of a group of women in New York City who banded together and made a public appeal for funds, the first nurses' training school "to be based definitely on Miss Nightingale's uncompromising doctrine which insisted on the need for full authority for the matron or superintendent of the school who must be a nurse, not a physician or layman," was opened at Bellvue Hospital on May 1, 1873. The author has chosen for inclusion in this book the lives of interesting women whose stories tell something of the problems and struggles which have confronted the nursing profession. "They have done a good job, they are women of whom democracy may well be proud."

F. Medical Education

4855. Allen, Raymond B. Medical education and the changing order. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1946. 142 p. (New York, Academy of Medicine. Committee on Medicine and the Changing Order. Studies) SG46–252 R735.A46
Bibliographical footnotes.

The medical profession is increasingly focusing attention on man in his economic and social environment which is constantly changed by technological advances. Medical education aims to produce physicians who recognize the influence of emotional and mental reactions on the physical manifestations of disease. Dr. Allen, dean of the College of Dentistry, Medicine, and Pharmacy, University of Illinois, describes the development of the techniques of medical education, points out some of the deficiencies, and suggests some improvements. "Medicine of the future," he says, "if it is to progress as a social as well as a biological science must broaden its outlook and adjust its educational program accordingly. Medicine is coming of age as a social science in the service of society." The problems of medical education and recent progress in their solution are also described by a group of medical educators in a series of papers which appeared in the Journal of Medical Education and have been reprinted as Medical Education Today, Its Aims, Problems, and Trends (Chicago, Association of American Medical Colleges, 1953. 123 p.). Experiments in methods of teaching and in integrating certain related science courses, which are in progress at Harvard, Western Reserve, the University of Colorado, and other medical schools, are given as illustrations of the "attempt to restructure the teaching program to accommodate comprehensive medicine."

4856. Carson, Joseph. A history of the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania, from its foundation in 1765. With sketches of the lives of deceased professors. Philadelphia, Lindsay & Blakiston, 1869.
8–7557 R747.P42 1869

Through the influence of Dr. John Morgan and Dr. William Shippen, formal medical education in the American colonies began with the organization of the Medical Department of the College of Philadelphia in 1765. This history is the expansion of a lecture delivered by the author on the occasion of its centenary. The growth of the school up to the American Revolution, its union with the University of Pennsylvania, and its progress through one hundred years, are told in the lives of the founders and professors, whose courses in the medical sciences, combined with clinical instruction in the Philadelphia Almshouse, did much to shape the pattern of medical education in the United States.

4857. Commission on Graduate Medical Education. Graduate medical education; report. Chicago [University of Chicago Press] 1940. 303 p.
40–33806 R737.C6

This report may be considered as a supplement to the Final Report of the Commission on Medical Education (no. 4858) which dealt only briefly with problems in the graduate field. It does not attempt to survey present practices, but to bring together the best medical and educational thought concerning the internship, the residency, postgraduate education, and specialty boards, with the hope of stimulating improvements in these areas which will lead to better-trained physicians and better medical care of the patient. To place internships and residencies in their proper perspective in the educational program, and to arouse a feeling of mutual responsibility between hospitals and interns for providing training in return for service, a study of the situation in 77 hospitals in New York City was prepared by the New York Committee on the Study of Hospital Internships and Residencies: Internships and Residencies in New York City, 1934–1937, Their Place in Medical Education (New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1938. 492 p.).

4858. Commission on Medical Education. Final report. New York, Office of the Director of Study, 1932. 560 p. 33–1109 R745.C86

Regulations and specifications formulated by the American Medical Association, the Association of American Medical Colleges, and various state licensing boards, by 1918, had transformed medical education from apprentice and commercial school training to a university enterprise with precise standards applying to students, teaching staff, hospital facilities, premedical requirements, and curriculum. The elevated standards reduced the number of schools and of students, and increased the cost so that medical education reached a static plateau. New discoveries and points of view, and changing university aims and methods as well as social conditions, created the need of broadening the scope of medical education. The Commission on Medical Education was organized as an independent body by the Association of American Medical Colleges in 1925 to study existing conditions. Attention is focused on the training of the medical student to meet the health needs and to understand the social and economic conditions of the community in which he becomes a practicing physician, and as such, a leader in health and other community programs. To accomplish this objective the Commission divides the study into chapters on the relationship between the medical profession and the general public, the need of postgraduate education, specialization, internship and licensure, and the medical courses that form the basis of the training. "Emphasis," says the Commission, "must be kept constantly upon the fact that only through a sufficient number of properly trained physicians can a community expect to meet its responsibility for the care and prevention of illness and the protection of health."

4859. Ebaugh, Franklin G., and Charles A. Rymer. Psychiatry in medical education. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1942. xxiv, 619 p. 42–5906 RC607.E24

Bibliography at end of each chapter.

Concerned with psychiatric education as a phase of medical training both for general practice and for specialization, this study is largely based on data collected during a survey of 66 psychiatric schools in the United States during 1932, and from follow-up questionnaires in 1934, 1938, and 1940. Training of the staff, curriculum from preclinical through postgraduate years, and hospital and other clinical facilities are explored. The authors use the 4-year course in psychiatry at their own University of Colorado as an illustration of the essential features in psychiatric training. The section on postgraduate education considers the need of advanced training and opportunities in the field. In summing up, the authors recognized that psychiatry in the early 1940's had not completely succeeded in breaking through its isolation, and that to succeed, it "must permeate the curriculum . . . [and] graduates of medical schools must learn to treat the whole patient—a total person with a mind as well as a body."

4860. Norwood, William Frederick. Medical education in the United States before the Civil War. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1944. xvi, 487 p. SG44–196 R745.N6

Bibliography: p. 435–462.

Prior to 1800 medical education passed through periods of apprenticeship to the few English or continental-trained doctors found in the American colonies, study abroad, and training at the infant medical schools such as those founded at the College of Philadelphia (1765), King's College (1768), Harvard (1783), or Darthmouth (1797). During the first half of the new century an increasing population and a continuous westward migration created a growing demand for doctors and so for medical schools. These sprang up without regulation, and often only for the financial gain of the promoters. Largely in order to improve the standards of the medical schools the American Medical Association was organized by leaders of the profession in 1847. The author surveys the development of the American system up to 1860 in this study of the medical schools of Pennsylvania, New York, New England, the Old South, and the country west of the Appalachian Mountains. In Part VIII he explores the financial support of medical schools, the cost of medical training, the curriculum, textbooks, teaching problems, and degrees and licensure. The period also witnessed the entrance of women into the medical profession, and the rise of sectarian groups such as the homeopaths and Thomsonians. "Medical education in the United States . . . in the century before the Civil War, constitutes a significant and unique chapter in the social history of the country."

4861. Survey of Medical Education. Medical schools in the United States at mid-century. [By] John E. Deitrick and Robert C. Berson. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1953. xxii, 380 p. 53–6041 R745.S85

A report on the Survey Committee's visits to 41 representative medical schools from September 1949 to May 1951, prepared by the director and associate director of study. The basic premises are stated in the Introduction in which the functions of medical schools—education, research, service, finances, operation, curriculum and teaching methods, and advanced education and training—are discussed. A Subcommittee on Preprofessional Education, under the chairmanship of Aura E. Severinghaus, also prepared a survey: Preparation for Medical Education in the Liberal Arts College (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1953. 400 p.), which rounds out the picture of medical education at mid-century. In summing up the authors say: "The greatest need of medical schools today is clear, critical thought, by men who are sincerely interested in the education of students and who have an understanding of educational principles, a knowledge of science, and familiarity with social and economic trends. Such men must have courage and faith in the idea that the quality of medical education in the last analysis will determine the future of medicine in the United States."

G. Public Health

4862. Bachman, George W. Health resources in the United States; personnel, facilities, and services. Washington, Brookings Institution, 1952. xvi, 344 p. 52–12128 RA407.3.B3

This is primarily a statistical review of the state of the Nation's health in 1950 as it has been affected by the advances in medical science, and the increase in medical facilities and the control of communicable diseases since 1900. Data collected by the Committee on Costs of Medical Care (1928–31), the Public Health Service in the National Health Survey (1935–36), the Blue Cross Commission and other groups are analyzed. The examination of the problem of personnel includes an inventory of physicians, dentists, professional nurses and auxiliary personnel, and a special study of medical group practice of which the Mayo Clinic was one of the first examples in the United States. An inventory of the hospital system as a whole with emphasis on the general hospital, and of facilities for special health problems and for certain classes such as the Armed Forces and the industrial workers, forms the third part of the survey. A study of the Nation's health was also prepared by the President's Commission on the Health Needs of the Nation: Building America's Health ([Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off.] 1952–53. 5 v.). This, as well as the Brookings Institution's study, assumes the joint responsibility of both private and public agencies for public health in a democracy.

4863. Cavins, Harold M. National health agencies, a survey with especial reference to voluntary associations, including a detailed directory of major health organizations. [Washington] Public Affairs Press, 1945. 251 p. SG45–276 RA421.A1C3

"This study is concerned primarily with the rise of the national voluntary health agency as a social phenomenon of the early twentieth century, as a significant phase of public health history, as an important agent of health education, and as a movement characteristically American." Against the background of economic, social, and scientific developments, the author traces the origin and history of such major professional organizations as the American Psychiatric Association, and representative agencies of the promotional or educational type like the National Tuberculosis Association. Bringing this information together in a single volume for the first time provides a useful source of information for the student of the public health movement. In the same year a book which, the authors say, "complements the present Study," was published under the auspices of the National Health Council: Voluntary Health Agencies by Selskar M. Gunn and Philip S. Platt (New York, Ronald Press, 1945. 364 p.).

4864. Chicago-Cook County Health Survey. The Chicago-Cook County Health Survey conducted by the United States Public Health Service. New York, Columbia University Press, 1949. xlviii, 1317 p. 49–11489 RA448.C4C4

Aroused during World War II by the Selective Service reports on the health of the nation's young men, the citizens of the Chicago-Cook County area organized this survey in 1946. It "represents a landmark in the evolution of co-operative community enterprises designed to bring the benefits of preventive medical, sanitary engineering, and nursing services to every individual in the community." The findings and recommendations represent the corporate opinions of the U. S. Public Health Service and a group of recognized local experts, whose first purpose was "to make a fact-finding inventory of all the health forces in this field and to appraise the strength and weakness of their functional capacity," in order "to determine whether or not community public health resources are being used in such a way as to obtain a maximum of service for the money expended." The results are described in three parts. Part I deals with all phases of "Environmental Sanitation" from water supplies and mosquito control to swimming pool sanitation and housing. Part II, "Preventive Medicine," details the activities of official and voluntary health agencies, from collecting public health statistics and control of communicable diseases to nutrition services and health education. Part III describes facilities and services for medical care available in the area. Dr. Thomas Parran, Surgeon General of the United States from 1936 to 1948, thought that this undoubtedly would "establish a pattern for many similar surveys in other areas of the country."

4865. Cohn, Alfred E., and Claire Lingg. The burden of diseases in the United States. New York, Oxford University Press, 1950. 129 p. 51–1304 RA407.3.C57

References: p. 127–129.

——— ——— Tables basic to figures in The burden of diseases. New York, Oxford University Press, 1950. 69 l. RA407.3.C57 Tables

Dealing for the most part with the period 1900 to 1940, two authorities in the field of medical statistics have examined the mortality figures gathered by the U. S. Bureau of the Census, and the morbidity statistics collected during certain surveys by the U. S. Public Health Service, and other groups, to present a picture, through graphs, charts and interpretation, of the incidence of diseases upon various age groups, and the changes in the percentage of deaths at specific ages. Such a study is important in any public health program because it demonstrates "how the results may effect shifts of emphasis in the study of disease, and in the provision society must make for those who are ill, or for those who, having escaped fatal illness through the advances of modern medicine, become charges upon the community in other ways." Comparable events in other countries have been included for "the light that is shed on the state of the various medical cultures."

4866. Hiscock, Ira V. Community health organization. 4th ed. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1950. 278 p. 50–6043 RA425.H5 1950

This fourth edition of a manual designed for the use of health officers, public health nurses, and teachers, brings up to date the developments in community health affairs which have affected their organization and administration during the past ten years. The author, who is chairman of the Department of Public Health, Yale University, defines the functions of the National Government, the State and the municipality in the public health program of the Nation, and details a plan for community health organization that "contains the elements of the best current practice in the country, considered in relation to a theoretical community of 100,000 population."

4867. Howard, William Travis. Public health administration and the natural history of disease in Baltimore, Maryland, 1797–1920. Washington, Carnegie Institution of Washington, 1924. 565 p. (Carnegie Institution of Washington. Publication no. 351) 24–24629 RA448.B3H6

Bibliography: p. 563–565.

Two health ordinances, enacted soon after the organization of the new city government of Baltimore in 1797, and revised many times in the next 123 years, formed the basis of practically all subsequent local public health legislation. The Baltimore Department of Health, in continuous operation since the Committee of Health was set up in 1793, is the oldest permanent municipal body devoted primarily to the public health. The evolution of the Health Department and the administration of the public health laws of Baltimore are traced by Dr. Howard, who laid the foundation for this study during four years of service as assistant commissioner of health in 1915–1919. The author presents such physical data as local topography, population, commercial expansion, and wealth, and such sociological factors as the prominence of medicine, medical men, and education in the development of the city, to illustrate their influence on the etiology and the control of disease. Chapters are devoted to diseases common to the area, mortality statistics, and the part which various diseases have played in determining policies of public health administration in Baltimore.

4868. Jacobs, Philip P. The control of tuberculosis in the United States. Rev. ed. New York, National Tuberculosis Association, 1940. 387 p. 40–34615 RA644.T7J25 1940

"Selected references" at end of most of the chapters.

Published posthumously, this revised edition is dedicated by the National Tuberculosis Association as a memorial to the author (1879–1940), who was director of personnel and publications of the Association. Some historical aspects of the anti-tuberculosis movement beginning with Drs. Hermann M. Biggs, Livingston Trudeau, and others who applied the scientific principles of Robert Koch, discoverer of the tubercle bacillus in 1881, are discussed in Part I. In Part II the methods that have contributed to the success of the movement are discussed, as well as the relationships between physicians and laymen, public and private officials, tuberculosis and other health agencies, and local, state, and national organizations. Programs for the control of tuberculosis, led by that of the National Tuberculosis Association, have been grouped together in Part III. The decline in the death rate from tuberculosis in the United States during the years 1900–1955 from 194.4 to 9.4 per 100,000 population is the best evidence of the progress which has been made through the cooperation of individuals, private organizations, and public agencies.

4869. Mott, Frederick D., and Milton I. Roemer. Rural health and medical care. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1948. xvii, 608 p. (McGraw-Hill ser. in health science) 48–3784 RA427.M73

The authors, who are officials in state health organizations, have prepared a study of the health conditions and medical facilities available to one segment of the population which is increasingly a concern of the Nation. Former Surgeon General Thomas Parran in a foreword describes the book as "the essence of current knowledge on virtually every aspect of rural health status and medical care . . . With broad social perspective it describes the economic and historical developments out of which arise present difficulties in rural medical services. It presents an integrated story of health conditions, medical resources and services, and organized efforts for health improvement in rural areas. In conclusion, it offers recommendations for future action which merit careful study."

4870. National Health Assembly, Washington, D. C., 1948. America's health; a report to the Nation. Official report. New York, Harper, 1949. 395 p. 49–4679 RA445.N28 1948

Organized by the Federal Security Administrator, the National Health Assembly met in Washington, D. C., in May 1948, to discuss all factors involved in preparing a 10-year plan for "expanding the health resources of this nation and raising the health standards of the entire population." The Assembly was divided into fourteen sections which conducted panel discussions, exploring and making recommendations concerning such problems as the Nation's need for more doctors and other medical personnel, more hospitals, and more health department units; the problems of chronic disease, maternal and child health, and rural health; and medical research and the cost of medical care. The success of a nation-wide health program depends not only on the determination of the citizens who sponsor community and state participation, but also on the health of other nations. Encountering problems of international character, the Assembly devoted one evening to them. It was pointed out that the United States has accepted its responsibilities to other nations by joining the World Health Organization.

4871. Pelton, Walter J., and Jacob M. Wisan, eds. Dentistry in public health. 2d ed., completely rev. and rewritten. Philadelphia, Saunders, 1955. 282 p. 55–5207 RK52.P4 1955

Includes bibliographies at end of chapters.

Dental public health is service provided for communities and administered by departments of health at all levels—Federal, State, and local. The authors point out that surveys of health conditions in given areas are prerequisite to dental health programs and discuss the methodology of collecting and classifying data according to the dental needs of the American people, and the resources available for their treatment. Chapters describe the control of dental caries by fluoridation of water, the need of educating the public and plans available for payment of dental services. The second edition has been completely reorganized to include advances that have been made in dentistry since the first appeared in 1949.

4872. Powell, John H. Bring out your dead; the great plague of yellow fever in Philadelphia in 1793. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1949. 304 p. 49–50068 RC211.P5P6 1949

Bibliographical references included in "Notes": p. 287–294.

Recurring epidemics of smallpox and yellow fever were the worst health crises faced by the small but growing towns of the Colonial and Federal Periods. The most disastrous decade opened with the Philadelphia epidemic of 1793, which the author calls "one of the great tragic episodes in the human history of this land." It was the problem of the whole people, and the banding together of a group of citizens to function as an emergency committee, the setting up of an isolation hospital on Bush Hill, and the issuing of certain sanitary rules, temporary expedients though they were, bore the seeds of a community public health program. Much of the story centers around Dr. Benjamin Rush, "Philadelphia's amazing citizen," who, like other physicians of the day, described the disease accurately, and noted the presence of mosquitoes, but left it to Walter Reed and his associates to establish the causal relationship between the two in the early 1900's. Howard A. Kelly tells the story of the disease, and the investigations which led to its control, in his Walter Reed and Yellow Fever, 3d ed. rev. (Baltimore, Norman, Remington, 1923. 355 p.).

4873. Sappington, Clarence O. Essentials of industrial health. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1943. 626 p. illus. 43–8345 RC963.S3

References: p. 604–610.

Following the outbreak of war in 1941, the mobilization of all manpower, the expansion of industries, the shifting of population with its related problems of transportation and nutrition, housing and sanitation, and the diminishing number of physicians, focused attention on the increasing importance of the health of industrial workers to the national economy. Medical schools quickly responded to the need by emphasizing in their courses the fundamentals of industrial health. According to the author, a consulting industrial hygienist and editor of Industrial Medicine until his death in 1949, this book outlines a recently instituted course for undergraduates and represents the application of preventive medicine and public health to industry. It outlines the administration of a health program in industrial plants, the protection of workers from environmental hazards, the coördination of industrial and community health services, and the contribution of industrial medicine and traumatic surgery to the maintenance of the health of workers. More recently, twenty authors have contributed to a book on Modern Occupational Medicine, edited by

Allan J. Fleming and Constance A. D'Alonzo (Philadelphia, Lea & Febiger, 1954. 414 p.), which "represents the combined experience of a group that has spent many years specializing in industrial medical practice."

4874. Smillie, Wilson G. Public health administration in the United States. 3d ed. New York, Macmillan, 1947. 637 p.
Med 48-888 RA445.S55 1947

Increased knowledge concerning epidemiology and environmental sanitation, the discovery of new antibiotics and techniques for the detection of carriers of infection, interest in the economics of nutrition, and the health programs of communities, have contributed to the "idea that provision of comprehensive medical care for all the people was a community function, and that a communitywide plan . . . must encompass preventive service as well as curative and rehabilitation facilities." Against this background the author, who is professor of public health and preventive medicine, Cornell University Medical College, describes the methods of controlling communicable diseases, the basic activities of health agencies, and the organization of municipal, rural, and state public health programs. The evolution of a national health program is traced in the last chapter, and the Appendix contains the minimum qualifications that have been set up by the Committee on Professional Education of the American Public Health Association for health officers, public health nurses and engineers, health educators, and school physicians. This third edition has been rewritten to reflect developments in the field, and changes in social attitudes brought about by economic depression and war, since the first appeared in 1935.

4875. Smillie, Wilson G. Public health: its promise for the future; a chronicle of the development of public health in the United States, 1607-1914. New York, Macmillan, 1955. 501 p.
55-4356 RA424.S58

The author's interest in the historical development of public health grew out of a request to select the outstanding men in the field, and the names selected appear in the Appendix. He divides his narrative into "The Colonial Period—1600-1790"; "The Pioneer Period—1790-1861"; and "The Period of Development—The Civil War to World War I." The terminus 1914 has been selected as the end of a period in American life, as well as the beginning of Dr. Smillie's association with the public health field. From his study he concludes "that the advances in public health in America have been an accurate index of our advancing civilization in all its aspects and connotations. Thus, it becomes an axiom that the degree of the development of public health service, as a well-established and effective community function, is a true measure of the stage of civilization of a nation."

4876. Tobey, James A. Public health law. 3d ed. New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1947. xxi, 419 p. Med 47-2428 RA445.T63 1947
Selected bibliography: p. [381]-383.

New court decisions on various aspects of public health law, changes in governmental organization and administration, and important legislative trends have been added to this edition. Part I deals with "Public Health Law and Administration"; Part II with "Powers and Duties of Health Departments"; Part III with "Liability"; and Part IV with "Legislation and Law Enforcement." The book will be useful in interpreting for the layman, the social worker, the health officer, and the lawyer, the health functions of the Federal Government, the State, and the community, as they have developed within the framework of the Federal Constitution and acts of Congress, state constitutions and legislation, and municipal charters and regulations.

4877. Top, Franklin H., ed. The history of American epidemiology, by C. E. A. Winslow [and others] St. Louis, Mosby, 1952. 190 p.
52-10820 RA650.5.T6

Includes bibliographies.

CONTENTS.—The colonial era and the first years of the Republic (1607-1799) the pestilence that walketh in darkness, by C. E. A. Winslow.—The period of great epidemics in the United States (1800-1875), by Wilson G. Smillie.—The bacteriological era (1876-1920), by James A. Doull.—The twentieth century—yesterday, today, and tomorrow (1920——), by John E. Gordon.

This symposium was originally presented at the 20th anniversary session of the Epidemiology Section of the American Public Health Association in 1949. Since public health services, both municipal and national, had their origin in measures to protect the people from contagious diseases, this study of America's contribution to the control of epidemics, and of the shift in emphasis during the last fifty years to the mass problems provided by other diseases, is also the story of the primary function of the public health movement. The impact of contagious diseases on colonial society has been described at greater length by John Duffy, in his Epidemics in Colonial America (Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1953. 275 p.).

4878. U. S. Public Health Service. Environment and health; problems of environmental health in the United States and the Public Health Service programs which aid States and communities in their efforts to solve such problems. [Washington] 1951. 152 p. (Its Publication no. 84)

51–61655 RA11.B18 1951a

The Public Health Service "has the responsibility of carrying on, stimulating, and fostering research; of supporting the work of the State and local health agencies, which bear most of the burden of administration." The share of the Service in the field of environmental sanitation, including radiological health, is described in this book. "The contribution to date is a matter of public pride: its measure is the margin between prosperity and destitution, between civilization and barbarism."

4879. Whipple, George Chandler. State sanitation; a review of the work of the Massachusetts State Board of Health. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1917. 2 v.
17–13246 RA84.D1W5

Said Lemuel Shattuck, who conducted a sanitary survey of Massachusetts as early as 1849: "It is the duty of the State to extend its guardian care, that those who cannot or will not protect themselves, may nevertheless be protected; and that those who can and desire to do it, may have the means of doing it more easily." In this spirit Massachusetts organized the first state health department in the United States in 1869, and thereby set up the pattern for similar departments throughout the Union. "The primary object of this book," according to the author, "is to set forth the past work of the Massachusetts State Board of Health so that it may be known by people of the present generation." The abstracts from the reports and scientific articles published by the State Board between 1870 and 1914 show "the evolution of thought in the realm of sanitation during nearly fifty years." A third volume of this work was planned, to include a guide to the annual reports and a series of biographical sketches, but it was evidently never published.

4880. Williams, Ralph C. The United States Public Health Service, 1798–1950. Washington, Commissioned Officers Association of the United States Public Health Service, 1951. 890 p.
52–82 RA11.B19W5

Bibliography: p. 841–847.

The origin of the U. S. Public Health Service is to be found in the Marine Hospital Service which came into being with the Act for the Relief of Sick and Disabled Seamen in 1798. The former Assistant Surgeon General of the Service tells the story of the various functions of the agency through 152 years of growth and concludes with a summary of its extensive programs in 1950. They include grants to states for general public health and for hospital construction, operation of certain types of hospitals and outpatient clinics, and extensive research through the National Institute of Health, as well as staffing and directing teams of experts to carry out health projects under the Point Four Program and the Economic Cooperation Administration. In 1950 the United States continued to play an active part in the World Health Organization, which "is working all over the world toward its goal of winning for all people the highest possible level of health."

4881. Winslow, Charles E. A. The life of Hermann M. Biggs, physician and statesman of the public health. Philadelphia, Lea & Febiger, 1929. 432 p. 29–11697 RA424.5.B5W5

Bibliography: p. [413]–420.

"Broadly speaking, the fundamental significance of Biggs' work lay in the modernization of public health administration in conformity with the new knowledge concerning the origin, nature and spread of infectious diseases." At Bellevue Hospital Medical College, Hermann Biggs progressed from lecturer on pathology in 1886 to professor of the practice of medicine in 1912. He organized the department of pathology and bacteriology of the New York City Health Department in 1892 and became director of the first municipal bacteriological laboratory in the world. Outstanding among his contributions were the introduciton of diphtheria antitoxin into this country in 1894, and his life-long and vigorous fight against tuberculosis. His achievements are of enduring value in the world of medicine, and to the general public, "which has begun to realize, however inadequately, the relation of personal and public health to the other interests and the welfare of modern society and civilization."

H. Medical Economics

4882. Bauer, Louis Hopewell. Private enterprise or government in medicine. Springfield, Ill., C. C. Thomas, 1948. 201 p.
Med 48–1133 RA411.B3 1948

Bibliography: p. 199–201.

Dr. Bauer's experience as a member of national and state medical associations, an officer in the Medical Corps, U. S. Army, specializing in aviation medicine, and a member of the New York State Public Health Council, has brought him in contact with many divergent views concerning health care and its insurance. In this book he describes the deficiencies in the medical system of the United States, pointing out, however, that health conditions in the United States are superior or equal to those in foreign countries in which health insurance is compulsory. He traces the growth of government in medicine by analyzing Federal legislation enacted especially since the recommendations of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care were published in 1932. He outlines the history of the voluntary insurance system in the United States, and the programs of the American Medical Association which, he says, "has done more to improve the standards of medical care . . . than all other organizations put together." In his summary of ideals, Dr. Bauer suggests solutions to existing problems, emphasizing the need for voluntary health insurance, subsidized when necessary by funds provided by a government agency. "Finally," he says, "with a system of medical care which is the best in the world, let us keep it in principle, revising it and improving it where necessary, but not discarding it for a system . . . which has never given as satisfactory results as our own."

4883. Committee on the Costs of Medical Care. The costs of medical care; a summary of investigations on the economic aspects of the prevention and care of illness, by Isidore S. Falk, C. Rufus Rorem [and] Martha D. Ring. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1933. xviii, 623 p. (Its Publications, no. 27) 33–27129 R152.C65, no. 27 RA413.F3

In 1927, during a conference in Washington of representative physicians, health officers, social scientists, and others interested in the costs and distribution of medical services, the nucleus of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care was created. Composed of fifty members and financed through the generosity of eight private research foundations, the Committee published 28 books and pamphlets covering every aspect of medical care. This publication is a summary of its five years of investigation.

4884. Committee on the Costs of Medical Care. Medical care for the American people; the final report. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1932. 213 p. (Its Publications, no. 28) 32–28169 R152.C65, no. 28 RA413.C6

This publication summarizes the Committee's conclusions and recommendations, and in the words of the chairman, Ray Lyman Wilbur, "affords for the first time a scientific basis on which the people of every locality can attack the perplexing problem of providing adequate medical care for all persons at costs within their means. It is hoped that the report may thus aid materially in bringing greater health, efficiency, and happiness to all the people."

4885. Davis, Michael M. Medical care for tomorrow. New York, Harper, 1955. 497 p. 54–6444 RA410.D3

References: p. 447–487.

Writing from the viewpoint of persons who receive medical care, the author analyzes the economic, social, and intraprofessional forces which have changed medical practice and will change it further in the future. Of the four parts, Part I deals with "Basic Elements in Medical Services": need and demand for care, cost, organization, and personnel; Part II, "Evolution in Organizations," traces the development of the A. M. A., hospitals, clinics and group practice, and describes the distribution of public health services and Federal, State, and local funds for medical care; Part III, "Evolution in Economics," reviews the growth of health insurance from the consumer's point of view, and the increasing interest of government in medical care between 1911 and 1952; and Part IV, "Programs and Outlook," discusses the costs of medical care in relation to the national economy and personal finances, the choice of doctors and the various methods of paying them, and the controversy over proposals for national health insurance. The author says: "According to the scale of values developed in this book, we would do well to depend primarily on insurance in order to achieve organized and comprehensive medical services, unified professionally around the patient as a person, administered democratically, and available financially to all."

4886. Goldmann, Franz. Voluntary medical care insurance in the United States. New York, Columbia University Press, 1948. 228 p. 48–7044 RA413.G62

Dr. Goldmann, a professor in the Harvard University School of Public Health and author of several books on financing medical care, describes the principles underlying medical care insurance, trends in development in the United States, and the attitudes of such voluntary organizations as the American Medical Association, the American Hospital Association, the National Grange, and labor unions, toward voluntary hospitalization plans and group practice. He analyzes cash indemnity plans, nonprofit hospital and physician service plans like the Blue Cross and Blue Shield, and individual and group practice plans, pointing out their limitations and potentialities, and raising the question of direct subsidy by taxes. The author says that the "chance for voluntary medical care insurance to make real progress within its natural limitations, to help tens of millions of self-supporting people develop the capacity and opportunity to lead personally satisfying and socially useful lives . . . lies in the combination of group prepayment and group practice . . . and in the inclusion of comprehensive professional services and hospitalization in one program." Emphasis on voluntary health insurance plans, such as the Blue Cross hospital plans and those sponsored by the medical societies, is the principal theme of Nathan Sinai, Odin W. Anderson, and Melvin L. Dollar in Health Insurance in the United States (New York, Commonwealth Fund, 1946. 115 p.) which appeared as one of the Studies of the New York Academy of Medicine Committee on Medicine and the Changing Order.

4887. Klem, Margaret C., and Margaret F. McKiever. Management and union health and medical programs. Washington, U. S. Dept. of Health, Education, and Welfare, Public Health Service, Division of Occupational Health, 1953. 276 p. ([U. S.] Public Health Service. Publication no. 329) 54-61546 HD7102.U4K55

Bibliography: p. 263-276.

This is the third in a series of studies on health and medical facilities in industry prepared by these authors for the U. S. Public Health Service. It emphasizes provisions for medical care outside the plant for workers, and sometimes their families, sponsored by employees' organizations, or management, or both. Industrial Health and Medical Programs, in which Walter J. Lear collaborated (Washington, 1950. 397 p. Public Health Service publication no. 15), covers the broad field, and Small Plant Health and Medical Programs (Washington, 1952. 213 p. Public Health Service publication no. 215), deals with problems peculiar to small plants. The present volume traces the development of management and union programs, and discusses program characteristics, administration, and financing under collective bargaining. Selected programs are classified by services, and the health services and welfare benefits of two industry-wide programs are described.

4888. Means, James H. Doctors, people, and government. Boston, Little, Brown, 1953. 206 p. 53-10240 RA395.A3M4

Dr. Means, who has had years of association with the unique plant organizations, clinics, research programs, and teaching staff of the Massachusetts General Hospital, says in his Preface: "The American people are entitled to the best medical service which science and art permit, and which they can afford to buy. They are entitled to get it at the lowest price consistent with high quality, or have it given them if they cannot pay." He points out that medicine will follow the economic, social, and political pattern of the country it serves; that doctors, in order to give adequate medical care, must have education, the benefits of research, medical facilities, and a fair remuneration in their practice; that the people, dissatisfied with the uneven distribution of medical care and its high cost, have aroused the interest of government in providing relief through legislation. He gives both sides of the controversy between conservative organized medicine and the proponents of government control. Prepayment insurance plans, and certain comprehensive health plans, as well as group practice plans, that are being tested in certain communities and industries today, are outlined. A plea is made for gradualism and experiment; for co-ordination of government, private, and nongovernmental community effort to achieve an integrated national health plan that will be a joint undertaking of public and private medicine. Suggestions for achieving that co-ordination in a country of free enterprise are indicated in the last chapter and summed up by Dr. Means: "In brief then, if a teaching hospital like the Massachusetts General were united with a medical care plan like HIP [Health Insurance Plan] in New York, together with an adequate Blue Cross, and if it found ways and means to pay the premiums of those who could not afford to do so themselves, placed all its doctors on salary and made all its patients available for teaching, it would be reaching the ideal which I have in mind."

4889. Rothenberg, Robert E., and Karl Pickard. Group medicine & health insurance in action. New York, Crown Publishers, 1949. xxviii, 278 p. 49-10662 RA413.R73

References: p. 46.

The Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York, the first large-scale, community-wide prepayment plan sponsored and directed by community representatives, was incorporated in 1944 and began operation in 1947. Its objective was to assemble, through experience, reliable actuarial data on which to base the operation of a prepayment plan which would provide complete medical service for a fixed annual premium, and to collect dependable statistics as to the number of services, the amount of physician's time, and total cost of the medical care required by a family, or a certain quota of population. The Central Medical Group of Brooklyn is one of the 26 groups organized to serve the persons insured by the Health Insurance Plan. Prepared by the chairman, the secretary, and the administrative counsel of the Group, this volume is the report of its experiences during the first two years. It outlines the basic staff organization, space and facilities required, and other information necessary to any medical group that organizes under the prepayment insurance plan. "The physicians of the Health Insurance Plan reaffirm their faith in voluntary, prepaid, comprehensive health insurance for the low-income group as a means of bringing much needed medical care to a large segment of the population. They wish also to restate their belief that medical group practice offers a mechanism whereby that goal can be reached most advantageously."

4890. Serbein, Oscar N. Paying for medical care in the United States. New York, Columbia University Press, 1953. xxiv, 543 p.
53–12029 RA412.5.U6S4

Bibliography: p. [497]–524.

Large-scale development of voluntary medical care insurance in this country started in the 1930's. At the end of 1951 about 48,000,000 persons were eligible for hospital benefits, about 43,000,000 for surgical benefits, and about 12,000,000 for medical benefits. In February 1951, Columbia University, under a grant from the Health Information Foundation, established the Medical Payments Project to study the methods used by people of the United States in paying for medical care. In Parts I and II the author discusses the sources and research methods used in preparing this book, and the problems which people face in meeting the cost of illness. In other chapters he analyzes and evaluates the various prepayment plans such as commercial medical care insurance, Blue Cross, Blue Shield, and other industrial and governmental plans in a manner which should interest anyone who participates in prepaid medical insurance, or contemplates doing so.

4891. Tannenbaum, Samuel A., and Paul Maerker Branden. The patient's dilemma; a public trial of the medical profession. [New York] Coward-McCann, 1935. xiv, 278 p.
35–24870 R707.T3

A physician and a layman advance in this book what they describe as "the hideous truth about the commercial side of the practice of medicine." The findings of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care are used to illustrate the uneven distribution of medical care, the exorbitant fees paid by certain segments of the population, and the imbalance of the earnings of average doctors. The authors urge physicians to take the methods of competitive business out of the profession, and advocate the establishment of a tax-supported public health system to provide adequate service for the patient and adequate compensation for the physician.

XIX

Entertainment

A.	General Works	4892–4896
B.	The American Stage
	Bi. History	4897–4906
	Bii. Criticism	4907–4912
	Biii. Particular Stage Groups, Theaters, Movements, etc.	4913–4926
	Biv. Biography: Actors and Actresses	4927–4939
	Bv. Biography: Directors, Producers, etc.	4940–4943
C.	Motion Pictures
	Ci. History	4944–4946
	Cii. Special Aspects and Analyses	4947–4951
	Ciii. Biography: Actors and Actresses	4952–4956
	Civ. Biography: Directors, Producers, etc.	4957–4963
D.	Other Forms of Entertainment
	Di. Radio and Television	4964–4966
	Dii. The Dance in America	4967–4972
	Diii. Vaudeville and Burlesque	4973–4976
	Div. Showboats, Circuses, etc.	4977–4982

THE distinction in this bibliography between "Entertainment" and "Sports and Recreation" is explained in the prefatory note to the latter. Within this section, drama (through the media of the stage, motion pictures, radio, and television) bulks as most important. That is so much the case that the section might almost be defined as various means and aspects of presenting drama. The concern here is with its performance and its implications. The more literary aspects are to be found in the Literature section of the bibliography.

It is to be regretted that so many of the books in these allied fields have been written in a popular fashion for a mass audience, while relatively few scholarly and reliable studies have appeared. Because the entertainment field has been dominated by individual personalities, there has been a parallel emphasis in the publication of a large number of biographies and autobiographies and relatively few survey or integrating studies. This relationship is also reflected in the selection, which is more biographical than for most other sections of this work.

It might be noted that subsections here interlock more extensively than may be immediately apparent. Not only do the people concerned, especially the performers, move more readily and frequently from one medium to another, but even much of the subject matter is carried over. In this way books become plays, then motion pictures, radioscripts, and finally television plays in a common sequence of evolution. However, the process may crisscross in almost any manner. Despite this, each has its own individuality and significance. The books involving overlapping subject matter have been arranged according to their dominant aspect, for most entertainers work predominantly (though not exclusively) through some one medium.

Although it is closely related to this section, musical entertainment has been left to the Music section, of which it is a more integral unit. By the same token, most books on radio and television appear under Communications. The few books on these subjects in this section are intended to represent the sizable entertainment, as distinct from the communication, aspects of these media. The emphasis throughout is on audience-directed activities, not activities with extensive audience participation.

A. General Works

4892. Green, Abel, and Joe Laurie, Jr. Show biz, from vaude to video. New York, Holt, 1951. 613 p. 51–13791 PN1962.G7

This comprises a history of half a century of American entertainment business, although the book was not written for scholarly purposes. The style and language are that of the entertainment world dialect exhibited by trade organs such as Variety. There is also, as part of the style, a heavy cramming of information without much exposition or analysis. The result is more a reference book than a reading text.

4893. Hurlbut, Jesse Lyman. The story of Chautauqua. New York, Putnam, 1921. 429 p. illus. 21–14568 LC6301.C5H8

Chatauqua brought culture and education (and, not always incidentally, entertainment) through many media (opera, drama, lectures, etc.) to millions. Hurlbut has here recorded Chatauqua history, from its beginnings to its heights. We Called It Culture; the Story of Chautauqua (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1948. 272 p.), by Victoria and Robert Ormond Case, tells the story with more perspective, but also more superficiality. Marian Scott's Chautauqua Caravan (New York, Appleton-Century, 1939. 310 p.) gives a closeup through the story of one participant's view.

4894. Revett, Marion S. A minstrel town. New York, Pageant Press, 1955. 335 p. illus. 55–12267 ML3556.R4

A history of entertainment in Toledo, Ohio, from the 1840's to the end of the 19th century. The book takes its title from the dominance in entertainment of the traveling minstrels. The sections of the book are "Minstrels," "Theater," "Circus," and "Local Music." Because of the systematic booking of traveling entertainers, and because of the small amount of local-origin entertainment, this book is meant to depict the development of entertainment in general throughout the area "west of the Alleghanies and east of the Rockies."

4895. Seldes, Gilbert V. The great audience. New York, Viking Press, 1950. 299 p. 50–10499 PN1991.6.S4

Movies, radio, and television are analyzed with the actual and the potential audience in view, and with the pecuniary, esthetic, and moral implications scanned.

4896. Theatre arts. Theatre arts anthology, a record and a prophecy; edited by Rosamond Gilder [and others] New York, Theatre Arts Books, 1950. 687 p. 50–11079 PN2020.T55

One hundred and thirty-two carefully selected articles which comprehensively survey theatrical arts from 1916 to 1948. Criticism and commentary at a high level.

B. The American Stage

Bi. HISTORY

4897. The Best plays. 1894/99+ New York, Dodd, Mead. illus. 20–21432 PN6112.B45

Title has frequently varied through forms such as The Burns Mantle Best Plays and the Year Book of the Drama in America and The Best Plays and the Year Book of the Drama in America.

Now edited by Louis Kronenberger (b. 1904). The work has been edited in the past by Garrison P. Sherwood, John A. Chapman (b. 1900), and Robert Burns Mantle (1873–1948).

Indexes: 1899/1909–1949/50. 1 v.

This work emphasizes the drama in New York giving a detailed record of performances there and regularly choosing the "best" plays from the New York productions of the previous theatrical season.

677676 O–63–44

The plays are normally presented in an abridged form, so that these volumes may not be relied on for full texts. As drama in other American cities has been becoming increasingly important, the section on non-New York productions has in recent years been increased in size and scope.

4898. The Best short plays. 1937+ New York, Dodd, Mead. 38-8006 PN6120.A4B44
Title varies: 1937-1951/52, The Best One-Act Plays.
Editor: 1937+ M. Mayorga.
An annual.

4899. Coad, Oral Sumner, and Edwin Mims, Jr. The American stage. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1929. 362 p. illus. (The Pageant of America [v. 14]) 29-22306 E178.5.P2, v. 14
An extensive and informative guide to the American stage; the text is accompanied by a multitude of well-ordered illustrations. In contrast to this, and produced for the "popular" audience, is Daniel C. Blum's A Pictorial History of the American Theatre, rev. 3d ed. (New York, Greenberg, 1956. 319 p.), which is a book of illustrations with very little text.

4900. Gagey, Edmond M. Revolution in American drama. New York, Columbia University Press, 1947. 315 p. 47-11297 PS351.G3
A history and assessment of the revolution in manners, morals, and artistry that, beginning in 1917, transformed the professional theater of Broadway. Joseph Wood Krutch's The American Drama Since 1918, an Informal History (New York, Random House, 1939. 325 p.) presents not so much a history of the period as incisive, evaluative essays on it. Ward Morehouse's Matinee Tomorrow, Fifty Years of Our Theater (New York, Whittlesey House, 1949. 340 p.) also covers the 20th-century drama, but more as a history of changing tastes; it is not intended for the scholar, but it is an interesting account for the layman or the general student of American culture.

4901. Houghton, Norris. Advance from Broadway, 19,000 miles of American theatre. New York, Harcourt, Brace, ©1941. 416 p. 41-22179 PN2266.H6
Little theaters, summer theaters, academic theaters, and almost all other any-distance-off-Broadway American theaters are examined in this concise and clear book, which resulted from a 19,000 mile trip made to examine the situation. Kenneth Macgowan's earlier Footlights Across America (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1929. 398 p.) somewhat similarly traces the nature and implications of the noncommercial theater; Albert McCleery and Carl Glick's Curtains Going Up (New York, Pitman, 1939. 412 p.) surveys the little theater movement across the country with an examination of 184 community theaters.

4902. Hoyt, Harlowe R. Town Hall tonight. Englewood Cliffs, N. J., Prentice-Hall, 1955. 292 p. illus. 55-9886 PN2256.H6
"This is the story of the country theater in the eighties and nineties, and though it treats somewhat specifically with the visitors and people of a little Wisconsin town, it is the story of each of the Town Halls that spotted the nation during those twenty years. And in the main that story is identical . . . Each of them . . . played the same plays, met with the same misadventures, and made their amateur productions from scripts purchased from the same play agencies. Except for the amateurs, this was equally true of the show boats that played the Mississippi River towns. . . . The only difference was the producing company and the playing cast. . . . There was a strange uniformity in all of these shows, including make up, costuming and stage business."—Prologue.

4903. Morris, Lloyd R. Curtain time; the story of the American theater. New York, Random House, 1953. 380 p. illus. 53-6914 PN2221.M68
This warmly nostalgic narrative of the American theater since 1815 aims to revive for the general reader all the splendors of its romantic past. For the early theater the emphasis is on the performers, rather than the plays or theaters, recognizing that the individuals presenting early dramatic entertainment in America themselves constituted the outstanding ingredient.

4904. Quinn, Arthur Hobson. A history of the American drama, from the beginning to the Civil War. 2d ed. New York, Crofts, 1943. 530 p. 43-11974 PS332.Q5 1943
"First printing, November, 1923."
"A list of American plays": p. [423]-497.
Bibliography: p. [393]-421.

4905. Quinn, Arthur Hobson. A history of the American drama from the Civil War to the present day. New York, Crofts, 1936. 296, 432 p. illus. 36-27316 PS332.Q55 1936
The text of the two volume edition of 1927, with an added chapter (The new decade, 1927-1936). The bibliography and play list have been completely revised and reset. Cf. Foreword to the revised edition.
"General bibliography and list of American plays, 1860-1936": p. [303]-402.

The two volumes together comprise an impressive, scholarly history of American drama; by virtue of style, it is approachable mainly as a reference book. A readable, concise, one-volume history is Glenn Hughes' A History of the American Theatre, 1700–1950 (New York, French, 1951. 562 p.). Valuable for its illustrations is the one-volume edition of The American Theatre, by John Anderson, and The Motion Picture in America, by René Fülöp-Miller (New York, Dial Press, 1938. 430 p.); Anderson gives a good account of his subject, but Fülöp-Miller's account suffers from age (it had appeared seven years earlier in German) and possibly from translation. The student of American drama will also be interested in George O. Seilhamer's History of the American Theatre (Philadelphia, Globe Printing House, 1888–91. 3 v.), which meticulously traces American drama from 1749 to 1797. Of antiquarian interest is William Dunlap's A History of the American Theatre (New York, Harper, 1832. 420 p.), by the "father of American drama."

4906. The Theatre book of the year . . . a record and an interpretation. 1942/43+ New York, Knopf. annual. 43–51298 PN2266.A2T4
1942/43+ by G. J. Nathan.

Mostly Mr. Nathan's personalized criticism, with small doses of data and no illustration. May with interest be compared to and supplemented by Theatre World, edited by Daniel C. Blum, 1944/45+ (New York, Theatre World), which offers no criticisms, a little data, and profuse illustration. George Jean Nathan has written numerous books of criticism expressive of his personality. Among these are Passing Judgments (New York, Knopf, 1935. 271 p.); The Morning After the First Night (New York, Knopf, 1938. 281 p.); Encyclopaedia of the Theatre (New York, Knopf, 1940. 449 p.); The Entertainment of a Nation (New York, Knopf, 1942. 290 p.); and The Theatre in the Fifties (New York, Knopf, 1953. 298 p.).

Bii. CRITICISM

4907. Atkinson, Justin Brooks. Broadway scrapbook. New York, Theatre Arts, 1947. 312 p. illus. 47–12086 PN2277.N5A8

The influential drama critic of The New York Times collects 70 of his reviews from its Sunday drama section, beginning with The Petrified Forest (1935) and reaching Born Yesterday (1947).

4908. Bentley, Eric R. The dramatic event, an American chronicle. New York, Horizon Press, 1954. 278 p. 54–12279 PN2266.B45

A collection of dramatic essays from The New Republic, largely critical of plays produced in New York in the period 1952–54. There are included a chapter on "The American Drama (1944–1954)" and a section of the critic's "Afterthoughts."

4909. Brown, John Mason. Seeing things. New York, McGraw-Hill 1946. 341 p. 46–6335 PS3503.R81945S4

The critic presents selections from his wide-ranging "Seeing Things," a column which appears each week in the Saturday Review. Subsequent installments have been Seeing More Things (New York, Whittlesey House, 1948. 347 p.); Still Seeing Things (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1950. 335 p.); and As They Appear (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1952. 258 p.). Other critical works by him include: Upstage, The American Theatre in Performance (New York, Norton, 1930. 275 p.); Two on the Aisle; Ten Years of the American Theatre in Performance (New York, Norton, 1938. 321 p.); and Broadway in Review (New York, Norton, 1940. 295 p.).

4910. Isaacs, Edith (Rich) ed. Theatre, essays on the arts of the theatre. Edited by Edith J. R. Isaacs. Boston, Little, Brown, 1927. 341 p. illus. 27–23981 PN2020.I8

The editor of Theatre Arts Monthly presents here a collection of 30 essays by various hands, on theater as art rather than as commercial venture. The editor contributes a general introduction and briefer ones to each of the eight sections.

4911. Woollcott, Alexander. The portable Woollcott, selected by Joseph Hennessey. New York, Viking Press, 1946. 735 p. (The Viking portable library) 46–25135 PS3545.O77 1946

Woollcott (1887–1943) was a full-time drama critic only for the six years beginning in 1922, and this convenient anthology contains much of his ornate and highly mannered writing in other spheres; but it gives a good idea of his personality, which many found fascinating and others infuriating. His critical writings include Shouts and Murmurs (New York, Century, 1922. 264 p.); Enchanted Aisles (New York, Putnam, 1924. 260 p.); and Going to Pieces (New York, Putnam, 1928. 256 p.).

4912. Young, Stark. Immortal shadows, a book of dramatic criticism. New York, Scribner, 1948. 290 p. 48–11512 PN2277.N5Y6

After about two decades as a theatrical critic, the author, upon retirement from the field, selected these critical articles from those published in various periodicals. The Pavilion: Of People and Times

Remembered, of Stories and Places (New York, Scribner, 1951. 194 p.) is an autobiographical work which in part reflects Young's connection with the theater. The author also gained attention with novels, his most prominent one being the Civil War novel, So Red the Rose (New York, Scribner, 1934. 431 p.).

Biii. PARTICULAR STAGE GROUPS, THEATERS, MOVEMENTS, ETC.

4913. Carson, William G. The theatre on the frontier; the early years of the St. Louis stage. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1932. 361 p. illus. 32–11827 PN2277.S2C3

Bibliography: p. 331–335.

A scholarly, detailed history of the first quarter century (1815–1840) of the St. Louis stage. There is much social and literary interest, as well as dramatic.

4914. Clurman, Harold. The fervent years; the story of the Group Theatre and the thirties. New York, Knopf, 1945. 298 p. illus. 45–5287 PN2297.G7C5

The Group Theatre (1931–41), which attempted to bring art to the commercial stage, here has its story told from the personal point of view of one who attended at its birth and now delivers the funeral oration.

4915. Davis, Hallie (Ferguson) F. Arena, by Hallie Flanagan. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce [1940] 475 p. illus. 41–231 PN2266.D37

Bibliography: p. 439–447.

In 1935, when there were some 25,000 unemployed theater people, Harry Hopkins put Mrs. Flanagan in charge of Federal Theater, a project of the Works Progress Administration. She gives an impressionistic view of its four years' work (a detailed production record and financial statement are appended) and discusses the Congressional dissatisfaction which brought it to a sudden end on June 30, 1939.

4916. Deutsch, Helen, and Stella Hanau. The Provincetown; a story of the theatre. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1931. 313 p. illus. 31–30075 PN2297.P7D4

A somewhat naive narrative of the Provincetown Theater, which originated on Cape Cod but developed an extension in Greenwich Village, New York City, from 1916 to 1929, with an analysis of its productions play by play. The Provincetown enjoyed the greatest prestige of any theater in America in its day, and introduced the early plays of Eugene O'Neill (q. v.).

4917. Dunn, Esther C. Shakespeare in America. New York, Macmillan, 1939. 210 p. 39–30566 PR3105.D8

Shakespeare in American culture from the Colonial era through the 19th century: productions, including those on the Ohio and Mississippi frontier and in Gold-Rush California; Shakespeare in the schools and colleges and in the thought of some eminent 19th-century figures; and American Shakespeare scholarship—including the Baconian theory, which had its inception here.

4918. Gagey, Edmond McAdoo. The San Francisco stage, a history. Based on annals compiled by the Research Dept. of the San Francisco Federal Theatre. New York, Columbia University Press, 1950. 264 p. illus. 50–8015 PN2277.S4G3 1950

Bibliography: p. [229]–233.

A detailed history, emphasizing the 19th century. The annals on which it was based were made available in mimeographed form as San Francisco Theatre Research (San Francisco, 1938–42[?1]) under the editorship of Lawrence Estavan.

4919. Gillmore, Margalo, and Patricia Collinge. The B. O. W. S. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1945. 173 p. illus. 45–35239 PN2297.U5G5

An account of the American Theatre Wing's overseas production for servicemen of The Barretts of Wimpole Street. Reflects an aspect of U. S. O. wartime activities.

4920. Houghton, Norris. But not forgotten; the adventure of the University Players. New York, Sloane, 1952, ©1951. 346 p. illus. 52–258 PN2297.U55H6

An informal history of the 1928–32 career of the University Players at Cape Cod and Baltimore. The story of an experimental, "progressive," theatrical group.

4921. Isaacs, Edith (Rich) The Negro in the American theatre. New York, Theatre Arts, 1947. 143 p. illus. 47–11394 PN2286.I8

While her subject goes back to 1821, when James Hewlett was playing Shakespeare with the African Company in New York City, Mrs. Isaacs dates her "foreground" from 1917 and Ridgeley Torrence's Three Plays for a Negro Theatre, and describes the individual stars and noteworthy all- or part-Negro productions of the following three decades.

4922. Kendall, John S. The golden age of the New Orleans theater. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1952. 624 p. illus.
51–14615 PN2277.N4K4
Bibliography: p. [606]–608.
The history of English-language drama in New Orleans during the first three-quarters of the 19th century.

4923. MacMinn, George R. The theater of the golden era in California. Caldwell, Idaho, Caxton Printers, 1941. 529 p. plates, ports., facsims. 41–10018 PN2275.C3M3
Bibliography: p. [509]–515.
A social history of the California theater during the gold rush decade. Many of the most popular entertainers of the day came West to take their share of the new wealth; among them, the author singles out Lola Montez for special attention.

4924. Odell, George C. D. Annals of the New York stage. New York, Columbia University Press, 1927–49. 15 v.
27–5965 PN2277.N5O4
By the time of his death in 1949 Odell had brought this highly detailed history of the New York stage to 1894. He noted each season's productions at all of the principal Manhattan theaters, from time to time giving complete casts, and devoted briefer chapters to dramatic events in Brooklyn, Williamsburgh, Greenpoint, Queens, Staten Island, etc. Each volume is lavishly illustrated. New York's centrality for the American stage lends this work an importance for drama throughout the Nation. The work is supplemented by The Best Plays of 1894–1899 (1955) and other volumes in The Best Plays series (q.v.).

4925. Schoberlin, Melvin, From candles to footlights; a biography of the Pike's Peak theatre, 1859–1876. Denver, F. A. Rosenstock, The Old West Pub. Co., 1941. 322 p. illus.
41–12800 PN2275.C6S35
"List of Colorado theatres, 1859–1876": p. 265–271.
Bibliography: p. 293–300.
A history of the theater in Colorado during its territorial period. The Pike's Peak gold rush began in May 1859 and the theater followed in September, when Apollo Hall was opened in Denver City.

4926. Sper, Felix. From native roots; a panorama of our regional drama. Caldwell, Idaho, Caxton Printers, 1948 341 p. illus.
49–1009 PS338.N3S6
Bibliography: p. [279]–334.
Since he rejects "the sentimentality of the local-color school," Mr. Sper emphasizes the late emergence of genuine regional drama in the United States, but notes some early treatments of the Indian, the Negro, and the Yankee. He then surveys the existing drama area by area, from "Yankee Lust"(!) to "Pacific Panorama," noting Broadway plays concerned with regional themes as well as local productions of all type. Robert E. Gard's Grassroots Theater; a Search for Regional Arts in America (Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1955. 263 p.) is largely an autobiographical account of the author's searching out of regional material for purposes of turning it into regional, rural drama.

Biv. BIOGRAPHY: ACTORS AND ACTRESSES

4927. Barnes, Eric W. The lady of fashion; the life and the theatre of Anna Cora Mowatt. New York, Scribner, 1954. 402 p. illus.
54–10366 PN2287.R54B3 1954
London edition (Secker & Warburg) has title: Anna Cora.
Includes bibliography.
Anna Cora (Ogden) Mowatt Ritchie (1819–1870) was a distinguished actress of the 1840's and 50's. Having come from the respectable element of New York society, she aided in raising the prestige of the then non-respectable profession of acting. The book is of value not merely as a record of theatrical operations in this period, but also for its depiction of the social scene. The work is in large part based on Mowatt's Autobiography of an Actress (1854).

4928. Bankhead, Tallulah. Tallulah: my autobiography. New York, Harper, 1952. 335 p. illus. 52–7278 PN2287.B17A3
This daughter of a famous Alabama family, a first-magnitude star since she took London by storm in 1923, gets into her story much of her famed flamboyance and caustic wit.

4929. Barrymore, Ethel. Memories, an autobiography. New York, Harper, 1955. 310 p. illus. 55–6565 PN2287.B3A3
The Barrymore-Drew family has long held a dominant position in American acting. In this volume Ethel Barrymore (b. 1879), the "first lady of the American theater," presents the story of her life; because of her long and distinguished career and her family associations, it also has some general stage history.

4930. Binns, Archie. Mrs. Fiske and the American theatre, by Archie Binns, in collaboration with Olive Kooken. New York, Crown Publishers, 1955. 436 p. illus.
55–10173 PN2287.F5B5

"It is rudimentary to say that Mrs. Fiske [1865–1932] was an American actress. She was the most purposefully American of them all; she discovered her own native playwrights; she took her productions, the best of their time, to the farthest reaches of the continent and to Americans who never saw Broadway; and she battled for ideals far beyond the confines of the theatre. . . . [She was] one of the best minds of her time: the acknowledged leader of the American stage for a generation, a skilled and successful playwright, an actress who was rated with Duse and Bernhardt, a producer who was probably the best outside Europe, the triumphal champion of Ibsen in America, the discoverer of some of the best American playwrights of the early twentieth century."—Preface.

4931. Blum, Daniel C. Great stars of the American stage, a pictorial record. New York, Greenberg, 1952. 1 v. 52–10871 PN2285.B6

Many portrait and on-stage photographs of limited quality in the reproductions; enthusiastic biographical sketches accompany the pictures. Older stage stars are presented in somewhat dated, but more thorough treatment in William Winter's The Wallet of Time (New York, Moffat, Yard, 1913. 2 v.). Biographical profiles of more recent theatrical personalities are presented in Margaret Case Harriman's Take Them Up Tenderly (New York, Knopf, 1944. 266 p.). A series of somewhat longer sketches on some prominent figures may be found in Maurice Zolotow's No People Like Show People (New York, Random House, 1951. 305 p.).

4932. Courtney, Marguerite (Taylor) Laurette. New York, Rinehart, 1955. 433 p. illus.
54–10448 PN2287.T25C6

A biography, by her daughter, of Laurette Taylor, who contributed 50 years of her life to the theater. This book is not merely a record of her stage triumphs, but also an analysis of her complex personality. Since her whole life was given to the theater, while life "bored" her, this presents not only the "makings" of an actress, but also a considerable segment of stage history.

4933. Fowler, Gene. Good night, sweet prince. New York, Viking Press, 1944. 477 p. illus. 43–18571 PN2287.B35F6

The life of John Barrymore (1882–1942). John Barrymore himself wrote a much earlier autobiographical book, Confessions of an Actor (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1926. 138 p.). His brother, Lionel Barrymore, discusses the family, with emphasis on Lionel, in his We Barrymores (New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1951. 311 p.). See also (supra) Ethel Barrymore's autobiography.

4934. Jefferson, Joseph. "Rip Van Winkle": The autobiography of Joseph Jefferson. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1950. 375 p. illus.
50–7350 PN2287.J4A3 1950

Originally published in 1890.

Joseph Jefferson (1829–1905) was the son of an actor and began his stage career at the age of four; it continued for 71 years! He was a flexible actor, but it was his fortune to become identified with his most popular role, as this retitled reprint attests. With wider scope, but somewhat dated and usually considered "less appealing," is William Winter's Life and Art of Joseph Jefferson, Together with Some Account of His Ancestry and of the Jefferson Family of Actors (New York, Macmillan, 1894. 319 p.), a revision of The Jeffersons, first published in 1881.

4935. Kahn, Ely J. The merry partners; the age and stage of Harrigan and Hart. New York, Random House, 1955. 302 p. illus.
55–8149 ML429.H3K3
PN2287.H247K3

Edward Harrigan and Tony Hart were partners and leading comedian entertainers in musical comedy productions in New York during the 1870's and 1880's. Harrigan wrote the scripts which they performed. This joint biographical study gives an insight into musical comedy as an aspect of the stagecraft of the period and also the popular music of the time.

4936. Le Gallienne, Eva. With a quiet heart, an autobiography. New York, Viking Press, 1953. 311 p. illus. 53–5201 PN2287.L3A35

The autobiography of a prominent actress. The book covers the two decades subsequent to the period covered by her earlier autobiography, At 33 (New York, Longmans, Green, 1934. 262 p.).

4937. Moses, Montrose J. The fabulous Forrest; the record of an American actor. Boston, Little, Brown, 1929. xxi, 369 p. illus.
29–27822 PN2287.F6M6

Bibliography: p. 345–355.

Edwin Forrest (1806–1872) was America's first tragedian, and he has been called the most popular actor America has produced. This book attempts to present not only the actor, but the actor as a product of his times. The work is therefore of value as an analysis of the mid-nineteenth-century society.

4938. Ruggles, Eleanor. Prince of players: Edwin Booth. New York, Norton, 1953. 401 p. illus. 53–5986 PN2287.B5R9

"Notes on sources": p. 377–386.

This life of the famous 19th-century actor largely supersedes William Winter's Life and Art of Edwin Booth (New York, Macmillan, 1893. 308 p.). Stanley P. Kimmel's The Mad Booths of Maryland (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1940. 400 p.) is more a psychological study of three famous actors than a story of dramatic achievement.

4939. Winter, William. Life and art of Richard Mansfield, with selections from his letters. New York, Moffat, Yard, 1910. 2 v. illus. 10–3307 PN2287.M4W6

Winter (1836–1917) was a leading New York drama critic and a prolific biographer of contemporary actors. He here presents (in large part through personal letters) the life of Mansfield (1857–1907), a famous actor and close friend of the author. Not just a chronicle, this book seeks to reveal the man's character.

Bv. BIOGRAPHY: DIRECTORS, PRODUCERS, ETC.

4940. Kinne, Wisner Payne. George Pierce Baker and the American theatre. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1954. 348 p. illus. 54–8632 PN2287.B15K5

A biography of the first college professor to teach practical playwriting and playproducing. Because of his work at Harvard from 1905 to 1924, and then at Yale until his retirement in 1933, he has been called "the father of modern American playwrights."

4941. Langner, Lawrence. The magic curtain; the story of a life in two fields, theatre and invention, by the founder of the Theatre Guild. New York, Dutton, 1951. 498 p. illus. 51–13798 PN2295.T5L3

A leading patent attorney writes of the theatrical world in which he has figured so prominently. Born in South Wales in 1890, Mr. Langner came to the United States in 1910, and 9 years later organized the Theater Guild, of which he has remained a principal director for 40 years. Its productions through 1950 are listed in Appendix VIII.

4942. Sobel, Bernard. Broadway heartbeat; memoirs of a press agent. New York, Hermitage House, 1953. 352 p. 53–12014 PN2287.S62A3

Mr. Sobel, now in charge of public relations for the Celanese Corporation of America, reviews his life between the two World Wars, when he was press agent for Earl Carroll, Florenz Ziegfeld, Jr., Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, and a diversity of other clients.

4943. Timberlake, Craig. The Bishop of Broadway: the life & work of David Belasco. New York, Library Publishers, 1954. 491 p. illus. 54–11646 PN2287.B4T5

Belasco (1853–1931) was a would-be playwright who attained fame and fortune as a stage manager and play producer. This book presents a picture of the Western frontier theater (Belasco started in San Francisco) and later New York City. Belasco, who made many stars, brought about lavish and popular productions. He was not notably original, but he did have an ability to perfect tendencies and gage the taste of his audience. A two-volume, somewhat eulogistic Life of David Belasco (New York, Moffat, Yard, 1918) was undertaken by William Winter (1836–1917), and completed after his death by his son, Jefferson Winter.

C. Motion Pictures

Ci. HISTORY

4944. Jacobs, Lewis. The rise of the American film; a critical history. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1939. 585 p. illus. 39–32345 PN1993.5.U6J2

Bibliography: p. 541–564.

Remains, after 20 years, the most detailed and best-documented history of its subject, with special emphasis upon the evolution of form and content, the work of the leading directors, and the organization of the industry. A famous early work is Terry Ramsaye's A Million and One Nights (New York, Simon & Schuster, 1926. 2 v.). A French view of the American film may be obtained from Robert Florey's Hollywood d'hier et d'aujourd'hui (Paris, Éditions Prisma, 1948. 381 p.). Another French view of it, as seen in the context of world production, may be found in Histoire du cinéma, nouv. éd. definitive ([Givors] Martel, 1953–

54. 2 v.), by Maurice Bardèche and Robert Brasillach. Paul Rotha in The Film Till Now, rev. and enl. ed. (New York, Funk & Wagnalls, 1949. 755 p.) also presents it in world perspective.

4945. Seldes, Gilbert V. The movies come from America. New York, Scribner, 1937. 120 p. illus. 37–28786 PN1993.5.U6S4

This work was published in London by Batsford under the title Movies for the Millions, and can be regarded as a clear and reasonably brief conspectus of the American cinema for British readers, with some instructive comparisons. The earlier chapters are historical, the later analytical; but all are constructively critical, for Mr. Seldes believed that the movies were a big and good thing, but could easily be made better than they were. This quality allows a book, written when color film and TV were still looming on the horizon, to retain much of its original interest.

4946. Taylor, Deems, Marcelene Peterson, and Bryant Hale. A pictorial history of the movies. Rev. and enl. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1950. 376 p. illus. 50–8567 PN1993.5.U6T3 1950

A chronologically arranged book consisting largely of pictures of stars and stills from motion pictures. A pictorial selection from the silent film alone is Daniel C. Blum's A Pictorial History of the Silent Screen (New York, Putnam, 1953. 334 p.). Blum also edits an annual, Daniel Blum's Screen World (v. 1+ 1949+ New York, Greenberg), each volume of which handles, through reproduced stills and some screen credits, American films produced in the preceding year and some foreign films released here; there are an obituary section and an index at the end.

Cii. SPECIAL ASPECTS AND ANALYSES

4947. Commission on Freedom of the Press. Freedom of the movies; a report on self-regulation from the Commission . . . Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1947. 240 p. 47–30119 PN1994.A2C6

At head of title: By Ruth A. Inglis.

"A note on sources": p. 220–224.

The history and state of film censorship are considered and the implications for film quality are discussed.

4948. Powdermaker, Hortense. Hollywood, the dream factory; an anthropologist looks at the movie-makers. Boston, Little, Brown, 1950. 342 p. 50–10280 PN1993.5.U65P6

This book is the result of a one-year sociological study of a famous Pacific coast community. Another analysis of the community is found in Leo C. Rosten's Hollywood; the Movie Colony, the Movie Makers (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1941. 436 p.).

4949. Ross, Lillian. Picture. New York, Rinehart, 1952. 258 p. 52–9607 PN1997.R38

In an attempt to obtain and present an insight into the American motion picture industry the author has reported on the production of the film The Red Badge of Courage from the stage of initial conferences through final release and publicity. The material originally appeared as a series of articles in The New Yorker. A similar work, Case History of a Movie (New York, Random House, 1950. 242 p.), by a person within the industry was done by Dore Schary for the film The Next Voice You Hear, which was produced with the assistance of Charles Palmer.

4950. Thorp, Margaret (Farrand). America at the movies. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1939. 313 p. illus. 39–31325 PN1993.5.U6T5

Mrs. Thorp analyzes who goes to the movies and why, and discusses the influences of films. Leo A. Handel in Hollywood Looks at Its Audience; a Report of Film Audience Research (Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1950. 240 p.) shows how the film industry evaluates audience reaction.

4951. Wolfenstein, Martha, and Nathan Leites. Movies; a psychological study. Glencoe, Ill., Free Press, 1950. 316 p. illus. 50–7374 PN1995.W63

A psychological-sociological study of the American films (contrasted with those of England and France); the book probes the basic themes and patterns in films, which it regards as ready-made versions of the widespread and (nearly) universal daydreams of our culture. In this way it presents new insights into present-day America and Americans.

Ciii. BIOGRAPHY: ACTORS AND ACTRESSES

4952. Bainbridge, John. Garbo. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1955. 256 p. illus. 55–5589 PN2778.G3B3

A biography of Swedish-born Greta Garbo (b. 1905), who has been called the screen's greatest actress. She came to America early in her career. Her last film was released in 1941; since then she has been living in retirement.

4953. Huff, Theodore. Charlie Chaplin. New York, Schuman, 1951. 354 p.
51–10104 PN2287.C5H8

Charlie was born Charles Spencer Chaplin at London in 1889; his parents were both in vaudeville. Mr. Huff offers a minimal biography, but very full descriptions and appreciations of his films from the Keystone comedies of 1914 to Monsieur Verdoux (1947) and a wealth of illustrations. A complete chronological list of the films and "Biographical Sketches of the People Professionally Associated with Chaplin" are appended. Among other recent biographies of Chaplin are Pierre S. R. Payne's The Great God Pan (New York, Hermitage House, 1952. 301 p.), which is primarily a study of Chaplin's film work, and Peter Cotes and Thelma Niklaus' The Little Fellow [rev. ed.] (London, Bodley Head, 1952. 160 p.), which is more recent, but shorter.

4954. Menjou, Adolphe, and Morris M. Musselman. It took nine tailors. New York, Whittlesey House, 1948. 238 p. illus.
48–5637 PN2287.M58A3

The life of Adolphe Menjou (b. 1890) is almost a history of the movies as he has lived it. It traces his career of 34 years in pictures, during which he had parts in 146 films.

4955. Pickford, Mary. Sunshine and shadow. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1955. 382 p. illus.
55–5580 PN2287.P5A3

Mary Pickford (b. 1893) was one of the most popular film stars. She started as a child actress, and even as an adult she played child roles, and met with little success when portraying mature individuals. Her extreme popularity, which brought her the nickname of "America's Sweetheart," makes this autobiography a useful document for interpreting mass culture, especially insofar as the silent films are concerned. The first part of the book has a place in the history of the film; the second part is largely personal.

4956. Taylor, Robert Lewis. W. C. Fields, his follies and fortunes. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1949. 340 p. ports.
49–11132 PN2287.F45T3

A life of the vaudeville star turned film comedian (1879–1946), which reflects much of the entertainment world of his period. A succession of very amusing anecdotes develop the view that Fields' whole life was pervaded by his highly original and sardonic comic spirit.

Civ. BIOGRAPHY: DIRECTORS, PRODUCERS, ETC.

4957. Feild, Robert D. The art of Walt Disney. New York, Macmillan, 1942. 290 p.
42–36248 NC1765.F4

Walt Disney's work is presented as a technical and commercial problem; an attempt is made to establish criteria for judging it as art. It serves, to some extent, as a history of Disney's work; Disney was a pioneer in the field of the animated cartoon, in which he rapidly acquired a commanding lead.

4958. Griffith, Richard. The world of Robert Flaherty. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1953. 165 p. illus. 51–10886 PN1998.A3F5

Flaherty (1884–1951) is called "the father of the documentary film," but it is less the fact of paternity than the beauty, dignity, and narrative power of his work that gives him enduring significance. Mr. Griffith documents the making of Tabu, Man of Aran, Louisiana Story, and the others with extracts from Flaherty's diaries and letters, and provides over 70 illustrations, mostly from the films.

4959. Mayer, Arthur. Merely colossal, the story of the movies from the long chase to the chaise longue. [New York] Simon & Schuster, 1953. 264 p. 53–5739 PN1993.5.U6M3

The humorous as well as informative autobiography of a man who has spent much of his life in the business of films: distributing, showing, advertising, importing, etc.

4960. Noble, Peter. Hollywood scapegoat; the biography of Erich von Stroheim. London, Fortune Press, 1950. 246 p. illus.
52–21529 PN1998.A3V65

Bibliography: p. 171–184.

This English life of von Stroheim (b. 1885), the Vienna-born actor-director, takes the line that "he was the one chosen to be sent out into the wilderness to perish, to atone in some measure for the sins and extravagances of Hollywood during the fantastic 1920's. He had directed at least six masterpieces, yet Hollywood banished him because he was feared by the money-men." He did not perish, but has been successful as a leading character actor.

4961. Smith, Albert E. Two reels and a crank, by Albert E. Smith in collaboration with Phil A. Koury. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1952. 285 p. illus., ports.
52–11617 TR849.S5A3

Albert E. Smith, in partnership with Jim Blackton, conducted the Vitagraph Company from 1896 to 1925, when it was sold to the Warners for "a sizable fortune." Mr. Smith here reminisces of the shoestring days of the industry, when a comedy could be produced for $3.50 plus the cost of the film at eight cents a foot.

4962. Vidor, King W. A tree is a tree. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1953. 315 p. illus.
53–9221 PN1998.A3V5

The autobiography, judiciously limited to his cinema career, of King Vidor (b. 1895), who learned to direct movies in Galveston, Texas, and went to Hollywood in 1915. The Appendix lists the 51 films he directed between 1918 and 1952. Although they include such classics of the silent films as The Big Parade, The Crowd, and Hallelujah, Mr. Vidor seems most deeply impressed by his Duel in the Sun (1946), "one of the ten biggest box-office grossers of all time."

4963. Zukor, Adolph. The public is never wrong. New York, Putnam, 1953. 309 p. illus.
53–8164 PN1998.A3Z8

A businessman of the films tells his life story, largely in terms of film history as he has seen it and the people he has known. The book was written with the collaboration of Dale Kramer. An earlier biography of Zukor is William H. Irwin's The House that Shadows Built (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1928. 293 p.).

D. Other Forms of Entertainment

Di. RADIO AND TELEVISION

4964. Allen, Fred. Treadmill to oblivion. Boston, Little, Brown, 1954. 240 p. illus.
54–11132 PN1991.4.A6A3

Fred Allen (1894–1956; real name, John Florence Sullivan) was a humorist of dry wit who for many years expressed in humor many aspects of American life. His career included stage, film, and some television, but the emphasis in this autobiographical work is on his radio program. The book not only presents the problems of such entertainment (sponsors, script-writing, etc.), but it also presents material from the programs. The book closes with his last regular program in 1949.

4965. Gross, Ben. I looked and I listened; informal recollections of radio and TV. New York, Random House, 1954. 344 p.
54–7806 PN1991.5.G7

In 1925 Gross became radio editor of a New York daily newspaper. After having spent nearly three decades growing up with the radio, and subsequently the television industry, he presents in this autobiographical book its informal history—especially in its entertainment aspects.

4966. Mackey, David R. Drama on the air. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1951. 468 p. illus.
51–6240 PN1991.7.M3

With an emphasis on radio acting and production, ". . . the purpose of this book is to describe the concepts and activities basic to the presentation of drama on the air, in the areas of script, acting, and production." There is a good bibliography on radio drama in particular and some radio history in general.

Dii. THE DANCE IN AMERICA

4967. Amberg, George. Ballet in America, the emergence of an American art. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1949. 244 p. illus.
49–1689 GV1787.A43

Also published by the New American Library with title: Ballet.

A critical and historical study. The emphasis is heavily modern, in view of the author's statement: "While there has been some form of the ballet in America for more than a century and a half, the native American ballet is barely fifteen years old."—Preface.

4968. Armitage, Merle, ed. Martha Graham. Los Angeles, M. Armitage, 1937. 132 p. illus.
39–2400 GV1785.G7A7

Articles by John Martin, Lincoln Kirstein, Evangeline Stokowski, Stark Young, Wallingford Riegger, Edith J. R. Isaacs, Roy Hargrave, James Johnson Sweeney, George Antheil, Margaret Lloyd, Louis Danz, and Martha Graham. This book is a group of articles discussing or simply lauding Martha Graham, one of the leading exponents of the modern dance. Barbara B. Morgan's Martha Graham, Sixteen Dances in Photographs (New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1941. 160 p.) presents a photographic study of the dancer.

4969. Chujoy, Anatole. The New York City Ballet. New York, Knopf, 1953. 382 p. illus.
52–6412 GV1786.N4C45

Although the New York City Ballet was not organized until 1948, Mr. Chujoy tells the story of its predecessor enterprises from "October 1933, when Lincoln Kirstein and his friend and Harvard classmate Edward M. M. Warburg brought George Balanchine and Vladimir Dimitriew from Europe to establish the School of American Ballet." The book acclaims the work of Messrs. Kirstein and Balanchine in creating, from Russian models, "an American institution to be proud of."

4970. De Mille, Agnes. Dance to the piper. Boston, Little, Brown, 1952. 342 p. illus.
52–119 GV1785.D36A3 1952

The autobiography of a rich girl who climbed the ladder to success as a dancer and choreographer. She was one of the revolutionaries in the establishing of an "American" dance.

4971. Magriel, Paul D., ed. Chronicles of the American dance. New York, Holt, 1948. 268 p. illus. 48–9068 GV1623.M33

"Notes and bibliographical data": p. 263–268.

Written largely as a series of chronologically arranged monographs by various authors on individuals and groups of dancers. Because of this manner of treatment, and because of its emphasis on theatrical dancing, the work is not a full history of dancing in America, although its range is wide. A work of wider scope, but for a shorter period, edited by Doris Hering for Dance Magazine, is 25 Years of American Dance (1951), rev. and enl. ed. (New York, Orthwine, 1954. 236 p.), a heavily illustrated work which covers the entire field of the dance in modern America, from recreational and social dancing through dancing in plays, motion pictures, and on television. Theatrical dancing in America since 1900 is studied in Winthrop B. Palmer's Theatrical Dancing in America (New York, Ackerman, 1945. 159 p.), which has much material on ballet. A dancer's view of the problems and aesthetics of the modern theatrical dance is given in Elizabeth S. Selden's The Dancer's Quest (Berkeley, University of California Press, 1935. 215 p.).

4972. Magriel, Paul D., ed. Isadora Duncan. New York, Holt, 1947. 85 p. illus.
47–3097 GV1785.D8M3

"The material in this book is made up largely from issues of the periodical, Dance Index."

Appendices: Chronology. Bibliography of Isadora Duncan (p. 73–78). Albums and books of drawings of Isadora Duncan (p. 79).

A short book of essays (by John Martin, Carl Van Vechten, A. R. Macdougall, and Gordon Craig) on Isadora Duncan (1878–1927), a pioneer of the modern dance. An illustrated memorial volume of essays by the dancer, with forewords by various people, is Duncan's The Art of the Dance, edited by Sheldon Cheney (New York, Theatre Arts, 1928. 147 p.).

Diii. VAUDEVILLE AND BURLESQUE

4973. Dillon, William A. Life doubles in brass. Ithaca, N. Y., House of Nollid, 1944. 234 p. illus. 44–8823 PN1967.D47

Will Dillon, born in 1877 in upstate New York to an Irish family with theatrical inclinations, progressed though traveling medicine shows, blackface minstrel shows, and repertory stock companies to Broadway vaudeville, as an "eccentric singing comedian." He was also an indefatigable writer of popular songs, and appends some sentimental specimens.

4974. Laurie, Joseph. Vaudeville: from the honky-tonks to the Palace. New York, Holt, 1953. 561 p. 53–9590 PN1967.L3

The honky-tonks, gambling houses and saloons providing entertainment during the 1870's and 80's, were the future vaudeville's cradle of talent. Mr. Laurie, however, is mainly concerned with the vaudeville of the 20th century down to the great collapse of 1932, when its disappearance from the Palace Theater on Broadway symbolized its final dispossession by the movies. He gives vivid, slang-filled sketches of the conditions of work, representative acts, and leading managers. An earlier, less memoiristic and less animated history of vaudeville is Douglas Gilbert's American Vaudeville, Its Life and Times (New York, Whittlesey House, 1940. 428 p.).

4975. Marston, William Moulton, and John Henry Feller. F. F. Proctor, vaudeville pioneer. New York, R. R. Smith, 1943. 191 p. illus.
44–155 PN1967.M3

The life of Frederick Freeman Proctor (1851–1929), a producer of vaudeville shows in New York City.

4976. Sobel, Bernard. Burleycue; an underground history of burlesque days. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1931. 284 p. illus.
31–33512 PN1967.S6

Burlesque began as travesty of classical tragedy, but since about 1869 its essence and its prosperity have resided in its revelation of the female form, by tights or otherwise. Mr. Sobel skims over its principal aspects and persons from Lydia Thompson and the British Blondes—an obese lot by present-day standards—to Ann Corio, a more streamlined type.

Div. SHOWBOATS, CIRCUSES, ETC.

4977. Barnum, Phineas T. Struggles and triumphs: or, The life of P. T. Barnum, written by himself. Edited, with an introd., by George S. Bryan. New York, Knopf, 1927. 2 v. illus.
27–13922 GV1811.B3A3 1927c

"Based upon 'The life of P. T. Barnum written by himself' (New York, 1855); the 1869 (Hartford) issue of 'Struggles and triumphs; or, Forty years' recollections of P. T. Barnum'; and the 1889 (Buffalo) issue of the condensed version of 'Struggles and triumphs.' "

Barnum kept adding and subtracting from his autobiography as it passed through its many editions. Accordingly, there is no one complete, definitive text. Bryan has here edited a composite text. Morris R. Werner's Barnum (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1923. 381 p.) is a biography based on the autobiography and outside materials.

4978. Graham, Philip. Showboats; the history of an American institution. Austin, University of Texas Press, 1951. 224 p. illus.
51–14160 PN2293.S4G7

Bibliography: p. 203–210.

Showboats, which first appeared on the Mississippi and its tributaries in 1831 and lasted for over a century, were long a major medium of entertainment from Pittsburgh to New Orleans. An autobiographical book recording this aspect of the dramatic art is Billy Bryant's Children of Old Man River; the Life and Times of a Showboat Trouper (New York, Furman, 1936. 303 p.).

4979. Havighurst, Walter. Annie Oakley of the Wild West. New York, Macmillan, 1954. 246 p. illus. 54–12424 GV1157.O3H3

Annie Oakley (1860–1926) was from childhood an incredibly accurate marksman with a shotgun or rifle. So uniform was her success with the most unlikely targets that for years she was able to travel widely and profitably as a popular entertainer. The peak of her career was perhaps her 17 successive years as a star of Buffalo Bill's Wild West show.

4980. Mannix, Daniel P. Step right up! New York, Harper, 1951. 270 p.
51–2123 GV1835.M3

Says Mr. Mannix, formerly The Great Zadma, of his venture into fire-eating and sword-swallowing: "I worked under canvas for the best part of three years and either performed or saw performed all the stunts I tell about in this book. . . . Except for combining the events of chronologically separated occasions into one summer, I've told the story of a travelling American carnival as I experienced it—only changing the names of the people with whom I worked."

4981. McPharlin, Paul. The puppet theatre in America, a history; with a list of puppeteers, 1524–1948. New York, Harper, 1949. 506 p. illus., facsims. 49–8939 PN1978.U6M22

A history of puppets in America, from the beginning to 1948, just before the television revival. The large amount of material and its ordering makes the book usable as a reference work.

4982. Robeson, Dave. Al G. Barnes, master showman, by Dave Robeson, as told by Al G. Barnes. Caldwell, Idaho, Caxton Printers, 1935. 460 p. illus. 35–12032 GV1811.B27R6

The life story of a circus manager who specialized in wild, trained, and performing animals, and to whom Maud the mule and Nero the first riding lion were real individuals.

XX

Sports and Recreation

A.	General	4983–4996
B.	Community and Scholastic Activities	4997–5000
C.	Particular Sports and Recreations
Ci.	Auto-Racing and Motoring	5001–5007
Cii.	Baseball	5008–5015
Ciii.	Boating	5016–5022
Civ.	Boxing	5023–5033
Cv.	Football	5034–5045
Cvi.	Golf and Tennis	5046–5053
Cvii.	Horse-Racing	5054–5057
Cviii.	Miscellaneous	5058–5064
D.	General Field Sports	5065–5097

AS THE leisure time of the average American has rapidly increased, the ways in which this time is passed have become increasingly important factors in the life of the Nation. This is further accentuated by the fact that increased specialization and routinization of jobs has decreased the percentage of those who live for their work, and enormously increased the number of people who live by it, but for something else. Leisure activities have taken on many aspects. One of the main categories is sport and recreation. While many of the sports are so commercialized and non-participatory in nature that they might well be included under Entertainment (q. v.), not to mention commerce itself, and while much entertainment is attended primarily for purposes of recreation, we have chosen to use Entertainment in its more traditional sense (covering spectacles such as drama, motion pictures, vaudeville, the circus, etc.), and to regard activities such as athletics as in a distinct category. To word it another way, the distinction is made in consideration of whether or not the activity is widely regarded among its followers as a participation activity (Sports and Recreation) or as a generally and basically non-participation activity (Entertainment).

Accordingly, this section covers such sports as football, baseball, tennis, sailing, horse-racing, and auto-racing, as well as the allied field sports, hunting and fishing. Some activities of the kind are, however, not included because of a lack of suitable books: basketball, swimming, billiards, hockey, bicycling, etc.; while other important sports and recreations are merely touched on: hiking, camping, skiing, etc. For all these there is ample literature in the form of manuals and guides, but little in the way of books treating them as significant experience or placing them individually in the picture of life in America. For these the student will find some information in the general histories of sport and recreation. Just as the manuals have been excluded, so too the various handbooks, encyclopedias, and annuals of individual sports (notably baseball and football) have been left out. Usually these are mainly compendia of records (often statistical) and do little to indicate any significance in the game for American experience. As such they are of value primarily to the game's fans, and secondarily to the specialist, while their value to the general student of American history and culture is limited.

It has been found impossible to represent the sports strictly in proportion to their importance. In some fields such as baseball, there is a vast literature, but mainly for young readers. In most fields the books are written for aficionados of the sport, and in a style with little appeal to the literate lay reader, and often with a wealth of statistical detail of interest chiefly to the fans. Also, many of the books are uncritically written with little concern for the distinction between truth and fable, and with much attention to the fame and glory of the moment. On the other hand, a few sports have had capable writers among their followers: notably hunting and fishing (which are probably the most widespread adult participation sports); yachting (which is certainly a minority sport); and also boxing (which in comparison to other sports has been surprisingly well, though not extensively, written up).

It should also be noted that these subjects are occasionally touched upon (directly or tangentially) in other sections of the bibliography. Books such as Lloyd Morris' Not So Long Ago under Society and the baseball literature of Ring Lardner in the Literature section may well be of interest to the student. For such material the appropriate sections and the index should be used.

A. General

4983. Cozens, Frederick W., and Florence Scovil Stumpf. Sports in American life. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1953. 366 p. 53–12897 GV583.C68

Two University of California sociologists study the 20th-century penetration of American society on every level by the practice and the enthusiastic fanship of organized sports and physical recreations. They describe the latter-day importance of sports in labor and industry, the school, the church, journalism, broadcasting, and even in war. They find sport a vast and beneficent force for unification in American life, narrowing the gaps between social classes and ethnic groups. Unlike most commentators, they wholeheartedly approve of spectator sports, "the cement of democracy." "The bleachers are equally cordial to coal-miners, politicians, and bank presidents."

4984. Danzig, Allison, and Peter Brandwein, eds. The greatest sport stories from The New York Times; sport classics of a century. New York, Barnes, 1951. 680 p. illus. 51–14836 GV191.N4

"From the files of The New York Times have been selected eyewitness accounts of the most celebrated events in the field of sports dating from the first year of publication of The Times, now celebrating its centennial anniversary."—Introduction.

A similar volume, Wake Up the Echoes, edited by Bob Cooke and selected from the sports pages of the New York Herald Tribune was published in 1956 (Garden City, N. Y., Hanover House. 251 p.).

4985. Dulles, Foster Rhea. America learns to play; a history of popular recreation, 1607–1940. New York, P. Smith, 1952, ©1940. xvii, 441 p. illus. 52–9893 E161.D852 1952

Bibliography: p. 375–390.

An attempt to present the main aspects of popular recreation. "Recreation is considered in its popular sense—the leisure-time activities that the American people have pursued over three centuries for their own pleasure. At all periods of history men and women have probably spent the greater part of their leisure in informal talk, in visiting and entertaining their friends, in casual walks and strolls, and sometimes in reading for their own amusement. But these more simple activities are hidden in the obscurity that shrouds private lives. Organized, public recreation has consciously been adopted as the basis for this record."—Preface.

4986. Durant, John, and Otto Bettmann. Pictorial history of American sports, from colonial times to the present. New York, Barnes, 1952. 280 p. 52–8298 GV583.D85

With text as well as pictures on nearly every page, this overall narrative hits the high spots of five periods, moving from "Captain Smith to General Grant" in the first 45 pages. The remaining four are "The Gas-lit Era, 1871–1898," "The Rise of Sports, 1900–1918," "The Golden Age, 1919–1930" ("an age of champions, of extraordinary events and superb performances, an age of public idolatry and fabulous purses"), and "Sports for Everybody, 1931–1952."

4987. Gallico, Paul. Farewell to sport. New York, Knopf, 1938. 346 p. 38–27340 GV53.G3

Mr. Gallico was for 13 years (1923–36) a sports writer for the New York Daily News, and has since become a prolific writer of fiction. This reflective book devotes individual chapters to three boxers (Jack Dempsey, Primo Carnera, Gene Tunney) and to Tex Rickard, "the world's greatest prizefight promoter," Babe Ruth, the king of baseball, and Helen Wills Moody, the queen of tennis. The remaining chapters discuss particular sports or special topics such as the Negro in sport. A recurrent theme is the national hypocrisy which insists that, in certain sports, professional athletes must maintain, by various subterfuges, their "amateur" status. Mr. Gallico had one relapse into sports writing in 1942, when he published Golf Is a Friendly Game (New York, Knopf. 274 p.) and Lou Gehrig, Pride of the Yankees (New York, Grosset & Dunlap. 185 p.).

4988. Kieran, John. The American sporting scene, with pictures by Joseph W. Golinkin. New York, Macmillan, 1941. 211 p. illus. (part col.) 41–52016 GV583.K47

Anecdotes and reminiscences of the world of sports; the text is in a measure written about the paintings and sketches of Golinkin. The book catches some of the mood of sports, including the non-professional's role, although there is no attempt to attain either a historical or comprehensive contemporary survey of the sporting world.

4989. Kirby, Gustavus T. I wonder why? New York, Coward-McCann, 1954. 180 p. illus. 54–10148 GV697.K5A3

Mr. Kirby, born in 1874, pursued careers as a New York lawyer and art dealer. Active in athletics at Columbia College in the '90's, he has been an official of the International Olympics since the second Games (1900), and has received six decorations from European governments. His autobiography is largely a procession of anecdotes, but expresses his conviction that "only through sport can there ever be a true democracy in this world."

4990. Krout, John Allen. Annals of American sport. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1929. 360 p. (The Pageant of America [v. 15]) 29–22307 GV53.K7 E178.5.P2, v. 15

Although conceived as a picture book, this is considerably the fullest and most dependable general history of American sports down to the mid-1920's, and the one best related to other aspects of national history. Unfortunately the pictures, as always in this exasperating series, are as poorly reproduced as they are admirably selected from original sources. After a general review of outdoor diversions in the colonial era, Dr. Krout deals successively with the turf, yachting and rowing, fishing and hunting, baseball, football, and golf, and has chapters on "The Day of the Athletic Club" and "The Coming of the Gymnasium." The "General Bibliography" (p. 338–347) covers the whole 15-volume series; the list for sports is limited to page 347.

4991. Lardner, John. Strong cigars and lovely women. New York, Published for Newsweek by Funk & Wagnalls, 1951. 127 p. 51–14397 PN6161.L3574

A selection from the author's columns which appeared in Newsweek, 1949 to 1951.

John Abbott Lardner, son of the famous Ring Lardner (q. v.), is a leading sports writer who is known for his style and the humor which he introduces into his articles. An earlier collection was It Beats Working (Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1947. 253 p.), a selection of his articles that appeared in Newsweek from 1939 to 1945. He is also the author of White Hopes and Other Tigers (Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1951. 190 p.), a history of heavyweight boxing in the U. S. from 1910 to 1930.

4992. Manchester, Herbert. Four centuries of sport in America, 1490–1890. New York, Derrydale Press, 1931. 245 p. illus. 32–2523 GV583.M3

"List of sources": p. [233]–245.

A well-illustrated volume whose purpose is "to follow the history of sport in America from that of the Aztecs and Indians down through the sports of the white man to about a generation ago." The point of view is historical rather than technical, and the author seeks to give the story of each period with the high spots of each sport, rather than its minor details. A more detailed, but unillustrated work with a smaller range is Jennie Holliman's American Sports, 1785–1835 (Durham, N. C., Seeman Press, 1931. 222 p.).

4993. Paulison, Walter M. The tale of the Wildcats; a centennial history of Northwestern University athletics. [Evanston? Ill.] N Men's Club, Northwestern University Club of Chicago, Northwestern University Alumni Association, 1951. xiv, 223 p. illus. 52–8032 GV691.N6P3

The centennial celebrated is the founding of Northwestern University, 1851–55; its football team, once the "Fighting Methodists," has been known as the Wildcats since 1924; this volume covers all college athletics but naturally gives most space to football (p. 17–63). Baseball was earlier, in unorganized form from the beginning, organized from 1869, and intercollegiate from 1871. Football has been played since 1876, organized since 1879, and intercollegiate since 1882. Track, tennis, basketball, swimming, etc., are all narrated, with a complete roster of lettermen and intercollegiate scores at the end, and many fine plates reproducing photographs of teams and individual stars.

4994. Rice, Grantland. The tumult and the shouting; my life in sport. New York, Barnes, 1954. 368 p. illus. 54–9173 GV697.A1R52

Henry Grantland Rice was for many years a leading sports columnist. He was well known for his work on a long series of short sport films. His autobiography, completed shortly before his death, is less his life story than a presentation of the world of sports as he saw it. Rice also wrote much popular sports and moral verse.

4995. Smith, Walter W. Views of sport [by] Red Smith. New York, Knopf, 1954. 293 p. 53–6862 GV191.S62

This is a second selection of articles from the author's column "Views of Sport," in the New York Herald Tribune; the first was entitled Out of the Red (New York, Knopf, 1950. 294 p.). Smith (b. 1905) may write on any aspect of his field. His approach is usually anecdotal and frequently humorous.

4996. Zaharias, Mildred Babe (Didrikson), and Harry Paxton. This life I've led; my autobiography, by Babe Didrikson Zaharias as told to Harry Paxton. New York, Barnes, 1955. 242 p. illus. 55–10217 GV964.Z3A3

Mrs. Zaharias has been called "the greatest woman athlete." Raised in an impoverished Texas family, she became a leading athlete in several fields, including golf, basketball, baseball, and track.

B. Community and Scholastic Activities

4997. Butler, George D. Introduction to community recreation, prepared for the National Recreation Association. 2d ed. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1949. xiv, 568 p. 49–7982 GV171.B85 1949

"The term 'community recreation' is applied in this volume to recreation services that are provided for the benefit of all the people. Special consideration is given to those forms of recreation which require a considerable degree of organization and leadership and in which participation plays an important role. Because governmental agencies provide a large and increasing proportion of such services, this book is devoted primarily to the work of these agencies. It deals with recreation as a function of local government . . . Commercial recreation . . . is not included . . ."

". . . Major consideration is given to problems . . . related to the town and city rather than the rural community."—Preface.

Bibliography: p. 533–548.

4998. Neumeyer, Martin H., and Esther S. Neumeyer. Leisure and recreation; a study of leisure and recreation in their sociological aspects. Rev. ed. New York, Barnes, 1949. 411 p. 49–8054 GV14.N4 1949

The aim of the authors is "to present an informative treatment of the place of recreation in modern society . . ." Their emphasis is on group activities. Something of a world view is presented, although basic orientation is to the United States. Chapter titles include: "Recreation Movement in the United States," "Conditioning Factors of Leisure and Recreation," "Leisure and Personality," "Preparing for Leisure," "Theories of Play and Recreation," "Recreation and Social Maladjustment," "Commercial Recreation," "Community Recreation: Public Agencies," "Community Recreation: Semipublic and Private Agencies," "Recreation Leadership," and "Methods of Recreation Research."

4999. Savage, Howard J., and others. American college athletics, by Howard J. Savage . . . and Harold W. Bentley, John T. McGovern, Dean F. Smiley, M. D., with a preface by Henry S. Pritchett . . . New York, Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, 1929. xxii, 383 p. (The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching. Bulletin no. 23) 29–23787 GV583.53 LB2334.C4, no. 23

A report on an investigation into the function of athletics in American higher education, as well as the financing of both athletics and the athletes. "The fundamental causes of the defects of American college athletics are two: commercialism," and a failure to develop the educational potentialities latent in the sports themselves. Little has changed since 1929; for instance, our athletes and student managers are still "puppets pulled by older hands."

5000. Whitten, Charles W. Interscholastics; a discussion of interscholastic contests. Chicago, Illinois High School Association, 1950. xv, 271 p. 50–14804 GV583.W5

"This book has been written to serve two purposes. It is a record of the growth and development of the Illinois High School Athletic Association and its successor, the present Illinois High School Association. It is also a record of my own convictions as to the educational philosophy underlying the interscholastic activities carried on under the aegis of the association."—Foreword.

Interscholastic athletic activities are the rule throughout the United States, but few of them have had published histories. This book may be taken as partially illustrating the systems that have been built up. The philosophy behind it is unusually conservative for a sports figure and probably comes closer to that of many humanists.

C. Particular Sports and Recreations

Ci. AUTO-RACING AND MOTORING

5001. Catlin, Russ. The life of Ted Horn, American racing champion. Los Angeles, F. Clymer, 1949. 223 p. illus.
49–50131 GV1029.H56C3

Horn was a leading automobile racer. His biography is largely a history of major racing developments from 1931 to his death in 1948.

5002. Chase, Harold B. Auto-biography; recollections of a pioneer motorist, 1896 to 1911. New York, Pageant Press, 1955. 174 p. illus.
55–11223 GV1021.C5

Reminiscences of a motoring enthusiast who started while the recreation was new and still far from standard.

5003. Clymer, Joseph Floyd. Indianapolis 500 mile race history. Los Angeles, 1946. 320 p. illus. NNC

A history of the leading automotive race in America. An annual supplement, Indianapolis Race History, has been published by Mr. Clymer since 1946. The author has written much on racing and has published many works by himself and others on this sport. A short popularized history of the race from its beginning in 1909 to 1955 is Brock W. Yates' The Indianapolis 500; the Story of the Motor Speedway (New York, Harper, 1956. 147 p.).

5004. Lozier, Herbert. Auto racing, old and new. [Greenwich, Conn., Fawcett Publications] 1953. 144 p. illus. (A Fawcett book, no. 184)
53–29624 GV1029.L6

A history of automobile racing, especially in America. The arrangement is by race, with chronological subdivision. Most attention is given to the Indianapolis races.

5005. Partridge, Bellamy. Fill 'er up; the story of fifty years of motoring. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1952. 235 p. illus.
52–10850 GV1021.P3

"Chronology of the Motor Car:" p. 219–227.

A rather loosely written chronicle of various aspects of the automobile's conquest of American life, especially in its earlier stages. Among its highlights are the first American automobile race, in Chicago on Thanksgiving day, 1895, when the winner averaged 5.05 miles per hour; the organization in New York City of the Automobile Club of America, followed by the first automobile parade ever seen in America (1899); the federating of the clubs into the American Automobile Association in 1902; and the Glidden Tours held under its auspices during each summer from 1905 to 1913.

5006. Shaw, Wilbur. Gentlemen, start your engines. New York, Coward-McCann, 1955. 320 p. illus. 55–8980 GV1029.S43

The personal narrative of an automobile racer, born in 1902, who began competing in 1921 and won the Indianapolis 500 (see no. 5003) in 1927 with his "little Jynx Special." He was still going strong in 1954, when his career was cut short by a fatal airplane crash. Another auto-racer's autobiography is Peter De Paolo's Wall Smacker; the Saga of the Speedway (Cleveland, Ohio, Thompson Products, 1935. 271 p.).

5007. Wagner, Fred J. The saga of the roaring road, by Fred J. Wagner as told to John M. Mitchell. Los Angeles, F. Clymer, 1949. 189 p. illus. 49–5081 GV1029.W25 1949

"Fred Wagner was the dean of race starters, and during his career officiated at auto races at nearly every track and course in the United States."—Foreword.

The book is more a group of reminiscences than an organized history; however, the scope of Wagner's activity makes it valuable for the early history. The book was first published in 1938. In this edition, the text is not altered, but photographic material has been added.

677676 O–63–45

Cii. BASEBALL

5008. Barrow, Edward G., and James M. Kahn. My fifty years in baseball. New York, Coward-McCann, 1951. 216 p. ports.
51–10981 GV865.B3A3

Mr. Barrow, born in 1868, entered the business side of baseball in 1894, and got his first club (Paterson, N.J.) to manage in 1896. He is proudest of having developed Hans Wagner, "the greatest ball player of all time," and of having "changed Babe Ruth from a left-handed pitcher into a full-time outfielder," with spectacular results. After two seasons with the Boston Red Sox, he became business manager of the New York Yankees in 1920, and succeeded Jacob Ruppert as their president in 1939, retiring in 1945 when the club was sold. His life story, taken down by Mr. Kahn, is objective, even-tempered, and most informative.

5009. Bartlett, Arthur C. Baseball and Mr. Spalding; the history and romance of baseball. New York, Farrar, Straus & Young, 1951. 295 p.
51–9661 GV865.S7B3

The life of Albert G. Spalding (1850–1915), a sporting goods businessman who as a baseball executive turned the game into big business.

5010. Graham, Frank. Lou Gehrig, a quiet hero. New York, Putnam, 1942. 250 p. illus.
42–8657 GV865.G4G7

A sports journalist's biographical tribute to Henry Louis Gehrig (1903–1941), one of baseball's heroes and one of the outstanding modern professional players of the game. In 1939 he retired from the game because of a fairly rare and incurable form of infantile paralysis which was causing his muscles to wither.

5011. McGillicuddy, Cornelius. My 66 years in the big leagues; the great story of America's national game, by Connie Mack (Cornelius McGillicuddy) Philadelphia, Winston, 1950. 246 p. illus. 50–7521 GV865.M27A3

Connie Mack (1862–1956) was a baseball executive who came to be known as the "grand old man" of the game. He was best known as the manager of the Philadelphia Athletics.

5012. Ruth, George H., and Robert B. Considine. The Babe Ruth story as told to Bob Considine. New York, Dutton, 1948. 250 p. illus.
48–6219 GV865.R8A3

George Herman Ruth, universally known as Babe Ruth (1894–1948), emerged from an "incorrigible" youth in Baltimore to enter professional baseball in 1913, and to become its most spectacular and popular star after joining the New York Yankees in 1920. In 1921 he made his incredible record of 177 runs in 152 games, and during his 21-year period in the American League (1914–34) he made the record slugging percentage of .692. In 1930 his salary was raised from $70,000 to $80,000 a year. A swift physical decline forced his retirement in 1935, and this honest book does not conceal the despair of the star who can play no more, or the agonies of his final illness—in the course of which he succeeded in completing this autobiography and the Hollywood film, The Babe Ruth Story, which was its counterpart.

5013. Smith, Ira L., and H. Allen Smith. Low and inside; a book of baseball anecdotes, oddities, and curiosities. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1949. 243 p. 49–8968 GV873.S58

A collection of baseball anecdotes that appeared in print prior to 1918. This book was supplemented by the authors' Three Men on Third; a Second Book of Baseball Anecdotes, Oddities, and Curiosities (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1951. 250 p.), which brought the coverage up to the time of compilation.

5014. Smith, Robert Miller. Baseball; a historical narrative of the game, the men who have played it, and its place in American life. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1947. xiv, 362 p. illus.
47–4836 GV863.S44

"BASEBALL is a private appreciation of a game I have played and watched as long as I can remember. It is an investigation of the manner in which the game began in this country, and a partial account of its place in the life of the nation for one hundred years. It is an attempt to bring to life a few of the great games and to revivify some of professional baseball's bygone heroes. It is an amateur effort to explain why baseball has meant so much to so many Americans."—Foreword.

A more recent history of professional baseball is Frederick G. Lieb's The Baseball Story (New York, Putnam, 1950. 335 p.).

5015. Spink, J. G. Taylor. Judge Landis and twenty-five years of baseball. New York, Crowell, 1947. 306 p. ports.
47–3905 GV865.L3S6

A biography of Kenesaw Mountain Landis (1866–1944), who in 1920 was appointed the first baseball commissioner (frequently called the "Baseball Czar"), in which position he regulated organized baseball and did much to establish baseball "law." He held this position until his death in 1944; in 1945 "Happy" [Albert Benjamin] Chandler was elected the second baseball commissioner.

Ciii. BOATING

5016. Barrett, J. Lee. Speed boat kings; 25 years of international speedboating. Detroit, Arnold-Powers, 1939. 143 p. illus.
40–27200 GV835.B3

Not a general history of motorboat racing in the United States, this book centers upon Gar Wood (Commodore Garfield A. Wood of Detroit), his mechanic Orlin Johnson, and the builders of his speedboats, Chris Smith and his son Jay of Algonac, Mich., and enthusiastically narrates their joint attempts to win the Harmsworth Trophy for America. Put in competition by the future Lord Northcliffe in 1903, it was first won by Wood in his Miss America I at Cowes in 1920, and successfully defended by him through 1933.

5017. Elder, George W. Forty years among the Stars. Port Washington, Wis., Schanen & Jacque, 1955. 352 p. illus. 55–57451 GV811.E4

A history of the Star (a small yacht), of the Star organization, and of Star racing.

5018. Gardiner, Frederic, M. Cruising North America. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1941. xii, 340 p. illus., maps. 41–14788 GV815.G3

This book was designed to be an introduction to the cruising areas, inland as well as coastal, of North America. It illustrates the local range of yachtsmen.

5019. Hoyt, Charles Sherman. Sherman Hoyt's memoirs. New York, Van Nostrand, 1950. xii, 348 p. illus. (A Van Nostrand sporting book)
50–10884 GV815.H6

A book of reminiscences of changes in yachting over a period of 60 years; the author is mainly concerned with sail yachts.

5020. Kelley, Robert F. American rowing; its background and traditions. New York, Putnam, 1932. xiv, 271 p. illus.
32–26690 GV796.K4

A well-organized and clearly written history of competitive rowing in America, which is now chiefly a college sport but was by no means so in its origins. Amateur racing and rowing clubs began to flourish in the 1830's; professional crews and single scullers emerged in the 1850's. Edward Hanlan (1855–1908), who was born in Toronto but dominated United States races from 1876 to 1884, is remembered as the greatest pro. Philadelphia's Schuylkill River Navy, organized in 1858, remains "the oldest governing body of sport in America." Harvard and Yale first raced in 1852, and have done so annually since 1876; multi-college regattas have been held since 1871, and the major one, the Poughkeepsie Regatta, since 1895. The colleges have kept up the old sport as mass interest has turned to speed. An appendix (p. 255–271) lists winners in various events.

5021. Klein, David, and Mary Louis Johnson. They took to the sea, including personal accounts of the voyages of Joshua Slocum, Jack London, Rockwell Kent and other small-boat voyagers. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1948. viii, 342 p. illus. 48–11442 GV811.K66

Annotated bibliography: p. [333]–339.

Crossing the open sea in a small sailing ship is, to the compilers of this volume, "a contest of wood and canvas against wind and water which presents an unchanging challenge to man's courage, skill, and ingenuity." They provide two introductory chapters as well as connective matter between their topically arranged selections. Most of the 13 authors excerpted are, like the three named in the subtitle, Americans, but they include two Frenchmen, and Englishman, and a Norwegian. The voyagers traversed the North and South Atlantic, the South Pacific, the Indian Ocean, and the Mediterranean; the earliest was Joshua Slocum, who sailed around the globe between Apr. 24, 1895, and June 27, 1898.

5022. Loomis, Alfred F. Ocean racing; the great blue-water yacht races, 1866–1935. New York, Morrow, 1936. xii, 295 p. illus.
36–14301 GV827.L6 1936

A history of open ocean yacht racing, starting with the first transatlantic race in 1866. As with most sports writing, the book is meant for aficionados of the sport, but the layman can easily sidestep much of the specialized discussion.

Civ. BOXING

5023. Dempsey, Jack. Round by round, an autobiography. Written in collaboration with Myron M. Stearns. New York, Whittlesey House, McGraw-Hill, 1940. 285 p. illus.
40–30806 GV1132.D4A3

Born in 1895 and originally named William Harrison Dempsey, the author was a popular world heavyweight champion boxer from 1919 to 1926.

5024. Durant, John, and Edward Rice. Come out fighting. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1946. 245 p. 46–25213 GV1121.D8

A pictorial history of boxing in America.

5025. Fleischer, Nathaniel S. Black dynamite, the story of the Negro in the prize ring from 1782 to 1938, by Nat Fleischer. New York, C. J. O'Brien, 1938–47. 5 v. illus. (Ring athletic library) 38–19731 GV1131.F65

A detailed history, largely in biographical form, of leading Negro boxers; according to the author, "About 60 per cent of the top flight boxers are of that race." Certainly they have played a very important role in the sport, and the sport has played a prominent role in their national life.

The first volume deals with American Negro fighters in the early years. Volume two has the individual title of "Jolting Joe," the Amazing Story of Joe Louis and His Rise to World Heavyweight Title; "Homicide Hank," the Socking Saga of Henry Armstrong. Volume three is entitled: "The Three Colored Aces": George Dixon, "Little Chocolate"; Joe Gans, "The Old Master"; Joe Walcott, "The Barbados Demon"; and Several Contemporaries. The title of the fourth volume is: "Fighting Furies," Story of the Golden Era of Jack Johnson, Sam Langford, and Their Contemporaries. The title of volume five is "Sockers in Sepia," a Continuation of the Drama of the Negro in Pugilistic Competition.

5026. Fleischer, Nathaniel S. The heavyweight championship; an informal history of heavyweight boxing from 1719 to the present day [by] Nat Fleischer. New York, Putnam, 1949. xv, 303 p. illus. 49–4955 GV1121.F6

This history of heavyweight boxing deals with the subject on an international level. However, because of the contemporary dominance of America in this field, all but the early portions are almost as though the scope had been exclusively American.

5027. Fleischer, Nathaniel S. John L. Sullivan, champion of champions, by Nat Fleischer. New York, Putnam, 1951. xiii, 242 p. illus. 51–10380 GV1132.S95F63

A biography of John Lawrence Sullivan (1858–1918), a leading American heavyweight pugilist, and one of the heroes and myths of his age. Earlier biographies include Roy F. Dibble's John L. Sullivan, an Intimate Narrative (Boston, Little, Brown, 1925. 209 p.) and Donald Barr Chidsey's John the Great, the Times and Life of a Remarkable American, John L. Sullivan (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1942. 337 p.).

5028. Graziano, Rocky. Somebody up there likes me; the story of my life until today. Written with Rowland Barber. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1955. 375 p. illus. 54–12365 GV1132.G62A3

Graziano (born in 1921 and originally named Rocco Barbella) was middleweight champion in 1947–48. This book is written in the East Side New York and general hoodlum argot in which he was raised. In addition to depicting the business of boxing, the book has interesting sidelights on a slum childhood, juvenile delinquency, and "modern" penology.

5029. Johnston, Alexander. Ten—and out! The complete story of the prize ring in America. 3d ed. rev. New York, Washburn, 1947. 401 p. illus. 47–31138 GV1125.J6 1947

A clearly planned and written narrative, for the most part, of the highlights of the heavyweight championship from the first decade of the 19th century, when Tom Molyneux, born a slave on a Virginia plantation, was known in New York City as Champion of America. Chapters 18–23 cover "The Lighter Divisions," from middleweights to flyweights. First published in 1927, the book was twice brought up to date by means of additional chapters.

5030. Louis, Joe. The Joe Louis story. [Written with the editorial aid of Chester L. Washington and Haskell Cohen] New York, Grosset & Dunlap, 1953. 197 p. illus. 53–11991 GV1132.L6A3 1953

First edition published in 1947 under title: My life story.

Joseph Louis Barrow was born into a poor Negro farm family in Alabama in 1914. He rose to become world heavyweight champion and held the title from 1937 to 1949.

5031. Tunney, Gene. A man must fight. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1932. 288 p. illus. 32–29070 GV1132.T8A3

Autobiography of a champion heavyweight boxer who in 1928 retired undefeated. A second autobiographical work by Tunney (b. 1898) is Arms for Living (New York, Funk, 1941. 279 p.). A biography of him is Nat Fleischer's Gene Tunney, the Enigma of the Ring ([New York, Hubner] 1931. 127 p.).

5032. Van Every, Edward. Muldoon, the solid man of sport; his amazing story as related for the first time by him to his friend, Edward Van Every. New York, Stokes, 1929. xiv, 364 p. illus. 29–19300 GV1132.M85V3

William Muldoon (1845–1933) became famous as a trainer of boxers, and came to be known as "the father of American boxing."

5033. Williams, Joseph P. TV Boxing book. New York, Van Nostrand, 1954. 186 p. illus. 54–11831 GV1133.W5

A "nationally known sports columnist" (who shares the profession's distaste for straightforward exposition in plain language) analyzes the depressing financial effect which, strangely enough, the transfer from ringside to fireside audiences has had on the boxing business, and goes on to expound the fine points of the sport, including its refereeing and judging, for members of "the Living Room Athletic Club."

Cv. FOOTBALL

5034. Buchanan, Lamont. The story of football in text and pictures. New York, Vanguard Press, 1952. 256 p. 52–13438 GV940.B8 1952

Pictures of college (none of professional) football each with accompanying text, from the late 19th century through the season of 1951. There are some wood engravings from the illustrated weeklies, and some very spirited drawings by Frederick Remington (p. 35–36), but mostly photographs, in a dull sort of reproduction, of stars, coaches, and actual plays. The latter demonstrate, at any rate, the progress of photography: the earlier ones are almost invariably blurred, but the modern fast shutter makes nearly all the more recent ones crisp and clear.

5035. Cohane, Tim. The Yale football story. New York, Putnam, 1951. 369 p. illus. 51–13447 GV958.Y3C6

Since, unlike baseball, football in America is largely a collegiate sport, this history of football at one of the oldest Eastern universities represents the dominant tradition of the game. In Gridiron Grenadiers (New York, Putnam, 1948. 320 p.) Cohane presented a similar history of football at West Point.

5036. Danzig, Allison. The history of American football: its great teams, players, and coaches. Englewood Cliffs, N. J., Prentice-Hall, 1956. 525 p. 56–9844 GV938.D35

The story of the evolution of the game of football in America. Much of the material was gathered in the course of the author's more than a quarter of a century reporting football for The New York Times.

5037. Grange, Harold E. The Red Grange story, the autobiography of Red Grange, as told to Ira Morton. New York, Putnam, 1953. 180 p. illus. [Putnams sports series] 53–8161 GV939.G7A3

Red Grange (b. 1903), the son of a Pennsylvania lumberjack, carried ice and played high school football at Wheaton, Ill., and became the "Galloping Ghost" of the University of Illinois team during 1923–25, when he once made four long touchdown runs in 12 minutes. On graduating, he at once entered professional football, which enjoyed small repute in 1925 but has improved since, and was for another decade the mainstay of the Chicago Bears. He did not coach for long, but has since had great success as a radio and TV sportscaster. His old coach, Robert C. Zuppke of Illinois, calls him "the greatest name in football" and "nearer to being the perfect football player than anyone I have ever known."

5038. Heffelfinger, W. W. This was football, by W. W. "Pudge" Heffelfinger, as told to John McCallum. New York, Barnes, 1954. 192 p. illus. 54–11793 GV939.H37A3

Pudge Heffelfinger was one of the earliest, and is still considered by many to be one of the greatest, of football athletes. Active in the game over a period of 50 years, he know many of the personalities in the sport, and this book is in large part anecdotal reminiscences about others.

5039. Luckman, Sid. Luckman at quarterback; football as a sport and a career. Chicago, Ziff-Davis, 1949. xxi, 233 p. illus. 49–10297 GV939.L82

The autobiography (actually told to Norman Reissman of Chicago, who reads like a sports journalist) of the son of a Jewish immigrant from Germany. Mr. Luckman began playing football at Erasmus Hall High School in Brooklyn, starred for Columbia (class of 1939), and in the next 10 seasons gained 14,303 yards passing for a professional team, the Chicago Bears.

5040. Roberts, Howard. The Big Nine; the story of football in the Western Conference. New York, Putnam, 1948. 259 p. illus. 48–8953 GV951.R53

A history of football in a Midwestern league which is one of the outstanding collegiate football associations in America. Roberts is also the author of The Chicago Bears (New York, Putnam, 1947. 248 p.), the story of a professional football team.

5041. Rockne, Knute K. The autobiography of Knute K. Rockne, edited, with prefatory note, by Bonnie Skiles Rockne (Mrs. Knute K. Rockne) and with introd. and postscript by Father John Cavanaugh, C. S. C. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1931. 296 p. illus. 31–30240 GV939.R6A3

Knute Rockne (1888–1931) was Notre Dame's football coach; in this capacity he brought fame to the university and to himself. Considered by many to be the greatest of football coaches, he has probably had more books written about him than any other football personality. These include Huber William Hurt's memorial Goals, the Life of Knute Rockne (New York, Murray Book Corp., 1931. 271 p.), which is extensively illustrated, and Eugene [Scrapiron] Young's With Rockne at Notre Dame (New York, Putnam, 1951. 312 p.), a somewhat autobiographical work that tends toward being a biography of Rockne.

5042. Samuelsen, Rube. The Rose Bowl game. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1951. 299 p. illus. 51–12108 GV957.R6S3

Pasadena, California, has held its Tournament of Roses each New Year's Day since 1890, and ever since 1916, when Brown met Washington State, its principal feature and financial prop has been a football game between the best-scoring Pacific Coast college team and a successful and prestigious team selected from elsewhere in the country. Mr. Samuelsen describes the first 36 games in great and anecdotal detail, and gives a statistical summary of each in an appendix (p. 265–299).

5043. Stagg, Amos Alonzo. Touchdown! As told by Coach Amos Alonzo Stagg to Wesley Winans Stout. New York, Longmans, Green, 1927. 352 p. illus. 27–19751 GV951.S8

Coach Stagg (b. 1862), the most durable man in the whole history of sport, played baseball and football for Yale in the '80's, and began his service as director of physical education and football coach at the new-fledged University of Chicago in 1892, the year before the World's Fair. When he dictated this autobiography he had long been known as "the Old Man," but had six more years of service before retiring in 1933 with a total of 41 years. He at once began coaching for the College of the Pacific, and took on his latest assignment, with Stockton College, in his tenth decade! His book tells much about the early days of college football, including the "dirty work" that marred it, and about the shoestring beginnings of athletics at Mr. Rockefeller's university.

5044. Wallace, Francis. The Notre Dame story. New York, Rinehart, 1949. 275 p. 49–10793 LD4113.W3

Notre Dame is an Indiana Catholic university that was made famous by its football team. This book tells the story of the school through the development of the story of its football and the life of Knute Rockne (q. v.), its great football coach. Wallace is a sportswriter who specializes in football and Notre Dame. In Dementia Pigskin (New York, Rinehart, 1951. 252 p.) he presented a general, non-sequential, and frequently humorous view of the world of the football fan.

5045. Ward, Archie. The Green Bay Packers, the story of professional football [by] Arch Ward. New York, Putnam, 1946. 240 p. illus. 47–751 GV956.G7W3

An enthusiast's history of a professional football team; the book also reflects much of the general history of professional football in America.

Cvi. GOLF AND TENNIS

5046. Danzig, Allison. The racquet game. New York, Macmillan, 1930. 283 p. illus. 30–4629 GV1003.D3

A study of court tennis, rackets, squash rackets and squash tennis. The subjects are approached through a presentation of their origin, history in America, personalities of the games, and the method of play.

5047. Jacobs, Helen Hull. Beyond the game, an autobiography. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1936. 274 p. illus. 36–14873 GV994.J3A3

Jacobs (b. 1908) was a leading tennis player who between 1923 and 1931 was seven times the U. S. woman champion.

5048. Keeler, Oscar B. The Bobby Jones story, from the writings of O. B. Keeler, by Grantland Rice. Atlanta, Tupper & Love, 1953. 304 p. illus. 53–13159 GV964.J6K4

Jones, one of the greatest of golf players, retired from the game in 1948. This biography is made up from articles written by Keeler, a sportswriter and golf enthusiast who knew Jones throughout almost all of his career. Keeler died in 1950.

5049. Marble, Alice. The road to Wimbledon. New York, Scribner, 1946. 167 p. illus. 46–5902 GV994.M3A3

Autobiography of a Californian who became woman tennis champion four times between 1936 and 1940.

5050. Riggs, Robert L. Tennis is my racket, by Bobby Riggs. [New York] Simon & Schuster, 1949. xxii, 245 p. illus. 49–8951 GV994.R54A3

Riggs (b. 1918) has won a number of tennis championships. His autobiography presents not only his own career in the sport, but presents at some length sketches of prominent tennis players he has known.

5051. Sarazen, Gene. Thirty years of championship golf; the life and times of Gene Sarazen, by Gene Sarazen with Herbert Warren Wind. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1950. xi, 276 p. illus.
50–7427 GV964.S3A3

The life story of a professional golfer who won the National Open in 1922 and 1932, among other awards. His original last name was Saracini (b. 1901).

5052. Tilden, William T. My story, a champion's memoirs. New York, Hellman, Williams, 1948. 335 p. illus. 48–3054 GV994.T5A33

Tilden (1893–1953) has generally been adjudged the best tennis player of the first half of the 20th century. In his long amateur career he won many national and international awards. In 1931 he became a professional, and subsequently won a number of professional awards. An earlier version of his autobiography was Aces, Places and Faults (London, Hale, 1938. 304 p.).

5053. Wind, Herbert W. The story of American golf, its champions and its championships. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1956. 564 p. illus.
56–13439 GV981.W5 1956

A revised edition of a history of American golf which first appeared in 1948. It has the game starting in this country in 1888; the emphasis is on championship golf, amateur and professional. An earlier book which also starts from 1888 is Harry B. Martin's Fifty Years of American Golf (New York, Dodd, Mead, 1936. 423 p.).

Cvii. HORSE-RACING

5054. Akers, Dwight. Drivers up; the story of American harness racing. [2d ed.] New York, Putnam, 1947. xv, 392 p. illus.
Agr 47–373 SF339.A5 1947

Harness racing is a special type wherein the horse trots as fast as he can but must not break into a run; nowadays he draws a sulky and driver, but in the early days he might bear saddle and jockey. Mr. Akers, whose history was first published in 1938, reminds us that, before the motor age, trotting races were not confined to special tracks, but were everyday events on city avenues and country roads. The prehistoric age of American harness racing ended with the formation of the New York Trotting Club in 1825; a highlight of the '60's was the long rivalry in trotters between Commodore Vanderbilt (no. 5935) and Robert Bonner of the New York Ledger. Harness racing survives to lend variety to present-day racing; its recent status is surveyed in Frank A. Wrensch's Harness Horse Racing in the United States and Canada (New York, Van Nostrand, 1951. 219 p.).

5055. Hervey, John. Racing in America: 1665–1865 . . . written for the Jockey Club. New York, Priv. print., The Jockey Club, 1944. 2 v. illus. 44–6592 SF347.H4

A large, detailed, de luxe history of the early days of horse-racing in America. The work is supplemented by Walter S. Vosburgh's Racing in America, 1866–1921 (New York, The Jockey Club, 1922. 249 p.) and John Hervey's Racing in America: 1922–1936 (New York, The Jockey Club, 1937. 293 p.).

5056. Parmer, Charles B. For gold and glory; the story of thoroughbred racing in America. New York, Carrick & Evans, 1939. 352 p. illus., tables. 39–30807 SF347.P3

The story of how 20th-century horse-racing in America developed out of early beginnings in England and then Virginia.

5057. Winn, Matt J. Down the stretch; the story of Colonel Matt J. Winn, as told to Frank G. Menke. New York, Smith & Durrell, 1944. xvi, 292 p. illus. 45–1614 SF336.W5A3

The autobiography of a leading horse-racing personality. A brief history of the Kentucky Derby, with which he has most prominently been associated, is included.

Cviii. MISCELLANEOUS

5058. Bent, Newell. American polo. New York, Macmillan, 1929. xxix, 407 p. illus.
29–16932 GV1011.B4

Polo originated in medieval Persia, and was introduced into America, via British India and England, by the younger James Gordon Bennett in 1876. The leading club, the Meadow Brook Club of Nassau County, Long Island, was incorporated in 1881 by August Belmont, Jr., and others. Although it penetrated the U.S. Army, and international matches with England have been played since 1886, it has remained a preserve of "Society" and of wealth, with a very limited popular following. Mr. Bent also tells how polo ponies are bred, gives hints for beginners, and calls the roll of leading American performers.

5059. Best, Katharine, and Katharine Hillyer. Las Vegas, playtown U. S. A. New York, McKay, 1955. 178 p. 56–1202 F849.L35B4

A study of Las Vegas, Nevada, the flashy gambling center of America. Since this "recreation" is legal in Nevada, the state has become a focal point for many gambling activities which are prohibited in other states of the Union.

5060. Fleischer, Nathaniel S. From Milo to Londos; the story of wrestling through the ages, by Nat Fleischer. New York, C. J. O'Brien, 1936. 330 p. illus. (The Ring athletic library, book no. 13) 37–910 GV1195.F5

The author gets from Milo of Croton to George Washington in one chapter, and a second takes him to William Muldoon (1845–1933), "the Solid Man" (as Ned Harrigan dubbed him in a popular song) and likewise "the Father of American Wrestling." Thereafter we proceed match by match and play by play ("every time Gotch tried to turn he was brought back by the crotch") to Frank Gotch, to Frank Hackenschmidt, to Strangler Lewis (who perfected the head lock), to Stanislaus Zbyszko, to Jim Londos, and then to chaos. There is a wealth of terrifying illustrations.

5061. Griffin, Marcus. Fall guys, the Barnums of bounce; the inside story of the wrestling business, America's most profitable and best organized professional sport. Chicago, Reilly & Lee, 1937. 215 p. 37–5807 GV1195.G75

A journalistic narrative of wrestling, "America's most popular and best organized sport," from the days of "the peerless champion," Frank Gotch, who won the title in 1904 and retired undefeated in 1912, to the accession of Dean Dutton to a disputed championship in 1936. The author notes the scandals which increasingly cast shadows over the game and points out that, while wrestlers are very well paid ("raw-boned country bumpkins who are possessed of incomes of from twenty-five to thirty thousand dollars yearly [1937]"), they run great risks and usually leave the ring with severe physical disabilities. The book of course does not reach the latter days of wrestling buffoonery on TV.

5062. Jay, John C. Skiing the Americas; with photographs by the author. New York, Macmillan, 1947. 257 p. illus. 48–5053 GV854.J35

Mr. Jay, skier, ski expert, ski cinematographer, ski lecturer, and ski enthusiast, answers the questions which his audiences had been putting to him for ten years past in this very informal but pleasant book, which describes the ski resorts of the East, the Midwest, the Rocky Mountain West, and the Pacific Northwest, and points out the skiing available during the several seasons of the year. The author credits the beginning of organized skiing in America to a Dartmouth undergraduate, Fred Harris, who founded the Dartmouth Outing Club in 1910; but it was not until the Olympic Winter Games of 1932 at Lake Placid that the sport began to snowball here. An attractive chapter describes Mr. Jay's "dream trip" as escort for the Chilean Ski Team, visiting in two months every big ski resort in the United States.

5063. Lester, John A., ed. A century of Philadelphia cricket. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1951. 397 p. illus. 51–12299 GV913.L4

Cricket was once a fairly popular game in some parts of America, but has gone into a period of decline. This book traces its rise and subsequent decline in a leading city where it has now ceased to be an important social force.

5064. Longstreth, Thomas Morris. The Catskills. New York, Century, 1918. 321 p. illus., map. 18–19146 F127.C3L8

T. Morris Longstreth in this record of a hiking and camping trip through the Catskills provides an example of a common American pastime (hiking and studying nature—in the backyard by the hour, or in the country by the day and week) and at the same time gives a good view of life in these mountains. A similar book is his The Adirondacks (New York, Century, 1917. 370 p.).

D. General Field Sports

5065. Brown, J. Hammond, ed. Outdoors unlimited; a collection of stories and articles which reflect the current American scene of the recreational outdoors. Sponsored by the Outdoor Writers Association of America. New York, Barnes, 1947. xiv, 343 p. Agr 47–272 SK33.B85

The emphasis in this book is on the various aspects of hunting and fishing in present-day America. There are, however, a few stories which reflect the "recreational outdoors" as a communing with nature for its own sake.

5066. Buckingham, Nash. De shootinest gent'man, and other tales. New York, Putnam [°1934, 1943] 222 p. illus. 43–4482 SK33.B89 1943

Buckingham (b. 1880) is one of the foremost American authors in the field of hunting and fishing literature. A number of his works were first published during the 1930's in de luxe, limited editions; trade editions of these appeared in the 1940's. His writings take the form of sketches, short stories, essays, and reminiscences, but they are regularly based on personal experiences. The setting is often Southern, and the period covered ranges as far back as the late 19th century. Some of his earlier books are probably among his best known. Later books include Ole Miss' (New York, Putnam, 1946. 178 p.), Blood Lines (New York, Putnam, 1947. 192 p.), and Hallowed Years (Harrisburg, Pa., Stackpole, 1953. 209 p.). Much of his work first appeared in field sports periodicals.

5067. Buckingham, Nash. Mark right! Tales of shooting and fishing. New York, Putnam [c1936, 1944] 196 p. illus.
44–3008 SK33.B885 1944

5068. Buckingham, Nash. Tattered coat. New York, Putnam, 1944. xiv, 210 p. illus.
45–248 SK33.B893

5069. Buckingham, Nash. Game bag; tales of shooting and fishing. New York, Putnam, 1945. xv, 185 p. illus.
Agr 46–152 SK33.B883 1945

5070. Cook, Beatrice G. Till fish us do part; the confessions of a fisherman's wife. New York, Morrow, 1949. 249 p.
Agr 49–412 SH441.C598 1949

The wife of a doctor-fisherman reports experiences while fishing in coastal and inland waters of Washington state. Her approach is humorous and personal; but she does manage to convey not only an impression of fishing as a recreation, but also of life in an American family. A later book of the same type by her is More Fish to Fry (New York, Morrow, 1951. 280 p.).

5071. Field and stream. Field & stream treasury; memorable articles and stories selected from the pages of America's number one sportsman's magazine. Edited by Hugh Grey and Ross McCluskey. Illustrated with original photographs, drawings, advertisements, and covers from the sixty-year file of the magazine. New York, Holt, 1955. 351 p. 55–10675 SK33.F383

A selection of material from a magazine whose history goes back to 1895. The work is meant to constitute "a sort of informal running history of hunting and fishing over the last 75 or 100 years." An earlier anthology from this periodical is The Field and Stream Game Bag (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1948. 306 p.), edited by Robeson Bailey.

5072. Goodspeed, Charles Eliot. Angling in America; its early history and literature. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1939. xiii, 380 p. illus.
39–20033 SH463.G6

A well written and scholarly history of early American fishing, starting with the fishing practices of the Indians. A bibliographical checklist of American fishing publications to 1900 is included.

5073. Grey, Zane. Tales of swordfish and tuna. New York, Harper, 1927. 203 p. illus.
27–20012 SH691.S8G7

Zane Grey was a most successful author of Western romances; this aspect of his writing is discussed in the Literature section (q. v.) of this bibliography. In later life he wrote a number of autobiographical works on his outdoor activities. Tales of Lonely Trails (New York, Harper, 1922. 394 p.) was largely an account of hunting, camping activities in Arizona. His books on fishing include Tales of Fishes (New York, Harper, 1919. 266 p.), Tales of Fishing Virgin Seas (New York, Harper, 1925. 216 p.), and Tales of Southern Rivers (New York, Harper, 1924. 249 p.). Most of these books were heavily illustrated with photographs taken by the author. An anthology selected from his fishing writings is Zane Grey's Adventures in Fishing (New York, Harper, 1952. 263 p.).

5074. Grey, Zane. Tales of fresh-water fishing. New York, Harper, 1928. 227 p. illus.
28–20833 SH441.G6

5075. Heilner, Van Campen. Salt water fishing. 2d ed., rev. New York, Knopf, 1953. xviii, 330, xxiv p. illus. (Borzoi books for sportsmen)
51–11997 SH457.H43 1953

Bibliography: p. 329–330.

An earlier book of fishing experiences by Heilner is Adventures in Angling; a Book of Salt Water Fishing (Cincinnati, Kidd, 1922. 233 p.).

5076. Herbert, Henry William. Frank Forester's Fish and fishing of the United States and British provinces of North America. Illustrated from nature, by Henry William Herbert. New ed., rev. and corr. with an ample supplement by the author, together with a treatise on Fly-fishing, by "Dinks" [pseud.] New York, Woodward, 1859. xxiv, [17]–512 p. 17–20300 SH441.H53 1859

First published, for copyright advantage, in London in 1849; the first American edition appeared in 1850.

Herbert (1807–1858) came to New York from England in 1831. In this country he embarked on a career as educator, editor, journalist, novelist, artist, historian, poet, translator, and naturalist. Of his "literary" accomplishments he was proud; but his less favored sports writing he published under the pseudonym of "Frank Forester." Today he is remembered almost exclusively for these works, which, in their own category, have become classics. He has been called the Shakespeare of sports writing for his nostalgic picture of field sports (especially hunting) in his day, and for his sports novels, which also present a vivid picture of hunting as a recreation in the middle of the 19th century. The Warwick Woodlands, or, Things as They Were There, Ten Years Ago (Philadelphia, Zieber, 1845. 168 p.) is his masterpiece and the work which has been most reprinted in the ensuing years; a recent edition is cited below. A complete Life and Writings of Frank Forester (New York, Orange Judd, 1882) was undertaken, but was never carried beyond the second volume.

5077. Herbert, Henry William. Frank Forester's [pseud.] fugitive sporting sketches; being the miscellaneous articles upon sport and sporting, originally published in the early American magazines and periodicals. Edited with a memoir of Herbert, and numerous explanatory notes, by Will Wildwood [pseud. of Frederick E. Pond] Westfield, Wis., 1879. 147 p. 12–22887 SK33.H54

Herbert's early book on hunting and the game birds of North America was American Game in Its Seasons, rev. ed. (New York, Woodward, 1873. 343 p.)., which was first published in 1853.

5078. Herbert, Henry William. Frank Forester's horse and horsemanship of the United States and British provinces of North America. Rev., corr., enl., and continued to 1871, by S. D. & B. G. Bruce. New York, Woodward, 1871. 2 v. illus. 12–15989 SF283.H54

Added title-pages, engraved: The horse of America . . .

This work was first published in two volumes in 1857 by Stringer and Townsend in New York.

5079. Herbert, Henry William. Frank Forester [pseud.] on upland shooting; edited, and with supplementary chapters, by A[rthur] R. Beverley-Giddings. New York, Morrow, 1951. 276 p. illus. 51–7267 SK324.U6H4

A selection of chapters from The Complete Manual for Young Sportsmen . . . (New York, Stringer & Townsend, 1856. 480 p.) and Frank Forester's Field Sports of the United States and British Provinces of North America, 8th ed. [rev.] (New York, Townsend, 1858. 2 v.), which was first published in Great Britain in 1848 and in the United States in 1849.

5080. Herbert, Henry William. [The sporting novels of Frank Forester [pseud.] The Hitchcock ed.] New York, Derrydale Press, 1930. 4 v. CtY

A modern, fine press reprint edition of 750 copies. This corresponds to the earlier, typographically and editorially poorer, "omnibus" edition of the same works in Frank Forester's Sporting Scenes and Characters (Philadelphia, Peterson, 1881. 2 v.).

CONTENTS.—v. 1. The Warwick Woodlands (1845).—v. 2. My Shooting Box (1843).—v. 3. The Quorndon Hounds (1852).—v. 4. The Deerstalkers (1843). Henry William Herbert, Frank Forester, by Harry Worcester Smith.

5081. Holder, Charles Frederick. Big game at sea. New York, Outing Pub. Co., 1908. xv, 352 p. illus. 8–9755 SH441.H73

The author discusses deep sea fishing, the game fish, and his personal experiences. The chapters originally appeared as articles in various periodicals.

5082. Holder, Charles Frederick. Life in the open; sport with rod, gun, horse, and hound in southern California. New York, Putnam, 1906. xv, 401 p. illus., 66 plates. 6–12862 SK55.H72

An account of some of the author's hunting and fishing experiences.

5083. Holder, Charles Frederick. The log of a sea angler; sport and adventures in many seas with spear and rod. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1906. 385 p. 6–8761 SH441.H75

Considered by some to be one of the truly outstanding books in the literature of angling. The first 12 chapters are drawn from the author's "experiences during a continuous residence of five or six years, winter and summer, on the extreme southwestern portion of the Florida reef, where Loggerhead looks into the west." Later chapters describe fishing among the islands "strung along the coast of Southern California, a chalice of emeralds in settings of silver," off Cape Cod, and for tarpon near the mouth of the Rio Grande.

5084. Holder, Charles Frederick. Recreations of a sportsman on the Pacific coast. New York, Putnam, 1910. 399 p. illus. 10–11406 SH473.H75

The author recounts deep-sea and inland fishing experiences.

5085. Lytle, John Horace. "Point!" [by] Horace Lytle. Harrisburg, Pa., Stackpole, 1954. 232 p. illus. 54–12762 SK17.L9A3

An autobiographical work by an Ohio hunter and hunting-dog fancier; the book is largely an account of his experiences with his dogs.

5086. Prime, William C. I go a-fishing, by W. C. Prime. New York, Harper, 1873. 365 p. 12–21568 SH441.P95 1873

Prime (1825–1905) was a meditative New York lawyer and scholar who loved to wander among northeastern hills while fishing or hunting, or just walking. His books include Along New England Roads (New York, Harper, 1892. 200 p.) and Among the Northern Hills (New York, Harper, 1895. 209 p.).

5087. Rutledge, Archibald H. Wild life of the South. New York, Frederick A. Stokes, 1935. 253 p. illus. 35–17191 QH81.R9783

Archibald Rutledge (b. 1883) comes from a low country area, formerly a rice plantation, in South Carolina; this he usually uses as a setting for his writings. Some of his best work is that of a nature lover and hunter describing his hunting experiences and the woods and swamplands, with much attention given to the animals inhabiting them; these books include Plantation Game Trails (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1921. 300 p.), Days Off in Dixie (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1924. 298 p.), and Children of Swamp and Wood (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1927. 280 p.). Further aspects of life on his plantation are treated in the short stories of Old Plantation Days (New York, Stokes, 1921. 344 p.) and the somewhat sentimental Peace in the Heart (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1930. 316 p.). Home by the River (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1941. 167 p.) records Rutledge's experiences and observations at, as well as some of the historical background of, the family plantation at Hampton, S. C. Rutledge has also written much conservative poetry, a recent volume of selections being Brimming Tide, and Other Poems ([Westwood, N. J.] Revell, 1954. 160 p.).

5088. Rutledge, Archibald H. An American hunter. New York, Stokes, 1937. 461 p. illus. 37–33916 SK33.R77

5089. Rutledge, Archibald H. Hunter's choice. New York, Barnes, 1946. 210 p. illus. Agr 47–163 SK33.R78 1946

5090. Rutledge, Archibald H. Those were the days. Richmond, Dietz Press, 1955. 462 p. 56–707 SK33.R85

An autobiographical book emphasizing the author's hunting and fishing experiences early in the 20th century.

5091. Sandys, Edwyn. Sporting Sketches. New York, Macmillan, 1905. 389 p. illus. 5–29978 SK31.S3

Sketches of hunting and fishing at the turn of the century; many of the articles first appeared in Outing. Another book by Sandys recording much personal experience is Upland Game Birds (New York, Macmillan, 1902. 429 p.); to this T. S. Van Dyke (q. v.) contributed a short concluding section on "The Quail and the Grouse of the Pacific Coast."

5092. Schaldach, William J. Coverts and casts; field sports and angling in words and pictures. New York, Barnes, 1943. 138 p. illus. 43–18352 SK33.S35

5093. Schaldach, William J. Currents & eddies; chips from the log of an artist-angler. New York, Barnes, 1944. 138 p. illus. Agr 45–101 SH441.S35

Both books are mainly a presentation of autobiographical anecdotes about the pleasures of fishing. Schaldach, long associated with Field and Stream, was both an artist and a writer, as well as an outdoors sportsman. His work dealt with the hunting and fishing that fascinated him.

5094. Smith, Onnie Warren. Musings of an angler, by O. Warren Smith. New York, Barnes, 1942. xv, 187 p. illus. 42–10914 SH441.S65

Smith (1872–1941) was fishing editor of Outdoors. A conscious follower of Walton and Prime, he did not "merely fish for fish"; his writings were an attempt to present the "aesthetic" rather than the scientific and technical aspects of fishing.

5095. Van Dyke, Henry. Little rivers. A book of essays in profitable idleness. New York, Scribner, 1895. 291 p. illus. 14–1080 PS3117.L5 1895

5096. Van Dyke, Henry. Fisherman's luck and some other uncertain things. New York, Scribner, 1899. 247 p. illus. 99–5146 PS3117.F5 1899

Van Dyke was a clergyman, and later a professor at Princeton University. His many books, which were popular in his own day, included Victorian verse and criticism, travel books, and volumes of essays, such as Days Off, and Other Digressions (New York, Scribner, 1907. 322 p.). Because of his interest in Europe and his wide travels, his books are seldom exclusively American in subject matter; but they do reflect the relative commonplace of the much-traveled American of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. The first book entered above views rivers mainly as places for fishing.

5097. Wylie, Philip. Denizens of the deep; true tales of deep-sea fishing. New York, Rinehart, 1953. 222 p. 53–9238 SH457.W88

Stories of deep-sea fishing and fish by a forceful author who has devoted much of his time to the sport of fishing. He is widely known for his popular novels which are discussed in the Literature section of this bibliography.

XXI

Education

A.	General Works
	Ai. Historical and Descriptive	5098–5114
	Aii. Philosophical and Theoretical	5115–5130
B.	Primary and Secondary Schools
	Bi. General and Historical Works	5131–5146
	Bii. Preschool and Primary Grades	5147–5151
	Biii. Secondary Schools	5152–5159
C.	Colleges and Universities
	Ci. General and Historical Works	5160–5190
	Cii. Individual Institutions	5191–5204
D.	Education of Special Groups	5205–5212
E.	Teachers and Teaching	5213–5223
F.	Methods and Techniques	5224–5231
G.	Contemporary Problems and Controversies	5232–5239
H.	Periodicals and Yearbooks	5240–5249

IT HAS been said truly that education is an essential part of the lifeblood of a democracy. Without its benefits citizens cannot participate usefully in the duties and responsibilities that devolve upon them under this form of government; nor can competent leaders of the people be developed without the wisdom and understanding that characterize the properly informed and educated mind. Throughout the course of the country's history the American people have proved their acceptance of such ideas by developing various types of schools, colleges, and universities, as the need for them has been understood.

One result of this continuing national interest in education is an enormous body of literature that has been produced at an increasing rate, with the passage of the years and the growth of the population to be educated. Such a mass of material on the subject poses a difficult problem of selection within the proper compass of a guide. The aim, therefore, in assembling the references that follow has been necessarily only to illustrate typical categories under which the subject may be studied and to provide general orientation rather than inclusive treatment of any topic.

To the student of American civilization who is interested in education only as a facet of the whole culture, Section A is particularly addressed. It should be noted here that a number of titles included in Section Aii, such as nos. 5116 and 5121, are actually histories of educational philosophy or educational theory, and therefore might, with equal justification, have been placed in Section Ai. Sections B and C are designed to serve as an introduction to the principal types of educational institutions developed in the United States, while Section D indicates selected cases in which specialized education is provided either within or without the bounds of the more traditional institutions. The opportunities and experiences of the teacher in American society are briefly touched upon in Section E.

A population growing as rapidly as that of the United States, and also one increasingly aware of the many benefits of education, has contributed to greatly increased enrollments in and demands upon all types of educational institutions. Overcrowding, inadequate financial resources, and the requirements of students drawn from groups lacking homogeneous experience and training are among the unfortunate effects of this otherwise desirable influx. In order to meet resulting problems, traditional theories and practices have been reviewed, and, in many cases, principally on the elementary and secondary school levels, revolutionary innovations in methods and techniques have been introduced. An unusual number of textbooks in which these newer concepts are embodied are therefore included in this list, to serve as primary sources for the study of controversial as well as traditional ideas presently at work. Sections F and G focus attention upon these aspects of the contemporary American scene. Section H provides a brief list of periodicals and yearbooks which may be used for keeping abreast of American education as it develops currently and in the future.

Throughout the list entries have been annotated to indicate additional sources of bibliographical guidance contained within individual volumes. It is hoped that in this way the serious student may be aided in extending his exploration of the relation of education to the development of American civilization.

A. General Works

Ai. HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE

5098. Alexander, Carter, and Arvid J. Burke. How to locate educational information and data; an aid to quick utilization of the literature of education. 3d ed., rev. and enl. New York, Bureau of Publications, Teachers College, Columbia University, 1950. xix, 441 p.
50–7005 Z711.A37 1950

Includes bibliographies.

Manual, which may also be used as a textbook, designed for students desiring to explore the literature of education through the use of library collections and reference books.

5099. Allen, Hollis P. The Federal Government and education. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1950. xvii, 333 p. (McGraw-Hill series in education) 50–6536 LC89.A6

The original and complete study of education in the United States, on all levels from primary to graduate, made by the task force on public welfare for the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, popularly known as the Hoover Commission, the object being to determine the proper role of government in education. Dawson W. Hales' Federal Control of Public Education (New York, Bureau of Publications, Teachers College, Columbia University, 1954. 144 p.) reconsiders the principle of local control of public education in the light of forces now at work in contemporary American life and culture.

5100. American Council of Learned Societies. Liberal education reexamined; its role in a democracy. New York, Harper, 1943. xiv, 134 p.
43–51269 LC189.A512

A preliminary draft was issued in 1940 under title: Liberal Education and Democracy.

Bibliography: p. 121–134.

Report of a committee appointed in 1940 by the American Council of Learned Societies to investigate recent educational trends in the humanities and to consider the causes responsible for them on all levels of school and university; prepared under the direction of the chairman, Theodore M. Greene, professor of philosophy, at Princeton and later at Yale University. Liberal Education Reconsidered (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. 46 p.) is Professor Greene's Inglis Lecture at Harvard (1952) on desirable goals for liberal education and methods of achieving them.

5101. Burns, James A. The Catholic school system in the United States; its principles, origin, and establishment. New York, Benziger, 1908. 415 p. 8–18343 LC501.B7

Bibliography: p. [387]–399.

Covers the history of the Catholic school and college movement from its beginning in colonial times through the year 1840; addressed to all students of education, whether Catholic or non-Catholic.

5102. Burns, James A. The growth and development of the Catholic school system in the United States. New York, Benziger, 1912. 421 p.
12–22334 LC501.B72

Bibliography: p. 382–390.

Continuation of the author's earlier work, with emphasis on improvement and development; written by a former president of the theological school of the Congregation of the Holy Cross, Holy Cross College, Washington, D. C.

5103. Butts, R. Freeman. The American tradition in religion and education. Boston, Beacon Press, 1950. xiv, 230 p. (Beacon Press studies in freedom and power) 50–7586 BR516.B85

Bibliographical references to books and documents included in "Notes": p. 213–224.

Supplies a historical perspective on the struggle for the separation of church and state in America. Fundamental principles of secular education are also reviewed and appraised in Vivian T. Thayer's The Attack Upon the American Secular School (Boston, Beacon Press, 1951. 257 p.). Church, State, and Freedom, by Leo Pfeffer (Boston, Beacon Press, 1953. 675 p.), examines the implications and consequences of religious freedom for which the Constitution of the United States provides, giving much attention to the impact of the doctrine on American education. An encyclopedic work on all aspects of the relation of church and state in America, including educational aspects of the problems involved, is provided in Anson Phelps Stokes' Church and State in the United States (q. v.).

5104. Butts, R. Freeman, and Lawrence A. Cremin. A history of education in American culture. New York, Holt, 1953. 628 p. 52–13892 LA205.B88

Deals with the interrelation of American culture, intellectual development, and education during four periods: Colonial, pre-Civil War, post-Civil War, and post-World War I; suggests applications to be made to contemporary educational problems; and documents each chapter by means of bibliographical references at the end. The authors are members of the faculty of Teachers College, Columbia University.

Harold O. Rugg's Foundations for American Education (Yonkers-on-Hudson, N. Y., World Book Co., 1947. 826 p.) is a strongly individual and personal book that ranges freely over American life, culture, psychological theories, and modern educational movements, progressive as well as traditional.

5105. Douglass, Aubrey A. The American school system. Rev. ed. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1940. xviii, 745 p. (Farrar & Rinehart series in education) 40–12406 LA210.D6 1940

Bibliography at end of each chapter.

Surveys the system of education that operates in the United States on various levels from kindergarten to graduate school; additional chapters deal with questions related to adult, rural, and vocational education, the instructional staff, finances, etc.

5106. Educational Policies Commission. Policies for education in American democracy. Washington, Educational Policies Commission, National Education Association of the United States and the American Association of School Administrators, 1946. 277 p. 46–3664 LA210.E464

The Commission acknowledges indebtedness to Charles A. Beard for preparing the first draft of Book I, The Unique Function of Education in American Democracy (1937); to Dr. George S. Counts for aid in the preparation of Book II, The Education of Free Men in American Democracy (1941); and to Dr. William G. Carr for contributing to the composition of Book III, The Purposes of Education in American Democracy (1938). Three publications influential on American educational thinking here reprinted in their essential parts in response to numerous requests. Cf. Foreword.

The Educational Policies Commission, a commission of the National Education Association of the United States and the American Association of School Administrators, has issued various other publications that treat of education in relation to American civilization. These include: Learning the Ways of Democracy (1940. 486 p.); Moral and Spiritual Values in the Public Schools (1951. 100 p.); Education for All American Youth, rev. ed. (1952. 402 p.); and Public Education and the Future of America (1955. 98 p.).

5107. General education in school and college; a committee report by members of the faculties of Andover, Exeter, Lawrenceville, Harvard, Princeton, and Yale. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952. 142 p. 52–13591 LB2350.G45

"The broad purpose of this study is to integrate the work of the school and college in the area of general education. More precisely, it is to plan the last two years of secondary school and the first two years of college as a continuous process, conceived as a whole."—Chapter 1, "Main Objectives," p. 8.

5108. Knight, Edgar W. Education in the United States. 3d rev. ed. Boston, Ginn, 1951. 753 p. 51–10341 LA205.K6 1951

Covers all periods from the beginning to the middle of the 20th century and provides a general bibliography supplemented by suggested readings listed at the ends of chapters; written by the Kenan Professor of Education at the University of North Carolina, whose various works on American education include: Readings in American Educational History (New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1951. 781 p.), a documentary source book for all periods, edited jointly with Clifton L. Hall; Fifty Years of American Education (New York, Ronald Press, 1952. 484 p.), a review and appraisal of education from 1900 to 1950; and A Documentary History of Education in the South before 1860 (Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1949–53. 5 v.), a compilation designed to gather and preserve original sources for definitive studies.

5109. Lee, Gordon C. An introduction to education in modern America. New York, Holt, 1953. 555 p. 52–11594 LA209.2.L43

Bibliographical references are supplied at the ends of chapters.

Textbook on education as a social institution, for students contemplating a career in teaching; designed also as a guide for the layman seeking an introduction to American education in the context of contemporary world conditions; written by an associate professor of education on the faculty of Pomona College, California.

5110. Monroe, Paul, ed. A cyclopedia of education. New York, Macmillan, 1911–13. 5 v. illus. 11–1511 LB15.M6

——— ——— Reprint. New York, Macmillan, 1914–15. 5 v. illus. 39–19604 LB15.M6 1914

——— ——— Reprint. New York, Macmillan, 1926–28 [v. 1–2, 1928] 5 v. in 3. illus. 30–33076 LB15.M6 1928

Much out of date at the present time but still historically important for its bibliographies and for authoritative signed articles by more than 1,000 specialists who contributed to it; world-wide in scope, with special emphasis on American education.

5111. Monroe, Walter S., ed. Encyclopedia of educational research, a project of the American Educational Research Association. Rev. ed. New York, Macmillan, 1950. xxvi, 1520 p. 50–5222 LB15.M62 1950

Differs from the typical encyclopedia in that it is composed of reviews, evaluations, and syntheses of the literature of educational research. Includes useful signed articles by specialists, fairly extensive selective bibliographies, and indications of additional research that should be undertaken. For a current guide to similar research, see the Review of Educational Research, described in Section H below, devoted to Periodicals and Yearbooks.

5112. Patterson's American education. v. 52. Willmette, Ill., Educational Directories, 1955. 652, 72 p. 4–12953 L901.P3, v. 52

Published 1904 through 1953 as Patterson's American Educational Directory; guide to the location and composition of schools, colleges, and universities. Highly condensed entries also provide names of administrators, officials of boards of education, librarians, and others engaged in educational work in America. Several supplementary lists include names of public libraries, names of educational associations and societies, and a classified directory of institutions according to their fields of specialization. Continued by the publication of an annual volume.

5113. Slosson, Edwin E. The American spirit in education. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1921. 309 p. (The Chronicles of America series, Allen Johnson, editor, v. 33) 21–14875 LA205.S6 E173.C55, v. 33

"Abraham Lincoln edition."

"Bibliographical note": p. 287–290.

Compact historical survey of education from the colonial period through World War I; emphasizes early education given in different sections and the continuing influence of statesmen and educators who contributed to the theory and practice of education in America; includes a chapter on colonial colleges and one on the [Morrill] Land Grant Act.

5114. U. S. Office of Education. Biennial survey of education in the United States, 1916/18+ Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1921+ E21–504 LA209.A37

Issued first as separate chapters and reissued biennially as a survey. Constitutes a repository of statistics, accompanied by summaries, relating to various phases of state and city school systems, higher education, public secondary day schools, and special education for exceptional children. From 1916/18 to 1940 the publication appeared as part of the Bulletin of the United States Office of Education.

Aii. PHILOSOPHICAL AND THEORETICAL

5115. Babbitt, Irving. Literature and the American college; essays in defense of the humanities. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1908. 262 p. 8–8540 LC1011.B2

PARTIAL CONTENTS.—What is humanism?—The college and the democratic spirit.—Literature and the college.—Literature and the doctor's degree.—The rational study of the classics.—Academic leisure.

Document of the movement in American education familiarly known as the "New Humanism"; written by its leading exponent, who opposed the philological emphasis then current in American literary scholarship and advocated a humanistic approach that brought together for study the great ideas found in the content of philosophical as well as literary works.

5116. Curti, Merle E. The social ideas of American educators. New York, Scribner, 1935.

xxii, 613 p. (Report of the Commission on the Social Studies, American Historical Association, pt. 10)
35–4578 LA2311.C8

"Bibliographical notes": p. 593–600.

Educators whose social ideas are considered include: Horace Mann, Henry Barnard, Booker T. Washington, G. Stanley Hall, William James, Edward L. Thorndike, and John Dewey. The colonial and Revolutionary backgrounds, the education of women, the schools and business enterprise, education in the South, and the education of Negroes are among the topics developed.

5117. Dewey, John. The school and society. Rev. ed. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1945. 164 p. 15–18118 LB875.D4 1915

First published in 1899.

Lectures delivered to raise money for the Laboratory School (called also the "Dewey School") conducted 1896–1904 in the Department of Pedagogy of the University of Chicago, for the purpose of providing good elementary education and of adding equipment to facilities for the study of education comparable to those available in laboratories to teachers of the physical sciences; inspired numerous changes and reforms in the teaching of children in widely separated parts of the world.

5118. Dewey, John. Democracy and education; an introduction to the philosophy of education. New York, Macmillan, 1929. xii, 434 p. (Textbook series in education)
30–10933 LB875.D35 1929

"Published March 1916. Reprinted . . . January 1929."

Represents "an endeavor to detect and state the ideas implied in a democratic society and to apply these ideas to the problems of the enterprise of education."—Preface, p. v.

5119. Dewey, John. Experience and education. New York, Macmillan, 1938. xii, 116 p. (The Kappa Delta Pi lecture series [no. 10])
38–8618 LB875.D3943

Written a number of years after the first formulation of the author's theories of education, the book may be used to discover differences existing between Dewey's own ideas and the deductions drawn from them by some of those who sought to apply them.

5120. Dewey, John. Education today. Edited and with a foreword by Joseph Ratner. New York, Putnam, 1940. 373 p.
40–31507 LB875.D39

Collection of the author's briefer writings dealing with his philosophy of education during more than 40 years. John Dewey, His Contribution to the American Tradition, edited by Irwin Edman (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1955. 322 p.), provides another more general collection of selections from the enormous body of Dewey's writings. Melvin C. Baker's Foundations of John Dewey's Educational Theory (New York, King's Crown Press, Columbia University, 1955. 218 p.) not only reviews Dewey's educational thought but also considers misunderstandings of it.

5121. Hansen, Allen O. Liberalism and American education in the eighteenth century. With an introd. by Edward H. Reisner. New York, Macmillan, 1926. xxv, 317 p.
26–18069 LA206.H3

Issued also as thesis (Ph. D.) Columbia University.

Bibliography: p. 265–296.

Designed "to be both an exposition of sources and a source book," the work presents analyses of various plans for education in 18th-century America, including those of Benjamin Rush, Robert Coram, James Sullivan, Nathaniel Chipman, Samuel Knox, Samuel H. Smith, Lafitte du Courteil, Du Pont de Nemours, and Noah Webster; concludes with a summary of elements in the philosophical basis for the education of the period. A contribution to the history of education in the 19th century is made by the author's Early Educational Leadership in the Ohio Valley (Bloomington, Ill., Public School Pub. Co., 1923. 120 p.), a study of educational reconstruction through the work of the Western Literary Institute and College of Professional Teachers, 1829–1841.

5122. Honeywell, Roy J. The educational work of Thomas Jefferson. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1931. xvi, 295 p. (Harvard studies in education, v. 16) 31–11362 E332.H77

Authorities and sources: p. 174–197.

Bibliography: p. 289–295.

Views Jefferson's proposals for primary, secondary, and higher education as parts of his larger plans for political and social reform; emphasizes their importance because of the wide dissemination of Jefferson's ideas; reproduces the texts of his famous educational documents, among them "A Bill for the More General Diffusion of Knowledge"; "A Bill for Establishing a System of Public Education"; "Report of the Commissioners Appointed to Fix the Site of the University of Virginia"; and "Organization and Government of the University of Virginia." Charles F. Arrowood's Thomas Jefferson and Education in a Republic (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1930. 184 p.) also reprints a number of Jefferson's writings on education preceded by a briefer introduction on his services to public education in Virginia and on his theory of education.

677676 O–63–46

5123. James, William. Talks to teachers on psychology. New ed. with an introd. by John Dewey and William H. Kilpatrick. New York, Holt, 1938. xv, 238 p.
39–27497 LB1051.J34 1939
American educational and literary classic, in which James presented to the teachers of his own time, for use in the schools of that day, ideas concerning applications of his own psychological theories. First published in 1899.

5124. Kallen, Horace M. The education of free men. New York, Farrar, Straus, 1949. xix, 332 p. 49–49023 LB875.K16
Called by the author "an essay towards a philosophy of education for Americans," the work is based on years of inquiry and is dedicated to the ideal of making American schools effective agencies for developing and preserving the freedoms promised in the Declaration of Independence.

5125. [Mann, Horace. Public education in Massachusetts] In Massachusetts. Board of Education. Report, together with the report of the secretary of the board. 1st-12th. Boston, Dutton & Wentworth, State Printers, 1838–49. [Washington, 1947–52] 12 v. 53–18466 L160.B18
Facsimile edition of Mann's reports while secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Education, made possible through a cooperative arrangement between the Horace Mann League and the Hugh Birch-Horace Mann Fund of the National Education Association.
Famous documentary source for evaluating Mann's contribution to public education in America; may be used to advantage with Burke A. Hinsdale's Horace Mann and the Common School Revival in the United States (New York, Scribner, 1898. 326 p. [Also published in 1937]). Louise Hall Tharp's Until Victory: Horace Mann and Mary Peabody (Boston, Little, Brown, 1953. 367 p.) is a lively narrative of Mann's public and private life, including his presidency of Antioch College. Edward I. F. Williams' Horace Mann, Educational Statesman (New York, Macmillan, 1937. 367 p.) emphasizes, against the social background of Mann's own time, his importance in the development of a democratic America, for the benefit of teachers, administrators, parents, and the general public.

5126. Mosier, Richard D. Making the American mind; social and moral ideas in the McGuffey readers. New York, King's Crown Press, 1947. 207 p. 47–5812 PE1117.M23M6
Bibliography: p. [179]–204.
Studies the basic ideas and values embodied in materials found in the McGuffey readers, the spread of these concepts by means of these textbooks, and the effects on American culture, from 1836 to about 1900, that may be attributable to wide familiarity with the readers.

5127. Shoemaker, Ervin C. Noah Webster, pioneer of learning. New York, Columbia University Press, 1936. 347 p.
36–22936 PE64.W5S5 1936a
Issued also as thesis (Ph. D.) Columbia University.
Bibliography: p. [317]–331.
Assesses Webster's general connection with American education and particularly the great influence exerted on the teaching of reading and the development of American English by his American Spelling Book, first issued in 1783 as part one of his A Grammatical Institute (1783–85). The spelling book was republished in successive editions that resulted, according to various estimates, in the circulation of between 62 and 80 million copies before 1889. Harry R. Warfel's Noah Webster: Schoolmaster to America (New York, Macmillan, 1936. 460 p.) emphasizes Webster's importance for the study of early national culture. The Letters of Noah Webster (New York, Library Publishers, 1953. 562 p.) have been edited with an introduction by Warfel.

5128. Thursfield, Richard E. Henry Barnard's American journal of education. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1945. 359 p. (The Johns Hopkins University studies in historical and political science, ser. 63, no. 1)
A46–2670 H31.J6, ser. 63, no. 1
L11.A715 1945a
Issued also as thesis (Ph. D.) Columbia University.
"Bibliographical note": p. 327–329.
"The present investigation attempts to portray the tremendous contributions [of the Journal published from 1855 to 1882] . . . in the development of a profession, in the transmission of educational ideas from Europe, in expanding and shaping the eclectic structure of American education, in continuing and modifying the American educational tradition, and in effecting social change."—Preface, p. 7.

5129. Whitehead, Alfred N. The aims of education. New York, Macmillan, 1929. 247 p.
29–10164 LB875.W48
Collected educational essays and addresses of one of the most eminent philosophers and mathematicians of recent times; designed as a protest against teaching and learning inert ideas, i. e., those received but not tested or acted upon. Provides also a series of proposals concerning the use of education to stimulate and guide the student's own self-development. Discussion is based on English educational practices, but the author considered his general principles equally applicable in America. A book seriously considered by American educators.

5130. Woody, Thomas, ed. Educational views of Benjamin Franklin. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1931. xvi, 270 p. (McGraw-Hill education classics) 31–12966 LB575.F72W6

Discusses the origin and influence of Franklin's ideas on education. Includes reprints of various papers he wrote on the subject, as for example: "Idea of the English School"; "Proposals Relating to the Education of Youth in Pennsylvania"; and "Constitution of the Public Academy in the City of Philadelphia." Benjamin Franklin and the University of Pennsylvania (Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1893. 450 p.), edited by Francis N. Thorpe for the United States Bureau of Education, is a study of Franklin's influence on university education.

B. Primary and Secondary Schools

Bi. GENERAL AND HISTORICAL WORKS

5131. Aikin, Wilford M. The story of the eight-year study, with conclusions and recommendations. New York, Harper, 1942. 157 p. ([Progressive Education Association. Commission on the Relation of School and College] Adventure in American education, v. 1) 42–36126 LB2350.A5

Half-title: Progressive Education Association. Publications . . .

Adventure in American Education (New York, Harper, 1942–43. 5 v.), of which Aikin's work is the summary in volume 1, gives results of an investigation of 30 secondary schools for the purpose of achieving a better integration of training in school and college; undertakes also to determine the relative success in college of students trained in progressive and in traditional schools. The larger work has been called "the most elaborate investigation ever made of transition from school to college," a contribution of the Commission on the Relation of School and College, of the American Education Fellowship, a name once used by the Progressive Education Association.

5132. Beale, Howard K. Are American teachers free? New York, Scribner, 1936. xxiv, 855 p. (Report of the Commission on the social studies, American Historical Association, pt. 12) 36–30655 LA210.B4

Bibliography: p. 793–800.

5133. Beale, Howard K. A history of freedom of teaching in American schools. New York, Scribner, 1941. xviii, 343 p. (Report of the Commission on the Social Studies, American Historical Association, pt. 16) 41–5920 LB1775.B4

Bibliography: p. 291–298.

The foregoing entries describe two companion studies that deal with academic freedom below the college level. The earlier book resulted from a detailed investigation of freedom in teaching after World War I; the later publication traces the development of freedom for teachers from colonial to contemporary times. In each case obstacles to such freedom also are emphasized. For references concerning academic freedom in higher education see entries for a book by Richard Hofstadter and Walter P. Metzger, with its companion volume by Robert M. MacIver, both cited in Section Ci., devoted to Colleges and Universities—General Works.

5134. Conant, James B. Education in a divided world; the function of the public schools in our unique society. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1948. x, 249 p. 48–8522 LA209.2.C6

Examination of public education in the structure of American society; emphasizes the citizen's obligation to know the schools in action and to consider the teacher's potential contribution to the welfare of the nation. Includes three chapters on general education. One of the author's many educational contributions while he was president of Harvard University (1933–53).

A later work, Education and Liberty; the Role of the Schools in a Modern Democracy (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. 168 p.), is focused on education of boys and girls from 12 to 20 years of age through a comparison of such education in the United States with that of several nations in the British Commonwealth; includes a chapter on the American college.

5135. Council of State Governments. The forty-eight State school systems. Chicago, 1949. 245 p. 49–45258 LB2805.C66

Report of a study made at the request of the Governors' Conference; deals with the organization, administration, and financing of public elementary and secondary education. Similar aspects of higher education are treated in a report to the Governors' Conference entitled Higher Education in the Forty-Eight States (Chicago, 1952. 317 p.).

5136. Counts, George S. Education and American civilization. New York, Bureau of Publications, Teachers College, Columbia University, 1952. xii, 491 p. 52–9979 LA210.C63

Includes bibliographical footnotes.

Based on research initiated by the staff of the Horace Mann-Lincoln Institute School of Experimentation, established at Columbia University in 1943; develops fundamental ideas of the American social heritage, the hazards implicit in totalitarian states for democratic societies, and the type of education that may help to combat tendencies dangerous for a free people; a work which has been called "essentially a study of the social, cultural, and moral foundations of the program and curriculum of our American common schools."—Preface, p. ix.

5137. Cremin, Lawrence A. The American common school. New York, Bureau of Publications, Teachers College, Columbia University, 1951. xi, 248 p. (Teachers College studies in education) 51–10599 LA215.C7

Bibliography: p. 222–241.

The origins of American political, social, and educational ideas, their impact on one another, and the developments that resulted in the evolution of the public school are considered from the colonial period to the middle of the 19th century.

5138. Cubberley, Ellwood P. Public education in the United States, a study and interpretation of American educational history. Rev. and enl. ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1934. xviii, 782 p. illus. (Riverside textbooks in education) 34–2426 LA205.C8 1934

Bibliographies at end of each chapter.

Traces evolution of public education in relation to social, political, and industrial forces that shaped American life through the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th. A special feature of the work is the evaluative annotations supplied with numerous selected references at the ends of chapters. His Readings in Public Education (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1934. 534 p.) reprints laws and other documents signficant in American educational history.

5139. Edwards, Newton. The courts and the public schools. Rev. ed. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1955. xvii, 622 p. 55–5122 Law

Views the maintenance and operation of the school system as one of the major public enterprises of the United States; therefore, the legal principles that govern the actions of school boards, superintendents of schools, principals, and teachers are discussed and documented by numerous legal references to specific cases tried in the courts. The book is an outgrowth of a course in the legal and constitutional basis of school administration, given for a number of years by the author at the University of Chicago.

5140. Edwards, Newton, and Herman G. Richey. The school in the American social order. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1947. 880 p. 47–4351 LA205.E3

Education in American schools is related to the civilization of which the schools are a product and a part, in three periods of American social development: the colonial, the national to 1860, and the industrial, from 1860 to 1945. A selected bibliography follows each of the 20 chapters.

5141. Hales, Dawson W. Federal control of public education; a critical appraisal. New York, Bureau of Publications, Teachers College, Columbia University, 1954. xiii, 144 p. (Teachers College studies in education) 54–7225 LC89.H22

Based on the author's thesis, Columbia University, published in microfilm form under title: The Rise of Federal Control in American Education.

Bibliography: p. 125–135.

Traces local, state, and federal control of education in relation to the history of public education in the United States, from 1830 to the present time.

5142. Herrick, Virgil E., and others. The elementary school. Englewood Cliffs, N. J., Prentice-Hall, 1956. 474 p. 56–9212 LB1555.H46

"This book has five major purposes: (1) to help the reader appreciate the historical breadth and continuity of elementary school development in America and to perceive pertinent European influences; (2) to present the reader with the concept of the elementary school as a responsible, dynamic agency, educating children in a demanding and complex American society; (3) to reveal the nature and use of the important bases upon which decisions in education are made; (4) to examine and critically analyze present elementary school practices as they now exist in the different kinds of school programs and in the many important curriculum areas; and (5) to consider as honestly and constructively as possible what this analysis means for the future."—Preface.

5143. Monroe, Paul. Founding of the American public school system; a history of education in the United States, from the early settlements to the close of the Civil War period. v. 1. New York, Macmillan, 1940. xiv, 520 p. illus.

40–27340 LA212.M63

Dr. Monroe, professor of education at Columbia and Barnard and "the dean of American writers in the field of educational history," died in 1947 without carrying his story beyond 1860. His first chapter describes the European backgrounds of the American development, and emphasizes its vocational as well as its religious origins. His narrative does not attempt a comprehensive social and intellectual synthesis, but limits itself to "the more commonplace idea of education as a school process," relating, however, this development to dominant political and economic forces. For both the colonial and the early national periods, the material is presented under the categories of primary, secondary, and higher education. The volume is largely based upon a fresh body of primary source material, selections from which, confined to Massachusetts, New York, and Virginia, are contained in a microfilm supplement of Readings, reproduced from the author's manuscript and deposited in selected libraries.

5144. Mort, Paul R., and Walter C. Reusser. Public school finance: its background, structure, and operation. 2d ed. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1951. xxii, 639 p. (McGraw-Hill series in education) 51–5276 LB2825.M598 1951

Contains bibliographies and technical exercises.

Includes three books and four supplements. Book I emphasizes current fiscal problems "that harass schools and threaten indirectly to bring about unwanted structural changes"; Book II reflects recent changes on the operational side and deals with budgetary and auditing matters; Book III spells out the pressing problems of state and Federal fiscal policy; part of the contents of the first edition are covered in the four supplements. Cf. Preface to the second edition, p. ix. Much the same ground is covered in Arvid J. Burke's Financing Public Schools in the United States (New York, Harper, 1951. 584 p.).

5145. Page, Walter Hines. The school that built a town; with an introductory chapter by Roy E. Larsen. New York, Harper, 1952. 109 p.
52–8488 F215.P13 1952

Three essays, originally published under the title The Rebuilding of Old Commonwealths, which include: The Forgotten Man (1897); The School That Built a Town (1901); and The Rebuilding of Old Commonwealths (1902).

Classic statement of the case for public education, particularly in the southern United States, by a notable journalist and diplomat who received his own education (through undergraduate college) in southern institutions.

5146. Warner, William L., Robert J. Havighurst, and Martin B. Loeb. Who shall be educated? The challenge of unequal opportunities. New York, Harper, 1944. xii, 190 p. illus.
44–4389 LA210.W33

Bibliographical references included in footnotes (p. 175–179); Working bibliography: p. 181–186.

Two scholars from the University of Chicago and a third from the University of California at Berkeley, representing respectively the fields of anthropology and sociology, education, and child welfare, present the effects of class differences and "caste" systems operating against the use of education in public schools to realize the democratic ideal of equal opportunity for all members of American society; depicts conditions before 1945.

Bii. PRESCHOOL AND PRIMARY GRADES

5147. Caswell, Hollis L., and A. Wellesley Foshay. Education in the elementary school. 2d ed. New York, American Book Co., 1950. xvii, 406 p. (American education series)
50–13041 LB1555.C35 1950

Presents the elementary school as the central unit in American education from nursery through professional school; reviews developments that have now culminated after half a century and recognizes contributions made by experimental work in this field. Supplementary readings are suggested after chapters; general references are supplied at the conclusion of the work, p. 391–392. The first of the two authors is president of Teachers College, Columbia University, and the second is a professor and director of educational research at Ohio State University.

5148. Gans, Roma, Celia Burns Stendler, and Millie Almy. Teaching young children in nursery school, kindergarten, and the primary grades. Yonkers-on-Hudson, N. Y., World Book Co., 1952. 454 p. (New-World education series)
52–1768 LB1140.G26

Covers the education of children between the ages of four and nine; written by three university professors working in the field, in nontechnical language for the use of parents, administrative officers of schools, nurses, social workers, and teachers.

5149. Gesell, Arnold L., and Frances L. Ilg. Child development, an introduction to the study of human growth. New York, Harper, 1949. 2 v. in 1 (403, 475 p.) illus. 49–50170 BF721.G477

Each volume previously published separately.
Includes bibliographies.
CONTENTS.—1. Infant and child in the culture of today (1943).—2. The child from five to ten (1946).
Studies of the understanding, guidance, and psychological care of children in a democratic society; used extensively by American parents and teachers. This edition includes the complete text of both earlier volumes, together with an added Foreword by Dr. Gesell, entitled "Child Development and the Science of Man." Dr. Gesell was for many years professor of child hygiene at the Yale School of Medicine. His own researches and those of Dr. Ilg while both were associated in the Clinic of Child Development at Yale provide the basis for much of the two studies.

5150. National Society for the Study of Education. Committee on Early Childhood Education. Early childhood education. Edited by Nelson B. Henry. Chicago, National Society for the Study of Education; distributed by the University of Chicago Press, 1947. xii, 390 p. (National Society for the Study of Education. Yearbook, 46th, pt. 2)
6–16938 LB5.N25, 46th yearbook, pt. 2
Composed of a series of articles by individual specialists or groups of specialists; concerned particularly with the sociological background of primary education, with child development, and with progress and application of knowledge in this branch of education; includes numerous lists of books recommended for reading.

5151. Otto, Henry J. Elementary-school organization and administration. 3d ed. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1954. 719 p.
54–5214 LB2805.O76 1954
The author, graduate professor of elementary administration and curriculum, University of Texas, addresses his book to administrators of and teachers in American elementary schools; a historical and statistical study of fundamental aspects of this segment of education; extensively documented by means of numerous footnotes.

Biii. SECONDARY SCHOOLS

5152. Brown, Elmer E. The making of our middle schools; an account of the development of secondary education in the United States. New York, Longmans, Green, 1903. xii, 547 p.
3–1867 LA222.B87
Bibliography: p. [481]–518.
Bibliographical notes at end of chapters.
Classic expression of educational thought and history at the beginning of the 20th century which has not been superseded; written by a former United States Commissioner of Education.

5153. Chisholm, Leslie L. The work of the modern high school. New York, Macmillan, 1953. 542 p. 53–1883 LB1607.C47
Written to develop a clear understanding of each part of the modern secondary school in the United States, the work is divided into four parts: (1) the place of education in American life; (2) the content of what should be taught; (3) the program that is in harmony with the needs of youth today; and (4) the plan of action that may be followed in building a good educational program. References to pertinent publications are provided at the end of each chapter except the last.

5154. Douglass, Harl R. Modern administration of secondary schools; a revision and extension of Organization and administration of secondary schools. Boston, Ginn, 1954. 601 p.
54–9748 LB2822.D6 1954
Designed as a textbook for college and university classes and as a handbook for professional workers in the field of secondary education; written by the director of the College of Education, University of Colorado.

5155. Heely, Allan V. Why the private school? New York, Harper, 1951. 208 p.
51–3394 LC47.H4
Analysis of the functions proper to the independent, nondenominational private school in American democratic society, its curriculum and methods of teaching, problems of ethical and religious training, and other miscellaneous questions; written by the headmaster of Lawrenceville School, Lawrenceville, New Jersey. Roland J. Mulford's History of the Lawrenceville School, 1810–1935 (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1935. 358 p.) describes the evolution of this preparatory institution for boys during its existence of nearly 150 years, first as a small academy, nonconformist and middle-class in its sympathies, and currently as a notable private school.

5156. Keller, Franklin J. The comprehensive high school. New York, Harper, 1955. 302 p. 54–12239 LB1607.K37
Bibliography: p. 287–290.
Considers the scope of various high schools and their accomplishments in relation to the definition of a comprehensive high school as one that "combines all the best features of an academic high school and a vocational high school, and therefore serves the needs of all youth in the community"; based on a survey involving a study of the literature, inquiries addressed to 2,220 educators, and field trips to visit some 77 schools. Favorable presentation of the case for vocational education, by the principal (1955) of the Metropolitan Vocational High School of New York City.

5157. Koos, Leonard V. Junior high school trends. New York, Harper, 1955. 171 p. (Exploration series in education) 55–6777 LB1623.K63

Review of the history, aims, and development of the junior high school as part of American education during a period of some fifty years; written by an authority on the subject who, after a long professorial career at the Universities of Minnesota and Chicago, in 1946 became director of research for the American Association of Junior Colleges. An annotated bibliography is supplied (p. 145–165) and documentation by means of bibliographic footnotes is given throughout.

5158. Leonard, John P. Developing the secondary school curriculum. Rev. ed. New York, Rinehart, 1953. 582 p. 52–14016 LB1628.L4 1953

Provides a background of social, political, industrial, and agrarian developments that affected changing educational ideas and theories, particularly as these have been reflected in repeated revisions of curriculums; traces recent developments in detail, e. g., core courses and unit instruction; copiously documented by footnotes referring to reports of important committees and commissions as well as to other official and unofficial publications. Other studies that may be compared with this are Fundamentals of Curriculum Development, by B. Othanel Smith, William O. Stanley, and J. Harlan Shores (Yonkers-on-Hudson, World Book Co., 1950. 780 p.); Reorganizing the High-School Curriculum, rev. ed. by Harold B. Alberty (New York, Macmillan, 1953. 560 p.); and Stephen Romines' Building the High School Curriculum (New York, Ronald Press, 1954. 520 p.). Developing a Curriculum for Modern Living, by Florence B. Stratemeyer and others (New York, Teachers College, Columbia University, 1947. 558 p.), makes detailed recommendations resulting from a cooperative investigation of the type of curricular development thought suited to modern elementary and secondary schools.

5159. Miller, George F. The academy system of the state of New York. Albany, J. B. Lyon, 1922. 181 p. 23–4874 LA337.M5

Thesis (Ph. D.)—Columbia University, 1916.
Bibliography: p. 179–180.

The American academy prepared the way for the high school, which finally superseded it. Historically, academies in the United States occupied an important place in the transition from colonial education to that of the late 19th century. The foregoing study of the system in New York is illustrative of its wider use in America for a hundred years following 1787.

C. Colleges and Universities

Ci. GENERAL AND HISTORICAL WORKS

5160. American Council on Education. Cooperative Study of Evaluation in General Education. General education: explorations in evaluation; the final report. Paul L. Dressel, director; Lewis B. Mayhew, assistant director. Washington, American Council on Education, 1954. xxiii, 302 p. 54–11007 LC1011.A6

Nineteen universities and colleges, widely separated as to type and locality, cooperated in the study, in an effort to determine the status and effectiveness of programs in "general education," offered in the institutions of the United States. The movement in favor of such education has been variously defined, but may be said to represent substantially a reaction against overspecialization, too free an election of unrelated subjects, narrowness in technical and professional preparation for vocational purposes, and the failure of American education adequately to stress the attainment of learning that should be the common experience of all educated men and women.

5161. American universities and colleges. 7th ed., 1956. Mary Irwin, editor. Washington, American Council on Education, 1956. 1223 p. 28–5598 LA226.A65 1956

Reference work providing information chiefly in the following categories: statement concerning accrediting, requirements for admission, degrees granted, administrative and teaching staff, library, finances, brief historical details.

5162. Bogue, Jesse P. The community college. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1950. xxi, 390 p. (McGraw-Hill series in education) 50–8962 LB2329.B6

Bibliographical footnotes.

Covers philosophies, functions, history, contributions, organization, and administration of junior colleges designed to provide education suited to individual communities; written by the executive secretary of the American Association of Junior Colleges.

5163. Commission on Financing Higher Education. [Reports and publications] New York, Columbia University Press for the Commission on Financing Higher Education, 1951–53. 12 v.

Dramatic increase in enrollment, declining income of private institutions, overcrowding, and increased costs experienced by state and private universities, caused grave anxiety during the past decade. The Association of American Universities therefore requested the Carnegie Corporation of New York and the Rockefeller Foundation to underwrite the Commission on Financing Higher Education, to study and report upon all phases of the problems involved. The reports and other monographic publications of the Commission are described in the following items.

5164. Allen, Harry K. State public finance and State institutions of higher education in the United States. 1952. 196 p.
52–12300 LB2342.A4

5165. Axt, Richard G. The Federal Government and financing higher education. 1952. 295 p. 52–14740 LC173.A97

5166. Current operating expenditures and income of higher education in the United States, 1930, 1940, and 1950; a staff technical paper, compiled by William V. Campbell [and others] 1952. xvii, 97 p. (chiefly tables)
52–14777 LB2342.C66

5167. Government assistance to universities in Great Britain; memoranda submitted by Harold W. Dodds [and others] 1952. x, 133 p.
52–8830 LB2901.C6

5168. Higher education and American business. 1952. 37 p. 53–3015 LB2336.C6

5169. Hofstadter, Richard, and C. De Witt Hardy. The development and scope of higher education in the United States. 1952. x, 254 p.
52–14741 LA226.H55

Bibliographical footnotes.

5170. Hollinshead, Byron S., and Robert R. Rodgers. Who should go to college? With a chapter on the role of motivation in attendance at post-high-school educational institutions. 1952. xvi, 190 p. 52–14133 LB2351.H64

Bibliographical references included in "Selections from the Literature" (p. [166]–184).

5171. Millett, John D., ed. An atlas of higher education in the United States; the geographical distribution of accredited four-year colleges, universities, and technical schools in 1950. 1952. [57] p. maps.
Map 52–909 G1201.E6M5 1952

5172. Millet, John D. Financing higher education in the United States; the staff report of the Commission on Financing Higher Education. 1952. xix, 503 p. diagrs., tables.
52–14622 LB2342.M48

Bibliographical footnotes.

5173. Nature and needs of higher education; the report of the Commission on Financing Higher Education. 1952. xi, 191 p.
52–14642 LB2321.C54

5174. Ostheimer, Richard H. A statistical analysis of the organization of higher education in the United States, 1948–1949. 1951. xviii, 233 p. tables. 51–14360 LA266.O75

5175. Ostheimer, Richard H. Student charges and financing higher education. 1953. xix, 217 p. diagrs., tables. 53–10191 LB2342.O8

Bibliographical footnotes.

5176. Coulter, Ellis M. College life in the Old South. [2d ed.] Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1951. 320 p. illus.
51–7109 LD1983.C6 1951

Bibliography: p. 299–305.

Considering the evolution of the University of Georgia typical in its region, a professor in the history department of that institution has analyzed its history and development from the turn of the 18th century to the immediate aftermath of the Civil War, in order to show the effects of higher education on the privileged class in the South of that day.

First issued in 1928 and now reissued with minor changes and corrections.

5177. Earnest, Ernest P. Academic procession; an informal history of the American college, 1636 to 1953. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1953. 368 p. 53–9859 LA229.E17

Briefly examines major forces that have operated in American higher education and the extent to which individual institutions have fitted their students to live and work in the society that produced them. Numerous references to literary, historical, and educational sources are supplied in "Notes," p. 341–359. Dr. Earnest is chairman of the department of English, Temple University.

5178. Five college plans: Columbia [by] Dean Herbert E. Hawkes; Harvard [by] Dean A. Chester Hanford; Swarthmore [by] President Frank Aydelotte; Wabash [by] President Louis B. Hopkins; Chicago [by] Dean Chauncey S. Boucher; with an introd. by John J. Coss. New York, Columbia University Press, 1931. 115 p.
32–1980 LB2341.F5

Lectures describing new educational programs designed to improve curriculums in five representative colleges after World War I; objectives of the changes include providing for individual differences in students and the creation of superior institutions flexible enough to serve the requirements of life in the postwar world.

5179. Flexner, Abraham. Universities, American, English, German. New York, Oxford University Press, 1930. 381 p. 30–32829 LA183.F6

The longest part of the book consists of a drastic criticism of American universities on the score of disproportionate emphasis on vocational courses, mass-production methods, and intellectual standards alleged to be far below those of English and German universities. Valuable as a provocation to discussion and review of problems, the book has been considered by various critics to be neither dispassionate nor the source of balanced evidence concerning conditions in many institutions. The author, a distinguished educational figure, was for nine years director of the Institute of Advanced Study, Princeton.

5180. Harvard University. Committee on the Objectives of a General Education in a Free Society. General education in a free society. With an introd. by James Bryant Conant. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1945. xix, 267 p.
A45–4180 LA210.H4 1945a

Report of an analysis of the curriculum of Harvard University and an inquiry into the problems and desiderata of general education not only at Harvard but in American schools and colleges throughout the country; one of the numerous studies made by committees in various institutions with the aim of improving education after World War II.

5181. Hofstadter, Richard, and Walter P. Metzger. The development of academic freedom in the United States. New York, Columbia University Press, 1955. xvi, 527 p. 55–9435 LA205.H55

Prepared for the American Academic Freedom Project at Columbia University, directed by Robert M. MacIver.

Bibliographical footnotes.

CONTENTS.—The age of the college, by R. Hofstadter.—The age of the university, by W. P. Metzger..

Historical study primarily of academic freedom of faculty members in American colleges and universities, from the beginning of these institutions to the recent past. Provides the backgrounds of religious, intellectual, and political issues involved; explores also a variety of other related topics, such as academic government, professional organizations of academic men, the rise of Darwinism in American thought, and the relation between big business and academic freedom. The authors are members of the faculty of Columbia University. Their book should be read with its companion volume, Robert M. MacIver's Academic Freedom in Our Time (q. v.).

5182. The Idea and practice of general education. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1950. 333 p. 50–12496 LD906.5.I3

An account of the progress made during nearly twenty years in developing an academic program at the College of the University of Chicago; written by present and former members of the faculty as a contribution to the exchange and communication of ideas concerning new forms of undergraduate education in America.

5183. Kelly, Robert L. The American colleges and the social order. New York, Macmillan, 1940. 380 p. 40–33507 LA225.K4

"References and notes": p. 347–369.

Historical study of American higher education and particularly of the liberal arts colleges from colonial to recent times, with special emphasis on the relations of such colleges to the society of which they have been a significant part.

5184. McDowell, Tremaine. American studies. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1948. 96 p. 48–9983 LB2321.M33

CONTENTS.—1. Time and the colleges.—2. General education.—3. American studies.—4. Curriculums in American studies.—5. American courses.—6. The Minnesota program.—7. Region, nation, world.

". . . based chiefly on firsthand observations of procedures in more than thirty colleges and universities"; immediately descriptive of specific programs in American Studies, but ultimately concerned "with the broad pattern of higher education in the United States."—Foreword.

The author has been chairman of the Program in American Studies at the University of Minnesota since 1945.

5185. MacIver, Robert M. Academic freedom in our time. New York, Columbia University Press, 1955. xiv, 329 p. 55-9094 LB2332.M28
Bibliography: p. [305]-320.

Prepared for the American Academic Freedom Project at Columbia University, directed by the author, formerly Lieber Professor of Political Philosophy and Sociology at Columbia University. After defining academic freedom, MacIver devotes the principal sections of his work to the following topics: the recent climate of opinion concerning freedom in the United States; academic government in relation to academic freedom; freedom required by the student and the teacher; and the university and the social order. The book emphasizes an analysis of the contemporary situation in the United States, problems that are present, and the significance of this type of freedom in the life of the nation. The general theme of the volume and its companion work, Hofstadter and Metzger's The Development of Academic Freedom in the United States (q. v.) is that of the Bicentennial of Columbia University: "Man's right to knowledge and the free use thereof."

5186. Ross, Charles D. Democracy's college; the land-grant movement in the formative stage. Ames, Iowa State College Press, 1942. 267 p. 42-11686 LA226.R65
Notes and references: p. 183-229.
Introductory and selective bibliography: p. 231-254.

Historical study of the meaning of the land-grant college in American educational development after Abraham Lincoln in 1862 signed the Morrill Act appropriating great areas of public land for the establishment in every state of a college for the people "to promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions of life." For current achievement in 1930 see a Survey of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities, directed by Arthur J. Klein for the United States Office of Education (Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1930. 2 v.).

More recently, the Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities has published Some Educational Questions Confronting the Association . . . (Washington, 1948. 52 p.), which is a manual of inquiry into considerations suggested by the report of the President's Commission on Higher Education (q. v. under U. S. below).

5187. Smith, Huston. The purposes of higher education. Foreword by Arthur H. Compton. New York, Harper, 1955. 218 p. 55-6970 LB2321.S57

Presents a moderate position with respect to various opposing ideas in American higher education. These include freedom versus authority, egoism versus altruism, and the individual versus the state. Considers the aims of liberal education with reference to knowledge, abilities, appreciations, and motivations. Based on deliberations conducted for 18 months by a faculty committee charged with studying the curriculum of Washington University, St. Louis, and with formulating a statement of the objectives of liberal education to be used as a basis for curriculum development.

5188. Thwing, Charles F. A history of higher education in America. New York, Appleton, 1906. xiii, 501 p. 6-35963 LA226.T56

Although written half a century ago, this comparative study of numerous institutions remains a contribution to American cultural and educational history, by virtue of its vigorous portrayal of persons, conditions, and events that shaped the founding and development of American colleges and universities.

5189. U. S. President's Commission on Higher Education. Higher education for American democracy, a report. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1947. 6 v. illus. 48-50042 LA226.A48
George F. Zook, chairman.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Establishing the goals.—v. 2. Equalizing and expanding individual opportunity.—v. 3. Organizing higher education.—v. 4. Staffing higher education.—v. 5. Financing higher education.—v. 6. Resource data.

Embodies the results of a study made by the commission established in July 1946, by President Harry S. Truman, to seek a comprehensive view of higher education in the United States, and to assess present problems and future requirements. Among the latter the commission outlined federal financial assistance on a large scale if the basic aim were to be achieved of providing equal opportunities for higher education to all qualified persons. The character of the debate over the report may be learned from Gail Kennedy's Education for Democracy (Boston, Heath, 1952. 117 p. Problems in American civilization, readings selected by the Department of American Studies, Amherst College. LA226.A485K4).

5190. Veblen, Thorstein. The higher learning in America. Introd. by David Riesman. Stanford, Calif., Academic Reprints, 1954 [°1918] xx, 286 p. (American culture and economics series, no. 3) 54–7096 LA226.V3 1954

First published in 1918, the work constituted a scathing attack on the conduct of universities by governing boards and officials dominated by the concepts of businessmen, to the great detriment of an honest search for knowledge. David Riesman, introducing the present edition, comments: "Though the details of the Veblen legend may be in error, he is surely, for those contributions, entitled to his place in the history of intellectual freedom."

Cii. INDIVIDUAL INSTITUTIONS

5191. Becker, Carl L. Cornell University; founders and the founding. Ithaca, N. Y., Cornell University Press, 1943. 240 p. 44–195 LD1369.B4

Series of lectures tracing the English influence on early classical education in America; the development of interest in scientific research and in training for agriculture and the mechanic arts as related to the Morrill Land-Grant College Act of 1862; and the founding of institutions such as Cornell. Texts of various documentary sources are provided, p. 139–190; a bibliography is supplied, p. 207–215; and references and notes are listed, p. 219–240.

Cornell as part of American social history after the Civil War is portrayed in Walter P. Rogers' Andrew D. White and the Modern University (Ithaca, N. Y., Cornell University Press, 1942. 259 p.).

5192. Cheyney, Edward P. History of the University of Pennsylvania, 1740–1940. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1940. x, 461 p. 40–32494 LD4528.C45

"The printed and manuscript material used in the preparation of this volume and all other known references to the history of the University have been listed, and this list will be preserved in the University library in accessible form for the use of subsequent investigators."—Preface.

5193. Cole, Arthur C. A hundred years of Mount Holyoke College; the evolution of an educational ideal. Published for Mount Holyoke College. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1940. 426 p. 40–27310 LD7093.C58

Reflects "the changing concepts in education and in society throughout a century especially notable for the widening of opportunities for women."—Preface p. [iii]. Includes biographical essays on Mary Lyon (1797–1849) and Mary E. Woolley (1863–1947).

5194. Curti, Merle E., and Vernon R. Carstensen. The University of Wisconsin; a history, 1848–1925. Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1949. 2 v. illus. 48–47638 LD6128.C8

Includes bibliographical footnotes and a bibliographical note, v. 2, p. 597–601.

Study of a state university, its origins, aims, growth, financial support, faculty and administration, students, and finally its status in the first quarter of the twentieth century; aims to relate the development of this individual institution to the social and intellectual movements of the Middle West and of America as a whole. Published in commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of the founding of the university.

5195. Flexner, Abraham. Daniel Coit Gilman. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1946. 173 p. 46–7929 LD2626 1876.F55

Bibliographical references included in "Acknowledgments" (p. 165–166).

Develops the thesis that by the far-reaching influence of Gilman at Johns Hopkins a new type of American institution was created, in which teaching and research were combined and that this example was followed until it became standard in the United States; documented by quotations from Gilman's works, such as University Problems in the United States (New York, Century, 1898. 319 p.) and The Launching of a University and Other Papers (New York, Dodd, Mead, 1906. 386 p.).

5196. Henderson, Algo D., and Dorothy Hall. Antioch College: its design for liberal education. New York, Harper, 1946. xiv, 280 p. 47–97 LD171.A53H4

Account prepared under the direction of the president of Antioch College, Yellow Springs, Ohio, at the end of 25 years of experimentation with the "Antioch Plan," a curriculum leading to the A. B. and B. S. degrees; programs included in the plan require 5 years for completion and combine 3 emphases: (1) liberal education; (2) experience as workers off the campus; and (3) the development of democratic group responsibility in college government.

5197. A History of Columbia College on Morningside. New York, Columbia University Press, 1954. viii, 284 p. illus. (The Bicentennial history of Columbia University) 54–8016 LD1248.H48

Bibliographical footnotes.

CONTENTS.—The college: a memoir of forty years, by I. Edman.—The Van Amringe and Keppel eras, by L. Trilling.—Reconstruction in the liberal arts, by J. Buchler.—"Most glad to teach," by C. W. Everett.—After class, by F. W. Boardman, Jr.—The lion afield, by J. N. Arbolino.—The men from Morningside, by G. R. Hawes.—A liberal arts college in a metropolitan university, by I. Edman.

5198. Jones, Barbara (Slatter) Bennington College; the development of an educational idea. New York, Harper, 1946. 239 p.
47–30081 LD7251.B4792J6

Covers the development of the educational program of a "progressive" college for women during the first 14 years of its life (1932–45) and outlines the main departures from conventional educational practices; originated in a series of research studies subsidized by the Whitney and the Rockefeller Foundations.

5199. Kennedy, Gail, ed. Education at Amherst: the new program. New York, Harper, 1955. 330 p. 55–8552 LD153.K4

Documents the curricular revisions and innovations undertaken by a traditional four-year liberal arts college to meet the educational problems and opportunities that developed in the United States, particularly after World War II. Two reports comprise the major part of the book: that of the Faculty Committee on Long Range Policy, from which developed the changes first put into effect in 1946–47; and that of the Review Committee on the New Program, which provides information on the results of the changes as of 1954. For observations on earlier offerings at Amherst see the following entry.

5200. Le Duc, Thomas H. Piety and intellect at Amherst College, 1865–1912. New York, Columbia University Press, 1946. 165 p. (Columbia studies in American culture, no. 16)
A46–2753 LD153.L4

"An earlier draft . . . was submitted to Yale University . . . for the doctoral degree [1943]."—Preface.

Bibliography: p. [153]–155.

Not designed as a comprehensive factual history of events in the life of Amherst College, but rather as a study of ideas current at the college and expressed in its curriculum and classes during the second half of the 19th century; also explores the role of a representative undergraduate college of that time in the life of the community of which it was a part, and thus relates it to the cultural history of the United States. For contemporary offerings at the college see the preceding entry under Gail Kennedy.

5201. Michigan. University. The University of Michigan, an encyclopedic survey. Wilfred B. Shaw, editor. v. 1+ Ann Arbor, University of Michigan, 1941+ 42–36603 LD3278.A24

Presents a factual and historical study of a large state university in its entirety: origin and growth, administration, schools, departments, faculty, instruction, students, alumni, libraries, and museums; includes frequent bibliographies that emphasize references to official documents of the institution and the state; a publication to be completed in 4 volumes and 9 parts.

A comparable study of a large metropolitan university is The University of Chicago Survey (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1933. 12 v.).

5202. Minnesota. University. Bureau of Institutional Research. A university looks at its program; the report of the University of Minnesota Bureau of Institutional Research, 1942–1952. Ruth E. Eckert and Robert J. Keller, editors. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1954. 223 p. (Minnesota studies in higher education)
54–8209 LD3326.5.A47

Enrollment trends, curriculum development, staff activities, and undergraduate and graduate instruction are among the matters considered in 23 selected studies representing the university's continuing program for studying its own procedures and offerings.

5203. Morison, Samuel Eliot. Three centuries of Harvard, 1636–1936. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1936. 512 p.
36–14160 LD2151.M65

Brief history of Harvard University. More detailed treatment of different periods in the life of the institution and of its relation to American culture and education in a wider sense is found in the uncompleted Tercentennial History of Harvard College and University, 1636–1936, which includes The Founding of Harvard College (1935), Harvard College in the Seventeenth Century (2 v., 1936), both by Dr. Morison, and The Development of Harvard University Since the Inauguration of President Eliot, 1869–1929 (1930), a cooperative volume edited by him. Dr. Morison at the time of his recent retirement was Jonathan Trumbull Professor of History at Harvard University.

5204. Wertenbaker, Thomas J. Princeton, 1746–1896. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1946. 424 p. illus. A47–267 LD4609.W4

Bibliographcial footnotes.

Written by a senior professor of American history at Princeton; reviews the institution's history, evaluates the contribution of the original founders and their successors, explains educational policies, recounts past services to the nation, and brings back the student life of the past. Cf. Foreword, p. v.

D. Education of Special Groups

5205. American Association for Gifted Children. The gifted child, edited by Paul Witty. Boston, Heath, 1951. xii, 338 p.
51–2586 LC3965.A6

Annotated bibliography on gifted children by Elise H. Martens: p. [277]–323.

Collection of nontechnical essays by specialists; discusses the problems of the gifted child, factors involved in identifying the gifted, the waste of talent and leadership inherent in wrong methods of education for this valuable segment of the population, etc. A useful brief treatment of the same subject is the Educational Policies Commission's Education of the Gifted (Washington, 1950. 88 p.). A progress report covering ten years of work in this field at the Hunter College Elementary School is provided in Educating Gifted Children, by G. H. Hildreth and others (New York, Harper, 1952. 272 p.). Programs for gifted boys and girls applied in a variety of schools, school systems, and projects are summarized in A Survey of the Education of Gifted Children, by Robert J. Havighurst and others (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1955. 114 p.), which includes an annotated bibliography, p. 103–113.

5206. Ashmore, Harry S. The Negro and the schools. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1954. 228 p. diagrs., tables.
54–10392 LC2801.A87

List of studies upon which the book is based: p. 216–217; selected reading and research materials: p. 218–220.

An objective appraisal of racial segregation and other biracial aspects of the educational system in the United States; written in summary by the director of a research project from data supplied by a staff of 45 scholars, whose work was made possible by the Fund for the Advancement of Education, with money supplied by the Ford Foundation. The book was published before the United States Supreme Court rendered its decision on May 17, 1954, declaring that segregation is a denial of the equal protection of the laws and therefore is unconstitutional. The same data formed the basis for a volume about desegregation in some 24 communities, published as Schools in Transition, edited by Robin M. Williams and Margery W. Ryan (Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1954. 272 p.). White and Negro Schools in the South; an Analysis of Biracial Education was edited by Truman M. Pierce, director of the Southern States Cooperative Program in Educational Administration, and four coordinators in the program (Englewood Cliffs, N. J., Prentice-Hall, 1955. 338 p.). The historical aspects of Negro education are presented in The Education of the Negro in the American Social Order, by Horace M. Bond (New York, Prentice-Hall, 1934. 501 p.). A detailed study of the problems and challenges of higher education in this field is found in the National Survey of the Higher Education of Negroes, by the United States Office of Education (Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1942–43. 4 v.).

5207. Baker, Harry J. Introduction to exceptional children. Rev. ed. New York, Macmillan, 1953. 500 p. 53–8275 LC3965.B32 1953

Textbook for college and university students and for the use of clinical and diagnostic agencies concerned with children having physical, neurological, mental, and other handicaps; includes brief sections on children who learn rapidly and on the mentally gifted child (p. 273–295); numerous references are provided at the ends of all important parts of the work; written by the director of the Psychological Clinic, Detroit Public Schools. Additional references for exploring the same and related problems are Educating the Retarded Child, by Samuel A. Kirk and G. Orville Johnson (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1951. 434 p.); Arch O. Heck's The Education of Exceptional Children, 2d ed. (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1954. 513 p.); and John E. Wallace Wallin's Education of Mentally Handicapped Children (New York, Harper, 1955. 485 p.). A compendium of essays and bibliographical suggestions concerning many phases of this problem is found in Special Education for the Exceptional (Boston, P. Sargent, 1955. 2 v.), edited by Merle E. Frampton and Elena D. Gall, which includes signed contributions by numerous specialists in work for students suffering from special conditions of health, and other physical or mental handicaps.

5208. Butterworth, Julian E., and Howard A. Dawson. The modern rural school; with chapters by Stanley Warren [and others] New York, McGraw-Hill, 1952. 494 p. (McGraw-Hill series in education) 51–12592 LB1567.B865

Includes bibliographies, and a list of visual aids: p. 471–476.

Presents the social and economic bases of the unique problems in the field of rural education; outlines a program for meeting the educational needs of rural America and specifies requirements for implementing that program. Dr. Butterworth is professor emeritus of rural education at Cornell University; Dr. Dawson is director of the Division of Rural Service of the National Education Association.

5209. Handbook of adult education in the United States. [3d ed.] Mary L. Ely, editor. New York, Institute of Adult Education, Teachers College, Columbia University, 1948. 555 p.
34–27011 LC5251.H3 1948

Survey articles by specialists and a composite record of activities that have as their purpose the stimulation of adults to inform and educate themselves for the better performance of their functions as human beings and as useful members of a democratic society; includes an extensive section on programs carried on by groups and associations organized in the interest of adult education (p. 303–514); a list of references suggested for supplementary reading is also provided (p. [515]–528). Other pertinent and more recent publications are Paul L. Essert's Creative Leadership of Adult Education (New York, Prentice-Hall, 1951. 333 p.) and Homer Kempfer's Adult Education (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1955. 433 p.).

5210. Kerrison, Irvine L. H. Workers' education at the university level. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1951. 177 p.
51–14170 LC5051.K4

Bibliography: p. 146–155.

Report on the efforts, failures, and successes of some fifty universities offering programs in workers' education; provides a point of departure for the development of labor-management education.

Education of workers in industry by means of apprenticeship, day trade schools, part-time and evening study, correspondence courses, and training within industry are treated in Arthur B. Mays' Essentials of Industrial Education (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1952. 248 p.). Philip R. V. Curoe's Educational Attitudes and Policies of Organized Labor in the United States (New York, Teachers College, Columbia University, 1926. 202 p.) is a thesis which traces the relation of labor groups to the development of public school education in America from 1840 to 1925.

5211. Prosser, Charles A., and Thomas H. Quigley. Vocational education in a democracy. Rev. ed. Chicago, American Technical Society, 1949. 575 p.
49–8838 LC1043.P8 1949

First edition by C. A. Prosser and C. R. Allen.

Emphasizes the social and economic needs for vocational education of secondary grade, also the schools, teachers, and facilities that will make the programs effective; written by two specialists who have been active for many years in this type of educational work. A second study of the subject, Vocational Education: America's Greatest Resource (Chicago, American Technical Society, 1950. 387 p.), by John A. McCarthy, Assistant Commissioner of Education in New Jersey, stresses the relation of the Government of the United States to vocational education and the legislation by which Federal participation may be implemented. A third evaluation of this type of education, which institutes comparisons with similar programs in other countries, is found in Alfred Kähler and Ernest Hamburger's Education for an Industrial Age (Ithaca, Published for the Institute of World Affairs by Cornell University Press, 1948. 334 p.).

5212. Woody, Thomas. A history of women's education in the United States. New York, Science Press, 1929. 2 v. illus. (Science and education, edited by J. McKeen Cattell, v. 4, book 1–2)
30–1557 LC1752.W6

Bibliography: v. 2, p. 481–589.

Although written over 25 years ago this work has never been superseded as the standard historical presentation of the subject. Of special value are the documentation by references to abundant contemporary sources, the emphasis on social and institutional changes, and the sections on academies, seminaries, colleges, and professional education. In 1924 Dr. Woody became professor of education at the University of Pennsylvania. An analysis of contemporary problems and opportunities connected with the education of women is found in Educating Women for a Changing World (Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1954. 302 p.), by Kate (Hevner) Mueller, who has had rich experience as a teacher and educational administrator.

E. Teachers and Teaching

5213. Barzun, Jacques. Teacher in America. Boston, Little, Brown, 1945. 321 p.
45–1580 LB2321.B258

Essays, frequently satiric and critical, concerning the academic scene and intellectual life on American campuses as known by the author, a professor at Columbia University, who received his early education in France.

5214. Chase, Mary Ellen. A goodly fellowship. New York, Macmillan, 1939. 305 p.
39–27971 LA2317.C48A3

"This book is the story of a life spent in teaching . . . a complement, perhaps a sequel, to A Goodly Heritage written ten years ago."—Foreword. Miss Chase, a writer on New England and other themes, has been a professor of English literature at Smith College since 1929.

5215. Cronkhite, Bernice (Brown) ed. A handbook for college teachers, an informal guide. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1950. xi, 272 p. 50–7896 LB2321.C73

Bibliography: p. [263]–267.

Based on extracurricular lectures and discussions, chiefly by distinguished educators, arranged by the Radcliffe Graduate School for graduate students at Harvard and Radcliffe who plan to become college teachers. The topics developed include: relations between teacher and student; varieties of teaching methods applicable in the humanities, natural sciences, and social sciences; visual and other aids to teaching; effective methods of speech; professional relations; research and publications; obtaining a teaching position; and educational developments and trends in relation to American society.

5216. Elsbree, Willard S. The American teacher. New York, American Book Co., ℗1939. 566 p. 39–17288 LB1775.E57

Includes suggested readings.

Tells of the evolution of the teaching profession in American public schools during the past three centuries. Staff Personnel in the Public Schools (New York, Prentice-Hall, 1954. 438 p.), written jointly by Elsbree and E. E. Reutter, Jr., deals with selection, certification, and in-service education of teachers, as well as with other administrative matters affecting teachers.

5217. Fuess, Claude M. Creed of a schoolmaster. Boston, Little, Brown, 1939. 195 p.
39–27185 LB1607.F8

Written after long association with an independent private school, the book indicates the general course that the author considers right for modern secondary education to follow; includes chapters on "The Transition from School to College" and "The Promise of Progressive Education." Dr. Fuess, who was headmaster of Phillips Academy, Andover, Massachusetts, from 1933 to 1947, has published a later book of the same character, Independent Schoolmaster (Boston, Little, Brown, 1952. 371 p.).

5218. Highet, Gilbert. The art of teaching. New York, Knopf, 1950. xviii, 291 p.
50–9306 LB1025.H63 1950

Bibliographical references included in Notes: p. 283–291.

Humanistic exposition of the art of teaching, the methods to be used, the practices of great teachers from antiquity to the early 20th century, and the place of teaching in everyday life; written by the Anthon Professor of Latin at Columbia University, who was educated at Glasgow and Oxford Universities, and taught at the latter before coming to this country.

5219. Johnson, Alvin S. Pioneer's progress, an autobiography. New York, Viking Press, 1952. 413 p. 52–12704 H59.J6A3

Economist, editor, encyclopedist, educator, and champion of adult education, Dr. Johnson's experience included appointment at some half-dozen important universities, and the directorship of the New School for Social Research from 1923 to 1945. The story of his life throws light on numerous aspects of American education and culture.

5220. McCuskey, Dorothy. Bronson Alcott, teacher. New York, Macmillan, 1940. 217 p. illus. 40–35143 LB695.A3M3 1936

Study based on manuscript sources, and submitted originally as a doctoral dissertation at Yale University; establishes Alcott as a progressive educator in his own or any day, by tracing his work at the Temple School, Boston, as superintendent of the Concord, Massachusetts, Public Schools, and as dean of the Concord School of Philosophy. May be used with George E. Haefner's dissertation, A Critical Estimate of the Educational Theories and Practices of A. Bronson Alcott (New York, 1937. 130 p.).

5221. Perry, Bliss. And gladly teach. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1935. 315 p.
35–16598 PS2545.P4Z52

Intimate insight into education at Williams College, and at Princeton and Harvard Universities, provided by the autobiography of a distinguished professor who taught in all three institutions between 1881 and 1930 and who was famous for his Harvard courses in American literature.

5222. Peterson, Houston, ed. Great teachers, portrayed by those who studied under them. New Brunswick [N. J.] Rutgers University Press, 1946. xxi, 351 p. 46–11976 CT105.P44

Partial Contents.—Socratic Yankee: Mark Hopkins, by L. W. Spring.—Garman of Amherst: Charles Edward Garman, by W. A. Dyer.—Quaker scholar: Francis Barton Gummere, by Christopher Morley.—Princeton schoolmaster:

Woodrow Wilson, by A. P. Dennis.—Columbia galaxy: John Dewey and others, by Irwin Edman.—"I become Agassiz's pupil": Jean Louis Rodolphe Agassiz, by N. S. Shaler.—Beloved psychologist: William James, by D. S. Miller.—Wisconsin historian: Frederick Jackson Turner, by C. L. Becker.—"Kitty": George Lyman Kittredge, by S. P. Sherman.—Emerson the lecturer: Ralph Waldo Emerson, by J. R. Lowell.

5223. Smith, Shirley W. James Burrill Angell: an American influence. Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1954. 380 p.
54-14913 LD3275 1871.S6

Details of Angell's own education, his work as a teacher, and primarily his presidency, in turn, of the University of Vermont and of the University of Michigan, contribute to an understanding of American educational history from 1840 to 1909.

F. Methods and Techniques

5224. Douglass, Harl R., ed. Education for life adjustment, its meaning and implementation, by Maurice R. Ahrens [and others] With a foreword by Raymond W. Gregory. New York, Ronald Press Co., 1950. 491 p. (Douglass series in education)
50-7899 LB1027.5.D6

Bibliography: p. 459-473.

The life adjustment movement has been promoted by the National Commission on Life Adjustment for American Youth, a body originated in 1947 by the United States Commissioner of Education. This work comprises a series of essays by specialists and is designed to assist school officials and communities to equip American young people to live democratically and with satisfaction as profitable members of society, in the home, at work, and as citizens; addressed particularly to the requirements of those less well-served by the schools than students going on to higher education or into skilled occupations. The editor's own work, Secondary Education for Life Adjustment of American Youth (New York, Ronald Press, 1952. 630 p.), discusses social changes in America in relation to education suitable for a democratic society. The Commission on Life Adjustment Education for Youth (1947-1950) issued a report on Vitalizing Secondary Education (Washington, Federal Security Agency, Office of Education, 1951. 106 p.).

5225. Faunce, Roland C., and Nelson L. Bossing. Developing the core curriculum. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1951. 311 p. 51-5578 LB1555.F3

Offers a definition and an educational basis of the "core curriculum" in a democratic society, together with the methods of implementing the idea in the community, the school, and the classroom.

5226. Flesch, Rudolf F. Why Johnny can't read—and what you can do about it. New York, Harper, 1955. 222 p. 55-6577 LB1573.F55

Strongly advocates teaching elementary reading by the phonetic method and castigates methods other than this now used in such teaching; controversial book that has aroused much discussion and examination of the reading abilities of young Americans. A reply to this is The Truth about Your Child's Reading, by Sam Duker and Thomas P. Nally (New York, Crown, 1956. 181 p.).

5227. Grambs, Jean D., and William J. Iverson. Modern methods in secondary education. New York, Sloane, 1952. 562 p.
52-10179 LB1607.G66

References at ends of chapters.

Undertakes to set forth the over-all task of the American high school which, along with the elementary school, is the common school of all the people; relates present conditions to the necessary changes in methods of teaching and aims to give beginning teachers the basis of a sympathetic understanding of contemporary problems. The authors are members of the faculty of the School of Education of Stanford University.

5228. Hardee, Melvene D., ed. Counseling and guidance in general education. Edited under sponsorship of the National Committee on General Education, Association for Higher Education, National Education Association. Yonkers-on-Hudson, World Book Co., 1955. xix, 444 p. (Professional books in education)
55-4197 LB2343.H275

Bibliography: p. 427-434. Bibliographical footnotes.

Symposium composed of chapters written by professors and administrators in American colleges and universities. The high school teacher who is charged with responsibility for taking part in guidance work without special training for the task is served by Leslie L. Chisholm's Guiding Youth in the Secondary School (New York, American Book Co., 1950. 441 p.). General Clinical Counseling in Educa- tional Institutions, by Milton E. Hahn and Malcolm S. MacLean (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1950. 375 p.), draws together the theories and ideas of scientific clinical counseling developed by psychologists during World War II and applies them to the professional practice of counseling in educational work. Counseling Theory and Practice (New York, Ronald Press, 1954. 307 p.), by Harold B. and Pauline N. Pepinsky, is addressed to advanced students and professional counselors interested in making a contribution as psychologists and also as practitioners; emphasizes the scientific basis of the subject.

5229. Lindquist, Everet F., ed. Educational measurement. With chapters by Gordon V. Anderson [and others] Washington, American Council on Education, 1951. xix, 819 p. illus. 51–9853 LB3051.L5

Includes bibliographies.

Sponsored by the standing Committee on Measurement and Guidance of the American Council on Education and written by 20 specialists, assisted by some 50 additional collaborators, to provide a comprehensive handbook and textbook on the theory, techniques, and functions of educational testing and measurement. An additional reference book on the subject is Oscar K. Buros' The Fourth Mental Measurements Yearbook (Highland Park, N. J., Gryphon Press, 1953. 1163 p.). It covers the work of 1948–51, lists 793 tests, 596 reviews of tests, 4,417 references on the construction, validity, use, and limitations of tests, and 429 reviews of books in the field. Harold Gulliksen, professor of psychology, Princeton University, in his Theory of Mental Tests (New York, Wiley, 1950. 486 p.) brings together in one volume technical developments in test theories during the last 50 years and elaborates those he considers to be of especial interest. Clay C. Ross' Measurement in Today's Schools, 3d ed., revised by Julian C. Stanley (New York, Prentice-Hall, 1954. 485 p. Prentice-Hall psychology series) stresses a functional approach to educational measurement in a work that resulted from long experience while teaching college classes in the subject. Frank S. Freeman's Theory and Practice of Psychological Testing, rev. ed. (New York, Henry Holt, 1955. 609 p.), amplifies his earlier discussions of test standardization, tests of specific aptitudes, and the results of recent researches in the field, and describes a number of specific tests.

5230. Siepmann, Charles A. Television and education in the United States. Paris, UNESCO, 1952. 131 p. (Press, film and radio in the world today) 53–9290 LB1044.7.S5

Provides information concerning television and its use in schools, colleges, and universities, the educational policies of television networks, and the effect of television on audiences; indicates the cautions that are in order when the medium is used educationally. Teaching Through Radio and Television (New York, Rinehart, 1952. 560 p.), by William B. Levenson and Edward Stasheff, has the twofold purpose of improving school broadcasting and encouraging more effective educational programs. Since 1941 the Association for Education by Radio-Television has provided current news and information through its periodical, The Journal of the AERT. Beginning with 1930 a group currently entitled the Institute for Education by Radio and Television has issued its yearbook under the title, Education on the Air.

5231. Wittich, Walter A., and Charles F. Schuller. Audio-visual materials: their nature and use. New York, Harper, 1953. 564 p. (Exploration series in education) 52–12772 LB1043.W58

Based on nine years' experience in work with teachers on the use in the schools of graphic teaching aids, radio, motion-picture film, television, etc. Copious illustrations are supplied, while bibliographies and lists of sources from which audio-visual materials may be obtained are added at the ends of chapters. Briefly discusses the place in contemporary American education filled by such aids to perception and understanding.

Edgar Dale's revised edition of his Audio-Visual Methods in Teaching (New York, Dryden Press, 1954. 534 p.) emphasizes the theory of learning underlying the use of these materials in teaching, the various types of materials to be used, and their application in the classroom, from the elementary grades through high school.

G. Contemporary Problems and Controversies

5232. Bell, Bernard I. Crisis in education. New York, Whittlesey House, McGraw-Hill, 1949. 237 p. 49–8612 LA209.2.B4

Written as a challenge to American complacency, the book deplores faults observed in all levels of education in the United States, particularly with reference to persistent adolescence and the lack of intellectual and spiritual qualities. Nine steps in reformation are proposed in conclusion (p. 200–230). Canon Bell is not only a clergyman of the Episcopal Church, but also an experienced educator who has served as a college president and as a professor at Columbia University.

5233. Bestor, Arthur E. Educational wastelands; the retreat from learning in our public schools. Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1953. 226 p. 53–9761 LB875.M345

Denunciatory criticism of professional "educationists" and their educational effects by a professor of history in the University of Illinois. A later work by the same hand, The Restoration of Learning (New York, Knopf, 1955. 459 p.), incorporates material from the earlier book, and in Part Three (p. [219]–393) suggests means of "redeeming the unfulfilled promise of American education."

5234. Bode, Boyd H. Progressive education at the crossroads. New York, Newson, 1938. 128 p. 38–13086 LB875.B518

Reasonable and dispassionate examination of "progressive" education by a critical progressive. Carleton W. Washburn, a past president of the Progressive Education Association, in A Living Philosophy of Education (New York, J. Day, 1940. 585 p.) equates progressivism with efforts to incorporate in practice scientific discoveries pertinent for education. Lucy Sprague Mitchell's Our Children and Our Schools (New York, Simon and Schuster, 1950. 510 p.) pictures progressive education at the Bank Street Schools in New York.

5235. Hutchins, Robert M. The conflict in education in a democratic society. New York, Harper, 1953. 112 p. 53–8539 LB875.H96

Stating his belief that "graduation from an American university is no guarantee of literacy," the former president and chancellor of the University of Chicago criticizes the prevalence in America of four contemporary pedagogical doctrines he believes to be detrimental to sound education in any society: the doctrine of adjustment or adaptation to the total environment; the doctrine of immediate needs; the doctrine of social reform; and the doctrine of no doctrine at all. The writer's additional controversial and critical writings on American educational themes include The Higher Learning in America (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1936. 119 p.) and No Friendly Voice (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1936. 196 p.).

5236. Scott, Cecil W., and Clyde M. Hill, eds. Public education under criticism. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1954. 414 p. (Prentice-Hall education series) 54–5871 LA209.2.S35

Extensive anthology of articles gathered from miscellaneous journals written for and against secondary education as provided in American schools; selections are arranged under such headings as Philosophy, Progressive Education, The Fundamentalists, Teacher Education and Teachers, etc. A second anthology has been edited by Henry Ehlers, under the title Crucial Issues in Education (New York, Holt, 1955. 277 p.). It includes selections culled from publications of the past ten years concerning freedom, learning, religion and public education, separation of church and state, racial segregation in schools, progressive education, and classroom methods and materials.

5237. Smith, Mortimer B. The diminished mind; a study of planned mediocrity in our public schools. Chicago, H. Regnery, 1954. 150 p. 54–11285 LA209.2.S6

A parent who has served on a board of education, the author expresses his vehement opposition to certain theories and practices in contemporary public education in America, notably those called the "Core Curriculum," "Life Adjustment," and "Social Reconstruction." He aims to present evidence in support of the thesis that learning, in the traditional sense of disciplined knowledge, is fast declining in our public schools. His earlier and more theoretical work, And Madly Teach (Chicago, H. Regnery, 1949. 107 p.), has been called a primer for parents.

5238. Thayer, Vivian T. Public education and its critics. New York, Macmillan, 1954. 170 p. (The Kappa Delta Pi lecture series) 54–9475 LA209.2.T47

Considers dispassionately efforts by pressure groups to restrict freedom of teaching and negate the separation of church and state.

5239. Woodring, Paul. Let's talk sense about our schools. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1953. 215 p. 53–9020 LA209.2.W65

PARTIAL CONTENTS.—The shadow of John Dewey.—What is progressive education?—The teachers college in America.—The American teacher.—Academic and other freedoms.—Free enterprise and the teacher.—What we know about how we can teach.—The fundamental issue.—Appendix: Related reading, with comments.

Review and appraisal by a professor of psychology of the grounds upon which American public schools are currently being criticized as intellectually arid, undisciplined, and blighted by the predominance of methods over content.

H. Periodicals and Yearbooks

5240. American Association of School Administrators. Yearbook. 1st+ 1923+ Washington. E23–142 L13.A363

Published by the Association, a department of the National Education Association of the United States.

Volumes are monographic in character, as indicated by their individual titles, of which the following are examples: 1932, Character Education; 1934, Critical Problems in School Administration; 1935, Social Change and Education; 1936, The Social Studies Curriculum; 1938, Youth Education Today; 1939, Schools in Small Communities; 1941, Education for Family Life; 1949, American School Buildings; and 1953, the American School Curriculum. Each volume is produced by a committee of members selected for the purpose.

5241. The Education index. 1st+ 1929/30+. A cumulative author and subject index. New York, H. W. Wilson. 30–23807 Z5813.E23

Issued monthly (except in June and August) and cumulated periodically within each year. Annual and biennial cumulations are also provided. Indexes more than 120 journals, proceedings of societies, bulletins, and other educational serials, and adds references to various monographic materials. A special feature of each number and volume is an index of book reviews, entered in a group under the words, "Book reviews." American interests predominate but material on education in other countries is also indexed when found in the serials analyzed.

5242. The Educational forum. v. 1+ Nov. 1936+ Menasha, Wis., George Banta Pub. Co. 37–35898 L11.E29

Published four times a year.

Supersedes the Kadelpian Review.

Some numbers in two parts, the second part being a supplement including news of Kappa Delta Pi, an honor society in education, of which this journal is the organ.

Articles are broad in interest, being concerned not only with all phases of education in the United States, but also to some degree with education throughout the world. Numerous book reviews are written and signed by specialists; currently (1957) edited by E. I. F. Williams.

5243. John Dewey Society. Yearbook. 1st+ New York, Harper, 1937+ 37–27225 L101.U6J6

Monographic studies on such varied topics as the place of the teacher in society, freedom of teaching, democracy and the curriculum, workers' education, intercultural education, and the American elementary school. The society, formed to study the interaction of education, society, and culture in the United States, honors John Dewey's leadership in American thought and education but is not committed to any specific educational doctrine. Cf. Foreword, vol. 1, p. v.

5244. The Journal of higher education. v. 1+ Jan. 1930+ Columbus, Ohio State University. E32–99 L11.J78

Issued monthly (except July–Sept.).

Currently edited by R. H. Eckelberry.

Professional journal addressed to teachers and administrators; deals with significant investigations of problems of higher education in the United States, whether instructional, curricular, administrative, or concerned with personnel.

5245. NEA journal. v. 1+ Apr. 1913+ [Washington, National Education Association of the United States] 24–4821 L11.N15

The organ of the National Education Association, designed to keep teachers abreast of educational affairs in America, important educational news, and publications considered particularly significant.

5246. National Society for the Study of Education. Yearbook. 1st–5th [1895]–99; [new ser.] 1st+ 1902+ Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1895+ 6–16938 LB5.N25

Official publication of the Society. Yearbooks are published in two parts, each devoted to a special topic developed in a series of sections written by specialists or by a committee of specialists. Emphasis is placed on recording research, on innovations, and on modern developments. Typical subjects treated include: changes and experiments in liberal arts education; vocational education; education of exceptional children; education in rural communities; general education; audio-visual materials of instruction; mass media and education; modern philosophies and education; and mental health in modern education.

5247. Review of educational research. v. 1+ Jan. 1931+ Washington, American Educational Research Association, a department of the National Educational Association of the United States. 33–19994 L11.R35

Published five times a year, beginning with February, each issue of the journal is devoted to aspects of a specific educational topic, e. g., "Educational Organization, Administration, and Finance" (Oct. 1955); "Growth, Development, and Learning" (Dec. 1955); "Educational and Psychological Testing" (Feb. 1956). Edited (1956–57) by Tom A. Lamke. Substantial bibliographies are provided with reviews of the literature. May be used currently to supplement W. S. Monroe's Encyclopedia of Educational Research, described in this chapter under General Works: Historical and Descriptive.

5248. School and society. v. 1+ Jan. 2, 1915+ New York, Society for the Advancement of Education. 17–1407 L11.S36

Issued biweekly; edited (1956) by William W. Brickman.

In general, provides a leading article in each number that discusses a timely educational topic, followed by briefer papers relating to various types of education in the United States; includes "News and Notes" of persons and events, and brief lists of recent educational and related publications.

5249. The School review; a journal of secondary education. v. 1+ Jan. 1893+ Chicago, University of Chicago Press. 6–14090 L11.S55

Issued monthly (except June, July, and Aug.). Index: v. 1–10, 1893–1902. 1 v.

Features educational news and comments; articles on all phases of secondary education; selected, annotated references on a different topic in each number; signed book reviews, and lists of current publications. Issued under the direction of the Department of Education, University of Chicago; edited (1956) by Maurice L. Hartung.

XXII

Philosophy and Psychology

A. Philosophy: General Works 5250–5264
B. Representative Philosophers 5265–5387
C. Psychology 5388–5393

THIS CHAPTER seeks to give some idea of the American achievement in the two fields of philosophy and psychology, which were originally one in academic organization and in the public mind, and have now become almost completely divorced. It has been prepared with the full realization that both have been international inquiries coterminous with the higher developments of Western civilization. Until the 19th century was well advanced American philosophy was little more than a reflection of contemporary European currents. Transcendentalism, however much it may have derived from weightier German models, certainly developed a tone and temper all its own; while with the pragmatic movement, which gradually crystallized during the 1890's, American philosophical thinking took a quite independent line, and began in its turn to make an impression on Europe, although most of the early reactions there were, to put it mildly, negative. American philosophy has gone its own course ever since, with the two-way currents of influence normal between nations of the West, tempered by the fact that Americans usually pay more attention to what is going on in Europe than vice versa.

Section A consists of some general histories and historical anthologies of American philosophy, usually intended for classroom use, together with some accounts of individual movements or schools, and symposiums intended either to develop a particular point of view, or to give a cross section of American philosophical thinking at the time of publication. Specifically religious philosophy, as well as theology, will be found in the following chapter. Much additional matter of relevance to American philosophy is contained in Chapters I on Literature and XI on Intellectual History.

Section B presents 18 American philosophers from Jonathan Edwards to the present day, some of whom were eminent in their time and representative of historic currents of thought, while a few are thinkers of true originality and power, whose ideas are alive today and seem likely to remain so. Under each philosopher the entries are arranged in conformity with the pattern adopted in Chapter I on Literature, and more fully explained in its introduction: individual works arranged by the date of the original edition (although the entry here is often a later edition or reprint, preferred as more readily available); collected works; selected works; and biographical or critical studies. Some earlier figures of note, such as Cotton Mather and Benjamin Franklin, who are treated at length elsewhere, and whose specifically philosophical writings are neither numerous nor striking, have not been included here, although they usually receive some attention in histories of American philosophy. Two men, James McCosh and A. N. Whitehead, are included notwithstanding the facts that their minds were formed in Britain and they came to America in middle age with important work behind them, for each became thoroughly domesticated, and was looked up to by numerous disciples of native birth. American philosophy has tended, especially since the 1890's, to have its being within the universities; of the many professors who have done distinguished work during the last 70 years we have been able to give individual treatment only to a handful. Two subjects which have flourished in the latest period, symbolic logic and general semantics, have been well-nigh ignored here: the first is so bristling with technicalities that books suited for the general reader remain to seek, while the second is still far from any definitive form or agreed body of doctrine.

Psychology, which since William James has increasingly allied itself with the natural sciences, is now flourishing inside the universities and out, where a host of "applied" specialists give counsel to diverse enterprises; she quite overshadows her elder sister, who has shared in the general diminishment of the humanities in the present technical age. Our entries for this section are nevertheless few, because among a host of textbooks, monographs, and reported experiments, general views of the American contribution to psychology remain scanty. One whole aspect of present-day psychology, that which takes its origin in the diagnosis and treatment of mental disease or disturbance, is treated not here but in Section C (Psychiatry) of Chapter XVIII on Medicine and Public Health.

A. Philosophy: General Works

5250. Adams, George P., and William Pepperell Montague, eds. Contemporary American philosophy; personal statements. New York, Macmillan, 1930. 2 v. (Library of philosophy)
31–15738 B934.C6 1930a

"Principal publications" at end of each statement.

Thirty-three professors of philosophy, representing colleges and universities from Harvard and Columbia to Michigan and California, present in this work their principal philosophic beliefs and the influences which they suppose to have given rise to them. Some of these "philosophic autobiographies" stress early life experiences, while others are nearly all theory. An exceptionally attractive paper is the introduction by George Herbert Palmer (1842–1933); writing as "a kind of representative of the philosophic young men of my time," he deals not only with his personal experiences and beliefs, but with the golden age of philosophy at Harvard. Contributors to the symposium were selected by a vote of the membership of the American Philosophical Association.

5251. Anderson, Paul Russell, and Max Harold Fisch. Philosophy in America from the Puritans to James, with representative selections. New York, Appleton-Century, 1939. 570 p. (The Century philosophy series)

Bibliography: p. [543]–562. 39–13842 B851.A5

In large part this is an anthology of writings by American philosophers. The plan followed called for the inclusion of documents not readily accessible; this has led to a somewhat heavier emphasis on the early periods, with extracts from work by figures such as Samuel Johnson, Cadwallader Colden, Ethan Allen, Thomas Cooper, Benjamin Rush, and Samuel Stanhope Smith, as well as by later and better known philosophers. Introductions to each of the volume's four parts help to provide a general view of the main currents of development of philosophy in the United States.

5252. Barrett, Clifford, ed. Contemporary idealism in America. New York, Macmillan, 1932. 326 p. 32–31170 B941.B3

Contents.—In dedication: Josiah Royce, by G. H. Palmer.—Introduction, by Clifford Barrett.—Continuity of the idealist tradition, by C. M. Bakewell.—The ontological argument in Royce and others, by W. E. Hocking.—On the meaning situation, by G. W. Cunningham.—The philosophy of spirit: idealism and the philosophy of value, by W. M. Urban.—The principle of individuality and value, by J. A. Leighton.—The finite self, by E. S. Brightman.—God and cosmic structure, by J. E. Boodin.—The theory of moral value, by R. A. Tsanoff.—The meaning of obligation, by C. W. Hendel, Jr.—The revival of idealism in the United States, by R. F. A. Hoernlé.

In this book a dozen philosophers take their stand for philosophical idealism, and express their sense of the inadequacy of the dominant realist movement. These idealists are basically in the tradition of Josiah Royce (q. v.).

5253. Blau, Joseph L. Men and movements in American philosophy. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1952. 403 p. 52–8596 B851.B52

"Footnotes and suggested reading": p. 357–383.

"What is attempted here is an introductory account, stressing the more formal side of our philosophic history, to provide a background for the general reader and the beginning student which will enable them to read further both in and about American philosophy." Each of nine periods or movements is first discussed in a general way, and then through three of its representative figures.

5254. Creative intelligence; essays in the pragmatic attitude, by John Dewey [and others]. New York, Holt, 1917. 467 p. 17-6640 B832.C7

CONTENTS.—The need for recovery of philosophy, by J. Dewey.—Reformation of logic, by A. W. Moore.—Intelligence and mathematics, by H. C. Brown.—Scientific method and individual thinker, by G. H. Mead.—Consciousness and psychology, by B. H. Bode.—The phases of the economic interest, by H. W. Stuart.—The moral life and the construction of values and standards, by J. H. Tufts.—Value and existence in philosophy, art, and religion, by H. M. Kallen.

Pragmatism, indubitably the best known specifically American contribution to philosophy, has not been defined, either by its exponents or its opponents, in such manner as to win general assent, and there is perhaps a wider span of opinion among its adherents than is the case with other major schools of thought. It can be given a narrow logical definition, such as "the doctrine that the whole meaning of a conception expresses itself in practical consequences," but it can be more generally regarded as a serious attempt to domicile in philosophy the evolutionary viewpoint and the crucial importance of scientific experiment. The latter views appear in the "Prefatory Note" to the present work, which identifies the authors' attitude with "the ideas of the genuineness of the future, of intelligence as the organ for determining the quality of that future so far as it can come within human control, and of a courageously inventive individual as the bearer of a creatively employed mind." Of the eight contributors to this symposium, five taught in the Middle West and two on the Pacific coast; their essays discuss the application of the pragmatic attitude to logic, mathematics, physical science, psychology, ethics, economics, and to esthetics and religion. Three of the major figures identified with pragmatism, Dewey, James, and Peirce, appear in the following section on individual philosophers. An interesting anthology, Pragmatism and American Culture, edited by Gail Kennedy, is entered in Chapter VIII above (no. 3115). Two expositions dating from the era when the movement was gaining self-consciousness and public attention are Henry Heath Bawden's The Principles of Pragmatism, a Philosophical Interpretation of Experience (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1910. 364 p.) and Addison Webster Moore's Pragmatism and Its Critics (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1910. 283 p.). The criticism that pragmatism sought to operate in a metaphysical void was answered by Sidney Hook in his earliest book, The Metaphysics of Pragmatism (Chicago, Open Court Pub. Co., 1927. 144 p.). A study of the movement's greatest sphere of practical influence, the primary and secondary schools of the United States, is John L. Child's American Pragmatism and Education, an Interpretation and Criticism (New York, Holt, 1956. 373 p.). The movement has had some foreign affiliations; the English ones are noticed in Emmanuel Leroux's Le Pragmatisme américain et anglais, étude historique et critique (Paris, Alcan, 1923. 429 p.). Its students have naturally searched for American antecedents prior to James and Peirce; a work of this type is Eduard Baumgarten's Der Pragmatismus: R. W. Emerson, W. James, J. Dewey (Frankfurt am Main, Klostermann, 1938. 483 p.).

5255. Essays in critical realism; a co-operative study of the problem of knowledge. London, Macmillan, 1920. 244 p. 21-11051 B835.E7

CONTENTS.—The approach to critical realism, by D. Drake.—Pragmatism versus the pragmatist, by A. O. Lovejoy.—Critical realism and the possibility of knowledge, by J. B. Pratt.—The problem of error, by A. K. Rogers.—Three proofs of realism, by G. Santayana.—Knowledge and its categories, by R. W. Sellars.—On the nature of the datum, by C. A. Strong.

A further symposium in which five American professors of philosophy joined with Charles Augustus Strong, an Englishman who had taught at Columbia, and George Santayana (nos. 5365-5377), then resident abroad, to present an epistemological doctrine upon which they were in fairly complete agreement, although they held "somewhat different ontological views." Their principal aim was to convict the "new realists" of 1912 (no. 5260) of a naïve view of knowledge, and to replace it with a more sophisticated and complex one, in which the character-complexes or "essences" of perception are distinguished from the sense of their outer existence. There is thus a triple relationship between the mind, the essences of perception, and the existents known, and the validity of any cognitive experience "must be tested by other means than the intuition of the moment." This symposium, together with its predecessor, made epistemological debate the major interest of American philosophy for more than a decade.

5256. Frothingham, Octavius Brooks. Transcendentalism in New England; a history. New York, Putnam, 1876. 395 p. 10-28608 B905.F7

The author, some of whose work is discussed in the annotation to his life of George Ripley (no. 2279), was a Unitarian clergyman whose views eventually became too advanced even for the elastic limits of that fold. He says that transcendentalism actually did not exist outside New England; but he treats of its antecedents in Europe, as well as describing its American beginnings, its practical applications (notably Brook Farm), and its outstanding personalities. Sympathetic, uncritical, and written in the formal style of the period, his account is in part based on personal knowledge and remains valuable as a sourcebook. Perry Miller's The Transcendentalists (no. 2346) is an anthology of writings by those who took part in this philosophical movement.

5257. Hook, Sidney, ed. American philosophers at work; the philosophic scene in the United States. New York, Criterion Books, 1956. 512 p. 56–11398 B934.H6

This anthology attempts "to meet the natural and almost universal curiosity about what American philosophers are doing, about what lies at the center of their contemporary intellectual concern." The editor states that all important philosophical movements are represented, but that practical considerations have prevented the inclusion of all important individual thinkers. Most of the contributions are reprints of magazine articles; a smaller number are extracts from books published or to be published; a very few are papers printed for the first time. Nine philosophers contribute to part 1 on "Logic and Scientific Method," ten to part 2 on "Metaphysics and Theory of Knowledge," and ten to part 3 on "Ethics and Social Philosophy." At the end is a section of "Biographical Notes" on contributors (p. 499–507). The editor remarks that American philosophers are independent thinkers, that most of them adhere to no school, and that they rarely agree.

5258. Kallen, Horace M., and Sidney Hook, eds. American philosophy today and tomorrow. New York, Furman, 1935. 518 p. 36–722 B934.K3

Five years after the appearance of Contemporary American Philosophy (no. 5250), a different pair of editors produced a similar volume comprising the views of "twenty-five representative American thinkers." These are described as the younger generation (their birth dates range from 1873 to 1907, as against 1859 to 1885 for the earlier group). Space limitations forced the editors to include only those who had not previously published their philosophic self-portraits. The atmosphere in this volume is less formal than in the earlier work; nearly all are trained philosophers, but not all have become teachers of philosophy, which makes for greater diversity of theme.

5259. Muelder, Walter G., and Laurence Sears, eds. The development of American philosophy; a book of readings. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1940. 533 p. 40–33273 B851.M8

CONTENTS.—pt. 1. Early philosophical theology and idealism.—pt. 2. The period of the American enlightenment.—pt. 3. Transcendentalism.—pt. 4. Evolution.—pt. 5. Idealism from William T. Harris to James E. Creighton.—pt. 6. Pragmatism and critical empiricism.—pt. 7. Realism and naturalism.—pt. 8. Recent perspectives in American idealism.

This anthology puts less stress on the early period than does the one of Anderson and Fisch (no. 5251). It nevertheless covers more ground, for it continues well beyond James to such contemporary philosophers as Santayana, Edgar S. Brightman, and Sidney Hook. In addition to providing introductions and bibliographies for each part, the editors, with the object of helping the student to develop a sense of philosophical criticism, have wherever feasible included "a critical discussion of a school of thought by an outstanding representative of another point of view"; thus Arthur O. Lovejoy is brought in to reply to the pragmatists. and Irving Babbitt to reply to the naturalists.

5260. The New Realism: cooperative studies in philosophy. New York, Macmillan, 1912. 491 p. 12–18627 BD161.N4

CONTENTS.—Introduction.—The emancipation of metaphysics from epistemology, by W. T. Marvin.—A realistic theory of independence, by R. B. Perry.—A defense of analysis, by E. G. Spaulding.—A realistic theory of truth and error, by W. P. Montague.—The place of illusory experience in a realistic world, by E. B. Holt.—Some realistic implications of biology, by W. B. Pitkin.

Both manifesto and symposium, this was the first in a series of similar volumes which gave to contemporaries a sense of significant development in American philosophy, and certainly indicated that the long-unchallenged reign of neo-Hegelianism in the universities was at an end. "The Program and First Platform of Six Realists," reprinted here as an appendix, appeared in the Journal of Philosophy, Psychology, and Scientific Method for July 21, 1910; the same six, teachers of philosophy at Columbia, Harvard, Princeton, and Rutgers, elaborated their views in the present volume. The "Introduction" (p. 1–42) is a joint statement upon which all agreed; the six essays which follow are more personal developments of the same general outlook. All six sought an escape from subjectivism, with which they identified the hitherto reigning philosophy, idealism, based upon "the fallacy of argument from the ego-centric predicament." All sought a return "to that primordial common sense which believes in a world that exists independently of the knowing of it," and that can be directly presented in consciousness. This did not lead to monism, for the things of thought were as real as the things of sense, logical entities as real as physical ones.

5261. Schneider, Herbert W. A history of American philosophy. New York, Columbia University Press, 1946. xiv, 646 p. (Columbia studies in American culture, no. 18) A47–737 B851.S4

This survey which relates philosophical ideas to the general development of American society, ranges from the work of John Cotton and Thomas Hooker to that of John Dewey. It includes not only professional philosophers, but also philosophical belletrists, historians, scientists, and economists, and therefore approximates a general intellectual history. Numerous quotations convey the individuality of the several writers. The "Guides to the Literature" at the end of each part point the way for further exploration of the periods covered, and are supplemented by occasional lists of the most important works of an author or the major publications of a period. So far as contemporaries are concerned, Professor Schneider does not claim comprehensiveness, asserting that "a decidedly new chapter in American philosophy is being written, the outlines of which we still cannot see." A companion volume is American Philosophic Addresses, 1700–1900 (New York, Columbia University Press, 1946. 762 p. Columbia studies in American culture, 17), edited by Joseph L. Blau. It aims to provide the student with specimen works of literary value which elaborate the ideas dealt with in Schneider's History. There are presented 27 pieces, all but one of which were prepared for oral delivery, as sermons, orations, lectures, etc. Each is provided with a short introduction which places it in its historical context and supplies a chronology of the writer's life. All these addresses, the editor says, "have one distinguishing characteristic; all are speculative in nature." Each is "a popularized statement of a philosophic outlook as well as a call to a particular action or belief."

5262. Townsend, Harvey Gates. Philosophical ideas in the United States. New York, American Book Co., 1934. 293 p.
34–18313 B858.T6

"Selected bibliography": p. 267–284.

A comparatively brief, simple, and undogmatic introduction to the history of American philosophy. To some degree it is dependent upon the more elaborate research of I. Woodbridge Riley's American Philosophy, the Early Schools (New York, Dodd, Mead, 1907. 595 p.), and does not attempt to add to the latter's account of unpublished materials through the early national period. Professor Townsend aims at a genetic method of presentation, and divides our philosophical history into four well-defined periods: one of almost exclusively British influence, until the Revolution; a brief period of French influence; one dominated by German thought and romantic temper, beginning about 1820 and lasting until after the Civil War; and, finally, one of increasing independence and of conscious, professional philosophy. However, he finds that the dominant note of American philosophy has been idealism, in the sense of the ancient doctrine "that the invisible kingdoms furnish the foundation for the visible." A final chapter on "evolutionary naturalism" discusses the thought of James Mark Baldwin, John Dewey, and George Santayana.

5263. Wells, Ronald Vale. Three Christian transcendentalists; James Marsh, Caleb Sprague Henry, Frederic Henry Hedge. New York, Columbia University Press, 1943. 230 p. (Columbia studies in American culture, no. 12) Bibliography: p. [217]–224. 43–13153 B905.W4

This work, which originated in a Columbia University dissertation, traces the careers of three lesser figures who were drawn into the transcendentalist movement from an orthodox theological background. Marsh (1794–1842), a Congregational minister, was president and later professor of philosophy for many years at the University of Vermont. Henry (1804–1884), of the same communion, became an Episcopalian and served as rector, editor of The Churchman, and professor of mental and moral philosophy at New York University. Hedge (1805–1890), a Unitarian, was long professor of ecclesiastical history at Harvard. Each in his separate way made a significant contribution to transcendentalist doctrine.

5264. Wiener, Philip P. Evolution and the founders of pragmatism. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1949. 288 p.
49–10659 B818.W63

Through the informal discussions of a group of philosophical liberals who met at Harvard College in the 1860's and early 1870's, there arose the movement known as pragmatism, one of the most important in American thought. The issues discussed in these meetings as a result of the publication of Darwin's Origin of the Species, and the points of view of the members as given in their writings, both published and unpublished, are treated comprehensively in this book, which is addressed to the specialist. Professor Wiener expounds in detail the development of the pragmatic ideas of Chauncey Wright, Charles S. Peirce, and William James; in addition he presents valuable accounts of minor members of the Harvard group: John Fiske, Nicholas St. John Green, and Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr.

B. Representative Philosophers

5265. AMOS BRONSON ALCOTT, 1799–1888

Alcott, a New Englander who referred to his own version of the transcendentalist philosophy as "personalism," made a greater impression through the spoken word than through his many published writings. His main work, the journals in 50 manuscript volumes, has never been published in its entirety, but only in extracts (no. 187). His writings are largely vitiated by an artificial style which, his contemporaries testify, was not carried over into his natural and forceful conversation. Consequently it was as a lecturer, an educator, and a friend of most of the prominent transcendentalists that he exerted his greatest influence. His friendship with Emerson was particularly close and is studied in Hubert H. Hoeltje's Sheltering Tree; a Story of the Friendship of Ralph Waldo Emerson and Amos Bronson Alcott (Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1943. 209 p.). Alcott as a teacher is studied in McCuskey's Bronson Alcott, Teacher (no. 5220). Alcott, who was quite unworldly, undertook a number of ventures which ended in failure. The most conspicuous was his attempt to found a model community, Fruitlands, where a few persons might lead an ideal life as a "consociate family." He and his associate, the Englishman Charles Lane, who put up the money, adopted such impractical ideals and devoted so much more time and energy to philosophical discussion than to agriculture, that their "new Eden" was doomed almost from the start. An account of the experiment compiled from contemporary sources is Clara E. Sears' Bronson Alcott's Fruitlands (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1915. 185 p.).

5266. Shepard, Odell. Pedlar's progress; the life of Bronson Alcott. Boston, Little, Brown, 1937. xvi, 546 p.
"Bibliographical note": p. 523–528.
37–10152 B908.A54S5 1937a

An earlier and more detailed life of Alcott, but without some of the information at Shepard's disposal, is A. Bronson Alcott. His Life and Philosophy (Boston, Roberts, 1893. 2 v.), by F. B. Sanborn and William T. Harris (q.v.).

5267. MORRIS RAPHAEL COHEN, 1880–1947

Cohen was born in Minsk, Russia, and brought to New York's East Side at the age of 12; the privations of his youth were doubtless responsible for the chronic ill-health which hampered his career and especially the major works he planned but was unable to complete. His first philosophical inspiration came from Thomas Davidson, a Scottish neo-Hegelian of wide interests but unsystematic temper; after a few years of teaching in the public schools he was able to attend the Harvard Graduate School in the great days of the Philosophy Department, and obtained his Ph. D. in 1906. After six painfully frustrating years he at last obtained an appointment in philosophy from the College of the City of New York (1912), and taught there and at the University of Chicago (from 1938) until the failure of his health in 1942. He did not achieve a complete formulation of his philosophical ideas, of which he gave a preliminary expression in Reason and Nature below. Most of his writings offer partial aspects or applications of his philosophy; a number of his books were posthumously assembled, through the editorship of his son, Felix S. Cohen, out of miscellaneous publications and incomplete manuscripts. Cohen combined a strong sense of traditional values with a conviction of the importance of the scientific outlook and the need for a reformed logic. His most finished work is concerned with the philosophy of scientific method: An Introduction to Logic and Scientific Method (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1934. 467 p.), which he wrote with Ernest Nagel; A Preface to Logic (New York, Holt, 1944. 209 p.); and the posthumously collected Studies in Philosophy and Science (New York, Holt, 1949. 278 p.). Cohen called himself "a stray dog unchained to any metaphysical kennel"; his thought rejects the transcendental, but gives a greater role to the active human reason than does other recent naturalism; he rejects ethical absolutism, but finds the formulation of ethical principles a necessity in the ordering of human conduct. Cohen's influence upon his pupils and associates was enormous; he was, without much doubt, a philosopher whose greatness is inadequately expressed in the corpus of his writings. His doctrines and some of the problems which he raised are discussed in Freedom and Reason: Studies in Philosophy and Jewish Culture, in Memory of Morris Raphael Cohen (Glencoe, Ill., Free Press, 1951. 468 p.), edited by Salo W. Baron, Ernest Nagel, and Koppel S. Pinson.

5268. Reason and nature; an essay on the meaning of scientific method. [2d ed.] Glencoe, Ill., Free Press, 1953. xxiv, 470 p.
53–13311 B945.C53R4 1953

Originally published in 1931, this was the author's first book, and remained the most considerable statement of his general philosophical outlook. He described it as an "effort to formulate a more or less integrated view of life and existence without abandoning the painfully critical methods and standards of science." He was fully aware that it was an incomplete work, but published it as a stopgap to meet what he considered a grave need for a new philosophical approach. As soon as it appeared he began to make notes for the second edition, which incorporates his considered revisions made over a period of 16 years.

5269. Law and the social order; essays in legal philosophy. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1933. 403 p. Law 33–13199

Cohen was long concerned with legal philosophy and its relationship to social problems. Reason and Law; Studies in Juristic Philosophy (Glencoe, Ill., Free Press, 1950. 211 p.) reflects this concern. He made an original contribution to the philosophy of history in The Meaning of Human History (La Salle, Ill., Open Court Pub. Co., 1947. 304 p.), one of the most distinguished American works in this field.

5270. A Dreamer's journey; . . . autobiography. Boston, Beacon Press, 1949. 318 p. 49–7881 B945.C54A3 1949

"Bibliography of the published writings of Morris R. Cohen": p. 291–303.

Cohen did not complete this autobiography, and some of its earlier chapters which appear continuous were but portions or sketches of what he intended to write. Books 7 and 8 are a collection of personal essays and fragments assembled by the author's son. Two of these essays are concerned with Judaism; a larger collection of Cohen's writings on this subject was made in 1950: Reflections of a Wondering Jew (Boston, Beacon Press, 1950. 168 p.). The extraordinary range of Cohen's mind is exhibited in a collection of his articles from periodicals which he published shortly before his death: The Faith of a Liberal (New York, Holt, 1946. 497 p.); the 12 sections into which its 51 items are grouped include "Politico-Economic Issues," "Literature and Literary Criticism," and "Education"; and there are essays on "Why I am not a Communist" and "Baseball as a National Religion."

5271. JOHN DEWEY, 1859–1952

Since the death of William James, Dewey has been the most influential of American philosophers. His emphasis on educational theory and the practical applications of philosophy has resulted in large-scale changes in American education; these are discussed in Chapter XXI on Education (q.v.). His other wide-ranging interests have also given him influence, at minimum as an opponent to be answered, in most philosophic fields actively cultivated in the first half of the 20th century. Dewey started as a neo-Hegelian interested in resolving the conflict between theology and science, especially with respect to the Darwinian theory of evolution. During the 1890's he developed into a pragmatist following the lead of William James, and then went beyond James to head his own school of philosophy. His philosophy is grounded on his belief in the experimental approach of science and his postulate that experience is the fundamental source of knowledge and conduct. This has caused him to be called an experimentalist; he has referred to his own philosophy as instrumentalism. It should be noted, however, that despite the "materialistic," "pragmatic," "scientific," and "experiential" aspects of Dewey's philosophy, it has at its core a considerable amount of the idealism which has been inherent in most American philosophy, as seen in its main line of development through such thinkers as Jefferson, Emerson, and James. Nature is regarded as malleable by mind. In fact, it is this "idealism" that has led a number of Marxists to write strong attacks on Dewey and Deweyism. These constitute but a small part of the many works which have been written about Dewey, as a leading and controversial philosopher; such writings are represented here only in part. Dewey himself during a long lifetime was unusually prolific, so that it has been possible to cite here only a part of his writings, selected as representative of his varied interests.

5272. Psychology. New York, Harper, 1887. 427 p. 10–13718 BF131.D5

This, Dewey's first published book, was intended as a textbook, and is in many ways derivative. It shows his interests and position in his early years, and it has the additional merit of being one of the early attempts to establish psychology as an independent science separate from philosophy. A third, slightly revised edition appeared in 1891.

5273. Ethics. Rev. ed. By John Dewey and James H. Tufts. New York, Holt, 1938. 528 p. 38–31611 BJ1025.D53 1938

This widely used textbook expounds Dewey's moral position; in large part it deals with the ethical problems of modern economic societies. The volume was first published in briefer form in 1908. Tufts was Dewey's colleague during his 10 years at the University of Chicago (1894–1904) and was sole author of a number of works on ethics, as well as translator of Wilhelm Windelband's standard History of Philosophy.

5274. The Influence of Darwin on philosophy, and other essays in contemporary thought. New York, Holt, 1910. 309 p.
10–10721 B945.D4314 1910

Essays of interest as showing separately some of the pragmatic and idealistic elements which Dewey was later to fuse more fully into a philosophic system. "The influence of Darwin upon philosophy resides in his having conquered the phenomena of life for the principle of transition, and thereby freed the new logic for application to mind and morals and life."

5275. Essays in experimental logic. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1916. 444 p.
16–14107 BC50.D42

Dewey made his first generalized philosophical statement about knowledge in Studies in Logical Theory (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1903. 388 p.). A more fully developed statement appeared in Essays in Experimental Logic, which incorporated and revised part of the material in the earlier work, and added much that was new. This is then, in a sense, his first full statement of his theory of the relation of knowledge to experience and experiment, and thus of his basic philosophy of instrumentalism. The ideas were briefly presented with an application to education in How We Think (Boston, Heath, 1910. 224 p.). A further elaboration of his general theory of logic may be found in his Logic, the Theory of Inquiry (no. 5283).

5276. Reconstruction in philosophy. Enl. ed. with a new introd. by the author. Boston, Beacon Press, 1948. xlvii, 224 p.
49–1234 B945.D43R4 1948

This book originated in lectures delivered at the Imperial University of Japan in 1919 and was first published the following year. Dewey sought "to exhibit the general contrasts between older and newer types of philosophic problems" in the changed conceptions of nature provided by science, of experience and reason, and of the ideal and the real, pointing to reconstruction in logic, morals, and social philosophy. In the introduction to the 1948 edition Dewey expressed his "firm belief that the events of the intervening years have created a situation in which the need for reconstruction is vastly more urgent than when the book was composed," and chided recent philosophical tendencies for retreating from the actual.

5277. Human nature and conduct; an introduction to social psychology. With a new introd. New York, Modern Library, 1930. 336 p. (The Modern Library of the world's best books)
30–19598 BF57.D4 1930

In this work, which first appeared in 1922, Dewey treats from the point of view of "the structure and workings of human nature, of psychology when that term is used also in its wider sense," what used to be called morals, including in that term "all the subjects of distinctively humane import, all of the social disciplines as far as they are intimately connected with the life of man and as they bear upon the interests of humanity." This is generally regarded as one of Dewey's more important books, and some consider it his first major philosophical work.

5278. Experience and nature. Chicago, Open Court Pub. Co., 1925. 443 p. (Lectures upon the Paul Carus Foundation. 1st ser.)
25–4301 B945.D43E8

Dewey's first large-scale statement of his conclusions in the crucial borderland where epistemology and metaphysics meet. Since thinking originates in a problematic situation, the world in which thought operates must have the characters of "genuine hazard, contingency, irregularity, and indeterminateness." The human enterprise is summed up in "the striving to make stability of meaning prevail over the instability of events." A doctoral thesis which studies this aspect of Dewey's philosophy is John J. Battle's The Metaphysical Presuppositions of the Philosophy of John Dewey (Fribourg, 1951. 128 p.). A somewhat similar analysis of the Deweyan premises (tacit and explicit) is William Taft Feldman's The Philosophy of John Dewey, a Critical Analysis (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1934. 127 p.).

5279. The Public and its problems, an essay in political inquiry. Chicago, Gateway Books, 1946. 224 p. 46–7355 JC251.D47 1946

In this book, originally published in 1927, Dewey applies his basic idea of problem-solving inquiry to the realm of politics. The public is distinguished from the individual, the state, and the government. Mastery of the arts of inquiry and of communication will permit an organized, articulate public to come into being; the machine age, by perfecting its machinery, will become a means instead of the master of life; and democracy will come into its own.

5280. The Quest for certainty: a study of the relation of knowledge and action. New York, Minton, Balch, 1929. 318 p. (Gifford lectures. 1929) 29–23500 BD161.D4

By the quest for certainty Dewey means the history of philosophy before the "scientific revolution," and the certainty which it sought to obtain in immutable ideas and absolutes is in the nature of things impossible. By its predispositions toward "the universal, invariant, and eternal," the classical tradition in philosophy opened a gulf between theory and practice. Modern science has closed the gulf in the natural realm, with spectacular results, but it still dominates man's thinking in the social and moral realm. The consequent separation of means and ends is most clearly perceptible in the present state of industrial life, brutalized by the failure to regard it "as the means by which social and cultural values are realized."

5281. Philosophy and civilization. New York, Minton, Balch, 1931. 334 p.
31–28147 B945.D43P5

A collection of 18 philosophical and psychological essays which takes its name from the initial one, and includes Dewey's account of "The Development of American Pragmatism" (p. 13–35). All its varieties have an essential tenet: "the formation of a faith in intelligence, as the one and indispensable belief necessary to moral and social life."

5282. Art as experience. New York, Minton, Balch, 1934. 355 p. 34–27080 N66.D4

A work which, deriving esthetic values from vital ones, forms an integral part of Dewey's philosophy.

5283. Logic, the theory of inquiry. New York, Holt, 1938. 546 p. 38–27918 BC50.D43

This presents a further development of Dewey's theory of logic, which he had earlier presented in Essays in Experimental Logic (q.v.). It seeks to ascertain the common pattern or structure of all inquiry, whether in common sense or in science, and to trace the genesis of the logical forms which accrue when subject matter is subjected to controlled inquiry. Of interest in connection with this work is Horace S. Thayer's The Logic of Pragmatism; an Examination of John Dewey's Logic (New York, Humanities Press, 1952. 221 p.). An early historical treatment of Dewey's logical theories may be found in Delton T. Howard's John Dewey's Logical Theory (New York, Longmans, Green, 1918. 135 p. Cornell studies in philosophy, no. 11).

5284. Freedom and culture. New York, Putnam, 1939. 176 p. 39–27972 JC423.D524

The abandonment of the ideal of freedom in the totalitarian states of Europe induced the octogenarian philosopher to restate the interrelations of human nature, culture, and democracy. Democracy, he found, was in real peril, but less from without than from within our own institutions and attitudes. It could be maintained and perfected "only by extending the application of democratic methods, methods of consultation, persuasion, negotiation, communication, co-operative intelligence, in the task of making our own politics, industry, education, our culture generally, a servant and an evolving manifestation of democratic ideas." Since for Dewey freedom, democracy, and liberalism were all practically identical, his somewhat earlier Page-Barbour lectures at the University of Virginia, Liberalism and Social Action (New York, Putnam, 1935. 93 p.), present a similar argument in briefer compass.

5285. Problems of men. New York, Philosophical Library, 1946. 424 p.
46–25157 B945.D43P7

A collection, by the author, of his late essays, originally published as separate articles in various periodicals.

5286. Knowing and the known. By John Dewey and Arthur F. Bentley. Boston, Beacon Press, 1949. 334 p. 49–48030 BD161.D38

In this book Dewey (aet. 90) and Bentley (aet. 79) undertake an investigation comparable to the work of the linguistic and semantic schools of philosophic approach that developed in recent decades. This particular work is a "terminological inquiry" resulting from "a startling diagnosis of linguistic disease not only in the general epistemological field, where everyone would anticipate it, but also in the specialized logical field, which ought to be reasonably immune." The authors accordingly proceed to seek out means for the eventual relative immunization of logic to such linguistic disease.

5287. Intelligence in the modern world; John Dewey's philosophy. Edited, and with an introd. by Joseph Ratner. New York, Modern Library, 1939. xv, 1077 p. (The Modern Library of the world's best books)
39–27121 B945.D41R17

This big volume compiled by one of Dewey's most devoted disciples contains 85 substantial selections, drawn from 19 of Dewey's books as well as from a number of periodical articles, and arranged under 21 headings. It is thus a comprehensive survey of his thought. The "Introduction to John Dewey's Philosophy" (p. 3–241) and the "Editor's Note," on p. 525–566, are themselves the equivalent of a moderate-sized book.

5288. John Dewey: his contribution to the American tradition. [Edited by] Irwin Edman. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1955. 322 p. (Makers of the American tradition series)
54–9487 B945.D41E3

A volume of selections from Dewey's writings, seldom less than a full chapter in length, grouped under seven headings and preceded by a general introduction from the pen of the editor, a professor of philosophy at Columbia who died shortly after completing it. In accord with the principles of the series, the selections are made to illustrate "the contributions that John Dewey has made to the remaking of American ideas and institutions." This involves outlining his general philosophical position, but excludes much that is technical.

5289. Essays in honor of John Dewey, on the occasion of his seventieth birthday, October 20, 1929. New York, Holt, 1929. 425 p.
29–24486 B29.E8

CONTENTS.—Personality: how to develop it in the family, the school, and society, by Felix Adler.—Religious values and philosophical criticism, by E. S. Ames.—Evolution and time, by A. G. A. Balz.—Art, action, and affective states, by H. C. Brown.—Two basic issues in the problem of meaning and of truth, by Edwin Burtt.—Kant, Aquinas, and the problem of reality, by Cornelius Clifford.—A pragmatic approach to being, by W. F. Cooley.—Consolation and control. A note on the interpretation of philosophy, by J. J. Coss.—A philosophy of experience as a philosophy of art, by Irwin Edman.—Dimensions of universality in religion, by H. L. Friess.—A criticism of two of Kant's criteria of the aesthetic, by Kate Gordon.—A pragmatic critique of the historico-genetic method, by Sidney Hook.—Certain conflicting tendencies within the present-day study of education, by W. H. Kilpatrick.—Causality, by S. P. Lamprecht.—Externalism in American life, by M. T. McClure.—The empiricist and experimentalist temper in the middle ages. A prolegomenon to the study of mediaeval science, by Richard McKeon.—The nature of the past, by G. H. Mead.—A functional view of morals, by S. F. MacLennan.—A materialistic theory of emergent evolution, by W. P. Montague.—What is meant by social activity? By E. C. Moore.—The cult of chronology, by Helen H. Parkhurst.—Dualism in metaphysics and practical philosophy, by J. H. Randall, Jr.—Prolegomena to a political ethics, by A. K. Rogers.—Radical empiricism and religion, by H. W. Schneider.—The role of the philosopher, by T. V. Smith.—A methodology of thought, by John Storck.—Individualism and American life, by J. H. Tufts.—Looking to philosophy, by Matilde C. Tufts.—Some implications of Locke's procedure, by F. J. E. Woodbridge.

5290. The Philosopher of the common man; essays in honor of John Dewey to celebrate his eightieth birthday. New York, Putnam, 1940. 228 p.
40–8301 B945.D44P5

CONTENTS.—Ratner, Sidney. Foreword.—Kallen, H. M. Freedom and education.—Murphy, A. E. Dewey's theory of the nature and function of philosophy.—Nagel, Ernest. Dewey's reconstruction of logical theory.—Barnes, A. C. Method in aesthetics.—Randall, J. H., Jr. The religion of shared experience.—Hamilton, Walton. A Deweyesque mosaic.—Patterson, E. W. Pragmatism as a philosophy of law.—Hu, Shih. The political philosophy of instrumentalism.—Dewey, John. Creative democracy, the task before us.

5291. Hook, Sidney, ed. John Dewey, philosopher of science and freedom; a symposium. New York, Dial Press, 1950. 383 p.
50–7272 B945.D44H473

CONTENTS.—John Dewey and the spirit of pragmatism, by H. M. Kallen.—Dewey and art, by I. Edman.—Instrumentalism and the history of philosophy, by G. Boas.—Culture and personality, by L. K. Frank.—Social inquiry and social doctrine, by H. L. Friess.—Dewey's theories of legal reasoning and valuation, by E. W. Patterson.—Dewey's contribution to historical theory, by S. Ratner.—John Dewey and education, by J. L. Childs.—Dewey's revision of Jefferson, by M. R. Konvitz.—Laity and prelacy in American democracy, by H. W. Schneider.—Organized labor and the Dewey philosophy, by M. Starr.—The desirable and emotive in Dewey's ethics, by S. Hook.—John Dewey's theory of inquiry, by F. Kaufmann.—Dewey's theory of natural science, by E. Nagel.—Concerning a certain Deweyan conception of metaphysics, by A. Hofstadter.—Dewey's theory of language and meaning, by P. D. Wienpahl.—Language, rules and behavior, by W. Sellars.—The analytic and the synthetic; an untenable dualism, by M. G. White.—John Dewey and Karl Marx, by J. Cork.—Dewey in Mexico, by J. T. Farrell.—A selected bibliography of publications by John Dewey (p. 381–382).—Some publications about John Dewey (p. 383).

On reaching his 70th birthday, John Dewey was the unrivaled dean of American philosophers, and was accordingly honored with a Festschrift by his colleagues, pupils, and friends, in which all contributors acknowledged "a common stimulus in the leading ideas of a fertile mind," but presented their own thoughts. Mr. Dewey having reached his 80th birthday in remarkably good order, a further symposium was produced, the contributors to which aimed to state his key ideas for the general public in unacademic language. On his 90th birthday Mr. Dewey was still alive and a national committee to celebrate it was formed, which sponsored the third symposium, with 20 contributors, largely professors of philosophy, all concerned with particular aspects of Dewey's thought or influence.

5292. Hook, Sidney. John Dewey, an intellectual portrait. New York, John Day, 1939. 242 p.
39-27986 B945.D44H47

A nontechnical statement of Dewey's leading ideas in a variety of fields, together with a statement of important criticisms and a reply to them, by one of Dewey's best-known followers.

5293. Leander, Folke. The philosophy of John Dewey; a critical study. Göteborg, Elanders Boktryckeri Aktiebolag, 1939. 154 p. (Göteborgs kungl. vetenskaps- och vitterhets- Samhälles handlingar. 5. följden, ser. A, bd. 7, no. 2)
A41-4123 AS284.G7, föl. 5, ser. A, bd. 7, no. 2

"The aim of this book is a critical inquiry into the basic postulates of Dewey's philosophy."—Introduction.

5294. Schilpp, Paul A., ed. The philosophy of John Dewey. [2d ed.] New York, Tudor Pub. Co., 1951. 718 p. (The Library of living philosophers) 51-6324 B945.D44S35 1951

CONTENTS.—Biography of John Dewey, edited by Jane M. Dewey.—Descriptive and critical essays on the philosophy of John Dewey.—The philosopher replies. John Dewey: Experience, knowledge and value: a rejoinder.—Bibliography of the writings of John Dewey (p. 611-686).

This volume is intended to supplement Dewey's own writings by providing something of a resolution of conflicting interpretations. It consists of "a series of expository and critical articles written by the leading exponents and opponents of the philosopher's thought," followed by the philosopher's reply. The book first appeared in 1939; the principal change in the second edition is the bringing up to date of the bibliography.

5295. White, Morton G. The origin of Dewey's instrumentalism. New York, Columbia University Press, 1943. 161 p. (Columbia studies in philosophy, no. 4)
43-1850 B945.D44W45 1943

A documented study of Dewey's progressive "conversion" from idealism to instrumentalism.

5296. Nathanson, Jerome. John Dewey; the reconstruction of the democratic life. New York, Scribner, 1951. 127 p. (Twentieth century library) 51-6859 B945.D44N3

A concise presentation of Dewey's ideas in the fields of philosophy, education, and psychology, together with an estimate of his influence.

5297. JONATHAN EDWARDS, 1703-1758

In Puritan New England philosophy was conceived of as the basis for and rationalization of theology. Edwards was the leading exponent of the Congregationalist Calvinism of his day. A well-educated man, he was aware of philosophical movements in Europe, and could draw upon them in constructing his notable defenses of orthodoxy, such as The Great Christian Doctrine of Original Sin Defended (Boston, S. Kneeland, 1758. xviii, 386 p.) and his famous Enquiry into the freedom of the will (no. 26). Edwards was also a master of the new expository prose, and thus one of the major figures in colonial literature; his main writings are listed and discussed in Chapter I on Literature (nos. 21-31).

5298. The Philosophy of Jonathan Edwards from his private notebooks. Edited by Harvey G. Townsend. Eugene, University of Oregon, 1955. xxii, 270 p. (University of Oregon monographs. Studies in philosophy, no. 2)
55-63038 B870.A5 1955

CONTENTS.—Of being.—The mind.—Miscellanies.

5299. Miller, Perry. Jonathan Edwards. [New York] Sloane Associates, 1949. xv, 348 p. (The American men of letters series)
49-50164 BX7260.E3M5 1949

"A note on the sources": p. 331-333.

The life of Edwards was eventful only in its intellectual development, and Professor Miller is concerned here with tracing his career as a thinker. More details of his life as a clergyman and paterfamilias are given in Ola Elizabeth Winslow's Jonathan Edwards, 1703-1758 (New York, Macmillan, 1940. 406 p.). Another study of Edwards' philosophical position is Arthur B. Crabtree's Jonathan Edwards' View of Man; a Study in Eighteenth Century Calvinism (Wallington, Eng., Religious Education Press, 1948. 64 p.).

5300. RALPH WALDO EMERSON, 1803-1882

The leading figure in the transcendental movement, Emerson was considered by Royce to be one of the three outstanding American philosophers. He was not so much a systematic thinker as a poetic philosopher more inclined to trust his intuition than his reason. He was nevertheless a scholar familiar with many of the world's philosophies, and these he in large measure assimilated into his work, which had as its base the Puritan tradition that had been developing for several centuries. Because Emerson's philosophy was expressed in essays, lectures, and poetry of unusual merit, his works appear in Chapter I on Literature (nos. 280–306), where he is discussed in greater detail.

5301. Gray, Henry David. Emerson; a statement of New England transcendentalism as expressed in the philosophy of its chief exponent. Stanford University, Calif., The University, 1917. 110 p. (Leland Stanford Junior University publications. University series [29])
17–30128 PS1642.P4G72
Published also as thesis (Ph. D.) Columbia University, 1905.
Bibliography: p. [105]–107.

5302. JOHN FISKE, 1842–1901

Fiske's importance is that of a lucid popularizer who introduces a nation to new ways of thought. Influenced principally by the philosophy of Herbert Spencer, Fiske early endorsed Darwinian evolutionism. Much of his popularity resulted from his "reconciling" the new scientific doctrines with the theological orthodoxies which he continued to accept. Throughout his mature life he was important not only for his widely read books, but also for the innumerable lectures he delivered. His first important book was Myths and Myth-Makers (Boston, Osgood, 1873. 251 p.), which revealed one of his wide-ranging interests. He then started building up his lectures into books; his published articles had already established for him a considerable reputation. In the late 1870's he began to devote most of his attention to history, which remained his main field of activity to the time of his death in 1901. In history too he was not an original investigator, but a re-stater and popularizer from other historians of his day. In both fields he always displayed rare vigor and lucidity of style and a real probity in his presentation of the findings of others. These qualities made him one of the outstanding popular educators and intellectual leaders of the last quarter of the 19th century. After his death his work was collected in a set, The Writings of John Fiske (Cambridge, Mass., Riverside Press, 1902. 24 v.). A recent interpretation of the nature and evolution of Fiske's thought is H. Burnell Pannill's The Religious Faith of John Fiske (Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1957. 263 p.), which views his work as a restatement of the "core of the Christian message which the new science of his day had developed."

5303. Outlines of cosmic philosophy; based on the doctrine of evolution, with criticisms on the positive philosophy. With an introd. by Josiah Royce. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1903. 4 v.
4–21706 B945.F43O76

First issued in 1874, this is Fiske's principal contribution to philosophy, in which he presents a complete outline of the new cosmology. It long ranked as a major philosophical work and was highly praised by many of the evolutionary movement's scientific and philosophic leaders, who were glad to have Fiske as an ally.

5304. The Letters of John Fiske, edited by his daughter, Ethel F. Fisk. New York, Macmillan, 1940. 706 p. 41–1890 E175.5.F47
Mrs. Fisk's volume presents her father's letters without any index, introduction, or identifying footnotes. Fiske's letters are lively and unstudied; their interest is such as to make a modern biography to supplement them seem desirable. John Spencer Clark's The Life and Letters of John Fiske (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1917. 2 v.) presents its letters mainly in extracts comprising part of a biographical whole. It is a completely admiring work by a friend and engages in frequent discussion of the philosophy and theology of Fiske's day. A brief sketch by a friend is Thomas Sergeant Perry's John Fiske (Boston, Small, Maynard, 1906. 105 p.).

5305. WILLIAM TORREY HARRIS, 1835–1909

Harris began his career as a teacher in St. Louis. He early came under the influence of A. Bronson Alcott (q.v.); then, through his reading of Theodore Parker (q.v.), he was led to study Goethe and Kant. In 1858 he met Henry C. Brokmeyer (1828–1906), the Prussian-born philosophic ironmolder. Through him Harris discovered the philosophy of Hegel, which proved a decisive and dominant factor in his life and views. Under Brokmeyer's lead he took a prominent role in the founding and developing of the Hegelian St. Louis school of philosophy. Aspects of this movement and of the roles of Brokmeyer and Harris are discussed in Frances B. Harmon's The Social Philosophy of the St. Louis Hegelians (New York, 1943. 112 p.) and in Henry A. Pochmann's New England Transcendentalism and St. Louis Hegelianism; Phases in the History of American Idealism (Philadelphia, Carl Schurz Memorial Foundation, 1948. 144 p.), which also gives considerable attention to the influence of Bronson Alcott. In 1867 Harris founded the Journal of Speculative Philosophy, the first journal of its kind in America, and a leading organ for new philosophers until its demise in 1893; it also introduced to America much of the work of Hegel and his German followers. Because of poor health, Harris in 1880 resigned his position of superintendent of the St. Louis public schools and went to Massachusetts to take part in the founding of the Concord School of Philosophy. In 1889 he became United States Commissioner of Education, a position which he held until 1906. In this period he built up a reputation as a great educator, which has proved more lasting than his contemporary fame as a leading philosopher. While his philosophy of absolute idealism was rather more sophisticated and formally logical than that of the transcendentalists, it was largely derivative, and represented the end of a movement rather than the beginning of one. The fact that the St. Louis school as a whole produced no important literary work has contributed to its posthumous obscurity. Harris himself wrote much, but most of it took the form of articles and pamphlets, and his use of language was ordinarily lifeless.

5306. Hegel's logic. A book on the genesis of the categories of the mind. A critical exposition. Chicago, S. C. Griggs, 1890. xxx, 403 p.
11–16863 B2949.L8H3

This exposition of the logic of Hegel was Harris' most important single book and a focal work for the Hegelian and neo-Hegelian movements in America. It has been said that in it he cleared up some of Hegel's own obscurities.

5307. Psychologic foundations of education; an attempt to show the genesis of the higher faculties of the mind. New York, Appleton, 1898. xxxv, 400 p. (International education series, edited by W. T. Harris, v. 37) 6-30238 LB1051.H3

This is a statement of Harris' philosophy of education in the light of the faculty psychology, which by 1898 was rapidly dying out. Studies of Harris' role in education and his educational philosophy include John S. Roberts' William T. Harris; a Critical Study of His Educational and Related Philosophical Views (Washington, National Education Association of the United States, 1924. 250 p.) and Carl L. Byerly's Contributions of William Torrey Harris to Public School Administration (Chicago, 1946. 219 p.).

5308. Introduction to the study of philosophy. Comprising passages from his writings selected and arr. with commentary and illustration, by Marietta Kies. New York, Appleton, 1889. 287 p. 10–28629 BD31.H3

While Harris himself did not succeed in organizing his philosophical system into one work, Marietta Kies, in a master's thesis at the University of Michigan, did manage to select passages from his articles and books in such a way as to present a synoptic view of his system.

5309. Leidecker, Kurt E. Yankee teacher; the life of William Torrey Harris. New York, Philosophical Library, 1946. xx, 648 p.
A49–9816 LB875.H25L4

This, the only full-scale biography of Harris, leaves much to be desired as to organization and indexing, but contains a wealth of detail gleaned from his diaries and personal correspondence. It treats his philosophical activities as fully as his other pursuits. Other works on Harris and his philosophy include William Torrey Harris, 1835–1935; a Collection of Essays, Including Papers and Addresses Presented in Commemoration of Dr. Harris' Centennial at the St. Louis Meeting of the Western Division of the American Philosophical Society (Chicago, Open Court Pub. Co., 1936. 136 p.), edited by Edward L. Schaub, and William Torrey Harris; the Commemoration of the One Hundredth Anniversary of His Birth (Washington, U.S. Govt. Print. Off., 1937. 70 p.), edited for the U. S. Office of Education by Walton C. John. A more specialized study is Thomas H. Clare's The Sociological Theories of William Torrey Harris (St. Louis, Mo., 1936. 262 p.).

5310. WILLIAM ERNEST HOCKING, 1873–

Dr. Hocking was for 30 years a professor of philosophy at Harvard University until his retirement in 1943, and was widely in demand for special lectures in other institutions at home and abroad. A philosopher in the idealist tradition, he has given relatively little attention to epistemology or metaphysics, but has concentrated upon working out an idealist view of religion, ethics, and human personality, usually in harmony with orthodox Christianity. His general survey of problems and characteristic solutions, Types of Philosophy, rev. ed. (New York, Scribner, 1939. xix, 520 p.), was originally published in 1929 and has been widely used as a college textbook for nearly three decades. Professor Hocking has also been extensively concerned with social and political problems, in books such as Man and the State (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1926. 463 p.), The Spirit of World Politics, with Special Studies of the Near East (New York, Macmillan, 1932. 571 p.), Freedom of the Press, a Framework of Principle; A Report from the Commission on Freedom of the Press (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1947. 242 p.), Experiment in Education; What We Can Learn from Teaching Germany (Chicago, Regnery, 1954. 303 p.), and The Coming World Civilization (New York, Harper, 1956. 210 p.). Dr. Hocking's first 54 years of publication are itemized in a compilation of Richard C. Gilman, The Bibliography of William Ernest Hocking, from 1898 to 1951 (Waterville,

677676 O–63–48

Me., Colby College, 1951. 63 p.); it lists 207 books (18), pamphlets, addresses, articles, and letters to the press, and includes an index of principal ideas and references.

5311. The Meaning of God in human experience; a philosophic study of religion. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1912. xxxix, 586 p.
12–14946 BL51.H6

Dr. Hocking's first book, which established his reputation as a thinker of consequence. Written in the light of the religious thought of his "honored masters," Royce and James, it is an attempt to reinstate, on the one hand, religion as a valid and essential form of human experience, and, on the other, philosophy as a sound and reasonable interpreter of religion. Neither idealism nor pragmatism has presented an adequate view of religion; it is mysticism, conceived as a practice of union with God, which supplies their deficiencies. "There is no creativity in human life without the Absolute as one party thereto." Living Religions and a World Faith (New York, Macmillan, 1940. 291 p.) is "a discussion of the rightful future relationships of the great religions, what attitudes they should hold to one another, and with what justification we might look forward to the prevalence of one of them as a world faith."

5312. Human nature and its remaking. New and rev. ed. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1923. xxvi, 496 p. 24–362 BF711.H6 1923

Dr. Hocking's highly original treatise on ethics, which first appeared in 1918, assumes that original human nature is a group of instincts, which require to be transformed in order to achieve a social order or the supersocial orders of art and religion. The book originated in an effort to challenge a group of tendencies, Nietzscheian, Freudian, and others, which the author lumps together under the name of moral realism. It affirms that only the mind, rather than any instinct or group of instincts, can experience satisfaction, and insists that, over and above the work of society, there must be the work of the individual will, kept in mind of its proper goals by r e l i g i o n, and most adequately by Christianity.

5313. The Self, its body and freedom. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1928. 178 p. (The Terry lectures) 28–8941 BF311.H6

In these lectures delivered at Yale on the D. H. Terry Foundation, the author is concerned "with the old question, How is the self set in the world of nature?" and aims to contribute in "an untechnical way toward our sense of proportion in psychology." The self is called "a system of purposive behavior emerging from a persistent hope"; the body is regarded as an organ of the self as is, to some extent, the whole of nature; while freedom is the essence of selfhood, and every act of a living self a free act. A later inquiry in a related field is The Lasting Elements of Individualism (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1937. 187 p.), which the author describes as "a study in the philosophy of history—looking forward! It is hostile not to pragmatism, but to mere pragmatism: it believes that our experimentalism is destined to transform itself into a version of the 'dialectic method' whereby mere groping takes on a rational direction and destination. Out of the flux, certainty."

5314. What man can make of man. New York, Harper, 1942. 62 p.
42–17192 BD431.H52

A small book which is an epitome of Dr. Hocking's views on the crucial issues of the age. A democratic world cannot be based on the biological or the psychological human creature, but only on the human soul devoted to goals of equality and fraternity which lie beyond scientific measurements.

5315. Science and the idea of God. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1944. 124 p. 44–8718 BL240.H715

In these lectures, originally delivered on the J. C. McNair Foundation at the University of North Carolina in 1940, Dr. Hocking reviews the uneasy truce between science and religion; insists that, while science can tolerate an inactive or nominal God, religion requires an active one; and points out the ill consequences of "getting on without God" in psychology, in sociology, and in cosmology.

5316. The Meaning of immortality in human experience, including Thoughts on death and life, rev. New York, Harper, 1957. 263 p.
57–10950 BD421.H62

A volume built up out of lectures at three universities, which incorporates a revised edition of the author's Thoughts on Death and Life (New York, Harper, 1937. 260 p.). Its temper is far from dogmatic, but it emphasizes the crucial nature of death and survival for human thinking, and employs the relativistic doctrine of a plurality of spaces to suggest that the conditions which make for the concrete freedom of the creative self make equally for the possibility of survival.

5317. GEORGE HOLMES HOWISON, 1834–1917

Among the exponents of idealism was Howison, whose theory of personalistic pluralism resembled the philosophy of Borden P. Bowne (1847–1910), but was arrived at independently. While he holds a firm, if minor, position in the history of American philosophy, Howison's most notable contribution was his long service as professor of mental and moral philosophy at the University of California. His principal statement of his own philosophy was The Limits of Evolution and Other Essays, 2d ed., rev. (New York, Macmillan, 1904. 450 p.).

5318. George Holmes Howison, philosopher and teacher. A selection from his writings, with a biographical sketch, by John Wright Buckham and George Malcolm Stratton. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1934. 418 p.

34–17950 B945.H71B8

"A list of Howison's published writings": p. 381–387; "A partial list of references to Howison in philosophical publications": p. 389–390.

5319. HENRY JAMES, 1811–1882

James early revolted against traditional religion but retained his intense religious inclinations. After studying and criticizing the philosophy of Swedenborg, he formulated his own philosophical system, which has affiliations both with the Christian tradition and with transcendentalism, but is on the whole an extremely original formulation. God is the assumed starting-point, the Creator and the only reality; Nature is the preliminary and imperfect stage of creation; Society, or "aggregate humanity" redeemed by a pure and altruistic love of man for man, is its redeemed and perfected stage, the incarnation of God. Democracy, completed on a social and moral level instead of merely a political one, is the forerunner of redeemed Society. These views were expressed in such books as Substance and Shadow: or Morality and Religion in Their Relation to Life: an Essay upon the Physics of Creation (Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1863. 539 p.), Society the Redeemed Form of Man, and the Earnest of God's Omnipotence in Human Nature: Affirmed in Letters to a Friend (Boston, Houghton, Osgood, 1879. 485 p.), and the autobiographical fragment and the book, "Spiritual Life," in his posthumous Literary Remains (Boston, Osgood, 1885. 471 p.), edited by William James. All are individual in style and organization, and far from easy to read or comprehend, which is sufficient to account for James' very limited influence in his day and since. The elder James has to a large extent been overshadowed by his towering sons, Henry James, Jr., the novelist, and William James, the philosopher. This intellectually prominent family is presented in Francis O. Matthiessen's The James Family: Including Selections from the Writings of Henry James, Senior, William, Henry, & Alice James (New York, Knopf, 1947. 706 p.), and in Clinton Hartley Grattan's The Three Jameses; a Family of Minds: Henry James, Sr., William James, Henry James (New York, Longmans, Green, 1932. 376 p.). An independent biography of Henry James, Sr., is Austin Warren's The Elder Henry James (New York, Macmillan, 1934. 269 p.). He is also discussed at length in the autobiographical works of his son Henry James, Jr., under whom they are entered in Chapter I on Literature.

5320. Young, Frederic Harold. The philosophy of Henry James, Sr. New York, Bookman Associates, 1951. xiv, 338 p.

51–5328 B921.J24Y6

A study of James' philosophy, which originated as a Columbia University dissertation. Through the use of frequent quotations the author attempts to present all the key passages from James' writings. The bibliography (p. 321–332) is meant to be exhaustive.

5321. WILLIAM JAMES, 1842–1910

William James, son of Henry James, Sr. (vide supra) and brother of the novelist Henry James, Jr. (q. v.), is America's best-known philosopher. Often classed as a pragmatist, he called himself a "radical empiricist" whose method was "pragmatism." He first studied to become a painter, and when he had decided he was not an artist, studied medicine without intending to practice. He began his career as an instructor in physiology at Harvard; when philosophical problems became paramount for him, he transferred to the Department of Philosophy. This crossing of lines was evidenced throughout his work, but especially in his first major publication, Principles of Psychology. In this and subsequent works James revealed himself not only as an eminent thinker, but also as a quite original stylist, whose unexpected phrasing could illuminate the most technical matters and suggest the widest relationships of his subject. While his stylistic merits have retained for his works a wide general audience, it is the basic substance of his work which has earned for him an international audience and the reputation of being one of America's few truly great thinkers. One of James' most important works, The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902) is entered in the next chapter (no. 5431).

5322. The Principles of psychology. Authorized ed., unabridged. [New York] Dover Publications, 1950, ©1918. 2 v. in 1.

50–7801 BF121.J2 1950

This work, which first appeared in 1890, was one of the major books of the period. While it contains many philosophical observations and implications, it is notable as a work that led to the establishment of psychology as a separate science rather than a subdivision of philosophy. In it James rejected the traditional concept of the mind's independence of the body; both were presented as aspects of a single natural phenomenon. While the book has been superseded in some details, it remains a basic work in the science of psychology as well as a milestone in the history of philosophy.

5323. The Will to believe, and other essays in popular philosophy. London, New York, Longmans, Green, 1937. xvii, 333 p.
38-30375 B945.J23W5 1937

CONTENTS.—The will to believe.—Is life worth living?—The sentiment of rationality.—Reflex action and theism.—The dilemma of determinism.—The moral philosopher and the moral life.—Great men and their environment.—The importance of individuals.—On some Hegelisms.—What psychical research has accomplished.

A collection of 10 essays, most of which were originally delivered as lectures before philosophy groups in a number of colleges, first published in 1897. In them James discusses moral and religious problems in the light of his attitude of radical empiricism. Further papers of the same type will be found in Talks to Teachers on Psychology; and to Students on Some of Life's Ideals (New York, Holt, 1899. 301 p.).

5324. Pragmatism, a new name for some old way of thinking; popular lectures on philosophy. London, New York, Longmans, Green, 1940. 308 p. 43-44203 B832.J2 1940

5325. The Meaning of truth, a sequel to "Pragmatism." New York, Longmans, Green, 1909. xxi, 297 p. 9-27102 B832.J4

CONTENTS.—The function of cognition.—The tigers in India.—Humanism and truth.—The relation between knower and known.—The essence of humanism.—A word more about truth.—Professor Platt on truth.—The pragmatist account of truth and its misunderstanders.—The meaning of the word truth.—The existence of Julius Caesar.—The absolute and the strenuous life.—Professor Hébert on pragmatism.—Abstractionism and "relativismus."—Two English critics.—A dialogue.

5326. A Pluralistic universe; Hibbert lectures at Manchester College on the present situation in philosophy. New York, Longmans, Green, 1909. 404 p. 9-9478 B804.J2

CONTENTS.—1. The types of philosophic thinking.—2. Monistic idealism.—3. Hegel and his method.—4. Concerning Fechner.—5. The compounding of consciousness.—6. Bergson and his critique of intellectualism.—7. The continuity of experience.—8. Conclusions. Notes.—Appendixes: A. The thing and its relations. B. The experience of activity. C. On the notion of reality as changing.—Index.

An aura of frustration hovered over James' last years. He had damaged his heart in 1898 by overindulgence in mountaineering, and it was progressively giving out. A rounded, systematic, and definitive statement of his essential philosophy was greatly desired, by others and by himself. He was, however, in enormous demand for public lectures, and did not like to refuse, especially since he was convinced of the desirability of converting the larger public to the empirical outlook. He therefore undertook to lecture upon pragmatism at the Lowell Institute, Boston, in the closing months of 1906, and repeated the lectures at Columbia early in 1907, before audiences of a thousand. The lectures were worked into shape for publication by the early summer, and Pragmatism had a popular effect such as few philosophical books have ever achieved. It also involved its author in a tide of acknowledgment, explanation, and controversy which absorbed his energies. This led him to collect his papers on the same or related themes, the oldest of which, "The Function of Consciousness," went back to 1885, in The Meaning of Truth. Nor could a further invitation to lecture at Oxford University in May 1908 be declined, for here was an opportunity to take "the scalp of the Absolute" in the very citadel of its defenders. But, as he complained to one of his chief allies, "this job condemns me to publish another book written in picturesque and popular style"—A Pluralistic Universe. His sands ran out, and the "concise, dry, and impersonal" treatise that he had desired to write remained forever unwritten.

5327. Essays in radical empiricism. New impression. London, New York, Longmans, Green, 1938. 282 p. 43-15820 B945.J23E7 1938

Editor's preface signed: Ralph Barton Perry.

CONTENTS.—Does "consciousness" exist?—A world of pure experience.—The thing and its relations.—How two minds can know one thing.—The place of affectional facts in a world of pure experience.—The experience of activity.—The essence of humanism.—La notion de conscience.—Is radical empiricism solipsistic?—Mr. Pitkin's refutation of "radical empiricism."—Humanism and truth once more.—Absolutism and empiricism.

These essays, first published posthumously in 1912, are interconnected and had been brought together before his death by James, who apparently intended some such work as a presentation of his essential philosophical position. The work has therefore more unity than most such collections.

5328. Memories and studies. New York, Longmans, Green, 1911. 411 p.
11–26966 B945.J23M5 1911

A volume of essays and addresses which James had been planning to bring together, and were posthumously edited by his brother, Henry James.

5329. Collected essays and reviews. New York, Longmans, Green, 1920. 516 p. Preface signed: Ralph Barton Perry.
21–112 B945.J2 1920

A collection of 39 articles and reviews which had not previously appeared in book form.

5330. The Letters of William James, edited by his son, Henry James. Boston, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1920. 2 v. illus.
20–23198 B945.J24A3 1920

These letters reveal the pith and charm of James' informal style, as well as reflecting his strong family attachments, wide range of interests, frequent travels, and a farflung and unusually interesting body of friends, together with the progress of his career and the development of his thought.

5331. The Philosophy of William James, drawn from his own works; with an introd. by Horace M. Kallen. New York, Modern Library, 1925. 375 p. (The Modern Library of the world's best books) 26–948 B945.J24A5 1925

"The works of William James": p. 371–375.

The "selections which make up this book have been chosen with the view of presenting the philosophy of William James systematically in his own words and in convenient compass, with some approximation to that rounded wholeness he himself would have given it had he lived to complete his work." Dr. Kallen was a pupil of James, and was chosen by him to edit the uncompleted manuscript of Some Problems of Philosophy (New York, Longmans, Green, 1911. 236 p.), which James had intended as an introduction to the subject.

5332. Selected papers on philosophy. London, Dent; New York, Dutton, 1929. xvi, 273 p. (Everyman's library [no. 739])
37–5572 AC1.E8, no. 739

"First published in this edition 1917."

Introduction by C. M. Bakewell.

"The principal works of William James": p. xiii–xv.

CONTENTS.—On a certain blindness in human beings.—The gospel of relaxation.—The energies of men.—Habit.—The will.—Philosophy and its critics.—The will to believe.—The sentiment of rationality.—Great men and their environment.—What pragmatism means.—Humanism and truth.—The positive content of religious experience.

5333. Essays in pragmatism. Edited with an introd. by Alburey Castell. New York, Hafner Pub. Co., 1948. xvi, 176 p. (The Hafner library of classics, no. 7) 49–1115 B945.J23E67

CONTENTS.—The sentiment of rationality.—The dilemma of determinism.—The moral philosopher and the moral life.—The will to believe.—Conclusions on varieties of religious experience.—What pragmatism means.—Pragmatism's conception of truth.

Selections from James' more popular writings in inexpensive editions designed for college students or the general reader. A brief, very untechnical, and entirely admiring summary of James' thought was prepared by Lloyd R. Morris for Scribner's Twentieth century library: William James; the Message of a Modern Mind (New York, 1950. 98 p.).

5334. Perry, Ralph Barton. The thought and character of William James, as revealed in unpublished correspondence and notes, together with his published writings. Boston, Little, Brown, 1935. 2 v.

Bibliography at end of each volume.
35–25802 B945.J24P4

CONTENTS.—1. Inheritance and vocation.—2. Philosophy and psychology.

Perry (1876–1957) was a pupil and colleague of James who edited two of his posthumous books and prepared an Annotated Bibliography of the Writings of William James (New York, Longmans, Green, 1920. 69 p.). A quarter-century after James' death he produced this monumental study of the man and his philosophy, which was rewarded with the Pulitzer prize in biography in 1936. He drew upon some 500 additional letters not included in Henry James' edition of 1920. In 1948 he published a "briefer version" of this work in one volume (Cambridge, Harvard University Press. 402 p.) which gave less attention to James' immature views, but also incorporated some new manuscript material of importance. An invitation to lecture at Indiana University gave Perry the opportunity to sum up James' thought in a nontechnical way, and to indicate the development of his own thinking out of certain of its strands: In the Spirit of William James (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1938. 211 p.). Perry himself taught philosophy at Harvard for 44 years (1902–46) and excelled in summaries of recent thought for the student or general reader, such as Present Philosophical Tendencies: a Critical Survey of Naturalism, Idealism, Pragmatism, and Realism (New York, Braziller, 1955. xv, 383 p.), originally published in 1912, and Philosophy of the Recent Past; an Outline of European and American Philosophy since 1860 (New York, Scribner, 1926. 230 p.). His chief original contributions lay in the field of value theory: General Theory of Value (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1950, ©1926. xvii, 702 p.) and Realms of Value; a Critique of Human Civilization (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1954. 497 p.).

5335. In commemoration of William James, 1842–1942. New York, Columbia University Press, 1942. 234 p. 42-52145 B945.J24I5

CONTENTS.—pt. 1. Papers presented at the Conference on Methods in Philosophy and the Sciences, New School for Social Research, New York City, November 23, 1941: Remarks on the occasion of the centenary of William James, by Henry James. Remembering William James, by H. M. Kallen. A debt to James, by D. S. Miller. William James as psychologist, by E. B. Holt. William James as empiricist, by John Dewey. Two questions raised by "The moral equivalent of war," by J. S. Bixler.—pt. 2. Papers presented at the annual meeting of the Eastern division, American Philosophical Association, Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, New York, December 29, 1941: If William James were alive today, by R. B. Perry. The psychology of William James in relation to philosophy, by G. S. Brett. William James and the facts of knowledge, by D. C. Williams. William James as a moralist, by H. W. Schneider.—pt. 3. Papers presented at the annual meeting of the Western division, American Philosophical Association, University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wisconsin, April 24, 1942: Jamesian psychology and the stream of psychological thought, by J. R. Kantor. William James' pluralistic metaphysics of experience, by Victor Lowe. William James today, by Charles Morris.—pt. 4. Papers from other occasions: William James, philosopher of faith, by E. W. Lyman. William James and the crisis of philosophy, by Arnold Metzger. The founder of pragmatism, by W. H. Hill.

These addresses were assembled by Professors Brand Blanshard and Herbert W. Schneider.

5336. Wisconsin. University. William James, the man and the thinker; addresses delivered at the University of Wisconsin in celebration of the centenary of his birth. Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1942. 147 p. 43-52550 B945.J24W5

CONTENTS.—William James and Wisconsin, by G. C. Sellery.—The distinctive philosophy of William James, by M. C. Otto.—William James, man and philosopher, by D. S. Miller.—William James and psychoanalysis, by Norman Cameron.—The William James centenary dinner: Introductory remarks, by C. A. Dykstra. William James and the world today, by John Dewey, read by Carl Boegholt. William James in the American tradition, by B. H. Bode.—The Sunday service: William James as religious thinker, by J. S. Bixler.

5337. JAMES McCOSH, 1811–1894

McCosh was born and raised in Scotland, where he entered the ministry in 1834; however, he soon found himself siding by conviction with the liberals, and with them left the established Church of Scotland to found the Free Church of Scotland. McCosh was influenced by the then flourishing Scottish school of philosophy, and at the University of Edinburgh came under the influence of William Hamilton. These debts are reflected in The Scottish Philosophy, Biographical, Expository, Critical, from Hutcheson to Hamilton (New York, R. Carter, 1875. 481 p.), written after he came to America. McCosh's early acceptance of Hamilton's position was soon modified, however, as he discovered a closer affinity for the intuitionism of earlier thinkers of the Scottish school. His dissatisfaction with the naturalism implicit in J. S. Mill's System of Logic (1843) led him to write his first book, The Method of Divine Government, Physical and Moral (Edinburgh, Sutherland & Knox, 1850. 531 p.). This gained him attention in philosophical circles and led to his appointment to a chair at Queen's College, Belfast, Ireland, where he remained for 16 years. His writings at Belfast included two of his most important philosophical works: The Intuitions of the Mind Inductively Investigated (London, J. Murray, 1860. 504 p.) and An Examination of Mr. J. S. Mill's Philosophy; being a Defence of Fundamental Truth (London, Macmillan, 1866; 2d ed., with additions, New York, Carter, 1871. 470 p.). In 1868 he came to America to assume the position of president of the College of New Jersey (Princeton), which he filled with distinction for 20 years. Here he continued to write, but it was probably as a lecturer and educator that he had his greatest influence. His introduction of a modified Scottish intuitionism of "fundamental truth," leading to a "common-sense realism," brought a new philosophical mode to this country and was widely influential. McCosh was also a crucial figure in the controversy centering about the Darwinian theory of evolution, for in the 1870's he was one of the few ministers in the United States to defend the theory, which he viewed as adding to the glory of God's creation; his views were expressed in The Religious Aspect of Evolution (New York, Putnam, 1888. 109 p.). In America he became increasingly interested in psychology and produced several widely read books dealing with the subject. Notwithstanding his earlier career in the British Isles, he may be said to have become the most representative American philosopher of his day. He was genuinely receptive to new discoveries and ideas without losing his grasp of religious fundamentals, and is likely to remain a figure both interesting and estimable.

5338. Christianity and positivism: a series of lectures to the times on natural theology and apologetics. New York, R. Carter, 1871. 369 p.
30–11323 BL51.M2

Ten lectures delivered the same year at Union Theological Seminary in New York.

5339. The Emotions. New York, Scribner, 1880. 255 p. 10–21236 BF531.M2

An attempt to understand the psychical problems of the emotions. The author does not "overlook their physiological concomitants and effects," but he enters "little into controversy."

5340. Psychology: the cognitive powers. New York, Scribner, 1886. 245 p.
10–19670 BF121.M2

5341. Psychology: the motive powers, emotions, conscience, will. New York, Scribner, 1887. 267 p. 10–19671 BF121.M22

Widely used as textbooks, these works remained in print into the 20th century, when Jamesian and other psychologies in large part superseded McCosh's work.

5342. Realistic philosophy defended in a philosophic series. New York, Scribner, 1887. 2 v. 12–36367 B835.M3

CONTENTS.—1. Expository.—2. Historical and critical.

The first volume is a collection of McCosh's philosophical papers, which in large part had been published as separate booklets. The second volume is a series of studies of other philosophers.

5343. First and fundamental truths, being a treatise on metaphysics. New York, Scribner, 1889. 360 p. 11–31414 BD111.M18

A work which sums up the author's final philosophical position. In part it is a reconsideration and rewriting of An Examination of Mr. J. S. Mill's Philosophy; being a Defence of Fundamental Truth (1866), mentioned above.

5344. The Life of James McCosh; a record chiefly autobiographical, edited by William Milligan Sloane. New York, Scribner, 1896. 287 p.
4–16947 LD4605.A3 1868

Bibliography, by Joseph H. Dulles: p. [269]–282.

Some of McCosh's co-workers and students, during the last years of his life, wished to preserve a record of his activities. To this end they induced him to set down reminiscences from time to time; these have here been incorporated with other material to form a composite biography.

5345. CHARLES SANDERS PEIRCE, 1839–1914

Opinions of Peirce have varied greatly; he has even been called the greatest philosopher of the 19th century. Certainly he has had an extensive influence in the development of thought. However, his attempts at precision resulted in a difficult style, which, combined with his assumption of wide philosophical knowledge in his readers (he said he was writing for but one in millions), have left him with a considerable reputation among philosophers and virtual anonymity among the laity. Peirce began his career as a scientist, with intensive training in physics and chemistry, and followed this with extensive incursions into other scientific fields, such as geodesy, astronomy, and psychology. Science was thus a major factor in the development of his philosophy, for which he coined the word "pragmatic." With the development of a quite different and more popular pragmatism by his friend, William James, Peirce named his system "pragmaticism." While Peirce produced no one systematic work intended to expound his philosophy, he did write numerous papers (many of them unpublished during his life) which were intended to lay a massive foundation for a new philosophy for the modern age.

5346. Collected papers. Edited by Charles Hartshorne and Paul Weiss. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1931–35. 6 v.
31–30898 B945.P43C6 1931

Since a great part of Peirce's writings were still in manuscript form at the time of his death, much of his work appeared for the first time in the Collected Papers. Of this set the editors write in the introduction to volume 1: "The more important of these manuscripts of Peirce, as well as his published papers, have now been brought together in some ten volumes which will appear in rapid succession. The first volume contains in outline his system, so far as it can be presented, his writings on scientific method and the classification of the sciences, his doctrine of the categories, and his work on ethics. The next volume deals with the theory of signs and meaning, traditional logic, induction, the science of discovery and probability; and the third volume reprints his published work on modern logic. The fourth includes his unpublished original contributions to the foundations of mathematics, logic and graphs. The fifth volume contains his papers on pragmatism. The sixth is concerned with metaphysics. It is expected that the remaining volumes will contain his writings on physics and psychology, as well as his reviews, letters and biography." After a 23-year interval, the publication of volumes 7 and 8 under a new editor, Arthur W. Burks, was scheduled by the Harvard University Press for 1958.

5347. Chance, love, and logic; philosophical essays. Edited with an introd. by Morris R. Cohen; with a supplementary essay on the pragmatism of Peirce, by John Dewey. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1923. xxxiii, 318 p. (International library of psychology, philosophy and scientific method)
23–11850 B945.P43C5

Professor Cohen's volume of selections was made in an attempt to present a "developed and coherent" account of Peirce's philosophy, and did much to secure a wider appreciation of his importance. While the selections themselves are not supplied with editorial commentary, the introduction is intended to "help the reader concatenate the various lines of thought contained in these essays." The two collections which follow reflect the continuing demand for representative writings of Peirce's among students of philosophy.

5348. The Philosophy of Peirce; selected writings. Edited by Justus Buchler. London, K. Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1940. 386 p. (International library of psychology, philosophy and scientific method)
41–5564 B945.P41B8

Published in the United States by Harcourt, Brace & Co. Republished in 1955 by Dover Publications (New York) under the title: Philosophical Writings of Peirce.

5349. Essays in the philosophy of science. Edited with an introd. by Vincent Tomas. New York, Liberal Arts Press, 1957. 271 p. (The American heritage series, no. 17)
57–2087 B945.P41T6

5350. Buchler, Justus. Charles Peirce's empiricism. With a foreword by Professor Ernest Nagel. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1939. xvii, 275 p. (International library of psychology, philosophy and scientific method)
40–4294 B945.P44B8 1939

This Columbia University dissertation is probably the most serviceable of the attempts to extract a coherent doctrine from Peirce's Collected Papers, fragmentary as they are, and presenting a developing rather than a unitary and static outlook. Buchler regards Peirce as primarily an empiricist, and thinks that such of his metaphysics as is incongruous with his empiricism is of secondary importance. This empiricism he characterizes as public empiricism, supporting a theory of common or cooperative inquiry. Manley H. Thompson's The Pragmatic Philosophy of C. S. Peirce (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1953. 317 p.) is more critical and narrower in scope, being concerned with the limitations involved in Peirce's approach to philosophy.

5351. Feibleman, James. An introduction to Peirce's philosophy, interpreted as a system. New York, Harper, 1946. xx, 503 p.
46–8096 B945.P44F4

"This book has two aims, the first of which is to offer an introduction to the general philosophy of Charles S. Peirce, who may fairly be described as one of the greatest philosophers America has thus far produced." The second is "to exhibit the system which seems to be inherent in Peirce's philosophy." Mr. Feibleman is himself a professor of philosophy at Tulane University, simultaneously conducting a real estate business. The life of the academic philosopher in America is to some extent reflected in his autobiographical Philosophers Lead Sheltered Lives (London, Allen & Unwin, 1952. 321 p.). Feibleman's own philosophical works include Christianity, Communism, and the Ideal Society; a Philosophical Approach to Modern Politics (London, Allen & Unwin, 1937. 419 p.); In Praise of Comedy, a Study in Its Theory and Practice (London, Allen & Unwin, 1939. 284 p.); The Revival of Realism; Critical Studies in Contemporary Philosophy (Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1946. 333 p.); The Theory of Human Culture (New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1946. 361 p.); Aesthetics; a Study of the Fine Arts in Theory and Practice (New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1949. 463 p.); and Ontology (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1951. 807 p.), which is probably his major work to date. Feibleman has also written fiction such as The Long Habit (New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1948. 365 p.), a novel which uses an island near the Mississippi Delta for setting, and poetry, including Death of the God in Mexico (New York, Liveright, 1931. 90 p.), Journey to the Coastal Marsh ([Cummington, Mass.] Cummington Press, 1946. [22] p.), Trembling Prairie ([Lexington, Ky.,] Hammer Press, 1952. 73 p.), and The Dark Bifocals (Lexington, Ky., Hammer Press, 1953. 48 p.).

5352. Gallie, Walter B. Peirce and pragmatism. Harmondsworth, Middlesex, Penguin Books, 1952. 247 p. (Pelican books, A 254)
53–3033 B945.P44G3

Professor Gallie, who has since become professor of logic and metaphysics at the Queen's University, Belfast, North Ireland, "tries to make clear, in a form freed from Peirce's more difficult technical terms, the organic unity of three main parts of his thought: his theory of knowledge, his Pragmatism—something very different from the popular Pragmatism of James—and his metaphysics both critical and constructive." It is one of the very few English studies of American philosophy.

5353. Wiener, Philip P., and Frederic H. Young, eds. Studies in the philosophy of Charles Sanders Peirce. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952. 396 p. 52–5411 B945.P44W5

Twenty-four studies of various aspects of Peirce and his philosophy. This work is part of a design to submit Peirce's philosophy as a whole, or system, to methodical and searching criticism. The authors represented were all engaged in special studies of Peirce and his work.

5354. JOSIAH ROYCE, 1855–1916

With William James and Peirce (qq.v.) Royce is usually considered one of America's "classic" philosophers. He early developed a close friendship with James, who encouraged the younger man in his work; after a time the influence worked both ways. While James was a pragmatist in method, Royce called himself an "absolute pragmatist"; this touches on one of the main points of disagreement between the two; for while Royce accepted pragmatism in some measure, he was primarily an idealist who believed in the existence of absolute truth. This idealism was in some measure a development of his early religious training. This is reflected in his first important book, originally published in 1885, The Religious Aspect of Philosophy; a Critique of the Bases of Conduct and Faith (New York, Harper, 1958. 484 p.). This was followed by California from the Conquest in 1846 to the Second Vigilance Committee in San Francisco; a Study of American Character (New York, Knopf, 1948. xxxvii, 394 p.), first published in 1886, which in its history of a decade was "meant to help the reader toward an understanding of two things: namely, the modern American state of California, and our national character as displayed in that land." This work revealed the basic tenets of his philosophy as well as his interest in his native State. This interest was further pursued in his one novel, The Feud of Oakfield Creek (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1887. 483 p.). Royce's next book was The Spirit of Modern Philosophy (New York, Braziller, 1955. 519 p.), first published in 1892, and based on lectures meant to give "some account of the more significant spiritual possessions of a few prominent modern thinkers." Written before Royce became a predominantly "technical" philosopher with his own fully developed system, the book is stylistically one of his most successful. A more technical and abstract presentation of the basic themes of this book may be found in Lectures on Modern Idealism (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1919. 266 p.), first delivered at Johns Hopkins University in 1906. Royce's continued interest in ethics was evinced in Studies of Good and Evil; a Series of Essays upon Problems of Philosophy and of Life (New York, Appleton, 1898. 384 p.). His maturing philosophical view and his continuing concern with the state of American society (which he hoped to assist to an idealist outlook) is expressed in Race Questions, Provincialism, and Other American Problems (New York, Macmillan, 1908. 287 p.). There followed William James, and Other Essays (New York, Macmillan, 1911. 301 p.), a collection meant further to illustrate the philosophy of The World and the Individual (vide infra). His more specifically religious interests again came to the fore in his lectures published as The Sources of Religious Insight (New York, Scribner, 1912. 297 p.), which concludes with a restatement of the basic idea of The Philosophy of Loyalty (vide infra). A selection of miscellaneous, mostly early, essays was posthumously published as Fugitive Essays (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1920. 429 p.), a work of some importance, since the ideas of Royce's major works were often amplified and most clearly illustrated in lectures and essays. A considerable number of these miscellaneous writings have unfortunately remained unpublished.

5355. The World and the individual; Gifford lectures delivered before the University of Aberdeen. 1st series: The four historical conceptions of being. New York, Macmillan, 1900. xvi, 588 p.
0–402 B945.R63W7, 1st ser.

5356. The World and the individual; Gifford lectures delivered before the University of Aberdeen. 2d series: Nature, man, and the moral order. New York, Macmillan, 1901. xx, 480 p.
1–27347 B945.R63W7, 2d ser.

These two series of lectures, revised and considerably extended for publication, are usually regarded as Royce's most important work in metaphysics. He characterized them, in relation to his earlier work, as "a deliberate effort to bring into synthesis, more fully than I have ever done before, the relations of Knowledge and of Will in our conception of God," and as necessarily centering upon "the true meaning and place of the concept of Individuality." The four conceptions of being considered in the 1st series are mysticism, realism, and critical rationalism, which are in turn criticized and rejected, and absolute idealism, which of course survives scrutiny. "You are in God," the reader is assured, "but you are not lost in God." The 2d series is concerned with developing the implications of this view for cosmology, ethics, and religion.

5357. The Philosophy of loyalty. New York, Macmillan, 1936. 409 p.
38–33154 BJ1533.L8R6 1936

This best known of Royce's books, first published in 1908, presents a doctrine of the need of a basic ethical motivation in man's life. The loyalty propounded is to this general idealism, rather than to the narrow loyalties of particular causes, persons, etc., although it finds expression through these. It is summed up in the conception of "loyalty to loyalty" as the highest virtue. This takes care of the individual, but the world must sort out and harmonize discrepant or conflicting loyalties.

5358. The Problem of Christianity. Lectures delivered at the Lowell Institute in Boston, and at Manchester College, Oxford. New York, Macmillan, 1913. 2 v. 13–10606 BR121.R67

CONTENTS.—1. The Christian doctrine of life.—2. The real world and the Christian ideas.

This is Royce's final statement of his general position, the outcome of his "philosophical study of certain problems belonging to ethics, to religious experience, and to general philosophy." In it he develops his idea of loyalty as "the practically devoted love of an individual for a community," and presents Christianity as being "in its essence, the most typical, and, so far in human history, the most highly developed religion of loyalty." Royce sidesteps the entanglements of dogmas, controversies, and institutions found in historical Christianity, since he is concerned with the "essence of Christianity" rather than with such particulars.

5359. Logical essays. Edited by Daniel S. Robinson. Dubuque, Iowa, W. C. Brown, 1951. 447 p. 51–8059 B945.R63L6

5360. The Social philosophy of Josiah Royce. Edited, with an introductory essay, by Stuart Gerry Brown. [Syracuse, N. Y.] Syracuse University Press, 1950. 220 p. 50–10512 H35.R87

5361. The Religious philosophy of Josiah Royce. Edited, with an introductory essay, by Stuart Gerry Brown. [Syracuse, N. Y.] Syracuse University Press, 1952. 239 p.
52–41521 B945.R61B7

In the first title Dr. Robinson, director of the School of Philosophy of the University of Southern California, has made a valuable collection of practically all of Royce's writings on logic. Royce took up the subject quite late in his career, largely through the stimulation of C. S. Peirce, but subsequent logicians have abundantly recognized the quality and the importance of his contributions. Save for one book review of the nineties, all these papers were published between 1901 and 1914, and only one of them has appeared in other collections of Royce's essays. This is an unusual piece of bookmaking: the first 12 pieces are reproduced from typewritten copy, while the remaining 5 are photographically reproduced from the original publications. Mr. Brown, who is professor of citizenship and American culture in the Maxwell School of Citizenship of Syracuse University, aims in the last two titles "to make the core of [Royce's] social and religious thought once more available for all students of American philosophy and culture." He contributes a substantial introduction, "From Provincialism to the Great Community," to the earlier one.

5362. Cotton, James Harry. Royce on the human self. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1954. xiv, 347 p. 54–8622 B945.R64C6

Bibliography: p. [303]–311.

Because of Royce's conceptions of the human self as intricately related, and because of this idea's centrality to his philosophy, this book deals with nearly all of Royce's work. Considerable reliance has been placed on unpublished material, though only as a source of illustrations, not of new ideas. As an extension of the central theme, one chapter is devoted to the relations between William James, C. S. Peirce, and Royce.

5363. Marcel, Gabriel. Royce's metaphysics. Translated by Virginia and Gordon Ringer. Chicago, Regnery, 1956. 180 p.
56–11854 B945.R64M33

Originally written in French (La Métaphysique de Royce. [Paris] Aubier, 1945. 224 p.), this is one of the most distinguished and thorough studies of Royce's philosophy, although it limits itself to studying Royce's solution of the problem of metaphysics. A Norwegian dissertation on Royce appeared in 1934: Sverre Norborg's Josiah Royce, Puritaner og Idealist (Oslo, Lutherstiftelsens Forlag. 441 p.).

5364. Smith, John Edwin. Royce's social infinite: the community of interpretation. New York, Liberal Arts Press, 1950. 176 p.
50-6708 B945.R64S5

Bibliography: p. 171–173.

This Columbia University dissertation studies Royce's fusion of Christianity and his own idealism, as expressed in his idea of a community, created by individual minds linked together by the special kind of knowing he named interpretation, and sustained by that loyalty which was the supreme good of life.

5365. GEORGE SANTAYANA, 1863–1952

Santayana taught philosophy at Harvard University for 22 years, but the greater part of his published work was produced after his resignation in 1911. Many of Santayana's works have been in a predominantly literary vein; these are entered in the Literature section of the bibliography (nos. 1733–1742, of which 1738 and 1739 are of special philosophic interest). This interest in literature has been carried over into his philosophical writings, which are noted for their stylistic qualities. It is also to be traced in his very philosophic conceptions, for his system has been called a poetic naturalism. His pervasive interest is in moral philosophy (outside traditional theologies), but he is basically a naturalist who starts with the view that all ideas must be explained in the context of the environment wherein they arise. He does not believe that any moral value exists in nature, but he does think that the philosopher may, through the contemplation of all arts and sciences, arrive at a general view of nature and human nature, and then ascribe value to any human enterprise insofar as it realizes the excellences which nature makes possible. Influenced primarily by the earlier Greeks and by Spinoza, Santayana combined two principles seldom joined: "naturalism as to the origin and history of mankind, and fidelity in moral sentiment, to the inspiration of reason." This accounts for the frequent approaches to paradox in his writings, and for those passages, no less startling for their being numerous, in which he cancels with his left, or naturalistic hand, the elaborate constructions of his right, or rationalistic one. He has had many admirers, but few followers among professional philosophers.

5366. The Sense of beauty, being the outlines of aesthetic theory. With a foreword by Philip Blair Rice. New York, Modern Library, 1955. 268 p. (The Modern Library of the world's best books, 292) 55-10656 N66.S23 1955a

This book, which first appeared in 1896, was Santayana's first philosophical volume. It remains one of the important works in the field of the philosophy of aesthetics.

5367. The Life of reason; or, The phases of human progress. One-volume ed., rev. by the author in collaboration with Daniel Cory. New York, Scribner, 1954. 504 p. 54-477 B945.S23L7 1953

This work, which originally appeared in five volumes in 1905–6, is considered by some critics to be Santayana's major work. It rapidly became one of the leading documents of naturalistic philosophy. It successively studies reason in common sense, society, religion, art, and science. In this edition, which has been somewhat abridged as well as revised, the author undertook to clarify obscurities in the original version.

5368. Winds of doctrine, and Platonism and the spiritual life. New York, Harper, 1957. 312 p. (Harper torchbooks, TB 24)
57-10533 B945.S23W7 1957

A paperback reprint of two works, the first of which was originally published in 1913 and the second in 1927. Winds of Doctrine originally bore the subtitle Studies in Contemporary Opinion, and consists of six essays, some of which review the general trends of the day in philosophy, while two subject the views of Henri Bergson and Bertrand Russell to severe critical scrutiny. This volume also contains the essay which coined a phrase that has been of some importance in American intellectual history: "The Genteel Tradition in American Philosophy." Lumping together the older schools under a word that had acquired an aura of absurdity, he gave impetus to the movement for eliminating the lingering influence of Protestantism, and particularly the inculcation of moral responsibility, from American higher education. Eighteen years later he detected in the so-called "New Humanism" a possible resurgence of these elements, and returned to the attack in a small volume, The Genteel Tradition at Bay (New York, Scribner, 1931. 74 p.). The second title defines spirit as "an overtone of animal life, a realization, on a hypostatic plane, of certain moving unities in matter," and spiritual life as "disintoxication from the influence of values."

5369. Character and opinion in the United States. New York, Norton, 1934. 233 p. (White oak library) 34-28429 B945.S23C5 1934

Contents.—The moral background.—The academic environment. — William James. — Josiah Royce.—Later speculations.—Materialism and idealism in American life.—English liberty in America.

First published in 1920, after having been given as lectures in England, this work attempts to interpret the American people and the philosophy of this country. The work is written from a very personal point of view, centering in Santayana's experiences at Harvard, his knowledge of the Boston area, and his views on New England. Most examples are chosen from within this area, and a large part of the book is a discussion of philosophers and the Department of Philosophy at Harvard, with some conclusions about the American temper drawn from these.

5370. Scepticism and animal faith; introduction to a system of philosophy. [New York] Dover Publications, 1955. 314 p.
55–14672 B945.S23S3 1955

This new edition presents in unaltered form the text of the first edition of 1923. The work may serve as an introduction to Santayana's philosophy, and as such may be regarded as an epistemological foreword to Realms of Being (vide infra). Everyday common sense realism, or animal faith, is regarded as a sounder theory of knowledge than the artificial doctrines of philosophic schools, which in concentrating on some facts ignore most of the others.

5371. Realms of being. One-volume ed., with a new introd. by the author. New York, Scribner, 1942. xxxii, 862 p.
42–36200 B945.S23R42

CONTENTS.—The realm of essence.—The realm of matter.—The realm of truth.—The realm of spirit.

This work was originally issued as four separate volumes between 1923 and 1940. This is a full statement of Santayana's mature philosophy. Matter is the unknowable but omnipotent basis for the other realms. Essence is "the infinite multitude of distinguishable ideal terms," the set of signals through which alone man knows the realm of matter. Truth is the limited realm of identity between essence and existence, but the truth of human experience is partial and relative. Spirit is the imaginative reshaping of the realm of matter into orderly and harmonious structure, but it has no significance apart from its physical substratum.

5372. The Idea of Christ in the Gospels; or, God in man, a critical essay. New York, Scribner, 1946. 266 p. 46–25109 BT201.S263

An interpretation of the Gospels in the light of Santayana's special variety of naturalism, which called religions "the great fairy-tales of the conscience." One bemused critic called it "the most devout book ever written by an unbeliever." However, the idea of Christ as expressed in the Gospels is found "to be vivid indeed, but not intellectually clear," and earthly lives modeled upon it "hardly present a satisfactory view of human perfection."

5373. Works. Triton ed. [New York, Scribner] 1936–37. 14 v. 37–6148 B945.S2 1936

5374. The Philosophy of Santayana; selections from all the works of George Santayana. New and greatly enl. ed., edited, with a new pref. and an introductory essay, by Irwin Edman. New York, Scribner, 1953. lxii, 904 p.
53–11902 B945.S21 1953

5375. Butler, Richard. The mind of Santayana. Chicago, Regnery, 1955. 234 p.
55–10827 B945.S24B8

In this study of Santayana's philosophy emphasis is placed on Scepticism and Animal Faith and Realms of Being (qq. v.), with lesser note taken of his other works. Excluded from consideration is The Life of Reason (q. v.), since Santayana told Mr. Butler that he considered it immature, and that even the revised version had been done when he was too weak to undertake it effectively. A dissertation which studies The Life of Reason in some detail is Milton Karl Munitz' The Moral Philosophy of Santayana (New York, Columbia University Press, 1939. 116 p.).

5376. Howgate, George W. George Santayana. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1938. 363 p. 39–7881 B945.S24H6

Aiming at a biography of Santayana's mind, the author presents the facts of his life, his literary productions, and his philosophic doctrines in a balanced volume which lacks only the last 15 years of a career that remained remarkably productive even in its ninth decade.

5377. Schilpp, Paul A., ed. The philosophy of George Santayana. [2d ed.] New York, Tudor Pub. Co., 1951. 710 p. (The Library of living philosophers) 51–6325 B945.S24S35 1951

In the first part of this book a number of Santayana's supporters and opponents comment upon his work. In the second part Santayana presents his replies to criticisms made or problems raised in the first part. A notable feature of the book is the extensive bibliography (p. 609–680).

5378. PAUL WEISS, 1901–

With the rapidly increasing specialization in all fields of knowledge in the 20th century the relative number of philosophers who take all knowledge for their domain has been steadily declining. Weiss, a professor of philosophy at Yale University, is here included as a leading representative of the diminished younger generation of universal philosophers. He was a student of Alfred North Whitehead, whose influence may be traced in much of his work. However, over the years he has been constructing a system of obvious originality, although growing out of what has gone before. All his books to date have been written as solid contributions to philosophy, and have not been simplified for lay readers. Professor Weiss' work has so far been predominantly concerned with problems arising from logic, the nature of reality, man's place in nature, and ethics.

5379. Reality. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1938. 314 p. 39–3540 BD21.W4

5380. Nature and man. New York, Holt, 1947. xxii, 287 p. 47–1847 BD431.W32

5381. Man's freedom. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1950. 325 p.
50–7197 BD21.W39

5382. Modes of being. Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1958. 617 p.
57–11877 B945.W396M6 1958

5383. ALFRED NORTH WHITEHEAD, 1861–1947

Whitehead was born in England and while teaching at Trinity College, Cambridge, and at the University of London developed a reputation as a leading mathematician and logician. In 1924 he came to America and taught at Harvard for 12 years. While the general principles of his philosophy had been developed in England, some of his major philosophical works were written in America. This philosophy he called a philosophy of "organism," which may be regarded as a philosophical theory of relativity in which everything has an active relationship with everything else. This fitted in with the trend to philosophies of schematic progress, as distinct from the "static morphological universe" inherent in most earlier systems. The accord between Whitehead's philosophy and the state of modern knowledge was such that he became a highly influential philosopher, and the acknowledged leader of a widespread movement in America. For this reason, while he remains basically English (as McCosh in an earlier generation remained basically Scottish), some understanding of his work is necessary for anyone who would understand recent developments in American philosophy.

5384. Alfred North Whitehead: an anthology. Selected by F. S. C. Northrop and Mason W. Gross. Introductions and a note on Whitehead's terminology, by Mason W. Gross. New York, Macmillan, 1953. 928 p.
53–12112 B1674.W351N6

5385. Schilpp, Paul A., ed. The philosophy of Alfred North Whitehead. [2d ed.] New York, Tudor Pub. Co., 1951. 797 p. (The Library of living philosophers)
51–6323 B1674.W38S35 1951

This volume contains a number of essays on the philosophy of Whitehead, including a very long one by Victor Lowe on "The Development of Whitehead's Philosophy." There are also some "Autobiographical Notes" and an extensive bibliography. Because of Whitehead's advanced age and illness at the time this work was compiled, he did not write a reply to the commentaries, although the other volumes in the series of which this is a part do have such a feature. Instead, he contributed some hitherto unpublished essays which he considered expressive of his final position.

5386. CHAUNCEY WRIGHT, 1830–1875

Though he himself did not use the term pragmatism, Wright's philosophy was in many ways a precursor of that movement. He was trained in mathematics and physics, and he developed a strong interest in philosophy. As a result, his philosophy was scientific rather than metaphysical. Because of his close examination of scientific method and his belief in the importance of scientific psychology for the further development of philosophy, he foreshadowed a number of aspects of modern philosophical movements.

5387. Philosophical discussions. With a biographical sketch of the author by Charles Eliot Norton. New York, Holt, 1877. xxiii, 434 p.
10–29063 B945.W73P5

This volume contains the greater part of the author's published philosophical writings, most of which had appeared as periodical articles. A further insight into his life and thought may be gleaned from his Letters (Cambridge, John Wilson, 1878. 392 p.). The connecting commentary by James Bradley Thayer enables this to serve as something of a biography.

C. Psychology

5388. Fay, Jay Wharton. American psychology before William James. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1939. 240 p. (Rutgers University studies in psychology, no. 1)
39–13495 BF108.U5F3

"Chronological table of American works and foreign sources": p. 219–226.

"Bibliography of primary sources in American psychology before 1890": p. 227–232.

The publication of James' Principles of Psychology (no. 5322) in 1890 was so epoch-making an event as to cast his predecessors in the shade, and led to the impression that the earlier history of the discipline here was a blank—an impression which has assumed the guise of fact in some serious works on psychology. Dr. Fay has no difficulty in showing that psychology was studied here from the beginnings of American academic thought, on much the same lines as in Europe; that it was a branch of moral philosophy down to about 1776, and a branch of "intellectual philosophy," after Scottish models, down to 1861; and that during the next 30 years German influences were mixed with English ones in the prevalent "philosophy of the mind." As the author says, if psychology is exclusively a natural science and there was no psychology in America before James (1842–1910), then equally there was no psychology in Europe before Wilhelm Wundt (1832–1920).

5389. Heidbreder, Edna. Seven psychologies. Student's ed. New York, Century Co., 1933. 450 p. 33–1339 BF95.H4 1933

Dr. Heidbreder regards systems of psychology as programs of action, without which few facts could be collected; as bases of morale, without which inquiry would be vague and aimless; "as ways and means of arriving at knowledge, as temporary but necessary stages in the development of a science." After preliminary chapters on systems as such, on prescientific and the beginnings of scientific psychology, she outlines seven systems prominent in the American psychology of 1933. They are the structuralism of Edward B. Titchener; the independent and individual system of William James; the functionalism developed at the University of Chicago under J. R. Angell and Harvey Carr; the behaviorism of J. B. Watson (no. 5393); the dynamic psychology developed at Columbia especially by Robert S. Woodworth (no. 5391); the Gestalt school; and psychoanalysis. The first and the last two are, as she says, "outright importations from Europe," but are treated here as influences in American psychology. She disclaims having treated all important schools or thinkers, or all divergences of opinion within the schools chosen as representative. Psychology, she thinks, "is a science that has not yet made its great discovery," and until it does the diversity of systems is both inevitable and desirable.

5390. Krech, David, and Richard S. Crutchfield. Elements of psychology. New York, Knopf, 1958. 700 p. 58–5044 BF121.K73

5391. Woodworth, Robert S., and Harold Schlosberg. Experimental psychology. Rev. ed. New York, Holt, 1954. 948 p. illus.
52–13912 BF181.W6 1954

These two titles are selected from the hundreds available as characteristic of American psychology as it is conceived by the vast majority of its academic practitioners at the present day: an experimental and quantitative natural science, with its most valued results obtained from the use of special apparatus in psychological laboratories. The first is a general textbook written by two members of the Department of Psychology at the University of California, and very lavishly produced by Mr. Knopf with 2 color plates, 25 tables, 157 figures, and 168 "boxes," of which most contain research evidence for the generalizations in the text, but some "provide the reader with an opportunity to carry out his own demonstration experiments." The four parts of the book are concerned with "Perception," "Motivation and Emotion," "Adaptive Behavior," and "The Individual." The key to the last part, which includes "the apex of psychology," the study of personality, lies in "quantifying individual differences." Each of 24 chapters is furnished with a glossary, defining such terms of art as "synesthesia" and "volume color" in chapter 2, "Bogardus social distance scale" and "cognitive dissonance" in chapter 25. The most representative figure in American laboratory psychology is probably Robert S. Woodworth (b. 1869), who received his Ph. D. from Columbia University in 1899 and taught psychology there for nearly 40 years, becoming professor emeritus in 1942. His lectures on Dynamic Psychology (New York, Columbia University Press, 1918. 210 p.) provided the profession with a new and laboratory-oriented system, while his textbook,

Psychology (originally published by Holt in 1921, and still in print in its 5th edition of 1947) was for years the most widely used in introductory college courses. The first edition of Experimental Psychology appeared in 1938 and was developed out of mimeographed predecessors which Professor Woodworth had used since 1910 in his Columbia course in the subject. In preparing the substantially altered second edition, from which much purely historical material has been dropped, the octogenarian experimentalist had the assistance of Professor Schlosberg of Brown University. After an introductory chapter on the principles of experiment, the book expounds methods and results in 25 separate fields, including "Reaction Time," "Association," "Psychophysics," "Conditioning," "Maze Learning," "Memory," and "Problem-Solving: Thinking." One of the 3 chapters on "Emotion" has a section on "Lie Detection." The subject index runs to 39 double-column pages (p. 910–948), while the "Bibliographic Index of Authors" (p. 851–909) requires a 4-column table of abbreviations. The front end papers contain "Logarithmic and Probability Scales," and the rear ones "Four-place Logarithms."

5392. Roback, Abraham A. History of American psychology. New York, Library Publishers, 1952. xiv, 426 p. illus. 52–11499 BF108.U5R6

The only substantial history of psychology in the United States from its beginnings to the present day, by a psychologist who was trained in the Harvard laboratory under Hugo Münsterberg. As several reviewers observed, it is a somewhat uneven work, but what it lacks in uniformity and objectivity is compensated for by the author's thorough knowledge of the doctrines he describes and his original and outspoken critical approach. Dr. Roback has always been an independent and very much his own man, taking his line from no system or institution. He has always had a strong sense of the limitations of purely experimental and physiological psychology, and the book bears traces of his old controversies, including the title of the chapter on behaviorism: "Psychology out of Its Mind." Since he is not unduly impressed by current fashions, he renders full justice to neglected figures of the recent past such as G. Stanley Hall, Morton Prince, William McDougall, and his own teacher, Münsterberg, once the most conspicuous psychologist in the country, the eclipse of whose reputation is attributed to his failure to establish any personal bond with his students. There are chapters on Freud's influence in America; on the Gestalt school, which the author characteristically hails as a creation of the Jewish race and which, he says, is dying out only because it is being absorbed into general psychology; on operationism, which he regards as an attempt to apply the rules of the physics laboratory to psychology; on "Factorial Analysis and General Semantics," including an appreciative treatment of Alfred Korzybski; and on neoscholastic psychology, which is treated with respect. A final chapter on "The Phenomenal Expansion of American Psychology," standing for the companion volume mentioned in the Preface, briefly reviews 14 specialized branches of psychology and some current trends. The United States now has the largest number of psychologists, including many of the foremost, an output of books and articles greater than in all other countries, and a leadership which conveys obligations along with authority.

5393. Watson, John B. Behaviorism. [Rev. ed. Chicago] University of Chicago Press, 1958, ©1930. 308 p. illus. (Phoenix books, P23) 58–14680 BF199.W3 1958

Behaviorism, an extreme development of functionalism, is usually regarded as an original American contribution to psychology, which it reduces to a study of the movements of muscle or gland. It is dependent upon physiology, and based upon laboratory experiments, primarily with animal subjects, and it rejects both introspective method and the concept of consciousness. Notwithstanding a number of more or less complete anticipations, it is usually regarded as having been founded by John Broadus Watson (b. 1878), who was trained in animal psychology at the University of Chicago, was for some years a professor of psychology at Johns Hopkins, and after 1920 pursued a successful career with large advertising firms. Mr. Watson contributed an interesting autobiographical sketch to A History of Psychology in Autobiography, v. 3, edited by Carl A. Murchison (Worcester, Mass., Clark University Press, 1936), p. 271–281. The volume listed above originated in popular lectures at the Cooper Union in New York City; a more technical exposition of the author's principles is given in Psychology from the Standpoint of a Behaviorist, 3d ed., rev. (Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1929. xvii, 458 p.), originally published in 1919. Behaviorism has not only aroused much controversy at home, but has attracted considerable attention abroad, as appears from two French studies: Pierre Naville's La psychologie, science du comportement; le behaviorisme de Watson, 9. éd. ([Paris] Gallimard [©1942] 253 p.), and André Tilquin's Le behaviorisme; origine et développement de la psychologie de réaction en Amérique (Paris, J. Vrin, 1942. 531 p.), which contains a substantial bibliography of behaviorist literature (p. [511]–528).

XXIII

Religion

A.	General Works	5394–5404
B.	Period Histories	5405–5417
C.	Church and State	5418–5422
D.	Religious Thought; Theology	5423–5438
E.	Religious Bodies	5439–5473
F.	Representative Leaders	5474–5483
G.	Church and Society	5484–5497
H.	The Negro's Church	5498–5502

RELIGIOUS motives were dominant in the founding of Plymouth Colony in 1620 and of Massachusetts Bay ten years later; and if the founding of Virginia in 1607 be regarded at all closely, its promoters will be seen to have emphasized religious aims and taken great pains to provide the new plantation with the ministrations of the Church of England. It is probably a safe assertion that until some date quite late in the 19th century, religion remained a greater concern with the majority of Americans than any secular interest. In the middle of the 20th, notwithstanding the multiplication of competing factors and various secularizing influences, it remains a major interest of the average American, and over 100 million persons, or nearly two-thirds of the total population, have become members of churches. Clergymen, however they may complain of crowded schedules, find leisure to write in the 20th century as they did in the 17th, and the literature of American religion through four centuries is staggering in its volume. The following hundred-odd titles that have been selected from the mass are of course inadequate to do justice to the great pageant of American religion, and three or four times as many would still leave many corners or aspects uncovered. We have tried, however, to make them as representative as possible of the extraordinary variety of religious life in this country, and, while avoiding works written from a narrow sectarian viewpoint, have sought to deal objectively and fairly with as many denominations and movements as our space will permit. The churches with the largest memberships have necessarily been emphasized, but some lesser ones are included because of their striking originality in belief, practice, or social effect.

The eight sections into which the chapter is divided attempt to deal with inseparable but distinguishable aspects of American religion: its development in the stream of history from 1607 to the present day; its relationship to government, especially since 1776; its exposition by men of thought; the churches which are its practical vehicles; the men who have been eminent in the churches; the churches as both cause and effect in their social environment; and, finally, the Negro's church.[1] Some works on individuals appear not in Section H, Representative Leaders, but in Section D, Religious Thought (Niebuhr and Tillich, nos. 5432 and 5433) or in Section E, Religious Bodies (no. 5464, Joseph Smith, whose biography is essential to the understanding of the Mormon Church). A number of other clergymen whose writings are noteworthy are given individual treatment in Chapter I, Literature; and certain philosophers similarly treated in the preceding chapter are much concerned with religion, in particular James McCosh (nos. 5337–5344),

[1] The three titles on Judaism (nos. 5458–5460) should be considered in connection with the larger group on the Jews as a racial minority in Section F of Chapter XIV.

Josiah Royce (nos. 5354–5364), and William E. Hocking (nos. 5310-5316).

Certain important themes recur in a number of the sections that follow. One is the westward movement of the churches which followed or accompanied the movement of the American people; and a related one is the changing position of the churches in an increasingly urbanized America. Another is the practically complete independence of the American churches from governmental support and controls, since the Revolution at any rate; this has not prevented a vast influence of the churches upon Government as upon every other aspect of social life. As early as 1831 de Tocqueville (nos. 4509–4512) found that here the spirit of religion and the spirit of liberty, instead of marching in different directions as in France, "were intimately related and that they reigned in common over the same country." Another theme may be succinctly described in Edmund Burke's phrase, "the dissidence of dissent"; the process whereby the Puritan Separatists came out of the established church has become a permanent characteristic of American life; nearly every group which has constituted itself around some apparently small difference of belief or practice has survived, albeit in small numbers—only the Shakers (no. 5469), who abjured biological reproduction, have died out—and new religious bodies, inside or outside the Christian framework, are still being generated. A countertendency has arisen in the movement toward church union or reunion; since it has been more effectual in the sphere of joint social action than in doctrinal or liturgical assimilation, the few titles that deal with the subjects are included in Section I, Church and Society. Yet another theme is the influence on traditional religion of the new scientific views of the universe and of life which were developed in the course of the 19th century, and received a unifying bond in Darwin's doctrine of the evolution of species. A final theme is that of secularization inside religious life as well as outside, which many find operative in recent years, so that America has been called, of all the nations of Western civilization, at once the most religious and the most secular.

A. General Works

5394. Hall, Thomas Cuming. The religious background of American culture. Boston, Little, Brown, 1930. xiv, 348 p. 30–18755 BR515.H28

"General bibliography": p. [315]–326; "Chapter bibliographies": p. [327]–337.

A Presbyterian clergyman who taught at Union Theological Seminary and at Göttingen here qualifies the widely held concept of the dominant part played by Puritanism in American civilization, and focuses his study on the tradition of dissent, which he considers the most striking feature of American religion. He traces its beginning to Wyclif and the Lollards in 14th-century England. The individualistic heresies that rejected the authority of church and priesthood to put reliance on God's word alone were persecuted and pushed underground, but continued to spread among the lower classes for two centuries. Dr. Hall limits the name of Puritans to the small party of Protestants which rose to political importance in Elizabeth's time, and he claims that Puritanism supplied hardly more than leaders to the New England settlement. In Anglican Virginia and Congregational New England alike, the great body of colonists were "of the class from which Dissent drew its members." The spread of toleration after 1660 was accompanied by widespread religious indifference, furthered by frontier conditions and punctuated by revivals, "the symptom of Dissent." Established religion collapsed during the Revolution, and the complete separation of church and state in the Constitution recognized the indpendent character of American Christianity. The writer traces the forms of dissent through the later history of American Protestantism, finding throughout American culture a strong element of "respectful indifference to any pronounced religious faith."

5395. Hudson, Winthrop S. The great tradition of the American churches. New York, Harper, 1953. 282 p. 53–6417 BR516.H75

The great American tradition of religious freedom, with churches purely voluntary and complete absence of state control, is examined in this cogently argued volume by Professor Hudson of the Colgate-Rochester Divinity School. He seeks to show that at the high point of American church development, placed in the 1890's, the voluntary principle was considered to be the secret of the power and influence of religion in American life. He is chiefly concerned with the situation in the churches during the 19th century, analyzed in part through individual preachers, Lyman Beecher, Charles G. Finney, Dwight L. Moody, and others, and in part through the achievements and failures of the churches resulting from acceptance of the voluntary principle. With the spread of the "social gospel," and the diversion of church activities into many fields apart from religion, there has come, he warns, an oversecularization: "The Church Embraces the World: Protestantism Succumbs to Complacency." He considers that the churches are running the risk of having no distinctive message, and that as a result they may be tempted to become tools of the state in the promotion of national self-interest. He calls for the restoration of voluntary discipline through conversion and a recovery of Christian faith.

677676 O–63–49

5396. Makers of Christianity. [v. 3] From John Cotton to Lyman Abbott, by William Warren Sweet. New York, Holt, 1937. 351 p.
34-36057 BR145.M23, v. 3
"Selected bibliography": p. 335-343.

Biographical sketches of more than 30 individual leaders who have influenced the religious life of America, from the Puritan John Cotton to the late 19th-century apostle of the social gospel, Walter Rauschenbusch, and the teacher of evolutionary philosophy reconciled with Christian faith, Lyman Abbott. The first two volumes of this set, by other hands, recounted great Christian lives from Christ to Charlemagne, and from Alfred the Great to Schleiermacher. Dr. Sweet begins with "The Founding Fathers": Cotton, James Blair of Virginia who founded William and Mary College, the Scotch-Irish Presbyterian Francis Makemie, and the Lutheran Henry M. Mühlenberg. His next chapter presents "Apostles of Religious Liberty": the Lords Baltimore, William Penn, and Roger Williams. He continues through the Great Awakening (Jonathan Edwards and George Whitefield), the Revolutionary and Constitutional period, the trans-Allegheny pioneers, the missionary heroes, the revivalists and reformers, and the leaders of modern liberal Christian thought.

5397. Mayer, Frederick E. The religious bodies of America. 2d. ed. Saint Louis, Concordia Pub. House, 1956. 591 p.
56-4924 BR516.M37 1956

A comprehensive handbook of the doctrines and practices of the religious bodies of America, compiled by the author during his 25 years of teaching theology in two Lutheran seminaries. Dr. Mayer died in 1954, the year of the first edition. His own viewpoint is admittedly Lutheran, but he aims at an objective and unbiased interpretation, based on what he calls the "creedal position" taken by each church in its profession of faith. He classes the 256 separate denominations reported in the 1936 census under 12 major families. For each family—Eastern Catholics, Roman Catholics, Lutherans, Reformed bodies, Arminian bodies (Methodists, etc.), "Unionizing" churches, the "Enthusiastic or Inner Light" bodies (Quakers, Mennonites, etc.), the Millennial groups—he outlines the historical background and doctrinal principles before examining the tenets of individual churches in the family. A long chapter on "Interdenominational Trends and Organizations" includes simple and helpful explanations of modernism, fundamentalism, and neo-orthodoxy. In "Anthropocentric and Anti-Trinitarian Bodies" Unitarianism and Swedenborgianism are included with Judaism. The last two chapters deal with groups which Dr. Mayer considered to be outside Christianity—Christian Science and other healing cults, and "esoteric" sects such as Theosophy. The work is extensively documented in long footnotes and bibliographies at ends of chapters.

5398. Mead, Frank Spencer. Handbook of denominations in the United States. Rev. and enl. ed. New York, Abingdon Press, 1956. 255 p. 55-10270 BR516.M38 1956
Bibliography: p. 229-237.

A more concise work than Mayer (above), this handbook, originally published in 1951, contains short accounts and statistics of some two hundred and fifty American church denominations. The arrangement is basically alphabetical, but churches that stem from a common source are grouped under the collective name. Thus the table of contents begins with "Adventists," under which come Seventh-Day Adventists, Advent Christian Church, Primitive Advent Christian Church, Church of God, Life and Advent Union. Next is a single denomination, The African Orthodox Church. The names within a group are distinguished from succeeding names only by a slight indention, and the reader may find it more convenient to turn at once to the full index. The statements for each church put less emphasis on theological concepts than do those of Mayer. They are factual statements, in simple and readable style, of history, organization, present status, missions, statistical data (not always consistent), and of doctrine in brief outline. Concluding pages give headquarters of denominations, statistics of church membership in 1955, and a glossary of theological and ecclesiastical terms.

5399. Niebuhr, Helmut Richard. The kingdom of God in America. Chicago, Willett, Clark, 1937. xvii, 215 p. 37-28492 BT94.N5
"Notes": p. 199-210.

Dr. H. Richard Niebuhr and his brother, Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, are prominent representatives of the neo-orthodox movement in modern American theology. The theme of these historical and interpretative lectures is that the dominant idea of Protestantism in America has always been the kingdom of God, but this has had three successive meanings. In the Puritan theocracy and no less in the other Protestant sects of the colonial settlements, the kingdom of God meant the absolute sovereignty of God. During the Great Awakening and later evangelical revivals, it meant the reign of Christ. In the social gospel of modern religion, it has come to mean the kingdom of God on earth. Dr. Niebuhr expands this idea in general terms as well as in relation to individual religious leaders. In a final chapter on "Institutionalization and Secularization" he suggests that in the "moment of petrifaction," when the liberalism that replaced the old evangelical pattern has itself become institutionalized, the many signs of concern for an aggressive Christianity are "indications of a spiritual unrest which might become the seed plot of new life." A recent book by Reinhold Niebuhr is largely focused on the spiritual unrest of the mid-20th century. Pious and Secular America (New York, Scribner, 1958. 150 p.) comprises nine essays written or published in 1956 and 1957 on "journalistic" themes. The first, which gives its title to the volume, and the second, "Frustration in Mid-Century," analyze the "paradox" that the United States is "at once the most religious and the most secular of Western nations," and point out the "naïve and simple" nature of the current religious revival. Other subjects treated include higher education, the conflict with Russia, the Negro question, the relations of Christians and Jews, and the "universal community." The last essay, "Mystery and Meaning," attempts to explain the relation of the mystery of creation to the human problem of sin.

5400. Sperry, Willard L. Religion in America. Appendices compiled by Ralph Lazzaro. Cambridge [Eng.] University Press; New York, Macmillan, 1946. 317 p. (American life and institutions . . . 1) 46–7760 BR515.S67 1946

A widely admired interpretation of the history and the present state of religion in America, presented informally for a British wartime public by the late Dean of the Divinity School of Harvard University. Initial "Presuppositions" point out salient differences between American religious life and that of the Old World. The primary one is disestablishment: "America is naked of 'the Church' in the historic sense of that word, as Europe has known it and used it. The place of the church is taken by 'denominations.'" Dean Sperry's three other points of distinction are the individualistic character of American religion, its "immense and indubitable optimism," and the sympathetic interest taken in it by non-church-going intellectuals. These four themes reappear throughout his accounts of religion in the Colonies, the causes and consequences of separation of church and state, the denominations, parish life, theological thought, and religious education. He devotes admittedly disproportionate space to the small independent sects, which he takes to be the most distinctive feature of the American religious scene. The chapter on American Catholicism is adapted from Theodore Maynard's book of 1941 (no. 5445). Mr. Lazzaro's appendixes give various details of church history and statistics.

5401. Sweet, William Warren. The story of religion in America. [2d rev. ed.] New York, Harper, 1950. 492 p. 50–10239 BR515.S82 1950

Bibliography: p. 453–472.

Until Dr. Sweet published the first edition of this influential work in 1930, the theme of religion in America had been treated almost exclusively in denominational terms. The professor of the history of American Christianity at the University of Chicago sought in one comprehensive and readable volume to trace through the complicated pattern of American religious life the "common thread" of "an individualism in religion such as existed nowhere else." The religious and political radicalism of the first colonial settlements established this tradition, which was carried on, with the westward movement of the frontier, in the multiplication of small sects and independent churches. Revivalism, from the Great Awakening to the end of the 19th century, was the emotionally extravagant way in which religion was brought to the masses. The consequences of slavery included the rise of many separatist Negro churches. In the 20th century the independent sects still increase in number and diversity, although the centralization of American culture has been reflected in the larger units of church life. Dr. Sweet's last two chapters, "World War I: Prosperity and Depression" and "Through a Decade of Storm to the Mid-Century" (the latter added in the 1950 edition), stress the movement of the Protestant churches toward union, as well as their secularized aspects and their political ideas.

5402. Sweet, William Warren. Revivalism in America, its origin, growth, and decline. New York, Scribner, 1944. xv, 192 p. 44–6536 BV3773.S8

"Selected bibliography": p. 183–188.

5403. Weisberger, Bernard A. They gathered at the river; the story of the great revivalists and their impact upon religion in America. Boston, Little, Brown, 1958. 345 p. illus. 58–7848 BV3773.W4

"Bibliographical comment and notes to chapters": p. 275–332.

These two historical studies of revivalism differ widely in approach, coverage, and style. Professor Sweet's little volume consists of essays interpreting, from the viewpoint of the religious historian, the nature of revivalism—"primarily the individualizing of religion." It concentrates on the colonial Great Awakening and the Great Revival of 1800, with its aftermath on the frontier, subjects treated in greater detail by this author in other works (nos. 5410–5416). Here he briefly outlines the by-products of the Western revivals in educational institutions, antislavery movements, and the like, and barely glances in his last chapter, "Revivalism on the Wane," at the city revivals, organized like business enterprises by D. L. Moody and his successors. The earlier evangelism, when the preacher in highly emotional terms called on each individual to work out his own salvation was, he says, in tune with the independent democratic temper of young America. He attributes a part of the late 19th-century decline in revivalism to the spread of the social gospel, whose advocates, in their enthusiasm to save society tended to overlook the individual sinner. Dr. Weisberger, whose lively style is that of the social historian, writes a more detailed history, interpreting revivals and revivalists in purely secular terms, with emphasis on the personalities of the evangelists. Comments on the colonial and Western revivals provide an introduction for the bulk of his text devoted to the city revivalists. Among the evangelists treated in biographical style are Lyman Beecher and Charles Grandison Finney, great preachers of the 1820's and 1830's in New England and the New West respectively. The central figure is the most successful of all the lay savers of souls, who made revivalism into a professional technique carried out through the force of his personality—"To thousands of his converts, God must have looked uncannily like Dwight L. Moody." In the hands of Moody's successors, the revival campaigns "put on the trappings of vaudeville." The last chapters are devoted to the most spectacular evangelist of all, Billy Sunday. Dr. Weisberger ends by speculation on the possibility of a revival suited to the age of mass communication, led by a public figure who could "deck the faith of the fathers in the fashion set by Madison Avenue's 'communicators.'"

5404. Williams, John P. What Americans believe and how they worship. New York, Harper, 1952. 400 p. 52–5477 BR516.W47

A comparative survey of the leading religions of the United States, by the chairman of the Department of Religion of Mount Holyoke College, which should prove as interesting to the general reader as to the student. His presentation of each faith includes some historical background, a sketch of doctrine and church government, description of the form of worship, and sometimes a biographical note on a representative leader. The treatment is factual, vivid, and objective, with stress upon social aspects. The subtitles of the chapters are designed to impress on the memory the salient quality of each church or group of churches; thus the first, the Roman Catholic Church, is characterized as "Defender of a Revelation." Protestantism in general is discussed at length, and then follow chapters on the Lutheran Churches, the Protestant Episcopal Church, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Unitarians, Baptists and Disciples, Quakers, and Methodists. Judaism is sympathetically described as "The Mother Institution." Finally there are two group chapters, "Recent Religious Innovations," taking in such sects as the Seventh-Day Adventists, Mormons, Christian Scientists, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Unity, and "Nonecclesiastical Spiritual Movements," a sampling of astrology, naturalistic humanism, hedonism, nationalism, etc.

B. Period Histories

5405. Garrison, Winfred Ernest. The march of faith; the story of religion in America since 1865. New York, Harper, 1933. 332 p. 33–11236 BR525.G3

"Sources and bibliography": p. 309–316.

A swift-paced narrative of American religious history since the Civil War, treated as inseparable from the economic, political, scientific, and cultural life of the time. The opening chapters, which sketch the Reconstruction era, the westward movement, and the "Gilded Age" of financial speculation, are primarily social history, although focused on religious activity. With a chapter on Moody and Sankey and other revivalists Professor Garrison turns more specifically to the history of religion. He recounts with interesting detail of men and events the spread of the new liberalism in religious thought, efforts at church union (he is himself prominent in the world ecumenical movement), the rise of the social gospel, and the increased activity of missions in America's age of overseas expansion. The records of individual denominations are briefly reviewed, a chapter being given to Roman Catholicism and another to the formation of the interdenominational Federal Council of the Churches of Christ. Social history is again to the fore in the chapters on the connection of churches with big business and their role in the First World War and the postwar years of prosperity. Finally the author examines miscellaneous doctrines, the groups outside the main Protestant sects, mystic and non-Christian cults, etc., and concludes with the argument that religion must deal in the matters of political concern, but should do so in a tolerant rather than a crusading spirit.

5406. Humphrey, Edward F. Nationalism and religion in America, 1774–1789. Boston, Chipman Law Pub. Co., 1924. 536 p.
24–12770 BR520.H75

Bibliography: p. [517]–532.

In the formative years of the American Nation, the period covered in this historical monograph, "the pulpit was the most powerful single force in America for the creation and control of public opinion," and religion, according to the author, was one of the more potent factors in the forging of the United States. Because of the separation of church and state in the new Republic, he points out, most American historians have deliberately omitted the religious element from constitutional history, in spite of its importance, to which both de Tocqueville and Bryce testified. Dr. Humphrey analyzes in a scholarly manner, with many quotations from contemporary sermons and documents, the contributions or the opposition of the various churches to political independence during the Revolution. This forms the first part of his book; the second part treats the independent and national organization of the churches during the Confederation. It also includes chapters on the separation of church and state, the influence of the churches in the Continental Congress and in the making of the Constitution, and their welcome of the new National Government.

5407. Johnson, Charles A. The frontier camp meeting; religion's harvest time. Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1955. 325 p. illus.
55–8783 BX8475.J64

Bibliography: p. 303–319.

The author, studying evangelical revivalism in the trans-Allegheny West from 1800 to 1840, describes the frontier camp meeting as one of the most important social institutions serving to tame backwoods society. Recreating "Camp Meetin' Time" through historical analysis documented from contemporary accounts, appraisals, sermons, and hymns, he is at pains to correct the caricatures and distortions which, he thinks, have pervaded 19th-century fiction, the biased writings of non-Methodist churchmen, and even secular histories. It was the Methodist itineracy system which chiefly developed the camp meeting technique, and the Methodists were almost alone in using it after 1805, although open-air gatherings were usual during the Great Revival or Second Great Awakening of 1800, and the first planned camp meeting was probably under Presbyterian auspices. To the "most fabulous of all great Revival meetings," at Cane Ridge in Bourbon County, Kentucky, in 1801, there came Baptist and Methodist preachers as well as 18 Presbyterian ministers; the "frenzied worship" continued for six days, with attendance anywhere between ten and twenty-five thousand. The "falling exercise," "the jerks," rolling, dancing, singing, and barking were engaged in by an estimated one to two thousand converts. The writer follows the camp meeting from this primitive form into its maturity under Methodist discipline, which endeavored to restrain emotional excesses. He tells of individual circuit riders, the evangelical doctrine they preached, camp meeting hymnody, and the social life in the "Tented Grove"—"the most mammoth picnic possible." He cites contemporary endorsements and criticisms. By the 1840's the institution was dying out, supplanted by permanent auditoriums and cabins invading the old forest camp sites, and by the churches in the rising towns.

5408. Morais, Herbert M. Deism in eighteenth century America. New York, Columbia University Press, 1934. 203 p. (Columbia University. Faculty of Political Science. Studies in history, economics and public law, no. 397)
34–23477 H31.C7, no. 397
BL2760.M6 1934a

"List of authorities": p. 179–193.

A dissertation, exhaustively documented, which studies the "remarkable spread of scepticism" in America during the latter 18th century. The liberal philosophy of the Age of Reason, as it appeared among the educated upper classes in the colonies and during the Revolution, did not for the most part extend to atheism. Jefferson, who sought to do away with clericalism and return to the pure teachings of Jesus, was more typical of American deism than were radicals such as Ethan Allan, whose ponderous book of 1784, Reason the Only Oracle of Man, was the first American text explicitly to reject Christianity. The author examines the European background of deism, its spread in colonial America through the importation of rationalistic books and the introduction of Newtonian science, its leaders and influence during the Revolution, and its militant stage in the early national period. Inspired by the French Revolution, Thomas Paine published his Age of Reason in 1794, attacking the principle of Biblical revelation. There arose a vigorous atheistic movement, led by a former Baptist clergyman, Elihu Palmer, with a widespread establishment of deistic societies and freethinking newspapers. Dr. Morais traces the course of deism, and the opposition of the clergy and colleges, through the turn of the century to its collapse following the explosion of evangelical Christianity in the Second Great Awakening.

5409. Schneider, Herbert W. Religion in 20th century America. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952. 244 p. illus. (The Library of Congress series in American civilization)
52–8219 BR525.S34

This closely written book by a professor of philosophy and religion at Columbia convincingly explains the transformation of religious habits, ideas, and institutions that has taken place in America during the last 50 years. The first three chapters survey the secularization and socialization of religious life. Religion is now, Dr. Schneider states, "one of America's biggest businesses," conducted by trained professionals among whom laymen are increasingly numerous; religious activities are chiefly directed, not to the salvation of individual souls, but against secular evils and social problems; religion, "like government," pervades all areas of life—education, medicine, politics, business, art: "Anything can be done religiously, and nothing is safe from ecclesiastical concern." The author examines the changes in America's religious conscience, the rapprochement of psychiatry and religion, the far-reaching spread of the social gospel, and its recent more realistic "rethinking." The second half of the text, which is separated from the first three chapters by a set of illustrative "Exhibits," is an analysis of changing trends in theological thought—the various reactions to 19th-century liberalism of fundamentalism, neo-orthodoxy, existentialism, humanism—and of the modern "art of worship." The last chapter discusses the interpretation of "Varieties of Religious Experience since William James." A useful compilation supplementing this is volume 256, March 1948, of the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Organized Religion in the United States, edited by Ray H. Abrams (Philadelphia, 1948. 265 p.). Papers by a variety of experts are arranged in five groups: "Our Contemporary Religious Institutions," "Relationship to Other Institutions" (state, class, family), "The Churches and Social Action," "Trends and Future Prospects," and "Statistics and Bibliography."

5410. Sweet, William Warren. Religion in colonial America. New York, Scribner, 1942. xiii, 367 p. 42–19309 BR520.S88
"Selected bibliography": p. 341–356.

5411. Sweet, William Warren. Religion in the development of American culture, 1765–1840. New York, Scribner, 1952. xiv, 338 p.
52–9960 BR520.S882
Bibliography: p. 315–332.

The author of The Story of Religion in America (no. 5401) has spent a lifetime studying the religious history of his country, and writes of it in the style of the urbane scholar addressing a literate lay public. Religion in Colonial America is the first installment of a general history by periods. It relates the transplanting of 17th-century Western European religion to the Colonies, and the adaptation of the various faiths to the physical, social, and political conditions of their new setting. The first arrivals, the Anglican Church in Virginia, and the Puritans in New England, founded state churches; after the Restoration (1660) adherents of other faiths—Baptists, Quakers, Roman Catholics, Lutherans, German pietists, Scotch-Irish Presbyterians—increasingly brought diversity, individualism, and liberalizing influences to the American religious scene. Dr. Sweet begins with a general chapter on the religious motives in the planting of the Colonies (said Hakluyt, "greatly for the inlargement of the gospill of Christ"), then tells the story of each denomination through the whole period. His last chapters deal with the Great Awakening in New England and the South, and the general advance toward disestablishment and religious liberty. Ten years later there followed Religion in the Development of American Culture, 1765–1840. Here the stress is on the radical factor in American religion, especially on the frontier. The better pioneers, Dr. Sweet says, were nonconformists or heretics, "impatient of the old and open-minded to the new and untried," who found opportunity for self-expression in the new West. "The story of experimentation in organized religion on the frontier constitutes one of the most significant and important aspects of the development of the new western civilization and culture." The first three chapters on religion during the Revolution, and the subsequent breaking of Old World ties to form new national organizations are, as in the preceding volume, traced through the separate threads of the individual denominations, and these same threads are followed in the account of the westward movement. Then come chapters on general aspects: "Barbarism vs. Revivalism," "Religion and Our Cultural Foundations" (the founding of colleges and seminaries), "The Revolt against Calvinism," missions, and "The Frontier Utopias": Mormons, Shakers, and other religious communities. An epilogue accepts, "with modifications," F. J. Turner's thesis of the frontier as the central theme in American history of this period. The third and fourth volumes of this series, which will bring the story to the present day, are still awaited.

5412. Sweet, William Warren, ed. Religion on the American frontier, 1783–[1850] New York and Chicago, 1931–46. 4 v.

5413. [Vol. 1] The Baptists, 1783–1830, a collection of source material; general introd. by Shirley Jackson Case. New York, Holt, 1931. 652 p. 31–26855 BX6235.S8
Bibliography: p. 629–637.

5414. Vol. 2. The Presbyterians, 1783–1840, a collection of source materials. New York, Harper, 1936. 939 p. 36–15032 BX8935.S75
Bibliography: p. 888–917.

5415. Vol. 3. The Congregationalists, a collection of source materials. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1939. 435 p.
39–33291 BX7131.S9
Bibliography: p. [405]–418.

5416. Vol. 4. The Methodists, a collection of source materials. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1946. 800 p. A47–717 BX8235.S92
Bibliography: p. [731]–770.

The sources on which Dr. Sweet based this frontier study and his history of Methodism (no. 5458) were assembled in a comprehensive search of the manuscript and out-of-print collections of church and seminary libraries in the region. He has made a share of his labors accessible to other scholars in this 4-volume collection of source materials for the Baptist, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, and Methodist churches in the trans-Allegheny West. Each volume begins with a general introduction of about a hundred pages explaining the status of the denomination at the end of the Revolution, and the stages and various aspects of its westward migration. Then come extracts from letters and reports, church minutes, the memoirs of preachers and missionaries, records of conferences and of church trials, and a sampling of documents of many other varieties. Each volume includes a long bibliography.

5417. Winslow, Ola Elizabeth. Meetinghouse Hill, 1630–1783. New York, Macmillan, 1952. 344 p. illus. 52–11102 BR530.W5

A social picture of religion in colonial New England, with the meetinghouse on the hilltop "in sharp focus." The writer's purpose, carried out with balance and charm, is, "by recalling typical procedures in relation to various aspects of community life, to suggest attitudes which [the meetinghouse] helped to establish and patterns of group action which it helped to make habitual." She has based her interpretation on town and church records, sermons, diaries, letters, and other memorials of the theocratic New England of the 17th and 18th centuries. Her narrative incorporates many well-chosen quotations. Of the five books, the first, "Bound Up Together in a Little Bundle of Life," describes, mostly by means of particular instances, the establishment of congregation, meetinghouse, and village. Book 2, "Zion is Not a City of Fools" (Cotton Mather), is on the learning and the sermons of the clergy. Book 3, "Noises about the Temple," describes "Where to Set," how to sing, etc. Book 4 deals with the "Rule of the 'Lord Brethren,'" the government and authority of the congregation. Book 5, "Powder in the Meetinghouse," illustrates the close association of the New England pulpit with the cause of liberty.

C. Church and State

5418. Blau, Joseph L., ed. Cornerstones of religious freedom in America. Boston, Beacon Press, 1949. 250 p. (Beacon Press studies in freedom and power) 49–10649 BR516.B55
"List of sources": p. 246–247.

A compilation of notable documents illustrating the history of American religious liberty. The editor writes a general introduction and an explanatory headnote for each of the themes under which he has arranged the extracts from writings and speeches. The headings are: "Colonial Stirrings" (Roger Williams and William Penn); "Building the Wall of Separation" (Jefferson and Madison); "The Affirmation of Civil Rights for Religious Minorities" (including a speech on the Maryland "Jew Bill," 1819); "Resistance to Enforced Sabbath Observance" (1830); "On Keeping Religion Out of Politics" (Zelotes Fuller, The Tree of Liberty, 1830); "Resistance to Imposed Religious Forms" (from A Report on Appointing Chaplains to the Legislature of New York, 1832); "On Keeping Religion Out of Public Schools" (Horace Mann, 1848); "On Keeping God Out of the Constitution" (1873 and 1876); and "The Fight against Released Time" (Justice Felix Frankfurter's concurring opinion in a case regarding religious education during school hours, 1948).

5419. Greene, Evarts B. Religion and the state; the making and testing of an American tradition. New York, New York University Press, 1941. 172 p. (Anson G. Phelps lectureship on early American history. New York University. Stokes Foundation) 42–1794 BR516.G67

Six lectures by a distinguished historian, outlining concisely, informally, and interestingly the main themes of church-state relationships in America. Professor Greene begins with the European antecedents, in Protestant and Catholic countries alike, of an established church in which ecclesiastical and temporal control were closely associated. Next he examines the transplantation of these ideas to New Spain, New France, New Netherland, Anglican Virginia, and Puritan New England. His third lecture introduces the liberalizing factors in the British colonies—the Rhode Island "livelie experiment" in religious freedom, the policy of Lord Baltimore and other proprietary governors of toleration for rent-paying tenants, and William Penn's "first fundamentall" of freedom of faith and worship. The Act of Toleration (1688), the Great Awakening, the penetration of 18th-century rationalism, all aided dissent, till on the eve of the Revolution church establishment was everywhere losing ground. The religious history of the Revolutionary and Federal eras is discussed in a chapter called "Separation." Chapter V, "After Separation," describes the situation after the last disestablishment act, passed by Massachusetts in 1833, and the persisting church-state relations in exemptions from taxation, in the law of church property, and in politics. The last chapter turns to the difficult question of education, in which more than in any other department the American tradition of disestablishment is tested. (See also nos. 5491 and 5494.) The valuable "Bibliographical Notes" (p. 147–162) are arranged by chapters.

5420. Stokes, Anson Phelps. Church and state in the United States. New York, Harper, 1950. 3 v. illus. 50–7978 BR516.S85

"Critical and classified selected bibliography": v. 3, p. 769–836.

The late author of this classic and encyclopedic work, a noted Episcopalian cleric and educator, published it after retiring as canon of Washington Cathedral. Professor Gabriel of Yale University, of which Dr. Stokes had been Secretary for over 20 years, speaks in his introductory note of the author as "guided by the historian's ideal of objectivity and the desire to uncover all pertinent material." The subtitle shows the vast terrain covered in the three large volumes: "A Historical Survey, Source Book, and Interpretation of Documents and Events Showing the Growth of Religious Freedom under the Friendly Constitutional Separation of Church and State, and the Resulting Influence of Religion in All Major Phases of National Development; also a Study of the Status of Churches Including Synagogues and Other Religious Groups under Federal and State Constitutions, Statutes, and Judicial Decisions; Authoritative Opinions of Courts, Church Bodies, Statesmen, Religious Leaders, and Publicists on Matters at Issue; and a Discussion of Contemporary Problems of Adjustment." Adjectives used by reviewers pay tribute to the monumental character of the work: "spacious, erudite, and magnanimous," "unique," "definitive." Those pressed for time may limit themselves to Part 8, a "Summary and Interpretation" (v. 3, p. 629–726) of the preceding seven. Part 9 includes, in addition to the monumental bibliography, a table of dates and six documentary appendixes, the last of which is a compilation of the "Provisions in State Constitutions Regarding Religious Freedom."

5421. Torpey, William G. Judicial doctrines of religious rights in America. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1948. 376 p. 48–8404 Law

Bibliography: p. [333]–371.

A legal study, beginning with an historical analysis of relations of government to religion, and then examining many aspects of religious freedom as interpreted, especially by the State courts. Under the first heading, "Delegated and Police Powers as Limitations upon Religious Freedom," there are discussed such matters as pacifism and conscientious objectors, postal laws prohibiting use of mails to defraud, refusals to salute the flag, Sunday laws, laws against fortunetelling. In many of these cases, which seem to run to oddities, the courts have ruled that religious liberty was not violated. Religious organizations are next considered with respect to their legal status, the finality of their decisions, the right of religious assembly, and the exemption of church property from taxation. Then the author turns to the religious rights of the individual in marriage and divorce, in conflicts over child control, in education, in court trials, and in bequests for religious purposes. Many of these cases likewise turn on what seem eccentricities of faith and conduct. The text is in easy narrative style, with footnote references to the many cases cited (tabulated in the bibliography), and each chapter ends with a simple and useful summary.

5422. Zollmann, Carl F. G. American church law. St. Paul, West Pub. Co., 1933. xv, 675 p. 33–4421 Law

A standard handbook of church law, covering comprehensively statutes in force of the Federal Government and the States relating to religious matters. Published first in 1917 with the title, American Civil Church Law, as volume 77 of the Columbia University Studies in history, economics and public law, it has been revised and expanded to encompass new material. It begins with a "Table of Constitutional Provisions Cited" (U.S., Alabama-Wyoming), and ends with a 40-page table of nearly 2500 cases. Each chapter opens with a list of the numbered sections into which it is divided. The sections state the legal issue under consideration: e.g., Ch. I, Sec. 29, "The Legal Effect of Antenuptial Promises in Mixed Marriages." The first two chapters on religious liberty and religious education include a number of the more unusual claims made on religious grounds, and upheld or rejected by the courts. Most of the laws, however, relate to matters of regular procedure or administration: the forms, natures, and powers of corporations, church constitutions, implied trusts, schisms, church decisions, and such material matters as tax exemption, the rights of clergymen and church officers, the acquisition, protection, and liability of church property, pew rights, and cemeteries.

D. Religious Thought; Theology

5423. Bainton, Roland H. Yale and the ministry; a history of education for the Christian ministry at Yale from the founding in 1701. Line drawings by the author. New York, Harper, 1957. 297 p. 57–7344 BV4070.Y36B3

5424. Williams, George Huntston, ed. The Harvard Divinity School: its place in Harvard University and in American culture. Boston, Beacon Press, 1954. xvi, 366 p. illus. 54–8425 BV4070.H46W5

These histories are rather different in scope, for while the Yale volume takes its departure from the founding of the college in 1701, the Harvard one starts only with the "tentative beginnings" of a separate divinity school in 1811, leading to its establishment as a separate department in 1819. Yale followed suit and set up a divinity school in 1822, but the first six chapters of Professor Bainton's book are concerned with the training of a learned ministry during the first 12 decades of the college. After four years spent in earning their bachelor's degrees, candidates would undergo an apprenticeship in the homes of the "graduate faculty," Connecticut pastors who were themselves Yale graduates. The author paints an impressive picture of Yale as "the creation, instrument, and leader of an entire community embracing the Connecticut valley as far north as Northampton, and taking in the southern fringe of Massachusetts and Rhode Island." The remaining 14 chapters narrate the history of the divinity school, with special attention to the "New Haven theology" which prevailed for some decades after its foundation, movements of moral reform, the acquisition of separate buildings, and distinguished teachers of several generations. Nor is it a backward-looking book for, in Dr. Bainton's opinion, "the last quarter of a century has been the greatest in the history of the Yale Divinity School," with a rigorously selected student body of the highest quality, ten percent of whom are women. Acting Dean Williams' volume on the Harvard School over which he presides is a coöperative work, with three chronological chapters contributed by Conrad Wright (to 1840), Sydney E. Ahlstrom (to 1880), and Levering Reynolds, Jr. (to the present); while the late Dean Willard L. Sperry has a briefer one on student life during the 19th century. Three supplementary essays, by Deans Sperry and Williams and Ralph Lazzaro, are concerned with "Theology at Harvard and Its Place in American Culture." Here Dean Sperry has the crucial subject of "Preparation for the Ministry in a Nondenominational School," for the School abandoned its Unitarian origins during the mid-19th century, and since 1865 has been "pan-Protestant and ecumenical" in outlook. Excellent portraits of 34 members of the faculty and a chronological chart at the end increase the value of the book.

5425. Ferm, Vergilius T. A., ed. Contemporary American theology; theological autobiographies. New York, Round Table Press, 1932–33. 2v 33–2542 BR525.F4

"Principal publications" at end of each "autobiography."

Twenty-three of America's leading theologians contributed to these two volumes, for which they were asked to set down "in an intimate manner" their personal stories of religious development. The editor's introductions to each volume outline some of the main trends of contemporary Protestantism. Most of the writers are professors of theology in universities or seminaries. In their spiritual experience they reflect the tremendous shifts in religious thinking that have taken place in the 20th century. In general they have revolted against liberalism as lacking in inner values (one writer came to see in liberal religion "merely a comfortable rationalization of middle-class prosperity"), and have turned toward modernism or conservatism. "Certain agreements and convergences" appear in these confessions of faith—the search for indubitable fundamentals, for social implications, loyalty to organized religious expression, the acceptance of higher criticism—but from a viewpoint tempered with imagination and poetic insight, an unconcern for absolutes. In theology, as in scientific investigation, says the editor, there is "the spirit of open-mindedness, a place for possibilities as yet unrealized, for convictions open to correction." "If the loss is great in dogmatic authority, the gain is great in the realm of faith and credibility."

5426. Finkelstein, Louis, ed. American spiritual autobiographies, fifteen self-portraits. New York, Harper, 1948. xvi, 276 p. 48-9493 BL72.F5

CONTENTS.—M. L. Wilson.—George N. Shuster.—Alvin S. Johnson.—Lyman Bryson.—Raphael Isaacs.—Harry J. Carman.—Harry Emerson Fosdick.—Rufus M. Jones.—Mary K. Simkhovitch.—William Foxwell Albright.—Mary McLeod Bethune.—Charles S. Johnson.—William G. Constable.—Jacob S. Potofsky.—Simon J. Finkelstein.—Biographical sketches.

5427. Finkelstein, Louis, ed. Thirteen Americans: their spiritual autobiographies. New York, Institute for Religious and Social Studies; distributed by Harper, 1953. 296 p. (Religion and civilization series) 53-5437 E176.I5

CONTENTS.—Clarence E. Pickett.—Ordway Tead.—Henry Norris Russell.—Edwin Grant Conklin.—Richard McKeon.—Erwin D. Canham.—Elbert D. Thomas.—Judith Berlin Lieberman.—Channing H. Tobias.—David de Sola Pool.—Basil O'Connor.—Willard L. Sperry.—Julian Morgenstern.

Two collections of autobiographical essays, all of which are "frank self-revelations" and concentrate on "the problems and influence of character and spirit." The 1948 volume arose from original lectures at the interdenominational Institute for Religious and Social Studies. Its 15 essays are by as many leaders of varied faiths who have contributed largely to American intellectual and spiritual life. The editor explains that they were selected "for a certain spiritual quality permeating their lives and actions which we may comprehend under the general term, saintliness, though it varies greatly from person to person." The biographical notes at the end of the book show that the majority represent a variety of professions outside the ministry—the social sciences, philosophy, science, public affairs, medicine, etc. The second volume includes 11 lectures delivered at the Institute and 2 essays written for the compilation. The editor comments that "the writers of these autobiographies differ from other people only in the extent of their dedication, and in the scope of causes they serve, but not in kind."

5428. Foster, Frank Hugh. A genetic history of the New England theology. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1907. xv, 568 p. 7-8502 BX7250.F7

A time-honored doctrinal history of the distinctive New England school of theology which took its departure from Jonathan Edwards' revivalist preaching of predestination in 1734. After a chapter on Puritanism and its decline, the writer concentrates on dogmatics, reviewing Edwards' battle with the anti-Calvinistic Arminians in his treatise on freedom of the will, and analyzing his other metaphysical concepts. He then examines the deterministic teachings of Edwards' successors, Joseph Bellamy, Samuel Hopkins, Jonathan Edwards the younger, and others. This uncompromising modification of Calvinism was the dominant school of thought in New England Congregationalism and in American Christianity in the latter 18th century. At the opening of the 19th century there arose within it two schisms, Unitarianism, which the writer studies in the teaching of W. E. Channing, and Universalism (Hosea Ballou's Treatise on the Atonement, and the essays of Walter Balfour denying the existence of hell). The later trends of the New England theology, as adapted to a changing environment, are next analyzed through the doctrines of individual leaders—Nathanael Emmons, Nathaniel W. Taylor, Horace Bushnell, Charles G. Finney, Edwards A. Park. The last chapter records the sudden collapse of Calvinism in 1880, under the impact of Darwinism and of Biblical criticism. The theological thought of Congregationalist and other Protestant preachers who succeeded the New England school was expounded by Dr. Foster in a series of lectures at the Andover Newton Theological School in 1934. This work, The Modern Movement in American Theology, published posthumously in 1939 (New York, Revell, 219 p.), had the subtitle: "Sketches in the History of American Protestant Thought from the Civil War to the World War." It analyzes the currents in Protestant thought resulting from Darwinism and the attempt to reconcile science, philosophy, and the modern world with theology, religion, and Christianity. The schools of Horace Bushnell and Henry Ward Beecher, the teaching of George A. Gordon, William N. Clarke, Henry C. King of Oberlin College, and other leaders of liberal and radical thought are described.

5429. Furniss, Norman F. The fundamentalist controversy, 1918–1931. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1954. 199 p. (Yale historical publications. Miscellany, 59)
54–5082 BT78.F82

5430. Cole, Stewart G. The history of fundamentalism. New York, R. R. Smith, 1931. xiv, 360 p. 31–10666 BT78.C56
Bibliography: p. 341–350.

Dr. Furniss' well-documented dissertation begins with a lively account of the sensational Scopes trial at Dayton, Tennessee, in the summer of 1925. At the extravagantly publicized "monkey trial" the complete discomfiture of William Jennings Bryan through the rigorous cross-questioning of the free-thinking defense attorney, Clarence Darrow, spotlighted the fundamentalist controversy. The author studies in detail the conservatives' battle for the literal acceptance of the Bible as against evolutionary science and modernism in theology, which had begun at the turn of the century and was waged with greater fervor after the First World War. In the opening "Analysis of the Fundamentalist Crusade" he outlines the general course of militant fundamentalism and the characteristics of the movement, among which he alleges violence, ignorance, and egotism. He next examines fundamentalist organizations and their attempts to secure laws against the teaching of evolution; the central body, the World's Christian Fundamentals Association (founded at the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago in 1919) within 2 years spread its campaigns into 25 states. The third and longest section analyzes the controversy within the separate churches—both the Northern and Southern branches of Baptists and Presbyterians were sharply divided, Methodists and Episcopalians slightly troubled, the Disciples of Christ deeply shaken. A postscript comments on the decline of the aggressive movement with the death of Bryan and the spread of scientific knowledge into the regions which had furnished its support. Dr. Furniss cites Stewart G. Cole's The History of Fundamentalism as the most comprehensive history of the conflict over modernism. This work is focused on doctrinal aspects of the conflict within the churches and pays minor attention to the antievolution campaign.

5431. James, William. The varieties of religious experience, a study in human nature; being the Gifford lectures on natural religion delivered at Edinburgh in 1901–1902. New York, Modern Library, 1936. xviii, 526 p. (The Modern Library of the world's best books)
37–27013 BR110.J3 1936
First published in 1902.

"The description of man's religious constitutions" is William James' own summation of these famous lectures which formed the starting-point for the modern study of the psychology of religion and are ranked among the most important of American contributions to religious thought. Proceeding from physiological psychology, the founder of philosophical pragmatism examined case histories of religious experience in the light of his "radical empiricism." With vivid analysis and felicitous citation he explored religious hallucinations, the "healthy-mindedness" of liberal religion (particularly the "mind-cure" movement), the opposite pole of pessimism, the divided self, conversion, saintliness, mysticism, and other characteristics of religious experience. "I have loaded the lectures," he said, "with concrete examples, and I have chosen these among the extremer expressions of the religious temperament." In the last chapters he sums up the phenomena in the general terms which he considers common to all religious persons: "We have in the fact that the conscious person is continuous with a wider self through which saving experiences come, a positive content of religious experience which, it seems to me, is literally and objectively true as far as it goes." To this he added his "over-belief" that there exist other worlds of consciousness from which higher energies may filter into our lives from communion with the ideal in faith and prayer.

5432. Kegley, Charles W., ed. Reinhold Niebuhr: his religious, social, and political thought, edited by Charles W. Kegley and Robert W. Bretall. New York, Macmillan, 1956. xiv, 486 p. (The Library of living theology, v. 2)
56–13522 BX4827.N5K4

5433. Kegley, Charles W., ed. The theology of Paul Tillich, edited by Charles W. Kegley & Robert W. Bretall. New York, Macmillan, 1952. xiv, 370 p. (The Library of living theology, v. 1) 52–13200 BX4827.T53K4

Perhaps the most vigorous theological thinking in America during the turbulent present has been that of the two theologians chosen as subjects of the first volumes in a series paralleling the Library of living philosophers edited by Paul A. Schilpp (nos. 5294, 5377, and 5385). The editors follow the same form, each volume including the subject's "intellectual autobiography," essays on different aspects of his work by leading scholars, his reply to interpretation and criticism, and a full bibliography of his writings. The third and fourth volumes of the series, as announced, are to go outside America, to treat the Swiss theologians Karl Barth and Emil Brunner, whose "neo-orthodox" or "neo-supernaturalist" doctrines have close relationships with Tillich and Niebuhr. These are works to be read by trained theologians. Reinhold Niebuhr first received attention as a critic of social conditions, and is known primarily as a Christian ethical and political thinker. He has been prominent in what Paul Tillich, writing the first essay on Niebuhr, speaks of as "the theological revolution" against liberalism in the United States. His doctrine is labeled "neo-orthodox," although, Dr. Tillich says, there is nothing in the world more unorthodox than "the spiritual volcano Reinhold Niebuhr." Since 1930 he has been professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary. Tillich left Germany at the beginning of the Hitler era and became Niebuhr's colleague at the Union Theological Seminary, which he left to go to the Harvard Divinity School in 1954. For the last quarter-century the two have led in the enunciation of dialectical theology. Tillich is currently publishing his Systematic Theology (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1951–57. 2 v. (300, 187 p.); v. 2 has title Existence and the Christ), which correlates philosophic questions with existential theological answers stemming from revelation. There are interpretative chapters on the theology of Niebuhr and Tillich in David Wesley Soper's Major Voices in American Theology: [v. 1] Six Contemporary Leaders (Philadelphia, Westminster Press, 1953. 217 p.). The author, chairman of the Department of Religion of Beloit College in Wisconsin, has written several other "readable" books on contemporary theology. Besides the two above-mentioned men, his study covers the Methodist evangelical theologian Edwin Lewis of Drew University, Nels F. S. Ferré, the "postcritical" professor of philosophical theology at Vanderbilt University, and H. Richard Niebuhr and Robert Calhoun of Yale, the first of whom teaches that man is justified by hope, and the second, by work. A second volume of Mr. Soper's Major Voices in American Theology, entitled Men Who Shape Belief (1955. 224 p.), gives somewhat briefer accounts of 11 additional theologians divided into 2 groups. The first, including John Luther Adams, Douglas V. Steere, John A. Mackay, Walter M. Horton, John C. Bennett, Wilhelm Pauck, and Harris Franklin Rall, has the title "A Central Theme: God, the Lord of History." The second part, "Alternative Trends," treats the "Church-centered" theology of W. Norman Pittenger, the Biblical literalism of Louis Berkhof, the theology of "exclusive immanence" of Henry N. Wieman, and the "theistic finitism" of Edgar S. Brightman.

5434. Long, Edward Le Roy. Religious beliefs of American scientists. Philadelphia, Westminster Press, 1952. 168 p.
52–9193 BL240.L66 1952

A study, which originated as a Columbia University dissertation, of the thought of natural scientists who have been sufficiently concerned with the meaning of life to write books expressing their beliefs. In all the writings surveyed the author discovers the search for a basis on which to reconcile science and religion. The men whose published credos are selected for discussion are 20th-century Americans, most of whom have written since the controversy over evolution in the twenties. The two parts are "Approaches through Science" and "Approaches through Religion." In the first appear, among many others, the well-known names Alfred Einstein and David Starr Jordan, who equated God with the cosmic order; Arthur H. Compton, who recognizes God as first cause; and Henry Fairfield Osborn, Robert A. Millikan (no. 4755), and Lecomte Du Noüy, who, like the philosopher Alfred N. Whitehead (nos. 5383–5385), see God as the ruler of evolution. In part 2 the writer analyzes books by scientists who, starting from belief in the Bible as literal truth or as of unique significance, try to fit contemporary scientific knowledge to Christian faith.

5435. Neumann, Henry. Spokesmen for ethical religion. Boston, Beacon Press, 1951. xvii, 173 p. 51–11143 BJ1581.N27

The ethical movement is associated particularly with the name of Felix Adler, a Hebrew scholar and agnostic who, having rejected Reform Judaism, in 1876 founded the Ethical Culture Society. This book, written by a longtime leader of the society for its 75th anniversary, expounds at length its principles—that the essence of religion is not creeds but good deeds, "to treat one another in ways which do most credit to the name human." The first four chapters are devoted to Adler, his formation of the society and of the "Workingman's School," now the Ethical Culture School, in which children of different faiths are brought together for nonsectarian moral education; his reform efforts on behalf of labor; his religious outlook; and his teaching of ethical living by community and nation. There follow chapters on Adler's chief disciple, John Lovejoy Elliott, other American leaders, and spokesmen in England, Germany, and Austria. The last three chapters explain the basic ideas of ethical religion: "Unity in Diversity," "How to Tell Right from Wrong," "Why a Religion?" The latter may be summarized in the statement which for many years appeared on the announcements of the ethical societies: "We interpret religion to mean fervent devotion to the ethical ideal." The educational ideas of the Ethical Culture Society incorporated those of a short-lived earlier movement, the Free Religious Association, which in the last third of the 19th century asserted that philanthropy and social reform were an integral part of religious faith. This group is the subject of a historical monograph by Prof. Stow Persons of Princeton University: Free Religion, an American Faith (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1947. 168 p.). An offshoot of radical Unitarianism, this "spiritual anti-slavery society" was launched by a few young clergymen in New England in 1867. Numerically the association was an insignificant group; its maximum membership during the seventies may have been five hundred; by the mid-eighties it was in decline, many of its members back in the Unitarian fold. Its views, expressed in its organ, The Index, edited by Francis Abbott, and largely written by him and his colleague, William J. Potter, influenced the later humanistic theism of the Unitarians, and particularly the emergence of the social gospel.

5436. Smith, Hilrie S. Changing conceptions of original sin; a study in American theology since 1750. New York, Scribner, 1955. 242 p.
55–9682 BT720.S5

An illuminating study of the doctrine of original sin in American religious thought, first presented as lectures at Princeton Theological Seminary by a professor of Duke University Divinity School. Dr. Smith explains the Puritan concept, the "federal" or "covenant" doctrine of inherited corruption through Adam's disobedience, which dominated colonial theology—"In Adam's fall, We sinned all." In the 18th century Jonathan Edwards and his followers upheld this Calvinistic tenet of native and inherited depravity against the repudiation of infant damnation by the English Daniel Whitby and John Taylor and their American disciples, the precursors of the Unitarian revolt. In the 19th century a modified form of the Calvinist position was maintained by Nathaniel W. Taylor at New Haven, and later by Horace Bushnell, and was opposed by the Unitarian Harvard school, led by Andrews Norton. The liberalism that followed Darwin rejected the fall of man and argued that sin originated in man's refusal to respond to his higher nature. This trend, dominant in late 19th and early 20th century thought, was challenged by Walter Rauschenbush, and in our own day by Niebuhr and Tillich, who have returned to a doctrine of original sin as indispensable to an understanding of the human situation and of the Christian doctrine of grace.

5437. Wieman, Henry Nelson, and Bernard Eugene Meland. American philosophies of religion. Chicago, Willett, Clark, 1936. 370 p.
Bibliography: p. 353–359.
36–15871 BL51.W55

Professor Wieman of the University of Chicago is himself one of the prominent voices in liberal American theology at the present time. He and Professor Meland are both "empirical theists," whose thought is close to that of John Dewey, Shailer Mathews, and others who derive their idea of God from the experience of value in the scientifically apprehended world of events. This book, designed for college use, surveys, defines, and labels contemporary types of religious thought as presented by individuals. It opens with a general section of orientation as to the background and traditions of American philosophies of religion. Then four main types are distinguished, "rooted in the traditions," respectively, of supernaturalism, idealism, romanticism, and naturalism. Within these are many shadings. Supernaturalists are traditionalist or neo-supernaturalist. The idealists include absolutists, modern mystics, and personalists. Within romanticism come ethical intuitionists, and philosophic, theological, or aesthetic naturalists. These last shade off into the "rooted" naturalists, who may be evolutionary theists, cosmic theists, religious humanists, or empirical theists. The volume ends with a short symposium, "The Present Outlook in Philosophy of Religion," by representatives of the four main branches, with summaries by the editors.

5438. Williams, Daniel Day. The Andover liberals; a study in American theology. New York, King's Crown Press, 1941. 203 p.
Bibliography: p. [193]–199.
42–480 BV4070.A56W5 1941a

The liberal movement in American Protestant thought found its most vigorous early expression at Andover Theological Seminary in Massachusetts during the years 1880 to 1895. This stronghold of Calvinism, founded by the Congregationalists in 1808, had been throughout the century a major battlefield of old and new faiths. Until 1881, when Edwards A. Park (no. 5428) retired, Calvinist orthodoxy held the fort; in that year a new faculty, trained in the German critical-historical approach and in evolutionary philosophy, began to champion evangelical religious liberalism. Their journal, the Andover Review (1884–93), was the organ of the new theology. Dr. Williams' study, which originated as a Columbia University dissertation, reviews the history of Andover and outlines the new developments in thought and their enunciation by the faculty and by the Review. Toward the close of the century, as strikes and labor troubles increase, the Andover theologians turned more and more to social problems. The movement culminated in "Social Christianity," marked by the establishment of a settlement house, Andover House in South Boston, in 1892. "The House's Head Resident found himself wondering if after all the trade union movement, and not the church, might be God's right arm in the bringing in of His Kingdom."

E. Religious Bodies

5439. Braden, Charles S. These also believe; a study of modern American cults & minority religious movements. New York, Macmillan, 1949. xv, 491 p. 49–8917 BR516.B697

The author, a liberal Methodist, is an emeritus professor of the history and literature of religions at Northwestern University. Most writings on the groups here treated, he explains, have aimed "either to exploit the strange, bizarre elements which many of them do undoubtedly contain . . . or to expose their weaknesses, refute their claims, laugh at their idiosyncrasies and so to discredit them." His is a careful scholarly study, based, insofar as each group would permit, on its own files of source materials. The lucid analysis of each comprises: essential historical facts; an explanation of its major distinctive religious ideas and their divergences, from and relationships to normative Protestant or Catholic faith; the form of organization; significant practices, social or economic as well as religious; the basic motivations to which they appeal; and current trends. The cults or minority religious bodies here examined are: The Peace Mission movement of Father Divine; Psychiana; New Thought; Unity School of Christianity; Christian Science; Theosophy; the I Am Movement; the Liberal Catholic Church; Spiritualism; Jehovah's Witnesses; Anglo-Israel; the Oxford Group movement; and Mormonism. Appendix A is a short selected bibliography (p. 453–460), Appendix B is a brief dictionary of 18 other modern cults not included in the study. In 1958 Dr. Braden published a full-length objective "case study" of one of these religious bodies: Christian Science Today; Power, Policy, Practice (Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press. 432 p.). As his title indicates, his primary interest is not in the life of Mary Baker Eddy, but in the modifications of her teaching and the development of Christian Science thought and practice during the half-century since her passing, and in the means whereby the Board of Directors of the Mother Church in Boston have maintained their authority over 3115 congregations throughout the United States and the world. It includes a very useful bibliography (p. 403–417).

5440. Clark, Elmer Talmage. The small sects in America. Rev. ed. New York, Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1949. 256 p. 49–10200 BR516.C57 1949

Bibliography: p. 236–240.

On the numerous little religious bodies, "for the most part unknown to even well informed persons," this book, first published in 1937, has been the standard and, until recently, the only publication of its kind. The author emphasizes that the descriptions are his own rather than those of representatives of the several groups; the latter would as he has found, entail endless repetition and much obscurity. "A glance at the U.S. Census of Religious Bodies will show the results of that procedure." (In this connection it might be noted that the Census of Religious Bodies has not been taken since 1936, and in the 1960 census religious distinctions are to be omitted from vital statistics.) Dr. Clark's attention is focused on the distinctive principles of the sects, and on their points of difference rather than on the agreements, which, he reminds us, "are far more numerous and important than differences. In spite of superficial appearances the churches are nearly all alike, and the strife or contention between them has been greatly exaggerated." In a running narrative which includes generalizations on sectarianism he examines about a hundred churches, denominations, and sects, grouping them by "the types of mind to which their leading principles appeal." His seven main categories are the pessimistic or adventists, the perfectionist or subjectivist, the charismatic or pentecostal, the communistic, the legalistic or objectivist, the egocentric or New Thought, and the esoteric or mystic. The last two groups must be sought in the Appendix.

5441. Drummond, Andrew L. Story of American Protestantism. Boston, Beacon Press, 1950. 418 p. 50–12382 BR515.D8 1950

Bibliography: p. 407–413.

The writer is a Scottish theologian. His account of the metamorphoses of the Protestant faiths transplanted from England, Scotland, Holland, and Germany to the New World is in vivid narrative style. Of five books, the first four are historical: "Colonial Genesis," "Unification" (the Great Awakening, the Revolution and post-Revolutionary "ebb-tide"), "Sectionalism" (the New England theology and growth of sectarianism), and "The Frontier and the Faith." The last part, "Modern American Religion (1865–1940)," is a general examination of the Protestant churches—the seven big denominations rather than the multiple small sects which account for only 3 percent of American church membership. Dr. Drummond is concerned to explain to British readers the vigor of the American churches and the strength of the tradition of free Protestantism in the national life. He looks appraisingly at the social gospel, men and methods in evangelism, the liberal theology, eminent preachers, recent tendencies toward a renascence of worship, and interdenominational trends. He has made effective use of secondary sources, and his pages are filled with pertinent detail and telling quotation.

5442. Ferm, Vergilius T. A., ed. The American church of the Protestant heritage. New York, Philosphical Library, 1953. 481 p.
53–7607 BR516.F45

CONTENTS.—The Moravian Church, by J. R. Weinlick.—The Lutheran Church in America, by V. Ferm.—The Mennonites, by J. C. Wenger.—The Presbyterian Church in America, by C. M. Drury.—The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, by W. H. Stowe.—The Reformed Church in America, by M. J. Hoffman.—Unitarianism, by E. T. Buehrer.—The Congregational Christian churches, by M. M. Deems.—Baptist churches in America, by R. G. Torbet.—The United Presbyterian Church in America, by W. E. McCulloch.—The Society of Friends in America (Quakers), by W. E. Berry.—The Evangelical Mission Covenant Church and the free churches of Swedish background, by K. A. Olsson.—The Church of the Brethern, by D. W. Bittinger.—The Evangelical and Reformed Church, by D. Dunn.—Methodism, by E. T. Clark.—The Universalist Church of America, by R. Cummins.—The Evangelical United Brethern Church, by P. H. Eller.—Seventh-Day Adventists, by L. E. Froom.—Disciples of Christ, by R. E. Osborn.—Churches of Christ, by E. West.—The Church of God (Anderson, Indiana), by C. E. Brown.

Twenty-one spokesmen for different Protestant denominations here explain their churches, giving the European background, the historic development in America, characteristic features of doctrine, organization, leadership, and other information. Most of the contributors are professors of religious history, and the chief emphasis is on history. Each article is followed by notes, a bibliography, and a list of serial publications of the church described.

5443. [Baptist] Torbet, Robert G. A history of the Baptists. Philadelphia, Judson Press, 1950. 538 p. 50–9198 BX6231.T6
Bibliography: p. 509–526.

By a professor of history at the Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary, this is an attempt to tell concisely but inclusively the story of the Baptists, who in their several branches constitute the largest single family of American Protestants. The book opens with a brief review of Baptist principles—dependence on the Bible as the sole rule for faith and practice, the church composed of baptized believers, the autonomy of the local congregation, religious liberty, and the separation of church and state—and of the heritage of the Anabaptists of the Reformation. Part 2 summarizes the history and present position of British and European Baptists; although found in almost every country they are nowhere numerically strong except in America. Well over half the text (p. 215–508) is devoted to the American Baptists. From the little band that surrounded Roger Williams, through the great revivals and the missionary expansion, doctrinal dissensions, movements in evangelism and education, widespread foreign missions, and the modern social gospel (whose prophet, Walter Rauschenbusch, was a Baptist), the narrative is carried swifty to the present day. The appendixes include a chronological table, 1525–1950, and a table of Baptist bodies in the United States (6 with more than 100,000 members, and nearly 40 with fewer). The American story is told in far greater detail in an older work originally published in 1894, Albert H. Newman's History of the Baptist Churches in the United States, 6th ed., rev. and enl. (New York, Scribner, 1915. 545 p.), and its source materials are excerpted in William W. Sweet's collection, Religion on the American Frontier (nos. 5412–5416).

5444. [Catholic] Blanshard, Paul. American freedom and Catholic power. 2d ed., rev. and enl. Boston, Beacon Press, 1958. 402 p.
58–6240 BX1770.B55 1958
Bibliography: p. 361–365.

5445. O'Neill, James M. Catholicism and American freedom. New York, Harper, 1952. 287 p. 51–11945 BX1406.O5

Mr. Blanshard's much-debated book on the Catholic Church as an organ of political and cultural power was first published in 1949. The 1958 revision includes a review of events of the decade since its appearance and an account of the storm of controversy it aroused. The author, a lawyer and a liberal in religion, declares in his "Personal Prologue: The Duty to Speak": "There is no doubt that the American Catholic hierarchy has entered the political arena, and that it is becoming more and more aggressive in extending the frontiers of Catholic authority into the fields of medicine, education, and foreign policy." He describes his study as a review of contemporary facts, and each statement is carefully documented, in large part from Catholic sources. Mr. Blanshard first discusses the working of the hierarchy and its relation to the state, then analyzes Catholic teaching and practice in regard to individual issues—education, medicine, birth control, marriage and divorce, censorship, science, political ideologies, etc. In a second book from the same publisher, Communism, Democracy, and Catholic Power (Boston, 1951. 340 p.), he extends his indictment of Catholic authoritarianism to the world scene. Catholic answers to this polemic have been numerous and indignant. The most detailed is by Mr. O'Neill, a teacher of rhetoric and debate, a former chairman of the Committee on Academic Freedom of the American Civil Liberties Union and a Catholic layman. His volume attempts to show "that Mr. Blanshard's basic thesis [that the Catholic Church is an enemy of American freedom] is false, and that the discussion of the belief and practice of American Catholics which he presents in support of his thesis is so biased and inaccurate as to be substantially worthless."

5446. The Commonweal. Catholicism in America, a series of articles from The Commonweal. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1954. 242 p.
54–5256 BX1406.C53

5447. Putz, Louis J., ed. The Catholic Church, U. S. A. Chicago, Fides Publishers Association, 1956. xxiii, 415 p.
56–11629 BX1406.P84

The widely esteemed weekly review The Commonweal is edited by Catholic laymen. Its attitude is predominantly that described by the Protestant theologian Reinhold Niebuhr in one of the essays in this symposium: "the Church finding a creative place in the moral and political reconstruction of a modern industrial society." The book reprints 17 essays published in the journal during 1953, all, except Dr. Niebuhr's and Will Herberg's "A Jew Looks at Catholics," by Catholic laymen. The foreword by President George N. Shuster of Hunter College sets the keynote of seeking to allay tensions still felt in the mid-20th century between Catholics and non-Catholic Americans. The first essay, "Catholicism in America," by William P. Clancy, an editor of Commonweal, outlines and deplores the extreme positions ("Mr. Paul Blanshard on the one side and his Catholic counterparts on the other") in which Catholicism is considered a threat to American democracy and, conversely, "the only force left strong enough to combat an increasingly arrogant secularist invasion of culture." The other essays examine, not uncritically, Catholic separatism, and the Catholic position in politics, isolationism, social reform, radicalism, education, science, arts, letters, and the movies. Another recent symposium, expository rather than analytical in treatment, is The Catholic Church, U.S.A. The 23 articles contributed by Catholic scholars, several of them priests, are grouped in three parts: the first is on the history, structure, and organizational workings of the Church. Part 2 is arranged by regions, showing the diversity of the church in New England, the Deep South, the Pacific coast, etc. The last part concerns the life and influence of the church in social and intellectual spheres. The quality of Catholic social thought is exemplified, for instance, in the essay by the Rev. John La Farge, S.J., on "The Catholic Church and Racial Segregation." Father La Farge, associate editor of the national Catholic weekly America, has been closely concerned with and written much on race relations. He has also recently published A Report on the American Jesuits, with photographs by Margaret Bourke-White (New York, Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1956. 236 p.). Extended from an article for Life, it is a splendidly illustrated outline of the history and current activities of this indefatigable order.

5448. Ellis, John Tracy. American Catholicism. [Chicago] University of Chicago Press, 1956. 207 p. (The Chicago history of American civilization) 56–11002 BX1406.E4
Bibliographical references included in "Notes": p. 160–180.
"Suggested reading": p. 188–197.

5449. Ellis, John Tracy, ed. Documents of American Catholic history. Milwaukee, Bruce Pub. Co., 1956. xxiv, 677 p.
56–13199 BX1405.E4

Monsignor Ellis of Catholic University is managing editor of the Catholic Historical Review and a noted historian. His first volume embodies four lectures concisely sketching in broad general lines the history of American Catholicism. The divisions are chronological, the first lecture covering the colonial period, 1492–1790. The second, "Catholics as Citizens," runs from the inauguration of the hierarchy in the United States under Bishop Carroll in 1790 to 1852, the year of the first national plenary council. "Civil War and Immigration," 1852–1908, describes the violent anti-Catholic agitation of the Know-Nothing Party, and the great increase of Catholic population through the Irish, German, and South European immigrations. The last lecture, "Recent American Catholicism," brings the story up to 1956. The record of the Church in America reveals, according to the author, "the maximum of loyalty and service to every fundamental ideal and principle upon which the Republic was founded and has endured." He lays much stress on the discrimination against Catholics that has prevailed throughout the four-century story. Dr. Ellis had earlier published a larger bibliography than the one in this volume: A Select Bibliography of the History of the Catholic Church in the United States (New York, McMullen, 1947. 96 p.) with 775 entries, most of them books, and with brief annotations for the greater part. The large volume of Documents is likewise in chronological order, selected from the source materials of Catholicism in America. They begin with the Papal Bull of Demarcation in 1493 and end with the Encyclical of 1939, Sertum laetitiae, celebrating the 150th anniversary of the American Hierarchy. Their great variety includes inspiring records of missionary faith and heroism; expressions of tolerance, patriotism, and charity; and contributions to art and letters, social thought and action, and political thought.

5450. Maynard, Theodore. The story of American Catholicism. New York, Macmillan, 1941. xv, 694 p. 41–23098 BX1406.M33
Bibliography: p. 649–675.

An eminently readable historical narrative by a Catholic scholar, poet, and man of letters. One Protestant reviewer called his book "mythology, anti-Protestant polemic, propaganda, history and criticism blended into a literary masterpiece." The chronological narrative ends with the death of Cardinal Gibbons in 1920. In the penultimate chapter Dr. Maynard reviews the cultural contribution of many Catholic writers, poets, artists, and musicians, and in the last, "The Corporate Vision," he discusses briefly the social action of the church, the liturgical revival, and other aspects of her estate in the second quarter of the 20th century. He takes issue with those who have claimed that the Catholic Church is inherently incompatible with the culture of the United States. He recognizes, he says, "dangers of Catholic disintegration here. But they do not come from American thought or American institutions; they come from the spirit of the times, from which Americanism itself is in danger." A later book by Dr. Maynard, The Catholic Church and the American Idea (New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1953. 309 p.), is a fuller and equally forceful statement of Catholic participation in and contributions to American civilization. In his most recent work, Great Catholics in American History (Garden City, N.Y., Hanover House, 1957. 261 p.), he briefly relates the life stories of 21 Catholic saints, heroes, and leaders beginning with the Jesuit Fathers and ending with Al Smith.

5451. Shea, John D. Gilmary. A history of the Catholic Church within the limits of the United States, from the first attempted colonization to the present time. New York, J. G. Shea, 1886–92. 4 v. 35–16425 BX1406.S5 1886
BX4705.C33S4 1888

Shea (1824–1892) abandoned a novitiate in the Society of Jesus in order to write the history of his church in America, and his magnum opus is one of the chief monuments of American Catholic scholarship, representing prolonged research in original source materials. The four volumes cover: 1, the Catholic Church in the colonies, English, French, and Spanish; 2, the life and times of Bishop John Carroll (1763–1815); 3, 1808–1843; 4, 1843–1866. A projected fifth volume was never completed. All the volumes have many illustrations, "portraits, views, maps, and fac-similes." Practically every page is crowded with footnotes, many of them including comment, additional data, and quotation as well as references. The work, while outmoded in some respects, remains impressive in its scholarship, eloquence, earnestness, and objectivity. Shea's voluminous output consisted largely of documentary publications, but his History of the Catholic Missions among the Indian Tribes of the United States, 1529–1845 (New York, E. Dunigan, 1855. 514 p.) deserves separate mention.

5452. [Christian Science] Beasley, Norman. The cross and the crown; the history of Christian Science. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1952. 664 p. 52–9086 BX6931.B4

5453. Beasley, Norman. The continuing spirit. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1956. 403 p. 56–5050 BX6931.B38

The first work is a history of the beginnings and widening acceptance of the teachings of Mary Baker Eddy, from her own healing and her discovery of "the Christ Science" in 1866 to her death in 1910. The second book takes up the story of the church at that point, with some backward glances, and carries it to the present day. The author disclaims any connection with the First Church of Christ, Scientist, and in his preface to the second declares that he wrote both works on the basis of his own research, "carried on in sources wholly outside the Archives of the Mother Church." His single purpose, he says has been to present "an independent, documented history of what Mary Baker Eddy left to her followers." His treatment of the discoverer and founder of Christian Science is uniformly sympathetic, and her position in the controversies which surrounded her is justified at each step of his full narrative of the persecutions, financial worries, intrigues, conflicts, and apostasies through which she maintained the leadership of a great and powerful religious movement. The crowded detail includes frequent and lengthy extracts from her writings, but contains nothing on the doctrinal sources of her new faith—at least, none since the third century A. D.—and leaves the impression that it was entirely self-contained. In the second book less attention is paid to the doctrines of Christian Science than to its organization, litigation, publishing, and other activities.

677676 O–63–50

5454. [Congregational] Atkins, Gaius Glenn, and Frederick L. Fagley. History of American Congregationalism. Boston, Pilgrim Press, 1942. 432 p. 42–18901 BX7135.A75

Bibliography: p. [409]–416.

In the last chapter of this substantial history of the Congregational churches in America, the authors appraise the Congregational polity as "An Adventure in Liberty." "The right and duty of the church member to administer his own church business with a direct control; a minimum of ecclesiastical machinery; willing obedience to majority discussions; a disciplined respect for the right of the minority. Congregationalism believes this to be necessary to the liberty of a Christian man, and whatever else is built must be upon this foundation." The story of the church which became American Congregationalism begins with its background of separatism on the Continent and in England, the group of exiles in Holland, and the Pilgrim Fathers in the New World. The Mayflower Compact is one of the covenants, the forms which united the saints into visible churches, reproduced in the Appendix. Among the Puritan churches of New England, the name Congregational "just growed." Landmarks in the story are the "New England Way," the adoption of the Cambridge Platform of Church Discipline (1648), the Great Awakening, the Revolution, the "departure" of the Unitarians, the expansion into the Northwest Territory, the growth of national consciousness and social concern, and the formation of the National Council and the Benevolent and Mission Boards. The forms of organization at successive periods are carefully noted.

5455. [Disciples of Christ] Garrison, Winfred Ernest, and Alfred T. De Groot. The Disciples of Christ, a history. St. Louis, Christian Board of Publication, 1948. 592 p. 49–7481 BX7315.G333

Bibliography: p. 571–576.

A coordinated and well-rounded history of the group of reunionist, congregational, noncreedal churches known as the Disciples of Christ and the Churches of Christ. The authors are both Disciples, and Dr. Garrison is recognized as one of the country's eminent professors of church history (no. 5405). This denomination originated as a direct outgrowth of the Great Western Revival in two separate movements of secession from the Presbyterian Church, the Stone movement in Kentucky in 1803 (Barton W. Stone's parish was Cane Ridge, scene of the most famous camp meeting), and Thomas Campbell's movement in western Pennsylvania in 1809. Basic ideas of both were a reunion of all Christian churches without sectarian division (resulting, of course, in the creation of new sects), and the Bible as sole authority, without "human" additions of creeds and ecclesiasticism ("anyone who could get an audience could preach"). The name of Disciples was first used by the Campbellites during the vigorous evangelism of Walter Scott around 1830. In the next decade the two bodies merged, and the first national convention was held in 1849. In growth through missionary effort along the advancing frontier, in planting churches, in preaching and publishing, and in establishing schools," the story of the Disciples parallels that of the country." Since the census of 1906 the conservative branch, gradually differentiated by the accumulation of small differences in matters of practice, has been listed separately under the name of Churches of Christ.

5456. [Episcopal] Manross, William W. A history of the American Episcopal Church. [2d ed., rev. and enl.] New York, Morehouse-Gorham, 1950. xiv, 415 p. 50–8326 BX5880.M35 1950

Bibliography: p. 373–386.

5457. Addison, James T. The Episcopal Church in the United States, 1789–1931. New York, Scribner, 1951. 400 p. 51–10050 BX5880.A33

Bibliography: p. 382–385.

The first of these two histories is a standard reference work, calm and dignified in style; it might even be termed prosaic. Dr. Manross covers a host of facts, names, and events. For the colonial beginnings he has depended on 19th-century histories, but much of his later text is from primary sources. Almost half the book is taken up with the slow expansion of the church in the colonies, the unsuccessful efforts to secure an American episcopate, and the serious decline during the Revolution when the Anglican clergy by and large inclined to the Loyalist side. The author feels this decline is often exaggerated; by 1785 the first General Convention met, and after a few years of reorganization and recuperation a vigorous revival and expansion were under way, led by the great Bishops John Henry Hobart and Alexander Viets Griswold, representing respectively High Churchmanship and Evangelicalism. Equally fact-crowded treatment is given to the establishment of missions in the West and abroad, the effects of the Oxford Movement (Anglo-Catholicism) and of 19th-century liberalism, and to institutional and organizational factors in the present-day church. Dr. Addison's book covers the same story (to 1931) in very different fashion. His narrative is rapid and colorful, focusing on the social environment and on great individual leaders—among others, the Revolutionary Bishop William White, Bishops Griswold, Hobart, Philander Chase, R. C. Moore, and Alonzo Potter, Dr. W. A. Mühlenberg, the missionary Bishop William H. Hare, the great preacher Phillips Brooks, and in the 20th century Bishops William Lawrence and Charles H. Brent. The writer offers more exposition of doctrine than does Dr. Manross and points out some weaknesses and failures of the church as well as its rich contributions to American Christianity.

5458. [Judaism] Glazer, Nathan. American Judaism. [Chicago] University of Chicago Press, 1957. 175 p. (The Chicago history of American civilization) 57–8574 BM205.G5

5459. Levy, Beryl Harold. Reform Judaism in America; a study in religious adaptation. New York, 1933. 143 p. 34–4818 BM205.L45 1933

5460. Sklare, Marshall. Conservative Judaism; an American religious movement. Glencoe, Ill., Free Press, 1955. 298 p. 55–7332 BM197.5.S45 1955

Mr. Glazer focuses his concise history on two main tendencies of Jewish religion in an American environment. The tiny communities of dignified, upper-class Orthodox Jewish merchants in early America represented both Judaism, the tradition of the law pervading the whole of life, and "Jewishness," the ethnic separateness of the Jewish people. With the large-scale immigration of refugees from the German ghettos (1825–80), there came in influences fostering religious as well as political freedom, and Reform Judaism rose concurrently with an increasing social and economic merging of the well-dispersed Jews into the new land of liberty. But with the flood of East European Jewry—nearly 2 million immigrants between 1880 and 1920, concentrated in the New York area—"Jewishness" revived, bringing on the one hand, militant irreligion, socialistic politics, and Zionism, and on the other, extreme orthodoxy. The process of integration of these newcomers with the Jewish community and the general stream of American life is analyzed from a sociological viewpoint. The author seeks to show that "Jewishness" has virtually disappeared, and that the practices of Judaism have been adjusted to the mores of the American middle class. He ends with a discussion of the revival since 1940, paralleling that in other faiths, of all forms of Judaism, Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform. The following two titles originated in dissertations at Columbia University. Dr. Levy's Reform Judaism has long been the standard treatment of this movement for a modernist revision of Jewish religious thought. Reform Judaism stemmed from the enlightenment and the struggles of the German Jews for civil liberties, and in America shaped itself so as to fit the Jews into the prosperous, comfortable, and liberal society of the late 19th century. The volume is in three parts, "Re-Making the Prayer-Book" (doing away with part of the rigid Mosaic ritual), "Attempts at a Theology" (movements toward rationalism and their leaders), and "Practical Issues and Rabbinical Reasoning." Mr. Marshall Sklare's Conservative Judaism is a well-organized study of the school which rose as a halfway house between the tendency of Reform Judaism toward complete assimilation into the larger gentile community, and the ethnic exclusiveness of Orthodox Judaism. Its doctrinal center is the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, founded in 1886 to counteract the influence of the Reformist school, the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati.

5461 [Lutheran] Wentz, Abdel R. A basic history of Lutheranism in America. Philadelphia, Muhlenberg Press, 1955. 430 p. 55–7765 BX8041.W38

5462. Spaude, Paul W. The Lutheran Church under American influence; a historico-philosophical interpretation of the church in its relation to various modifying forces in the United States. Burlington, Iowa, Lutheran Literary Board, 1943. 435 p. 43–10142 BX8041.S65

Bibliography: p. [403]–429.

The Basic History is a standard text by a cleric and historian prominent in Lutheran circles at home and abroad. His story is framed in the political and social history of America. The great name of the early days is Henry M. Muhlenberg, who in the middle 1700's organized the congregations of German and Swedish Lutherans in Pennsylvania and the neighboring Colonies into the first synods. In the 1820's a large measure of unity was achieved, with a general synod and a seminary at Gettysburg, but separatism increased with national discord and with the immigration of several million Germans and Scandinavians into the Middle West. Although essentially one in the basic tenets of their conservative doctrine (Luther's "Church, conscience, and the Book"), the various bodies have developed a great variety in organization and practice. At one time there were 150 Lutheran groups; there are now fewer than 20. Their divisions as to points of faith and polity, and the trends of the modern age toward union in liturgy, in social action, in welfare and relief work, and in synods, conferences, and councils, at home and abroad, form the chief theme of Dr. Wentz' later chapters. His general bibliographical note (p. 385–388) describes 7 historical works, all but 2 from the 19th century. Mr. Spaude's work is not a chronological narrative but, as its subtitle indicates, an interpretation of the development of the Lutheran Church in America. The first 40 pages describe the Lutheran movements in the European homelands. Then American Lutheranism is analyzed with respect to the chief influences it has undergone—democracy, industrial organization, Sunday schools, secret societies, universities, modern financial organizations, the social gospel, "evolution," the other Protestant faiths, rationalism, revivalism, and ecumenical trends.

5463. [Methodist] Sweet, William Warren. Methodism in American history. Revision of 1953. Nashville, Abingdon Press, 1954. 472 p. illus. 54–5943 BX8235.S9 1953

The history of Methodism in America, springing out of the great spiritual urge of John Wesley (1703–1791) and rapidly spread by the colorful means of the revival meeting and the circuit rider, is one that lends itself to the style of its leading historian, at once expert scholar and vivid interpreter. Dr. Sweet was ordained in 1906, and served as a Methodist pastor for five years before taking up his life work of religious historian (nos. 5401–5402, 5410–5416). In this narrative persons and events play a larger part than doctrine. Despite the temptations offered by the exciting early days, by Wesley, Devereux, Jarratt, Asbury, and by the explosive westward expansion of the church, the author gives equal attention to later phases of Methodism in the history and social development of the Nation. The book was first published in 1933, and ended with a chapter "[Methodism] Faces the Great War and Its Aftermath." For the revision 20 years later a long chapter has been added, "Through Two Decades of Storm and Stress, 1933–1953," in which are reviewed the concerns of Methodism with the depression, Nazism, neo-orthodoxy (with which Dr. Sweet does not go along), prohibition and its end, pacifism, World War II, peace programs, Protestant-Catholic tension, and the ecumenical movement. An appendix outlines the church's organizational structure. This is a complex matter, involving various institutions and procedures developed over the years. For a full understanding, reference may be made to a scholarly monograph by Nolan Bailey Harmon: The Organization of the Methodist Church; Historic Development and Present Working Structure, rev. ed. (Nashville, Methodist Pub. House, 1953. 288 p.). A painless introduction to Methodist history is the handsome quarto picture book put together by Elmer Talmage Clark, An Album of Methodist History (New York, Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1952. 336 p.). This contains reproductions of contemporary prints and other illustrations of Methodist beginnings. The first section covers the life and times of John and Charles Wesley, their families, associates, and successors in Britain and its colonial possessions; the second and longer section illustrates American Methodism.

5464. [Mormon] Brodie, Fawn (McKay). No man knows my history; the life of Joseph Smith, the Mormon prophet. New York, Knopf, 1945. ix, 476, xix p. illus. 45–9481 BX8695.S6B7

Bibliography: p. 466–476.

5465. West, Ray Benedict. Kingdom of the saints; the story of Brigham Young and the Mormons. New York, Viking Press, 1957. 389 p. illus. 57–6437 BX8611.W4

Mrs. Brodie's biography of Joseph Smith is a work of intensive scholarship, widely praised as the best history of the prophet and seer upon whose revelations the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter-Day Saints was founded. The author has searched out and scrutinized carefully the evidence on all sides of the strange story, and her picture of her subject is impartial and in the main sympathetic. Her account ends with the martyrdom of Joseph Smith in Carthage, Illinois, in 1844. In her first appendix she quotes documents on his early life; in the second she disposes of the Spaulding-Rigdon Theory of the authorship of the Book of Mormon. Appendix C identifies the plural Mesdames Smith. The bibliography is brief and selective, and does not attempt to list "the legion of secondary source books that furnished background for the life and times of Joseph Smith." Mrs. Brodie's title is taken from a speech made by the prophet himself a few months before his death. "I don't blame anyone for not believing my history," he said. "If I had not experienced what I have, I could not believe it myself." His biographer's suggested answer is that he was essentially a romantic author whose imagination made his romance more real to him than reality. The author of Kingdom of the Saints, who comes of Mormon stock and grew up as a devout believer, is more ready to accept Smith as a genuine religious mystic whose transcendent experience could not be proved and must be believed. This, Mr. West says, is "the only point of view that can present the Mormon religion for what it is, the basis of a belief which holds the faith of almost a million and a half today." He protests against the usual treatment of the Mormon story "as a comic episode in American history." His narrative covers the whole epic but is sketchy regarding Joseph's revelation and the founding of the church. Mr. West's protagonist is rather Brigham Young, the Moses who led the exodus of the saints and established their "foursquare" kingdom, a Zion at once spiritual and material. Essentially a religious history, it emphasizes the faith by which the heroic pioneers accomplished their latter-day miracle. Nels Anderson's Desert Saints; the Mormon Frontier in Utah (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1942. xx, 459 p.) is a remarkably vivid picture of the frontier community created by the Mormon Church in Utah down to about 1877, emphasizing the partial achievement of its ideal: an economic autarchy of religiously dedicated families from which both riches and poverty had been eliminated. The many original sources used by the author are listed in his bibliography (p. 447–452).

5466. [Presbyterian] Slosser, Gaius J., ed. They seek a country; the American Presbyterians, some aspects. New York, Macmillan, 1955. xvi, 330 p. illus. 55–14554 BX8935.S55
Bibliography: p. 322–324.

Thirteen lectures delivered at an historical symposium are here published to form an overall sketch of the Presbyterian Church in the United States. The arrangement is roughly chronological, the first chapter by the editor being on Old World origins—Calvinism and its manifestations in Northern Ireland, Scotland, and England. "Beginnings in the North" covers the colonial era, and tells how the great missionary, Francis Makemie, established the first intercolonial Presbytery in the Middle Colonies in 1706, "at least four decades earlier than any other intercolonial body among American churches." "Beginnings in the South" deals particularly with the Scottish settlements of the Carolinas. "The United Presbyterian Church" and "The Reformed Presbyterian Church in America" explains the schisms of the 19th century and the resultant groupings. "The Founding of Educational Institutions," by W. W. Sweet, is an important chapter in the church's history. The Presbyterian contribution to the Revolution, the Constitution, and the Government of the United States are examined in "Service in Founding and Preserving the Nation." There are chapters on missionary expansion at home, on the antislavery struggle, and on events and trends in the early and later 19th century. K. S. Latourette contributes a chapter on his specialty, "Service Overseas." The last is "Today and Tomorrow: the Road Ahead," with three authors. In each chapter four pages reproduce portraits of important leaders, thumbnail biographies of whom are included in a "Who's Who" appendix. The last group (after p. 270) includes six presidents and five other statesmen. A recent compilation of documents is The Presbyterian Enterprise; Sources of American Presbyterian History, edited by Maurice W. Armstrong, Lefferts A. Loetscher, and Charles A. Anderson (Philadelphia, Westminster Press, 1956. 336 p.). The interesting selections are tied together by brief historical notes.

5467. [Quaker] Thomas, Allen C. A history of the Friends in America. 6th ed., rev. and enl. Philadelphia, Winston, 1930. 287 p. (Pennsbury series of modern Quaker books)
30–27832 BX7635.T5 1930
Bibliography: p. 257–280.

5468. Brinton, Howard H. Friends for 300 years; the history and beliefs of the Society of Friends since George Fox started the Quaker movement. New York, Harper, 1952. 239 p.
52–5424 BX7631.B7

The older of these titles, first issued in 1894, is a highly condensed history of the Society of Friends, from its beginnings in England with the mystic experience (1646) of the founder, George Fox, and his preaching of the Inner Light. By 1656 members of this "cursed set of heretics" had reached New England, and in spite of persecution by colonial governments from Massachusetts to Virginia, its spread was rapid. The visit of Fox himself in 1672 made many converts, while the acquisition of Pennsylvania as a proprietary colony by William Penn and the British Toleration Act of 1689 gave the congregations of Friends a settled status by 1700. In the 18th century notable aspects of Quaker history were the excellent relations with the Indians, leadership in opposition to slavery, and the sufferings of pacifist Friends during the Revolution. The early 19th century brought divisions—Orthodox, Hicksite, and Wilburite Friends—confirmation of the antislavery stand, and the first educational foundations. The account of later years summarizes events through the First World War. The revised edition was the work of William Brinton Harvey. Dr. Brinton's book is theological rather than historical, concentrating on Quaker faith and practice—"To Wait upon the Lord," "The Light Within as Experienced," "The Light Within as Thought About," etc. He declares Quakerism to be "an explicit and developed manifestation" of a third form of Christianity besides Protestantism and Catholicism. There is a short historical chapter: "The Four Periods of Quaker History and Their Relation to the Mystical, the Evangelical, the Rational, and the Social Forms of Religion." The famous work of the Friends' Service Committee, as well as activities among Negroes and Indians, in education, and in international relations, are described in a chapter on "The Meeting and the World."

5469. [Shaker] Melcher, Marguerite (Fellows) The Shaker adventure. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1941. 319 p.
41–51750 BX9765.M4

Annotated bibliography: p. 294–301.

A warmly sympathetic history of the "moral and industrious, though eccentric, people" called Shakers and their handicraft culture. This interesting communitarian sect, now almost extinct, grew up around an Englishwoman, "Mother Ann" Lee, to whom it had been revealed in a vision that she was the female incarnation of Christ in the second coming, and who in 1774 led a band of nine Believers to their adventure in America. The account of the beginnings and early days is written with respect for, if not complete acceptance of, Mother Ann's spiritual gifts. The principles of the Shakers, so called from their extreme bodily manifestations of the spirit in worship, were the confession of sins, community of goods, celibacy (new members were by conversion, children, if any, by adoption), and withdrawal from the world. Guided by fresh revelations, advancing under persecution, and spreading with the revival of the early 1800's, the Society of the United Believers, commonly called Shakers, in their peak period between 1840 and 1860 numbered some 6,000 members, established in 18 rural communities from Maine to southwest Kentucky. Men and women lived and worked side by side with sex eliminated through religious emotion. Farmers and craftsmen, thorough and practical, they achieved a "hand-minded" society which provided economic security and peace, and has left to machine-age collectors a treasure of craftsmanship. Mrs. Melcher has made extensive use of Shaker records for her detailed story.

5470. [Unitarian] Cooke, George Willis. Unitarianism in America; a history of its origin and development. Boston, American Unitarian Association, 1902. 463 p. illus.
3–605 BX9833.C7

5471. Wilbur, Earl Morse. A history of Unitarianism. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1945–52. 2 v. A45–3134 BX9831.W49

CONTENTS.—[1] Socinianism and its antecedents.—[2] In Transylvania, England, and America.

5472. Wright, Conrad. The beginnings of Unitarianism in America. Boston, Starr King Press; distributed by Beacon Press, 1955. 305 p.

"Bibliographical appendix": p. [281]–291.
55–8138 BX9833.W7

"Bibliographical note": p. [292]–294.

The time-honored work by Dr. Cooke is still the one full-scale history of American Unitarianism. In Dr. Wilbur's authoritative modern study only the last four chapters (v. 2, p. 379–487) are devoted to the doctrine in the New World. The movement in America, although preceded in general by the liberal thought of the Reformation (Dr. Wilbur goes back in his first volume to antecedents in the Apostolic Age) and influenced by the writings of English rationalists and deists, was essentially an outgrowth of New England Puritanism. Dr. Wright's interesting monograph illuminates the doctrine of free will, usually referred to as Arminian in 18th-century New England, which preluded the Unitarian break with Calvinism. The 18th-century liberals, he says, combined the three tendencies of Arminianism, supernatural rationalism, and anti-Trinitarianism. Their great spokesmen were Charles Chauncy and Jonathan Mayhew; their chief opponent was Jonathan Edwards with his defense of original sin. The new trends of thought, nourished by the revolutionary social and political climate, spread widely; Dr. Wright in an appendix lists 60 ministers identified as Arminians from their printed sermons and tracts, and over 20 more reputed to be "new divinity" men. His story ends with the open breach of 1805, when the election of the liberal Henry Ware as Hollis Professor of Divinity at Harvard opened the so-called Unitarian Controversy. For half a century Unitarian views were set forth in a torrent of controversial books, pamphlets, and magazines, and by such spokesmen as William E. Channing, R. W. Emerson, and Theodore Parker. In 1825 the American Unitarian Association was formed as a missionary and publication agency; in the Convention of 1865 the national body was organized in much its present form. Dr. Cooke's history is detailed as to men, publications, and events. His last chapters are concerned with the growth of denominational consciousness, the ministry, social and educational work, and missions and philanthropies.

Dr. Wilbur's more concentrated account highlights the controversial path of Unitarianism as a more or less spontaneous development among liberal thinkers in many countries and ages.

5473. [Universalist] Eddy, Richard. Universalism in America, a history. Boston, Universalist Pub. House, 1884–86. 2 v.
43–32304 BX9933.E3 1884
CONTENTS.—1. 1636–1800.—2. 1801–1886.
Bibliography: p. 485–599.

Universalism, the doctrine of the eventual salvation of all men through divine grace, has been advanced since early Christian times, and came to America through many channels. This work, which in spite of its age is the only adequate history of the Universalist Church of America, examines at great length and with abundant quotation the evidences of Universalism in various creeds and in the thought of individuals, and the evolution of the church through the 18th and 19th centuries. The first great leader, John Murray, organized the denomination in New England in 1785 as the "Independent Christian Society, commonly called Universalists." At a convention of the New England groups in 1803 there was adopted a Profession of Belief and a Plan of Church Government. Hosea Ballou (1771–1852), whose Treatise on the Atonement, published in 1805, was one of the normative texts of the movement, strongly influenced the Universalists toward Unitarian views. The later history of the church is here told in detail as to individual spokesmen, publications, and organizational aspects. Volume 2 includes chapters on the spread of the Universalists outside New England and on educational institutions (Tufts College was founded as a Universalist theological school). The concluding large bibliography catalogs "all that has been published in America either for or against the doctrine of Universal Salvation" through the year 1886. Over the years the Universalists have drawn progressively closer in their radial liberalism to the Unitarians, and in the 1950's steps are being taken toward an organic merger of the two bodies. In 1957 the Universalist Historical Society in Boston published a little book, The Universalist Church of America, a Short History, by Clinton Lee Scott (124 p.). It is little more than an outline, preliminary to a definitive history of Universalism which Dr. Scott has been commissioned to write.

F. Representative Leaders

5474. [Asbury, Francis] Asbury, Herbert. A Methodist saint; the life of Bishop Asbury. New York, Knopf, 1927. xiv, 355 p. illus.
27–5884 BX8495.A8A8
Bibliography: p. [337]–342.

5475. Duren, William Larkin. Francis Asbury, founder of American Methodism and unofficial minister of state. New York, Macmillan, 1928. 270 p. illus. 28–23317 BX8495.A8D8

Francis Asbury (1745–1816), whose "premiership among church founders and religious leaders of the New World is probably one of the most unchallenged facts connected with the history of our country" (Duren), in 1771 was sent by John Wesley as a missionary to the three-hundred-odd adherents of the new movement in America. He began at once the itinerant career which he followed for 45 years. In 1784 he was appointed by Wesley superintendent of the Methodist work in America, and at a conference of all Methodist ministers was elected and ordained, assuming the title of bishop. Until his death he rode over the country from Georgia to Maine and westward to Kentucky, always triumphing over ill health, always preaching, converting, establishing churches (approximately nine hundred), and organizing and directing conferences. His Journal, published in three volumes in 1821 (New York, N. Bangs & T. Mason), is a notable source for the study of American social as well as religious history. The two biographies here listed, published a year apart, are very different in tone. The first, by a collateral descendant, is a popular work, satirical in its characterization, if not of the circuit-rider bishop and saint, at least of his colleagues and the backwoods society in which they moved. The second, by a Southern Methodist minister, admiringly sets forth the sterling virtues of "the mightiest spiritual beacon that ever blazed on this continent."

5476. [Beecher] Hibben, Baxton. Henry Ward Beecher: an American portrait. New York, Doran, 1927. 390 p. illus.
27–19865 BX7260.B3H5
"Sources cited": p. 357–367.

Beecher (1813–1887), the great preacher who for 40 years swayed an audience reaching far beyond the confines of his own Plymouth Congregational Church in Brooklyn, is here the subject of a long "portrait," painted in the vivid style of the modern psychological biographer. His influential career as crusader against slavery, and for evolution and woman suffrage, is interpreted as giving highly emotional expression to the changing standards of American society during his long lifetime. During his boyhood the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination to hell-fire, as preached by his father, Lyman Beecher, had hardly been shaken; in three decades it gave way to the easy liberalism of the Gilded Age—with Beecher playing the part of drum major in the parade, our author says. The earlier biographies of Beecher were all laudatory; Hibben's critical analysis tends toward irony, and finds fitting illustrations in contemporary cartoons. Sensational aspects tend to be uppermost, not only in the account of the cause célèbre of 1875, when Theodore Tilton sued Beecher for adultery, but throughout the entire story of the man who represented God as "loving man in his sins for the sake of helping him out of them." In the middle years of the 19th century, one of the great influences in breaking down the harsh individualism of the Puritan heritage and humanizing the "new theology" was the Congregational minister of Hartford, Conn., Horace Bushnell. "He insisted upon experience in theology, leveled the dividing wall between nature and the supernatural, and set Christ in the middle of the Christian system" (Hopkins in no. 5489). His most recent biographer, Barbara M. Cross, in Horace Bushnell: Minister to a Changing America ([Chicago] University of Chicago Press, 1958. 200 p.), finds that his sermons and books, and especially Christian Nurture (1847) "mapped the course by which orthodoxy was moving toward liberal Protestantism." Another famous voice of the period, though on the opposite side of the religious platform, was the "professional agnostic," Robert G. Ingersoll. In Royal Bob (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1952. 314 p.) Clarence H. Cramer gives a sympathetic interpretation of the orator who, for many years after his "plumed knight" speech of 1876, was the premier lecturer of the Nation on Science versus Religion, as well as on the Republican Party. The writer gives more space to Ingersoll's political activities than to his religious scepticism.

5477. [Carroll] Guilday, Peter K. The life and times of John Carroll, Archbishop of Baltimore (1735–1815). New York, Encyclopedia Press, 1922. 2 v. illus. 22–10425 BX4705.C33G8

This monumental biography of the first archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States is also considered to be an authoritative account of the Roman Church of the English-speaking New World in his time. Episodes given careful treatment include: the story of the Roman Catholic part in the Revolution, including Carroll's Canadian mission for the Continental Congress; Carroll's post-Revolutionary controversy with the apostate priest Charles Wharton; his fight to preserve the church from Protestant attack and French political intrigue; the reconstruction of the church and the establishment of the American hierarchy (1784–90); the development of religious orders and of education (Georgetown College, founded in 1789). The late author, professor of church history at the Catholic University of America, wrote solidly and in great detail, making exhaustive use of archival materials in Europe and America. He concluded with a critical essay on the sources, published and unpublished, both for Carroll's life and for the history of the church. Annabelle McConnell Melville's scholarly, but more spirited and readable, biography is confined in its scope to the life, work, and influence of its subject: John Carroll of Baltimore, Founder of the American Catholic Hierarchy (New York, Scribner, 1955. 338 p.).

5478. [Gibbons] Ellis, John Tracy. The life of James Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop of Baltimore, 1834–1921. Milwaukee, Bruce Pub. Co., 1952. 2 v. illus. 52–14973 BX4705.G5E4

"An essay on the sources": v. 2, p. 651–669.

The outstanding figure in recent Catholic history in America was James Gibbons. Born in Baltimore of Irish immigrant parents, he became archbishop in 1877, and the second American cardinal in 1886. A firm believer in democratic institutions, he took a leading and patriotic part in humanitarian, social, and public affairs. His liberal and conciliatory views were influential in Rome and in national policy alike, and made him a powerful force in the accommodation of the Catholic Church and its huge new immigrant community to American life. His winning personality brought him warm friendships with great and small, and he served as adviser to presidents and popes as well as to his flock. This full and authoritative, if somewhat pedestrian, biography is by the professor of church history at the Catholic University of America, which Gibbons was instrumental in founding.

5479. [Jones] Hinshaw, David. Rufus Jones, master Quaker. New York, Putnam, 1951. 306 p. illus. 51–9891 BX7795.J55H5

Bibliography: p. 295–298.

Jones (1863–1948), professor of philosophy at Haverford College, chairman for almost 30 years of the American Friends' Service Committee, and the spiritual leader of present-day Quakerism, died in 1948. This biography, by a close friend and associate of many years, includes his reminiscences in its picture of the growth of a modern saint. It opens with a short appreciation of Dr. Jones, "the inspiration and the leader of the effort that had turned the century-long gaze of Quakerism from attempted inward ecclesiastical purity through disciplinary don'ts to the outward effort of perfection through spiritual and humanitarian service." A few chapters sketch the history of Quakerism and of the Jones family of South China, Maine. Then Rufus Jones is described in the various phases of his inspiring career as teacher, minister, lecturer, author—he wrote over fifty books and is widely known as an outstanding modern interpreter of religious mysticism—and as organizer of the great relief service which exemplifies the Quaker way of life to the world. The brief bibliography includes the main sources on Quakerism, but lists only a few of Dr. Jones' many published writings, for which one may turn to the compilation of Nixon Orwin Rush: A Bibliography of the Published Writings of Rufus M. Jones (Waterville, Me., Colby College Library, 1944. 54 p.).

5480. [Moody, Dwight L.] Moody, William R. D. L. Moody. New York, Macmillan, 1930. 556 p. illus. 30–18035 BV3785.M7M62
Bibliography: p. 543–548.

In the latter years of the 19th century, while the new stirrings of evolutionary science were manifest in the sermons of H. W. Beecher and the agnostic oratory of Robert Ingersoll, the dwellers in America's growing cities were thronging in their millions to hear the fundamental Word of God brought to them by the lay evangelist, Dwight L. Moody (1837–1899). He did not confine his exhortations to this country: with his organist helper, Ira D. Sankey, he carried out a two-year mission to England (1873–75), where he was the instrument of the greatest religious revival of the century. He directed his notable business talents and energies to saving souls through lay enterprises as well as revival meetings. Starting from his Chicago North Market Sabbath School (1858), the programs of religious social service to which his organizational genius gave form expanded into the national system of Young Men's Christian Associations, the Sunday School movement, Northfield Seminary for girls and Mount Hermon School for boys, the Chicago Bible Institute, and the Bible Institute Colportage Association. His vigorous work in missions and conferences in the colleges led directly to the Student Volunteer Movement, which stimulated the expansion of American foreign missions. This biography by his son is informal in arrangement and lavish in quotation from Moody's letters and speeches. Interesting recent biographies of earlier and later evangelists are George Whitefield, Wayfaring Witness, by Stuart C. Henry (New York, Abingdon Press, 1957. 224 p.), and Billy Sunday Was His Real Name, by William G. McLoughlin ([Chicago] University of Chicago Press, 1955. 324 p.). A largely biographical treatment of the whole course of revivalism in America is Weisberger's They Gathered At the River (no. 5403).

5481. [Parker] Commager, Henry Steele. Theodore Parker. [2d ed.] Boston, Beacon Press, 1947. 339 p. illus. A48–9983 MnU
Bibliography: p. [311]–331.

The great New England radical clergyman and reformer who is brought to life in this interpretative biography never withdrew, and was never expelled, from the Unitarian Church in which he had been ordained in 1837. But most of its pulpits were closed against him and the unsettling Higher Criticism that he and his transcendentalist friends imported from Germany. His services in Boston were held in what he called the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, where for 13 exciting years he preached freethinking religion, transcendental philosophy, and the abolition of slavery to audiences numbering in the thousands. He wrote his long farewell letter to the society, "Theodore Parker's Experience as a Minister," as he sailed away to die of tuberculosis in Italy: it is here called "not only the best brief account of Parker's public career but also the most satisfactory history of the Boston of the forties and fifties of the last century that has ever been written." The other sources on which Professor Commager has largely based his portrayal of the man who was a part of the flowering of New England are the writings, letters, and recorded conversations of Parker's contemporaries.

5482. [Rauschenbusch] Sharpe, Dores Robinson. Walter Rauschenbusch. New York, Macmillan, 1942. 463 p. 42–12945 BX6495.R3S48

The great influence of Walter Rauschenbusch (1861–1918), whose name "stands out as a beacon" in the history of the social gospel in America, was principally exercised through his writings. As a young Baptist minister in New York in the late eighties and nineties he had worked much with poor German immigrants; during a year of study abroad he had become interested in Fabian socialism, the Salvation Army, and consumers' cooperatives; and the depression of 1893 confirmed his belief that the Kingdom of God must be realized on this earth. In preaching, in social and organizational activities, and especially in his books, Rauschenbusch drove home this message, and after his publication in 1907 of Christianity and the Social Crisis (New York, Macmillan. 429 p., he was hailed as prophet and leader. His later books, Prayers of the Social Awakening (Boston, Pilgrim Press, 1910. 126 p.), Christianizing the Social Order (New York, Macmillan, 1912. 493 p.), The Social Principles of Jesus (New York, Association Press, 1916. 198 p.), and A Theology for the Social Gospel (New York, Macmillan, 1917. 279 p.), added to his prestige. This admiring and affectionate biography, by a former student and secretary, was written at the request of the Rauschenbusch family and the Colgate-Rochester Divinity School, where Professor Rauschenbusch taught church history from 1902 until his death in 1918. The narrative of his life is combined with interpretations of his writings, in chapters with such titles as "The Prophet's Pen," "The Social Philosopher," and "The Thunder of the Prophet."

5483. Wise, Stephen S. Challenging years; the autobiography of Stephen Wise. New York, Putnam, 1949. xxiv, 323 p. illus.
49–48677 BM755.W53A3 1949

In this autobiography Rabbi Stephen Wise (1874–1949) emphasizes the causes and beliefs for which he battled rather than personal details. The son and grandson of rabbis, Stephen Wise at the age of 20 was appointed pastor of a Conservative Jewish synagogue in New York. In 1900 he was called to a temple in Portland, Oregon, where he became known as a vigorous fighter for child labor laws and a liberal in politics, social thought, and religion. He came back to New York in 1906 to found the Free Synagogue, which he served as rabbi for over 40 years, preaching Reform Judaism and working for civic, social, and Jewish causes. In 1897 he had been the moving spirit in founding the Federation of American Zionists, and throughout his life he strove ardently in the cause of the Jewish homeland. The American Jewish Congress (1917), the Jewish Institute of Religion (the liberal rabbinical seminary) (1922), and the World Jewish Congress (1936) were among other organizations he was instrumental in founding and active in serving. A powerful speaker, he was among the first of his faith to preach to Jews and Christians alike, and he played a prominent role in interfaith movements. Challenging Years was written in the last year of his life. The prophet of American Reform Judaism in the 19th century was Rabbi Isaac M. Wise (1819–1900), unrelated to Stephen. This inspiring leader, imbued with the ideas of the Enlightenment, came from Bohemia in a wave of political immigration in 1846. After a few years of preaching modernization of the ritual in Albany, he settled in Cincinnati and became the acknowledged head of the large Jewish community of that city. He was the founder and president for 25 years of Hebrew Union College, and the founder of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and the Central Conference of American Rabbis. He was instrumental in the preparation of the revised prayer book, Minhag America (the rite in American style). His life and influence have been recently summarized in a contribution to the valuable Library of American biography, edited by Oscar Handlin: Israel Knox's Rabbi in America; the Story of Isaac M. Wise (Boston, Little, Brown, 1957. 173 p.).

G. Church and Society

5484. Cronin, John F. Catholic Social principles; the social teaching of the Catholic Church applied to American economic life. Milwaukee, Bruce Pub. Co., 1955. 803 p.
55–1755 HN37.C3C69 1955

A comprehensive and practical textbook by the assistant director of the Department of Social Action of the National Catholic Welfare Conference. Parts I and II, "The Christian Social Order" and "Social Principles in Economic Life," are universal in scope, each chapter beginning with pertinent passages of the social encyclicals and other papal directives for social action, from the Rerum Novarum of Pope Leo XIII in 1891 to the messages of Pius XII in 1949. The interpretation that follows is focused on American problems. The subjects covered include social justice; the "unsound philosophies" of individualism, socialism, and communism; "The Ideal Social Order"; the rights and duties of capital; the social problems of labor; property; the state in economic life; and social reform. Part III is concerned with "American Catholic Social Thought" and covers such matters as the Catholic approach to big business, to the cooperative movement, to rural life, etc. Annotated reading lists and a correlation of the encyclicals and other authorities with the chapters of the book are given in appendixes. A more elementary text for high schools by Father Cronin, Catholic Social Action (Milwaukee, Bruce Pub. Co., 1948. 247 p.), is on practical social programs in the United States.

5485. Douglass, Harlan Paul. The Protestant church as a social institution, by H. Paul Douglass and Edmund de S. Brunner. New York, Published for the Institute of Social and Religious Research by Harper, 1935. xv, 368 p. diagrs.

35–2275 BR516.D66

Bibliography: p. 356–362.

The Institute of Social and Religious Research was organized in 1921 for the investigation by scientific methods of socioreligious phenonmena, with Dr. Douglass as its research director. By the time of its dissolution in October 1934 it had been responsible for 48 research projects relating to rural and urban churches, home and foreign missions, Christian education, the racial aspects of organized religion, and the cooperation and unity of religious forces. (Dr. Douglass was closely concerned with the last theme, and later served as secretary to the Commission to Study Church Unity of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ.) This solid work is the final report of the institute, quite balanced and comprehensive, and a veritable mine of socioreligious information, with its findings statistically illustrated in 19 tables and 45 charts. After a general and historical introduction the main text (p. 31–234) is devoted to an account of "Institutional Factors and Processes"—church membership, the church in the community, its organization and the ministry, activities in education and social welfare, finances, etc. Part 3, "Conditioning Factors," surveys environmental influences, cooperation and integration of the churches, and the intellectual and religious climate. The last part, "Foreshadowings," looks at future prospects and policies, notably regarding the church unity movement. Reviewers have called the work "a religious Middletown."

5486. Douglass, Harlan Paul. Protestant cooperation in American cities. New York, Institute of Social and Religious Research, 1930. xviii, 514 p. diagrs. 31–1893 BX8.D67

Bibliography: p. 496.

5487. Douglass, Harlan Paul. Church unity movements in the United States. New York, Institute of Social and Religious Research, 1934. xxxviii, 576 p. 34–21128 BX8.D66

The first title was one of a series resulting from a statistical survey of urban churches made by the institute. In the 1920's there were in the 50 largest cities of the United States nearly 18,000 churches, of many varieties, involved singly, cooperatively, or competitively in many forms of religious and social activity. To bring the complicated and ponderous machinery of all these into some kind of system was the aim of the federation movement. The author classifies the organizations of federation in five orders: local churches; locally organized denominational agencies; interdenominational agencies; nonecclesiastical extensions and allies; national or regional administrative machinery of the denominations. Of the two parts, the first is a general report on the movement, on the forms and structures of church federations; membership or participation short of membership; cooperative activities; agencies, resources, and methods; and other aspects of cooperation. The second part is a shorter technical report on specific processes—the committee system, the paid staff, religious education, social service, the work of women's departments, and financing and publicity. The second title, prepared in response to the interest shown in the first, was compiled after questionnaires were sent to more than 20,000 persons. The answers, summarized in over 150 tables, provide the basis for a detailed examination of American opinion regarding church union. There are three parts: "Objective Trends and Popular Reactions," "Ecclesiastical Thinking and Proposals," and "Prospects of Church Union," and methodological appendixes. The chief federal body resulting from the American movement of interchurch organization, The National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America (1950), is itself a merger of 12 interdenominational agencies, the largest of which was the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. It includes also organizations for foreign and home missions, missionary education, women's groups, religious education, the Church World Service for relief, etc. A description will be found in Mayer's Religious Bodies (no. 5397). A lucid account of the Federal Council was written by John A. Hutchison: We Are Not Divided; a Critical and Historical Study of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America (New York, Round Table Press, 1941. 336 p.).

5488. Herberg, Will. Protestant, Catholic, Jew; an essay in American religious sociology. Garden City, N.Y., Doubleday, 1955. 320 p.
55–7661 BR525.H46

"List of chief works cited": p. [299]–313.

A sociological study of the religious situation in mid-20th-century America. The author, who has lectured in Protestant, Jewish, and Catholic institutions alike, here interprets the paradox which he finds reflected in every aspect of contemporary religious life: "pervasive secularism and mounting religiosity." His first two chapters deal with the "triple melting-pot" of the land of immigrants, in which, he says, ethnic separateness has almost disappeared and the only differentiating element between descendants of the great immigrant groups is religion. He next discusses the contemporary upswing in religion in American society, explaining lucidly the sociological factors of the shift in American character-structure from "inner-direction" to "other-direction" (David Riesman's terms from no. 4555), and of the need for security in the age of crisis and spiritual chaos. Next comes a chapter on the place of religion in the American Way of Life, following which the three religious communities of Protestantism, Catholicism, and Judaism are first examined as to general history, philosophy, and present trends, and then compared and contrasted. Their fundamental unity is disturbed by many and serious "religio-communal tensions," but "the interfaith idea" is offered as a reasonable and practicable resolution. The last chapter conveys the author's criticism of the secularism of American religion, which he sums up as "so naïvely, so innocently man-centered."

5489. Hopkins, Charles Howard. The rise of the social gospel in American Protestantism, 1865–1915. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1940. 352 p. (Yale studies in religious education, 14) 41–1101 HN39.U6H6 1940a

A general account of the movement in socioreligious thought that began with the general stirrings of humanitarian reform in the middle of the 19th century and gained momentum until the First World War reshaped the doctrines of liberal groups in all Protestant sects. "America's most unique contribution to the great ongoing stream of Christianity," Dr. Hopkins calls the social gospel, "the result of the impact of the industrial revolution and its concomitants upon American Protestantism." In distinction to the old orthodoxy with its insistence upon the salvation or damnation of the individual soul, the social gospel applied the teachings of Christ and the message of salvation to society as a whole, its economic life and social institutions, and offered an essentially collectivist ethic for a capitalistic age. Its origins, exponents, expressions, and institutions—culminating in the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America—were numerous, and Dr. Hopkins has woven together many strands into a well-organized and interesting presentation. His footnotes cite a huge literature, and he speaks of more than fifteen hundred items utilized in his research. The Urban Impact on American Protestantism, 1865–1900, by Aaron I. Abell (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1943. 275 p. Harvard historical studies, v. 54), describes one phase of social Christianity, the effects of the post-Civil War urbanization on American Protestantism. This impact was a double-edged affair: the urban workers looked to religion to win them a better economic order, and the cities called on the churches for social service as well as spiritual aid. The writer traces the channels of organized aid from the beginnings of the Young Men's Christian Associations in the 1850's, and notices a variety of missions, organizations, and associations: the Salvation Army, the "institutional church" movement, various brotherhoods and sisterhoods, and many other forms of social service.

5490. Hopkins, Charles Howard. History of the Y.M.C.A. in North America. New York, Association Press, 1951. 818 p. illus. 51–11674 BV1030.H6

The Young Men's Christian Association was born in London on June 6, 1844, when 12 young drygoods assistants met under the leadership of George Williams, a Congregationalist Sunday school worker who had been inspired by the revivals of the American evangelist Charles G. Finney. In 1851 the association was introduced into North America, with beginnings simultaneous in Boston and Montreal; within 3 years it had spread to most large cities and many smaller ones and its growth has been continuous. For the Y.M.C.A.'s centenary Dr. Hopkins was commissioned by the Committee on Historical Resources to prepare this definitive history, based on the important collection of records in the Bowne Historical Library maintained by the national council in New York. The exceedingly detailed narrative is divided into chronological sections: 1851–1865, 1865–1895, 1895–1940, and 1940–1951. In the 1890's, under the impulse of the general missionary expansion, the Y.M.C.A. movement spread abroad. Much attention is given in the later chapters to its world functions.

5491. Institute for Religious and Social Studies, Jewish Theological Seminary of America. American education and religion: the problem of religion in the schools; a series of addresses, edited by F[rederick] Ernest Johnson. New York, Institute for Religious and Social Studies; distributed by Harper, 1952. 211 p. (Religion and civilization series) 52–12044 LC111.I58

The problem discussed in these 12 thoughtful essays, based on lectures delivered at the institute in 1950–51, is stated by the editor in the introductory paper: "How can public education, in accord with its function of putting each generation in possession of its full cultural heritage, do justice to the religious phase of that heritage without doing violence to religious liberty as constitutionally safeguarded?" The authors express the viewpoints of agnostic, Jewish, Catholic, and liberal Protestant educators, university and college presidents, spokesmen for privately supported colleges and schools of education, and for elementary and secondary public schools. In summarizing, Dr. Johnson found a consensus that "the educative process has a unitary quality which makes a dualism of the secular and the religious unrealistic," particularly in higher education; and also that the Supreme Court decision of 1948 outlawing the released-time plan for religious education (the McCollum case) was "remote from the realities of the educational system." He was able to note that since the delivery of the lectures the Supreme Court had reversed itself on the released-time plan (the Zorach case, 1952), and that two influential educational bodies had recommended substantive religious instruction in the schools. The most vigorous defense of purely secular education in the volume was "An 'Experimentalist' Position," by a former secretary of the Ethical Culture Schools, Dr. Vivian T. Thayer. His ideas were more fully expressed in the same year in one of the Beacon studies in freedom and power: The Attack upon the American Secular School (Boston, Beacon Press, 1951. 257 p.). Another notable study on this topic of mid-20th century debate is The American Tradition in Religion and Education, by R. Freeman Butts, entered in the chapter on Education (no. 5103).

5492. May, Henry Farnham. Protestant churches and industrial America. New York, Harper, 1949. 297 p. 49–8159 HN39.U6M38
Bibliography: p. 267–290.

A study of the influence of American religion on the developing social thought of the industrial age (1828–95). The author writes as a historian rather than a theologian in his examination of movements, sermons, and the writings of churchmen and other leaders of opinion. His focus is on attitudes toward labor in the struggle of liberal thought against the laissez-faire theory upheld by traditional Protestant orthodoxy. In his first period (1828–61) he describes "The Conservative Mold" and its support of the social status quo against the anticlerical radicalism of the Jacksonian era. "The Summit of Complacency" was reached in the years 1861–76, when the great industrialists piled up their millions and poured out bounty for religious and charitable work, while conservative clerics justified "the Divinely-regulated and unchangeable social order." The last period (1877–95) is treated in two parts, "Sources of Change"—the economic facts of strikes, depressions, unemployment, and bankruptcies, accompanied by mounting waves of liberal and humanitarian, socialist and radical protest—and "Social Christianity." Dr. May attributes a large measure of the success of American progressivism to the moral aid of the social Christian movement.

5493. Miller, Robert Moats. American Protestantism and social issues, 1919–1939. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1958, 385 p. 58–1243 HN39.U6M59
Bibliography: p. 351–370.

The social attitudes of American Protestantism during the between-war years of prosperity and depression are here surveyed with respect to the basic controversial problems of society—"civil liberties, labor, race relations, war, and the contending merits of capitalism, socialism, and communism." The author's concern is with the eight largest Protestant groups and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ; on some matters he reviews systematically the position taken by each group. After a long general sketch of the churches in the social order a section is devoted to each of the large issues. In the 1920's they were "Corpulent and Contented," although a "Dissenting Report" called for replacing the profit motive with the service motive. "A Footnote to the 1928 Election" suggests that a vote against Al Smith was not necessarily an effect of bigotry, but might proceed from a sincere support of the 18th Amendment. Three chapters record the churches' move to the left during the depression, while a fourth notes the large conservative element that did not move. The writer has attempted to lighten his serious matter with frequent touches of humor and irony, especially through pointed quotation. Large amounts of primary and secondary source materials are listed in the extensive bibliography.

5494. Rian, Edwin H. Christianity and American education. San Antonio, Naylor Co., 1949. 272 p. 49–9753 LC427.R5
Bibliography: p. 241–254.

An expansion of a series of lectures delivered at the Princeton Institute of Theology by a Presbyterian college president. In 1936 Dr. Rian was one of the organizers of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, a body formed in protest against modernistic tendencies in the Presbyterian Church, which, however, he subsequently rejoined. His conservative viewpoint is expressed here only in the few pages in which he offers conclusions, and the bulk of the text is factual. He devotes his first and longest section to an account of American public schools, beginning with their history, and then discussing present-day philosophies of education, textbooks, and what he considers the disrupting and disintegrating effects of naturalistic education. John Dewey is his bugbear. A second section presents Roman Catholic education, quite objectively up to the last three pages, in which the writer explains his reasons for considering the system "erroneous and inadequate." These two parts are offered as perspective for the last, Dr. Rian's real point of concern: "Protestant Schools." Here he is outspoken in his criticism. He finds Protestant education in tragic plight, "weak, hesitant, and largely ineffective as an answer to naturalism and as an exposition of Christianity."

5495. Silcox, Clarice Edwin, and Galen M. Fisher. Catholics, Jews and Protestants; a study of relationships in the United States and Canada. New York, Published for the Institute of Social and Religious Research by Harper, 1934. xvi, 369 p. 35-1151 BL2520.S5

A report based on a series of case studies in 20 large cities of the United States and Canada, undertaken by the institute at the request of the National Conference of Jews and Christians. The purpose was to elucidate problems of interfaith relations through a survey of actual contacts and relationships between Catholics, Jews, and Protestants in particular communities, in order to determine the forces dividing them or bringing them together. The material is presented in leisurely, somewhat discursive, but eminently readable style. The writers begin with a rapid review of the historical backgrounds of the three communions and their tensions and conflicts in America. The divisive aspects of discrimination and social distance are discussed in respect to business, employment, real estate, social and political life, and immigration. Next, relations in social work and education, intermarriage, and conversion and proselytization are examined for both isolating and cohesive elements. Last, the field of cooperation is outlined in its philosophies and in measures of national or local scope. A short epilogue points out the chief philosophical differences in the three faiths which cause organized religion to make for divisiveness rather than integration. Although of great sociological interest, the work has been criticized as based on partial impressions and inadequate statistics.

5496. Spann, John R. ed. The church and social responsibility. Nashville, Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1953. 272 p. 53-8136 HN31.S75

A set of essays interpreting the convictions of American Protestantism about the social order, the general viewpoint being that the Christian church bears responsibility for social conditions and must provide redemptive measures for society. The 15 writers are specialists, most of them professors in university schools of religion or seminaries. "Biographical Notes" on them are supplied (p. 259-264). Their papers, all in plain language addressed to laymen, are grouped in four parts: "The Social Ministry of the Church," "Basic Human Rights and the Community," "The Church and the Economic Order," and "The Church and the Political Order." The center of attention is American society, although one essay, "New Testament Sources of the Social Ministry of the Church," by Donald T. Rowlingson, is straight theology, and two or three others—e.g., "World Economic Problems," by Eddy Asirvatham, and "The Church and World Political Order," by Walter M. Van Kirk, have no local limitations. Another symposium of the same year, Christian Faith and Social Action, edited by John A. Hutchison (New York, Scribner, 1953. 246 p.), is in the nature of a Festschrift to Reinhold Niebuhr, whose concluding essay gives its title to the volume. The 13 contributors are all members of the Frontier Fellowship, a group founded under Niebuhr's inspiration as the Fellowship of Socialist Christians (1930; name changed in 1947). The editor explains in the first paper, "Two Decades of Social Christianity," that the aim of the fellowship is to understand and interpret Christian faith in ways relevant to contemporary society and its problems; their "thinking is inescapably oriented" to Niebuhr, their teacher and associate. Like him they are deeply concerned with the appraisal of Marxist thought and with criticism of the social gospel as "theologically shallow" and "socially unrealistic." They write for theologically trained readers. W. E. Garrison, literary editor of the Christian Century, summarizes the position of the fellowship as "moving to the right theologically and to the left socially."

5497. Wisbey, Herbert A. Soldiers without swords; a history of the Salvation Army in the United States. New York, Macmillan, 1955. 242 p. illus. 55-13783 BX9716.W5

"Sources": p. 229-234.

"This book was written to provide a concise, accurate, objective history of the Salvation Army in the United States that would be of use both to Salvationists and to students of American social and religious history." Its occasion was the 75th anniversary of the Salvation Army in the United States, which can be precisely reckoned from the "invasion" of New York City on March 10, 1880, when Commissioner G. S. Railton and seven English lasses, having made a long and stormy voyage from London, held their first official service on the dock. The parent British body had been founded by William and Catherine Booth in 1865 (the name was not used until 1878); and like it the American army aimed its ministry at the swarming urban poor, the "unreached and unchurched" who felt out of place in middle-class churches, and whose sufferings were regarded as being largely the penalty of their own idleness and vice by too many Protestants. The army immediately fixed public attention by its uniforms, martial music, and generally spectacular methods, but in spite of the "mud, bricks, stones, tomatoes, rotten eggs, dead cats and rats, and buckets of water" with which its early meetings were often pelted, it gained willing workers from American young people, and converts of varying degrees of permanence among the dwellers in the slums where it evangelized. The army has never acquired the least snobbery, and the colorful evangelism of the early days has not been abandoned, but it has been supplemented by a fine variety of social services conducted along approved lines. The least interesting parts of the book are concerned with the various jurisdictional disputes arising out of the effort to keep the American along with the other national groups under unitary leadership; and it is quite weak in statistics.

H. The Negro's Church

5498. Fauset, Arthur Huff. Black gods of the metropolis; Negro religious cults of the urban North. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1944. 126 p. illus. (Publications of the Philadelphia Anthropological Society, v. 3)
44-3761 BR563.N4F3 1944a

The anthropologist who wrote this University of Pennsylvania dissertation is himself partly of the Negro race, and is thus equipped by background, entrée, and point of view for the interesting anthropological, psychological, and sociological research involved. Beginning with a general statement on Negro cults, he describes in systematic detail five groups currently functioning in Philadelphia: the Mt. Sinai Holy Church of America, Inc., the United House of Prayer of All People ("Daddy Grace" is not, like Father Divine, God, but has taken over while God is on vacation), the Church of God (Black Jews), the Moorish Science Temple of America, and the Father Divine Peace Mission Movement. For each group he starts with a short "testimony," and describes its origin, organization, membership, finance (in the case of Father Divine information was not forthcoming), beliefs, ritual, and other practices. The material and treatment are of feature-story quality. Dr. Fauset then compares these cults with evangelical Christian denominations, and seeks to ascertain why they attract followers, and the degree to which they promote economic, social, and cultural advance. Finally he calls into question the generally accepted idea of the peculiar "religiosity" of the American Negro. His conclusion is that such cults result from "the comparatively meager participation of Negroes in other institutional forms of American culture"—i.e. from race discrimination.

5499. Loescher, Frank S. The Protestant church and the Negro, a pattern of segregation. New York, Association Press, 1948. 159 p.
48-7076 BR563.N4L6

A foreword by Bishop Scarlett of the Episcopal diocese of Missouri sets the tone for this clear, hard-hitting monograph: "This book will be unpleasant reading for those who love the Church." The author, who wrote the work as a doctoral thesis in sociology, is a member of the Society of Friends and a specialist in race relations. The facts he assembles demonstrate that segregation is the normal practice of the Protestant churches. First he examines the general problem and "What the Churches say"; this is illustrated in appendix I with abstracts of pronouncements by church conventions and interchurch groups, notably the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ, which show an advance in thinking on race relations between 1908 and 1947. Next comes "What the Churches Do," nationally, regionally, and locally, and in denominational schools and colleges; this is illustrated in the statistical appendixes II and III. Of the eight million Protestant Negroes, approximately seven and a half million are in separate "Negro" denominations, and the other half million in separate Negro churches in the "white" denominations. Only a tiny minority of local churches accept Negro members, and most of those are in communities where the Negro population is too small to maintain its own church. The last chapter is on policies and programs aiming at racial integration.

5500. Mays, Benjamin Elijah, and Joseph William Nicholson. The Negro's church. New York, Institute of Social and Religious Research, 1933. 321 p. 33-6349 BR563.N4M3

The first comprehensive survey, not as yet superseded, of the Negro church in the United States. Made by the Institute of Social and Religious Research at the request of Negro leaders, it is based on a firsthand study of 609 urban and 185 rural churches selected as a representative sample. A sentence in the Preface gains added force a quarter-century later: "In view of the recent extensive migrations of Negroes from country to city and from South to North, together with the extension of education and sophistication among the Negro population as a whole, it may be considered fortunate that this study was made while the older patterns of religious life were still to be found." The analysis, reinforced by statistics, covers the place of organized religion in Negro life, its historical development, the ministry, church membership, buildings and programs, worship, fellowship and community activities, and finances, first for urban churches, and then for rural ones. In both areas consideration is given to whether the Negro is "overchurched." The last chapter, "The Genius of the Negro Church," suggests that in spite of the discouraging condition of Negro church life in a number of respects, which are "in part the result of the failure of American Christianity in race relations," "the Negro Church has potentialities to become possibly the greatest spiritual force in the United States." Another institute study also examines the Negro's share in organized religion: Divine White Right, by Trevor Bowen (New York, Harper, 1934. 310 p.). The subtitle indicates its scope: "A Study of Race Segregation and Interracial Coöperation in Religious Organizations and Institutions in the United States." A separate section by Ira De A. Reid, "The Church and Education for Negroes," deals principally with the Negro mission schools and colleges in the South.

5501. Richardson, Harry V. Dark glory, a picture of the church among Negroes in the rural South. New York, Published for Home Missions Council of North America and Phelps-Stokes Fund by Friendship Press, 1947. xiv, 209 p.
47–24753 BR563.N4R5

"A selected reading list": p. 194–197.

"The church is still the predominant institution in the rural South. It is the Negro's chief agency of social expression and it enjoys greater freedom than any other community institution. The pastor as leader of the most important institution commands a unique authority, in spite of his limitations, that no other community leader enjoys." This thesis is maintained through its various aspects by the writer, an influential Southern religious leader formerly at Tuskegee Institute. His first seven chapters cover the historical background, the general setting and present conditions in four selected counties of Alabama, South Carolina, Arkansas, and Virginia, church buildings, church membership (Negroes are predominantly Baptist and Methodist), and programs for adults and young people. The next five chapters are concentrated on the ministers, their training, their knowledge of rural affairs, and their attitudes and influence in general and regarding social problems, race relations, etc. Finally plans for their better training are outlined. In this connection the Program for a Better Trained Rural Ministry sponsored by the Phelps-Stokes Fund, with which the writer was at the time associated, is emphasized.

5502. Woodson, Carter G. The history of the Negro church. 2d ed. Washington, Associated Publishers, 1945. 322 p. illus.
46–279 BR563.N4W6 1945

In these days when churchgoers are kept constantly aware of the missionary effort to carry the Gospel to the Africans at home, it is hard to realize that for the first century or more of slavery in the English Colonies of America the conversion of Negroes to Christianity was frowned upon. Although royal decrees and special colonial laws had been passed to make it lawful for Christians to be held as slaves, the masters on the plantations generally feared the mental improvement which religious teaching might bring their laborers. The Catholic priests and missionaries in Maryland were the first to preach to all regardless of color. The few attempts at conversion of the Negroes made by clergymen of the Anglican Church and by Quakers in the Southern and Middle Colonies during the 18th century are described individually by Dr. Woodson in the first chapter of this detailed history. It was not until the Baptist and Methodist evangelical campaigns at the turn of the 19th century that the slaves were Christianized in substantial numbers; then Negro preachers arose, and separate Negro churches were formed in cities and on the plantations. In the 1830's, after the slave revolt led by the preacher Nat Turner in Virginia, the frightened slaveowners put restrictions on Negro preaching in the South, and the great development of independent Negro churches did not come until after Emancipation. This book, by a prominent Negro historian (1875–1950), professor at Howard University, traces the history of the Negro church in terms of movements and men, and has been a standard authority since its first publication in 1921.

XXIV

Folklore, Folk Music, Folk Art

A.	Legends and Tales: General	5503–5519
B.	Legends and Tales: Local	5520–5548
C.	Folksongs and Ballads: General	5549–5564
D.	Folksongs and Ballads: Local	5565–5584
E.	Games and Dances	5585–5592
F.	Folk Art and Crafts	5593–5604

ONE OF THE major encyclopedias defines the scope of folklore as "the material as well as the intellectual culture of the peasantry." This raises a primary consideration in approaching American folklore: there is and has been no American peasantry, properly so-called. Cultivators of the American soil have avoided both the name and the conditions which it implies; and American public policy has equally aimed, by and large, to prevent such conditions from arising, or at least from developing into permanent disabilities or status. Of all such policies, the most powerful antidote to the status of peasantry and its concomitant folk culture is that of universal and free public education, available to children of every race and condition in every area, through secondary school or beyond. This ideal, first grasped by Thomas Jefferson and gradually made a reality during the past century, makes for a maximum of intercommunication between every part of American society, and so wars upon that isolation which is recognized to be the natural soil of a folk culture. It seeks to make a child's opportunities to some degree independent of the condition of his parents, so that he need not inherit their status. In large degree, therefore, the American way of life is incompatible with a folk culture. The past 60 years, however, have witnessed an intense cultivation of American folklore and folk music, and the past 30 of folk art, by the learned and the sophisticated, which they have succeeded in communicating, if not to the largest public, at least to large groups of amateurs, urban and suburban.

This seeming paradox is easily resolved. The Jeffersonian ideal, if early proclaimed, was belatedly and gradually embodied, and is not yet perfected. Until the 19th century was well advanced, large sections of the American people remained in relative isolation, with little or no schooling, and in greater or lesser degree dependent upon traditional lore, and what they could add to it, for the enrichment of their lives. The frontier, which did not disappear until about 1890, pushed on ahead of schools and printing presses, and out of its occupational and other interests usually amplified the traditions brought with it in various characteristic and colorful ways. Areas or classes which did not share in the main tide of American progress, such as the mountainous and other parts of the rural South, and the Negro nearly everywhere, conserved their old lore and modified it very gradually. Furthermore, about 1820 began a real influx of genuine peasantry from the nations and ethnic groups of Europe, each with a different body of traditional notions. These were of course subjected to an Americanization that was sometimes a deliberate policy but far more often an undirected social process, which had a limited effect upon the immigrant generation, but a much more thorough one upon their children and grandchildren. Traces of tradition, however, have usually been left.

The American Folklore Society, founded in 1888, defined as its first aim "the collection of the fast-vanishing remains of Folk-Lore in America." Their alarm was undue, since successful collecting goes on seven decades later, but they had indelibly expressed their sense that American folklore was a fringe phenomenon, a perishable residue, and a quite different matter from European folklore. The elaborate and sometimes grotesque theoretical structures that have been reared on the basis of Old-World folklore could never have been educed from the American variety. Yet another difference has been concisely put by Ruth Benedict: in native American folklore "self-expression is at a maximum and historical analogues are almost non-existent." One consequence has been that in recent years American academic folklorists have claimed for their subject matters that would have been dubiously regarded by the brothers Grimm or E. B. Tylor, and some of their recent compilations have been miscellanies that seem to escape any clear and distinct definition.

677676 O–63–51

However, the latter-day tendency of Americans to seek refuge from the standardized present in a more colorful past has made all the esthetic kinds of folk culture marketable commodities. The titles which follow fill the distance between two extremes: rigorous academic collections in which the ipsissima verba of elderly rustics are reverently recorded, collated, and annotated; and frankly popular works in which traditional materials are cheerfully reworked for their value as healthy entertainment. Both kinds must be included if the American folklore interest of today is to be faithfully mirrored here. The arrangement of the entries that follow is self-explanatory. One warning needs to be given: the boundaries between the folk arts and their sophisticated counterparts remain indistinct. There is no clear demarcation between the first two sections here and Chapter I on Literature, where will be found such a folk classic as the Brer Rabbit corpus of Joel Chandler Harris; nor between folk music and the sections on popular music in the next chapter; nor between folk art and the section on Decorative Arts in Chapter XXVI. Folk art is a more recent interest than the other contents of this chapter, going back little more than three decades; but intensive cultivation has produced collections and a literature no less interesting than exist for the older pursuits.

A. Legends and Tales: General

5503. Allen, Jules Verne. Cowboy lore; illustrated by Ralph J. Pereida. [7th ed.] San Antonio, Tex., Naylor, 1950. xvi, 164 p.
50–2725 F596.A38 1950
M1629.A46 1950

"The songs were taken down and set to music by Mrs. G. Embry Eitt."

Billed as "The Original Singing Cowboy," the late Jules Verne Allen was long a favorite entertainer in rodeos and open-air exhibitions, and later won a wider popularity through his recordings and radio broadcasts. Nearly forty of Allen's favorite songs, provided with piano accompaniments, make up a large portion of this book, but other aspects of cowboy life and lore are also presented. Part 1 describes the real life and work of cowhands, as opposed to the Hollywood version, and appends to much miscellaneous information a few tall stories. Other parts describe the history and methods of cattle brands and earmarks, and define English and Spanish terms from the cowboy's occupational lingo. The frontispiece illustrates the equipment of the cowpoke and his pony, identified in English and Spanish, from the brand, or fierro, to the stirrup, or estrivo. The book was originally published in 1933.

5504. Beckwith, Martha Warren. Folklore in America, its scope and method. Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Vassar College, The Folklore Foundation, 1931. 76 p. (Publications of the Folklore Foundation, no. 11) 32–4724 GR105.B4
GR15.V3, no. 11

"Selected references": p. 67–76.

The term "folklore" was introduced by the British scholar William Thoms, in 1846, to supplant the vaguer names "popular literature" and "antiquities." The scope and limitations of the discipline have been a matter of some debate since Thoms' day, and Miss Beckwith's careful definition is but one of several possible ones. In her first chapter Miss Beckwith differentiates between "folk knowledge" in general and folklore by linking the latter more closely with its German counterpart, Volkskunde or folk art. It is only the artistic part of the folk tradition which the present definition of folklore includes. Thus the folklorist is not concerned indiscriminately with all popular tradition, but only with that which transcends utility in being "touched by poetic thought," imagination, and fantasy. The "art" in folklore differs from sophisticated artistic expression in that, though originally the product of an individual's creative imagination, the folk art work takes on the character of a group creation, through generations of repetition and variation. The folk group which is the true custodian of folklore is defined as a group of limited sophistication and restricted contact outside the group itself. The isolation of the folk group can be geographical, linguistic, racial or national, or occupational. The definition is concluded with a brief discussion of the extent to which folklore is allied with literature, on the one hand, and cultural anthropology, on the other. The remaining chapters trace the development of the scientific study of folklore, first in Europe, with special attention to Germany, Scandinavia, and Great Britain; and finally in the United States. The author points out early signs of literary interest in popular lore and literature, but finds the first scientific approach only in the 19th century, with the work of the brothers Grimm. For America's part, special emphasis is placed on the New World vestiges of the British ballad, first given prominence in the great contributions of Francis James Child, author of The English and Scottish Popular Ballads (no. 5550 note).

5505. Blair, Walter. Mike Fink, king of Mississippi keelboatmen. By Walter Blair and Franklin J. Meine. New York, Holt, 1933. xiv, 283 p. illus. 33–5924 F353.B62
Bibliography: p. 269–283.

The introduction discusses the processes whereby the American folk hero has developed from historical personage to romantic demigod recreated by the popular imagination. Kit Carson, Wild Bill Hickok, and Daniel Boone are a few of those instanced as real people whose real exploits have been touched by the creative muse of the folk, transcending history and outdistancing fact. One of the most colorful of the frontier heroes, Mike Fink, started looking for new frontiers from the river village of Pittsburgh, where he had been born about 1770. A crackshot Indian fighter whose practical jokes included shooting off an Indian's scalplock, a fighting keelboatman on the Ohio and Mississippi whose immortal boast was "I can outjump, out-run, and out-fight any man on the Massassip'," and at the end a trapper on the Missouri, Mike Fink led a legendary life of courage and cruelty, cunning and violence. Tracing the oral and early printed accounts of Mike's adventures, the epilogue recounts the birth and growth of the legend. The same authors have recently edited a further work which examines the subject from a more scholarly point of view: Half Horse, Half Alligator; the Growth of the Mike Fink Legend ([Chicago] University of Chicago Press, 1956. 288 p.).

5506. Blair, Walter. Tall tale America, a legendary history of our humorous heroes. Illustrated by Glen Rounds. New York, Coward-McCann, 1944. 262 p. 44–8461 PS451.B55
"Proof (a bibliographical note)": p. 257–262.

With tongue firmly set in cheek, Walter Blair sets out to recount America's history in terms of the legendary heroes who have been important figures in popular tradition. Fact and folklore are mingled freely and seasoned with witty improvements by the author, who "fixed up fact after fact to make it truer than it ever was before." Exploits of Mike Fink, Davy Crockett, Johnny Appleseed, Paul Bunyan, Pecos Bill, and John Henry are humorously related, together with those of earlier heroes around whom legends have long clustered, beginning with Lief the Lucky, Columbus, and Ponce de Leon. Asserting that "We've Still Got Heroes," the last chapter reminds us of our recent tall tales about "shipyards, gremlins, and marines" and "the bewildering Pentagon building." There are a number of other books of American folk tales designed for popular reading, all of which cannot be mentioned here. Two recent ones which present some favorite tales in an attractive format are Burl Ives' Tales of America (Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1954. 305 p.) and Maria Leach's The Rainbow Book of American Folk Tales and Legends (Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1958., 318 p.).

5507. Boatright, Mody C., ed. Backwoods to border. Mody C. Boatright [and] Donald Day, editors. Austin, Texas Folklore Society, 1943. xv, 235 p. illus. (Publications of the Texas Folklore Society, no. 18) 43–18054 GR1.T4, no. 18

The 18th yearbook of the Texas Folklore Society marked the retirement of J. Frank Dobie as editor, although he remained an active contributor and supporter. The articles range over various standard aspects of folklore in the Southwest, including tales of ghosts, animals, heroes, and heroines, and legends, anecdotes, jargon, and rope-jumping rhymes. More unusual is a description of the custom of grave decoration among the Negroes, Mexicans, and Indians of the Southwest, and an account of the cowhands' bulldogging and branding techniques at a branding roundup. "The Arkansas Traveler," that widely popular combination of humorous dialog and fiddle-playing, is the subject of an especially penetrating study by Catherine Marshall Vineyard, who compares versions of the skit and while tracing its history and origin finds some distant cousins.

5508. Boatright, Mody C. Folk laughter on the American frontier. New York, Macmillan, 1949. 182 p. 49–49204 PN6161.B663

The Easterner's idea of frontier life, as being full of crudity, violence, and sloth, seems to have been the starting place for the grandiose exaggerations which characterize much of the frontier's own humor. The tall tales and anecdotes which Professor Boatright has assembled in these pages abound in rough-and-tumble fights, ridiculous in the degree of their brutality, and pioneer hardships, impossibly extreme. The subjects of the 13 chapters include "Backwoods Belles," one of whom killed a marauding wolf with her wooden leg, and another who could "eat more wildcat steaks raw than any other living critter in creation." One of the rugged frontiersmen encountered in "Manners and Men" is tobacco-chewing Davy Crockett, who "was hugeously ashamed to spit on that splendiferous carpit," not realizing the function of an elaborately painted cuspidor. In his final chapter Professor Boatright attempts to discover the basis of frontier humor and concludes by taking issue with such writers as Lewis Mumford and Van Wyck Brooks, who thought that the pioneers used humor as "a grim release of frustrated hopes." Buoyancy, rather than despair, is in Professor Boatright's view the source of American frontier humor.

5509. Boatright, Mody C., ed. Folk travelers: ballads, tales, and talk. Edited by Mody C. Boatright, Wilson M. Hudson [and] Allen Maxwell. Austin, Texas Folklore Society; [distributed by] Southern Methodist University Press, Dallas, 1953. 261 p. illus. (Publications of the Texas Folklore Society, no. 25)
53–12578 GR1.T4, no. 25

The migrant nature of folklore is the key to the title of this installment in the Texas Folklore Society's series, and the subject of J. Frank Dobie's lead article, "The Traveling Anecdote." Many tales and tale-motifs have traveled widely, and some, such as the famous story of the Tar Baby, recorded in Uncle Remus, have been around the world many times over thousands of years. For the most part, the volume stays close to the Southwest, with discussions of Spanish cattle brands and tall tales, and of magic and weather lore from the Texas-Mexican border country.

5510. Botkin, Benjamin A., ed. Sidewalks of America; folklore, legends, sagas, traditions, customs, songs, stories, and sayings of city folk. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1954. xxii, 605 p. illus.
54–9485 GR105.B57

In stating his case for collecting urban lore, the editor points out that "wherever you find people you find folklore—that is, a body of traditions, collective symbols and myths, folkways and folksay, rooted in a place and in ways of living and looking at life." The folk groups reflected in this miscellany are urban groups and ethnic and religious groups within each city. The 16 chapters include American city tales and anecdotes dating from early in the last century to the recent rise of suburbia, but make no attempt to present them in chronological order. Not overlooking city folk music, Dr. Botkin has included ballads such as "The Milwaukee Fire," urban industrial songs such as "The Homestead Strike," and a large assortment of children's rhymes and songs, and of peddlars' street cries.

5511. Botkin, Benjamin A., ed. A treasury of American folklore; stories, ballads, and traditions of the people. With a foreword by Carl Sandburg. New York, Crown, 1944. xxvii, 932 p.
44–4275 GR105.B58

"A book of American folklore," the compiler thought, "should be as big as this country of ours—as American as Davy Crockett and as universal as Brer Rabbit." In both size and variety, this one-volume introduction to American folk literature embodies much of Dr. Botkin's sense of the breadth and inclusiveness of his subject. Part 1, "Heroes and Boasters," recounts the exploits of classical American folk figures such as Crockett, Pecos Bill, and Stormalong. It brings to our attention some modern ones as well in Joe Magarac the Hunkie Steelman, and Popeye. The "Jesters" in part 3 tell American anecdotes, proverbs, and gags from popular tradition and from the folk-inspired and folk-oriented works of such writers as Carl Sandburg. Not to be overlooked are the recent urban "Little Moron" jokes and "Knock Knock, Who's There" riddles. The tall tales treated in part 4, "Liars," include some whoppers about remarkable insects and "fearsome critters," and Mark Twain's "Jumping Frog." Washington Irving's "The Devil and Tom Walker" is one of the legends in part 6, although most come directly from folk tradition. The songs and rhymes, many of whose melodies are included, range from traditional Anglo-American ballads to modern jingles and rope-skipping chants. Although there is no general bibliography, the footnotes are many and detailed. The songs are indexed by titles and first lines and by the names of their collectors and editors, while the other material is thoroughly indexed by names and subjects.

5512. Botkin, Benjamin A., ed. A treasury of railroad folklore; the stories, tall tales, traditions, ballads, and songs of the American railroad man. Edited by B. A. Botkin and Alvin F. Harlow. New York, Crown, 1953. xiv, 530 p. illus.
53–9973 GR920.R3B6

The joint product of a railroad historian and an American folklorist, this large anthology examines both historical fact and oral lore connected with the development of railroading in the days of steam. Real and legendary personalities who worked at all levels of the business are encountered, from John Henry and Casey Jones to Jay Gould and Andrew Carnegie. Jones' disaster is one of several examined at length. Other sections discuss the "Banditti of the Rails," including the first train holdup, and several of the James boys' jobs, and present many "Blues, Ballads, and Work Songs," with tunes and historical notes.

5513. Clough, Benjamin C., ed... The American imagination at work; tall tales and folk tales. New York, Knopf, 1947. xix, 707 p.
47–30583 GR105.C55

Bibliography: p. 701–707.

This large collection of American folk tales and tall tales draws on material collected from the oral tradition by such folklorists as Richard Dorson, Harold Thompson, Richard Chase, Vance Randolph, and Herbert Halpert. Other items are taken from more purely literary sources, from writers so diverse in period and outlook as Captain John Smith, Cotton Mather, Washington Irving, Mark Twain, Stephen Vincent Benét, and Bennett Cerf. Loosely arranged by type and subject matter, the yarns cover "history, semi-history and pseudo-history," "witchcraft and other satanic mischief," "the animal kingdom," "explorers, pioneers, benefactors, demigods, supermen, myth-makers, and jokers," and a number of "hardy perennials."

5514. Davidson, Levette J. A guide to American folklore. [Denver] University of Denver Press, 1951. 132 p. 51–10205 GR105.D3

In his first chapter "What is Folklore?" the author gives the discipline a broader definition than does M. W. Beckwith in her Folklore in America (no. 5504). The present study applies the term in general to "the traditional expressions of unsophisticated groups of people, expressions that are oral or informal in transmission." Thus Professor Davidson, with the more recent folklorists, tends to place less emphasis on artistic standards in folk literature, and more on authentic tradition as a key to better understanding of the cultural group. The author agrees with earlier scholars that folklore thrives best in isolated, homogeneous, and unlettered societies, but finds that it also flourishes in clubs, fraternities, schools, and other such groups in urban society: "We all, more or less, follow folk patterns, enjoy folk creations, and pass along folklore." The remaining 14 chapters of this handbook make brief examinations of the several types of folklore: myths, legends, customs, songs, crafts, etc., defining and commenting upon each, and appending bibliographies and study questions for each. Appendixes trace the development of American folklore scholarship; list many of the outstanding experts, with their fields of specialty; and survey the sources available to the student of folklore in America's museums, libraries, and archives.

5515. Federal Writers' Project. Lay my burden down; a folk history of slavery. Edited by B. A. Botkin. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1945. xxi, 285 p. illus. A45–5576 E444.F26

Edited by Dr. Botkin from the numerous manuscript narratives of former slaves collected during the 1930's by the Federal Writers' Project, Lay My Burden Down constitutes a group autobiography of the Southern Negroes to whom the time of slavery was still a personal, albeit distant, memory. Aiming at the general reader, the editor has maintained a clear and concise narrative style without sacrificing the personal language of the original sources. The book is divided into five general sections: "Mother Wit," "Long Remembrance," "From Can to Can't," "A War among the White Folks," and "All I Know about Freedom." Both factual narrative and folklore figure importantly in the reminiscences. Tall tales, anecdotes, ghost stories, and myths—many of them involving Lincoln and other important figures of the day—come from the many informants blessed with "mother wit." Personal recollections of slavery days vary widely, according to the informants' individual experiences. Some of the accounts are strongly tinged with nostalgia, others with bitterness. One of the former slaves even shows sympathy for the Ku Klux Klan! Nevertheless, most of the contributors would seem to agree with the one who said, "Freedom is better than slavery, though. I done seed both sides."

5516. Hoffman, Daniel G. Paul Bunyan, last of the frontier demigods. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press for Temple University Publications, 1952. xiv, 213 p.
52–12005 PS461.B8H6

Bibliography: p. 193–201.

Although Paul Bunyan is among the most widely known of American folk heroes, his position as a genuine folk character is surprisingly precarious. Considered by some authorities to have been invented out of whole cloth by professional writers, the good-natured giant owes at least a large proportion of his current popularity and many of his individual exploits to printed sources. That Paul himself originated in the oral tradition, however, is convincingly demonstrated by Professor Hoffman. Paul's first appearance in print was as recent as 1910, in a newspaper story whose authentic lumberwoods vocabulary suggests a traditional oral source. In scholarly fashion the author analyzes the popular Paul Bunyan literature and the poetic treatments by Robert Frost, Carl Sandburg, and Louis Untermeyer, as well as the surviving fragments of oral literature which probably originated in the last century. He appends an index to the motifs in the Bunyan tales, both literary and oral.

5517. Johnson, Guy B. John Henry; tracking down a Negro legend. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1929. 155 p. (University of North Carolina. Social study series)
29–23914 PS461.J6J6
ML3556.J7J7

"Bibliography of John Henry": p. [152]–155.

"The songs about John Henry," states Professor Johnson, "are at the heart of the legend which has sprung up around him." By gathering and analyzing the available hammer songs and ballads (some of which are here accompanied by their melodies) about the mighty steel driver, and comparing their widely conflicting patches of evidence with what documentation and individual recollections he could locate, the author, while unable to obtain the complete facts, has at least laid the ground for better-informed speculation and set an example for other such studies of the factual bases of American song-legends. An examination of the development of the steam drill and the physical conditions of the Big Bend Tunnel in West Virginia leads him to the conclusion that the famous contest between man and machine could, at least, have taken place, and that, under the right circumstances, such a steel driver as John Henry could well have been the victor. The relationship between John Henry and another ballad hero, the murderer John Hardy, long a thorny matter in American Negro folklore, is found to be only a confusion of two separate Negro steel drivers. Hardy, whose exploit is well documented, appears to have entered the annals of folk legend some time after the John Henry tradition was already well established. Mention should also be made of a similar study, later by a few years, Louis W. Chappell's scholarly John Henry, a Folk-Lore Study (Jena, Frommannsche Verlag, 1933. 144 p.), which supports many of Professor Johnson's conclusions while it clarifies and corrects others.

5518. Journal of American folklore. v. 1. Apr./June 1888. Philadelphia, American Folklore Society. quarterly. 17–28737 GR1.J8

Published in Boston by Houghton Mifflin, 1888–1910.

Index: Vols. 1–40, 1888–1927. 1 v. (Issued as v. 14 of the Memoirs of the American Folklore Society (GR1.A5, v. 14).

The American Folklore Society, the parent organization devoted to the study of folklore in the New World, was founded in 1888, with Professor Alcée Fortier of Tulane University as its first president. Through its Journal of American Folklore and other publications, including monographs and bibliographies, this active organization has contributed most significantly to the study of British, French, Spanish, and Negro lore in Canada, the United States, and Latin America, as well as the indigenous lore of the American Indian. The vast amount of material in the Journal's first 70 volumes has recently been made more accessible to the researcher by Tristram P. Coffin's An Analytical Index to the Journal of American Folklore (Philadelphia, American Folklore Society, 1958.). Among the first regional offspring of the American Folklore Society was the Texas Folklore Society, which held its first meeting in 1911 and got out the first of its annual volumes in 1916, under the editorship of Stith Thompson. Professor Thompson's successor was J. Frank Dobie who, after a brief World War I interim, presided over the Publications of the Texas Folklore Society until 1943, when the editorial work was taken up by Mody C. Boatright and others. This series of yearbooks continues to offer a wide variety of legends, tales, songs, ballads, and other lore from the Indian, Spanish, Negro, and Anglo-Saxon peoples of the American Southwest. A number of the Texas Society's Publications are individually listed elsewhere in this chapter. The number of folklore periodicals devoted to specific areas, States, or subjects is large and growing. The most important include the Southern Folklore Quarterly (founded in 1937), Western Folklore (originally the California Folklore Quarterly, 1942–46), New York Folklore Quarterly (1945), and Midwest Folklore (1951). These publications have not rigidly restricted themselves to their particular areas in the range of their contents but, like the Journal of American Folklore, show evidence of a growing interest in the general field of folklore, including its international aspects.

5519. Price, Robert. Johnny Appleseed; man and myth. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1954. xv, 320 p. illus.
54–7972 S417.C45P7

Bibliography: p. 299–303.

In an oral literature replete with vigorous, swashbuckling, swaggering, and sometimes brutal heroes, the folk memory of John Chapman (1774–1845) is unique. Legend tells us that, although he ran from Mansfield to Mt. Vernon, Ohio, in 24 hours in order to summon armed help for settlers threatened by an Indian attack, Chapman himself would never use a gun against another man, whether white or Indian. Nor would he permit animals or insects to suffer for his own comfort. Already a popular legend long before his death, the earliest printed account of Chapman appeared in England in 1817, and does not describe Johnny Appleseed, the popular planter of Midwestern orchards, so much as the religious mystic and "extraordinary missionary" for the New Church of Swedenborg. As far as is possible, Professor Price has attempted to separate fact from legend, and proves, among other things, that while the itinerant pioneer, missionary, and nurseryman was not without his eccentricities, the popular notion that he was a pauper is far from correct. In tracing the development of the Appleseed myth, however, the author concludes that, in the final analysis, its worth "no longer lies merely in the dead facts that may have inspired it but in the new, living and creating force that it has become in the present."

B. Legends and Tales: Local

5520. Boatright, Mody C. Tall tales from Texas. Illustrated by Elizabeth E. Keefer; foreword by J. Frank Dobie. Dallas, Tex., Southwest Press, 1934. xxiv, 100 p. 34–24636 PZ3.B6304Tal

The ideal audience for a frontier tall tale, or "windy," was a credulous greenhorn, who was often treated to exaggeration regarding the potency of poisonous serpents, dreadful aspects of fantastic beasts, and extraordinary feats of strength and speed by heroes of the Southwestern plains. But, as J. Frank Dobie points out in his "Preface on Authentic Liars," even when no tenderfoot was about the authentic liar took his art seriously and told his tale with the gravity of "a historian of the Roman Empire," expecting "neither credulity nor the establishment of truth," but creating his tale as an end in itself. In this book there is a young greenhorn to provide his more experienced cronies with the opportunity and incentive to summon up a large assortment of "windies" on all manner of subjects, culminating in accounts of the genesis, exploits, and exodus of Pecos Bill and his beloved first wife, Sluefoot Sue.

5521. Boatright, Mody C., ed. Texas folk and folklore. Edited by Mody C. Boatright, Wilson M. Hudson [and] Allen Maxwell. Drawings by José Cisneros. Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1954. 356 p. (Publications of the Texas Folklore Society, no. 26)
54–11299 GR1.T4, no. 26

The indigenous Indians, the Spanish settlers from Mexico, the Anglo-American settlers, and their Negro slaves formed four distinct racial groups and cultural traditions in Texas which maintain, to a great extent, their several identities. All four of these traditions are drawn upon freely in this collection, which includes tales of the Kiowa-Apache and the Alabama-Coushatta, together with Mexican, Negro, and Anglo-American tales, jokes, legends, and ghost stories. Another branch of folklore covered is music, with white and Negro ballads and songs, and Mexican corridos. Rounding out the collection are examples of folk-medicine, plant lore, games, and proverbs, and an account of a highly poetic and moving Negro folk sermon. The volume is one of a series which has been issued regularly by the society since 1916.

5522. Botkin, Benjamin A., ed. New York City folklore: legends, tall tales, anecdotes, stories, sagas, heroes and characters, customs, traditions, and sayings. New York, Random House, 1956. 492 p. illus. 56–8815 F128.B6

Urban popular tradition, previously presented in the editor's Sidewalks of America (no. 5510), is further exploited in a volume devoted to the largest city of the Nation and the World. "The focus of the book," the editor observes, "is on the quintessence of New York," rather than on the many individual ethnic, linguistic, and occupational groups which exist within the whole. At the same time certain neighborhoods and "cities within the city" are given attention in chapters such as "You Walk around a Corner, and It's a Different World," "Peacocks on Parade," and "Playtown and Playboys." While the book's organization is informal and follows no strict historical pattern, a wide range of New York City history is covered, from the earliest encounters between the Indians and Dutch to the latter days of Grover Whalen, Jimmy Walker, Casey Stengel, and Toots Shor, all of whom are represented in the editor's selection of New York City folklore. It is unlike Dr. Botkin's other anthologies in that music does not figure importantly, although a few street cries and chants are included.

5523. Botkin, Benjamin A., ed. A treasury of Mississippi River folklore; stories, ballads, traditions, and folkways of the mid-American river country. New York, Crown, 1955. xx, 620 p.
55–10172 GR109.B58

While cultural homogeneity has often been regarded as an ideal breeding ground for pure folklore, and has been a vitally important factor in the South, New England, and other regions of America, the keynote of the mid-American river country is, as Dr. Botkin points out, diversity. "From frigid Lakes and North Woods to semi-tropical Gulf, the river country has . . . been a region of extremes and sharp contrasts and violent changes." Over the length of the Mississippi, there is a greater amalgamation of ethnic and cultural groups than has been encountered in most of the other areas dealt with in the editor's "Treasury" series. As a result the legends and tales, heroes and outlaws, language and customs, and ballads and blues of the Mississippi country are related to diverse cultural traditions: those of the Anglo-Saxon, the Frenchman, the Negro, the Indian, the German, and the Scandinavian; and include occupational lore of the trapper, the lumberman, the farmer and plantation laborer, and the industrial worker.

5524. Botkin, Benjamin A., ed. A treasury of New England folklore; stories, ballads, and traditions of the Yankee people. New York, Crown, 1947. xxvi, 934 p. 47–11615 GR106.B6

Following the same broad treatment of written and oral lore as the editor's popular Treasury of American Folklore (no. 5511), this anthology presents a large quantity and variety of legendary and real local New England characters, stories, anecdotes, customs, and music. In a brief introduction, "New England as a Folklore Country," Dr. Botkin describes the close-knit New England culture as an ideal ground for the preservation of folklore, because of its "strong sense of 'nationality' rooted in 'racial remembrance.'" The book's five sections range over the earlier source literature, Artemus Ward, Josh Billings, and The Farmer's Almanack, as well as the purely oral lore gathered in recent years by the Federal Writers' Project and individual collectors.

5525. Botkin, Benjamin A., ed. A treasury of Southern folklore; stories, ballads, traditions, and folkways of the people of the South. With a foreword by Douglas Southall Freeman. New York, Crown, 1949. xxiv, 776 p. 49–11786 GR108.B6

A further regional installment in Dr. Botkin's series on folk taste and fancy, A Treasury of Southern Folklore sets forth local loyalties and prejudices, heroes and desperadoes, stories, customs, and music. One type of hero is presented in a particularly interesting chapter, "The Peoples' Choice," which recalls Southern politicians and political commentators who have captured the popular imagination, from Patrick Henry and John Calhoun to Huey Long and Will Rogers. Moonshine, mint juleps, hush-puppies, and burgoo are among the "Pleasures of the Palate" described in part 4, "Southern Folkways." As is customary in this series, the editor concludes with a large assortment of songs and ballads, with melodies.

5526. Botkin, Benjamin A., ed. A treasury of Western folklore. Foreword by Bernard De Voto. New York, Crown, 1951. 806 p. illus. 51–12013 GR109.B6

"To the New Yorker," one of this anthology's selections avers, "anything west of Hoboken is the West." Most Easterners locate the frontier along the far slope of the Alleghenies, for one's concept of the West changes with one's point of view. However, all commentators, even those who regard the West as being a state of mind, agree that the West, wherever it is, is a place of vastness and diversity. Like the West itself, Mr. Botkin's third regional miscellany of American folklore is expansive and varied. The tales, anecdotes, language, customs, and songs, reprinted with connecting editorial commentary, offer a panorama of the hard and high living and the fast and frequent dying which all of us associate with the story of westward expansion. As in its two predecessors, the focal point is Anglo-American tradition. Strung upon this thread, however, are the contributory traditions of the Western Indian and the Spanish American. In a loose historical and geographical order, the collection offers folkways, folk-say, and a considerable amount of straight history of the struggles of the settlers against nature, the Indians, and each other. There are tales and songs of sandstorms and earthquakes, of Crazy Horse and Cochise, and of Clay Allison and Billy the Kid. Nor does the editor ignore the 20th century's contributions to Western folklore, with the coming of industry, wealth, and Hopalong Cassidy. Readers desiring a smaller collection may turn to Duncan Emrich's volume in the American customs series: It's an Old Wild West Custom (New York, Vanguard Press, 1949. 313 p.), which has selections in most of the categories offered by Dr. Botkin, as well as an illustrated study of branding irons and saloon fixtures.

5527. Brewer, John Mason. The Word on the Brazos; Negro preacher tales from the Brazos bottoms of Texas. Foreword by J. Frank Dobie; illus. by Ralph White, Jr. Austin, University of Texas Press, 1953. 109 p. 53–10834 GR103.B7

The folk sermon in the religion of the Southern Negro, which has been better preserved in the Brazos bottoms of Texas than in most places, is characterized by its superb poetic imagery, its musical nuance, and its striking use of parables and anecdotes. Many of the stories in this collection originated as exempla from the pulpit, while others were told about preachers and religious matters in general by members of the flock. Both are known as "preacher tales." All of the tales, which Dr. Brewer relates in an authentic idiom, show a genuine gift of wit and humor: The Reverend gently chides the Sister Rosies who cry out "Ride, salvation, ride!" until the collection hat is passed, when they change to a less enthusiastic, "Walk, salvation, walk." The charm and humor of these tales of "Bad Religion," "Good Religion," "Baptizings, Conversions and Church Meetings," "Heaven and Hell," and "Preachers and Little Boys," reflect the happiness which this folk found in their religion, without detracting from the sincerity and humility of their belief.

5528. Carrière, Joseph Médard, ed. Tales from the French folklore of Missouri. Evanston, Ill., Northwestern University, 1937. 354 p. (Northwestern University studies in the humanities, no. 1) 38-6249 GR110.M77C3

In the village of Old Mines, in Washington County some 25 miles from the Mississippi River, Dr. Carrière found a small community which retained the language and traditions of the French pioneers who settled the area in the 18th century. The 73 tales which he here presents appear in the dialect in which he recorded them, and are arranged into three general categories: "Animal Tales"; "Ordinary Folk-Tales," which include tales of magic, religion, and of the stupid ogre, and novelle or romantic tales; and finally, assorted "Farces, Anecdotes, and Cumulative Stories." The dialect, which strongly resembles some Canadian-French dialects but also includes some English influences, is closely analyzed along with the stories. Each tale is preceded by a brief English summary. Additional helps include a glossary, and lists of tale types and motifs, arranged in accordance with the scholarly classification set up by Antti Aarne and Stith Thompson.

5529. Chase, Richard, ed. The Jack tales, told by R. M. Ward and his kindred in the Beech Mountain section of western North Carolina and by other descendants of Council Harmon (1803-1896) elsewhere in the Southern mountains; with three tales from Wise County, Virginia. Illustrated by Berkeley Williams, Jr. [Boston] Houghton Mifflin, 1943. 201 p. 43-12028 GR110.N8C5

Some Americans may be surprised to learn that the resourceful young man who climbed a beanstalk and slew a giant is also the hero of a large and widely known cycle of tales, brought to the New World from England, and still told in several regions, including the Southeastern States where Mr. Chase heard them. In this collection are 18 adventures of an Americanized Jack, an easygoing country boy far removed from his dashing English cousin, and of his brothers, Will and Tom. The ancient origins still show through in appearances of a Woden-like stranger with magical powers, and a unicorn, described as "just some kind of little old yearlin' bull that didn't have but one horn." Most of the tales come from the tradition of a single family, descendants of "Old Council" Harmon, all in the vicinity of Beech Mountain, North Carolina. Mr. Chase has combined different versions, clarified the dialect, and retold the stories in a manner which will best appeal to his readers, and especially to the children for whom Jack's escapades are a constant source of delight. At the same time he has preserved the characteristic Southern mountain idiom. Serious students of folklore will not overlook the special appendix prepared by Dr. Herbert Halpert, which makes a brief survey of the folktale in America and lists Old World parallels to Mr. Chase's selections, with references to the relevant literature. Five years later Mr. Chase issued a further and more general collection: Grandfather Tales; American-English Folk Tales (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1948. 239 p.). Its 25 traditional tales were taken down by Mr. Chase or others in Virginia, North Carolina, and Kentucky. The title originated thus: when Mr. Chase explained to one of his informants just the sort of tales he was looking for, the reply was, "Oh, you want the old grandfather tales: 'Jack and Will and Tom,' 'Chunk o' Meat,' 'The Two Lost Babes'—them old impossibilities. Is that what you're after?" As in the earlier collection, the author has reworked his sources for greater readability, and gives references to them in an appendix. Melodies are given in the popular old-shaped notation. This volume, like its predecessor, is illustrated with the pen-and-ink drawings of Berkeley Williams, Jr.

5530. Davidson, Levette J., and Forrester Blake, eds. Rocky Mountain tales. With drawings by Skelly. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1947. xiv, 302 p. 47-3645 GR109.D3

The Rocky Mountains and the plains around them have been the birth-place of many of America's most attractive legends, and the theater of much fact which has acquired legendary status. In the present collection the compilers have gathered from many printed sources tall tales, historical incidents, and accounts of many of the natural phenomena for which the region is famous. The first chapter introduces Jim Bridger, a wild and woolly frontiersman, who is still remembered as one of the greatest spinners of fabulous yarns. "Old Jim's" tales of the petrified forest and the glass mountain are among those recounted. Another remarkable personality encountered is the "Pikes Peak Prevaricator," Sergeant

O'Keefe, whose Munchausen-like tales of superhuman feats are recorded at length.

5531. Dobie, James Frank. Coronado's children; tales of lost mines and buried treasures of the Southwest. Illustrated by Ben Carlton Mead. Garden City, N. Y., Garden City Pub. Co., 1934. xiv, 367 p. 34–33497 F786.D633

Professor Dobie asserts that the gold fever which drove the conquistadores in search of the legendary Seven Cities of Cibola, the Gran Quivira, and El Dorado, did not die out with the coming of permanent settlers but persists more strongly than ever. In evidence he has printed here (the original edition was in 1930) a large number of tales current in America's Southwest of lost or hidden gold and other treasures. The legends abound in lost mines, rich caches guarded by Indians, pirate treasure buried by Lafitte and guarded by his shade, and many other tales of the endless quest of prospectors and adventurers. Appended are detailed bibliographical notes and a glossary of Mexican and other localisms of the Southwest.

5532. Dobie, James Frank, ed. Tales of old-time Texas; illustrated by Barbara Latham. Boston, Little, Brown, 1955. 336 p. 55–10755 GR110.T5D63

Adventurous tales of lost mines and hidden treasures, not unlike those encountered in the preceding Coronado's Children, are to be found in this new collection, but there is a great deal more. There are tall tales on many subjects, including the Texas weather; pure fantasy; and historically based tales revolving around such heroes as Jim Bowie and Sam Bass, best-known and -liked of the latter-day Robin Hoods of Texas folklore. Intentionally omitted are Roy Bean, whom the author regards as a character unworthy of folk-hero status, and Pecos Bill, described as a comparatively recent non-folk invention. While the introduction laments that there has been a loss of zest and flavor in the transition from telling to printing, the author's long personal experience with Texas tales and storytellers has enabled him to preserve much of the original language and style.

5533. Dorson, Richard M. Bloodstoppers & bearwalkers; folk traditions of the Upper Peninsula. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952. 305 p. 52–5394 GR110.M6D6

Michigan's Upper Peninsula retains a vast amount of traditional lore among each of the varied groups which make up its population. Emphasizing tales, but also including superstitions, customs, cures, food, songs, and other lore, Professor Dorson's study is based on his own collecting in the area. Commencing with the region's original inhabitants, the author examines "Indians Stuffed and Live," discrediting several of the romantic Indian legends contrived for the tourist trade, but revealing many vastly more fascinating tales he found still current among the Indians themselves. Part 2, examining some of Upper Michigan's Old-World traditions, describes the loup-garou and other beliefs and tales of the French-Canadian settlers; the language and customs of the "Cousin Jacks," the Michiganders of Cornish descent; tales and jokes of the Finns; and folk medicine among the Slovenians. Native lore, including detailed chapters on traditions of the miners, lumberjacks, and lake sailors, occupies part 3.

5534. Dorson, Richard M. Jonathan draws the long bow. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1946. 274 p. A46–4126 GR106.D6

"Note on the printed sources for New England folktales": p. 261–263.

In a concise preface, the author defines his sphere of operation as New England folktales "lodged in print." Recognizing printed sources—memoirs, journals, local histories, newspapers, and other ephemera—as important sources and transmitters of popular tradition, Professor Dorson has located and organized a substantial corpus of New England folktale literature without resorting to oral sources. After an introductory chapter on the background of the New England storytelling tradition, the tales themselves are presented, with analytical and historical commentary, under the general headings of "Supernatural Stories," "Yankee Yarns," "Tall Tales," and "Local Legends." The last chapter, "Literary Folktales," observes that "a fertile folklore eventually infiltrates into and nourishes creative writings." Folkloristic influences and usages in the works of such New England writers as John G. C. Brainard, John Greenleaf Whittier, Daniel P. Thompson, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Robert P. Tristram Coffin, and Walter Hard are treated at length.

5535. Dorson, Richard M., ed. Negro folktales in Michigan. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1956. 245 p. illus. 56–6516 GR103.D6

This book, the first collection and study of Negro folklore in the North, provides the editor with the opportunity to examine in detail the survival of rural Southern Negro traditions in urban areas of the North. Professor Dorson found that his best storytellers tended to be those with more immediate Southern connections, for the faster pace of the new society takes its toll. In the words of one of the storytellers, a hard-working and increasingly successful resident of Benton Harbor, Arkansas-born and Missouri-bred: "I haven't told any tales since I left Missouri; no time for it up here." After introductory chapters which describe the towns visited in southern and central Michigan, the informants, and their storytelling art, 165 stories which Professor Dorson collected on paper or on tape recordings are presented. The classifications are: "Animal and Bird Stories"; tales about "Old Marster" and his crafty slave, John; tales about the colored man; "Horrors"; "Hoodoos and Two-Heads"; "Spirits and Hants"; "Witches and Wonders"; "The Lord and the Devil"; "Preachers"; "Liars and Irishmen"; and "Fairy Tales." The informants and the tale types and motifs are indexed, and there are detailed comparative notes.

5536. Duke University, Durham, N. C. Library. Frank C. Brown Collection of North Carolina Folklore. The Frank C. Brown Collection of North Carolina Folklore; the folklore of North Carolina, collected by Dr. Frank C. Brown during the years 1912 to 1943, in collaboration with the North Carolina Folklore Society. General editor: Newman Ivey White. Wood engravings by Clare Leighton. Durham, N. C., Duke University, 1952–57. 4 v. illus. (Duke University publications) 52–10967 GR110.N8D8

The immense quantity of folklore materials which the late Frank C. Brown (1870–1943) collected in North Carolina during more than thirty years, in collaboration with the North Carolina Folklore Society, is the source for this largest of all publications of American folklore, a memorial to Professor Brown. Under the general editorship of the late Professor White, who died in 1948, and of Paull F. Baum, and with a staff of 9 associate editors who cover the many fields represented, first 5 and then 7 volumes were planned: 1, "Games and Rhymes, Beliefs and Customs, Riddles, Proverbs, Speech, Tales and Legends"; 2, "Folk Ballads"; 3, "Folk Songs"; 4, "The Music of the Ballads"; 5, "The Music of the Folk Songs"; 6 and 7, "Superstitions." The last three have yet to appear. All of the materials published are given as they were collected from the folk tradition, and are accompanied by detailed documentation as to sources and history and by bibliographical references. All of the materials are indexed for reference use. Professor White's "General Introduction" discusses the meaning and significance of folklore; describes the surprising extent to which ancient custom survives in 20th-century urban society; traces the history of folklore scholarship; and goes on to explain the "History, Nature, and Growth" of the Brown collection. Further introductions by the associate editors open volumes 2 and 4, and the six parts of volume 1.

5537. Espinosa, José Manuel. Spanish folk-tales from New Mexico. New York, American Folklore Society, Stechert and Co., agents, 1937. xix, 222 p. (Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, v. 30) 38–9815 GR1.A5, v. 30

"Printed in Germany."

Bibliography: p. [187]–188.

Despite the change in New Mexico's government and economy when it became a part of the United States, in much of the State the old Spanish culture has remained unchanged. Moreover, the author tells us, many of the traditions of Old-World Spain are better preserved here than in the Spanish-American countries to the South, where Indians have exercised a greater influence. The present collection prints an assortment of 114 tales, taken down from the informants word for word, in the language in which the compiler heard them. There has been no attempt to employ phonetic notation, but the author has reproduced the authentic dialect and grammar in standard Spanish orthography. The subject classifications of the tales are: magic tales, religious tales, picaresque tales, romantic tales, short tales and anecdotes, and animal tales. The author's bibliographical notes are accompanied by English summaries of all the tales. This first detailed scholarly study of the area now has a newer and larger companion in Juan Bautista Rael's Cuentos Españoles de Colorado y Nuevo Méjico (Stanford, Calif., Stanford University Press, 1957. 2 v.). Like his predecessor, Mr. Rael gives his 518 tales in the original language, with introduction, notes, and summaries in English.

5538. Fife, Austin, and Alta (Stephens) Fife. Saints of sage & saddle; folklore among the Mormons. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1956. 367 p. illus. 56–11997 BX8611.F5

Isolated from outside influences by geographical and social distance, and bound together by their common faith, the followers of the prophet Joseph Smith were in a position to develop a folklore uniquely their own throughout the past century. Seeking the "authenticity not of history but of folklore," the authors reexamine many of the legends, customs, tales, and songs which grew up among the Mormons. Among the early Mormon leaders who assumed the stature of folk hero was the colorful cowboy-preacher, J. Golden Kimball, and a large number of traditional "J. Golden yarns" are included in the Fifes' chapter on "The Golden Legend." Tales, some humorous and some full of pathos and tragedy, are recorded, covering a wide range of subjects: the Saints' early persecution in the East and Middle West, their dealings with Indians, the establishment of their great city in the desert, and plural wives. The many songs of the Mormon folk, which sympathetically interpret their theology and history, are dealt with in several chapters and at particular length in the epilogue: "Lyre of the Lord's Anointed." Among other aspects of Mormon folklore described are pioneer arts and crafts, illustrated by photographs.

5539. Gardner, Emelyn Elizabeth. Folklore from the Schoharie hills, New York. Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1937. xv, 351 p. illus. 37-7981 GR110.N7G3

Bibliography: p. 322-331.

Only some 40 miles west of Albany, and 150 miles from New York City, in Schoharie County, the author found a region whose isolation from modern life and wealth in ancient folklore were comparable to the remotest parts of the Southern Appalachians or the Ozarks. Beginning in 1912 with the collection of traditional ballads, Miss Gardner went on to discover a varied body of folklore which included, in addition to songs and ballads, legends, witchcraft, ghost stories, folk tales, children's rhymes and games, riddles, and superstitions. The folk-tale tradition was found to be particularly rich, as appears in the hundred pages devoted to it. After a general description of the people and her experiences in getting acquainted with them, the author details at some length the history and topography of the region, the ethnic backgrounds of the inhabitants, and social conditions at the time of her study.

5540. Johnson, Guy Benton. Folk culture on St. Helena Island, South Carolina. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1930. 183 p. ([University of North Carolina. Social study series]) 30-32135 E185.93.S7J67

Bibliography: p. 174-179.

The Sea Islands, just off the coasts of South Carolina and Georgia, have retained a rather distinct Negro culture which has been studied at some length by anthropologists, sociologists, and folklorists. Other important folklore studies and collections are Elsie Clews Parsons' Folk-Lore of the Sea Islands, South Carolina (Cambridge, Mass., 1923. xxx, 219 p. Memoirs of the American Folk-lore Society, v. 16), Nicholas Ballanta's Saint Helena Island Spirituals (New York, Schirmer, 1925. xviii, 93 p.), and Lydia Parrish's Slave Songs of the Georgia Sea Islands (New York, Creative Age Press, 1942. xxxi, 256 p.). The present study is one of a series jointly sponsored by the Institute for Research in Social Science of the University of North Carolina and the Social Science Research Council, which includes Thomas J. Woofter's Black Yeomanry (New York, Holt, 1930. 291 p.) and which deals to a large extent with the customs, folkways, and mores of St. Helena. Dr. Johnson's study takes three other branches of St. Helena folklore and examines them in detail. The first is the dialect of the Negroes of the area, Gullah, that singular English dialect known for its incomprehensibility to English-speaking outsiders. Dr. Johnson traces the cultural background of Gullah and describes its pronunciation and structure. Folk songs, with particular emphasis on spirituals, are dealt with in the second chapter. Here, as in the language, the author finds a greater kinship with the white American tradition than with Africa. Folk tales, riddles, proverbs, toasts, rhymes, games, and beliefs conclude this detailed study.

5541. Kittredge, George Lyman. The old farmer and his almanack; being some observations on life and manners in New England a hundred years ago, suggested by reading the earlier numbers of Mr. Robert B. Thomas's Farmer's Almanack, together with extracts curious, instructive, and entertaining, as well as a variety of miscellaneous matter. Boston, W. Ware, 1904. xiv, 403 p. 4-37129 F5.K62

Reasoning that nothing, with the possible exception of a newspaper, "is more strictly contemporary than an almanac," the great American literary scholar and teacher, Professor Kittredge of Harvard (1860-1941), undertook a careful study of the celebrated Farmer's Almanack as a means of gaining a personal, contemporary, and unembellished glimpse of life in New England at the end of the 18th century and through much of the 19th. Established in 1792 by Robert B. Thomas (1766-1846), it was compiled by him at West Boylston in the heart of Massachusetts, until he died while reading proof for the 1847 issue. While intended primarily as a guide for the planting and harvesting of crops based on astronomical calculations, the almanac became much more. The "new, useful, and entertaining matter," which included general news items, proverbs, anecdotes, and what today's newspapers call "household hints," helped to keep volumes of the Farmer's Almanack on countless New England bookshelves, beside the Bible and Pilgrim's Progress. For the social historian, and even more for the folklorist, it is a treasured source of popular riddles, customs, anecdotes, folk cures, superstitions, plant and animal lore, and tales. Professor Kittredge's work first sketches the life of the Almanack's founder, and then proceeds to describe the Almanack's views on a wealth of subjects, with many extended quotations and facsimiles of the original illustrations. As Kittredge says in his introduction, "the temptation to go farther afield has been irresistible," resulting in fascinating historical discourses on witchcraft (a subject further developed in his Witchcraft in Old and New England (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1929. 641 p.)), astrology, the calendar, and many specific beliefs and superstitions.

5542. Masterson, James R. Tall tales of Arkansaw. Boston, Chapman & Grimes, 1943. 443 p. illus. 43–6036 PS266.A8M3

In arriving at a theory of Arkansas humor, Dr. Masterson finds that, like most American frontier humor, it manifests itself in boisterous wit, heavy satire, and tall talk, devoted to the themes of laziness, ignorance, squalor, illiteracy, boasting, drinking, fornicating, and other rough-and-ready pastimes from the half-horse, half-alligator tradition. This analysis, the subject of the present book's last chapter, is based on the large collection of tall tales and anecdotes which occupy the preceding 20. The author's study of Arkansas tall talk goes back as far as a pair of 18th-century French captains who sent home some highly imaginative accounts of their experiences among the Akanças Indians, and the slightly later tales of Arkansas pioneer life recounted by Davy Crockett. The great line of Arkansas humorists goes back to Colonel Charles F. M. Noland and Major Thomas Bangs Thorpe, whose contributions to William T. Porter's Spirit of the Times, under the pseudonyms "Pete Whetstone" and "Tom Owen the Bee-Hunter," receive much of Dr. Masterson's attention. Other memorable chapters deal with "The Arkansas Traveler," the state's infamously slow trains, and a classic political oration in rebuttal of an attempt to change the name of Arkansas. The notes (p. 306–395) and bibliography (p. 396–425) are on a monumental scale.

5543. Randolph, Vance. Ozark superstitions. New York, Columbia University Press, 1947. 367 p. 47–3899 GR110.A8R3

Bibliography: p. [341]–351.

The author introduces this collection with a refutation of the city dweller's notion of the "hillbilly" as a "simple child of nature whose inmost thoughts and motivations may be read at a glance." On the contrary, "the hillman is secretive and sensitive" and "his mind moves in a tremendously involved system of signs and omens and esoteric auguries." Mr. Randolph deals with this complex system according to the various subjects and functions of the superstitions in the rural society, among them, weather signs, witches, cures, courtship and marriage, childbirth, ghosts, and death. Largely of British stock and descended from pioneers who came from the Southern Appalachians, the Ozark people are found to retain many of the Anglo-American traditions familiar to students of Southeastern folklore. To these customs have been added a very few from American Indian lore, such as the sprinkling of cornmeal into a coffin before burial.

5544. Randolph, Vance. We always lie to strangers; tall tales from the Ozarks. Illustrated by Glen Rounds. New York, Columbia University Press, 1951. 309 p. 51–10537 PS558.A8R3

Bibliography: p. [273]–294.

Confounding an outlander with a string of whoppers is not at all the same thing as lying, in the view of an Ozark taleteller. Mr. Randolph says that the real storytellers, whom he has known as their good friend and neighbor, are a singularly honest and dependable group. Tall tales are something else again, to be regarded as a prize form of entertainment, particularly when a credulous "furriner" is about. At such times it becomes a point of honor among the Ozark folk to support the contentions of one's fellows with encouragement, affirmation, and even a little embellishment. Mr. Randolph has heard many tall tales in the Ozarks and has recorded them diligently and accurately, preserving the true regional flavor. The yarns selected for this collection have to do with razorback hogs and other "fabulous monsters," prodigious crops, hunting, supermen, and the weather. The large index includes names and subjects, and the bibliography, also large, is extensively annotated.

5545. Randolph, Vance. Who blowed up the church house? and other Ozark folk tales. New York, Columbia University Press, 1952. 232 p. 52–4469 GR110.M77R3

After completing his book of tall tales, We Always Lie to Strangers (no. 5544) this indefatigable collector of Ozark lore set about publishing a series devoted to the longer tales of the Ozarks. The title entered above was followed by two more from the same publisher: The Devil's Pretty Daughter (1955. 239 p.) and The Talking Turtle (1957. 226 p.). Mr. Randolph's method in gathering his stories has been to establish them carefully, either with the aid of a recording machine, the shorthand transcriptions of an assistant, or his own notes. Pointing to the greater freedom a storyteller takes in his narrative, the collector has not attempted the strictly verbatim repetition desirable in the publication of songs and rhymes. The changes are minor, however, and the idiom is retained in all its freshness. Other changes—literary coloring, the composition of versions from different sources, and so forth—are not indulged in at all. These books do much to bridge the gap between the needs of the professional folklorist and the layman. The stories themselves, regardless of their careful documentation, are good for plenty of laughs, and it may be mentioned that Mr. Randolph has provided a large amount of authentic material for radio comedians and comic strips. Valuable to students and scholars are the detailed comparative notes citing European and American parallels on each of the tales by Dr. Herbert Halpert. All three volumes are illustrated by Glen Rounds.

5546. Roberts, Leonard W., ed. South from Hell-fer-Sartin; Kentucky mountain folk tales. Lexington, University of Kentucky Press, 1955. 287 p. 55–7002 GR110.K4R6

The 105 tales in this collection, many of them with one or more variants, were collected by the author in the hill country of eastern Kentucky. This isolated, strongly Anglo-American folk culture yielded many tales with familiar Old-World analogues. Some have close counterparts in the collections of Grimm, and there are a number of the popular "Jack Tales." Arranged according to the Aarne-Thompson classification, the book is divided into "Animal Tales," "Ordinary Tales," "Jokes and Anecdotes," and "Myths and Local Legends." Significantly, there is only one animal tale, because of the relative scarcity in the area of Negroes, in whose folklore animals play a more important role. The author collected most of the tales with the aid of a tape recorder, which insured the accuracy of his transcriptions. Appendixes give the sources of each tale and list motif numbers.

5547. Sale, John B. The tree named John. With twenty-two silhouettes by Joseph Cranston Jones. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1929. 151 p. illus. 29–20773 GR103.S3

The tree named John was an elm. Aunt Betsey had selected it as the name tree for her mistress' newborn grandson because the tall straight sapling was tough, an early budder, and a fast grower—good omens for the child's future. This book tells the story of the child's rearing, in which Aunt Betsey, assisted by the other plantation Negroes, played a most important part. In describing his childhood and youth on a Mississippi plantation around the turn of the century, the author describes many of the folkways of the Negroes he knew: superstitions, proverbs, religion, and tales—including some of the animal tales popularized in Joel Chandler Harris' Uncle Remus stories.

5548. Thompson, Harold W. Body, boots & britches. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1940. 530 p. 40–2174 F120.T55

The title is a Dutchess County expression roughly corresponding to "lock, stock and barrel." While Professor Thompson denies that any one volume could sum up the lore and legendry of New York State, "body, boots and britches," his book is a big step in that direction. The legendary figures of New York come from a wide range of ethnic and occupational groups, and include pirates, Indian fighters, outlaws, sailors, whalers, "canawlers," soldiers, and many others. Some of these tales and heroes have found their way into American letters, among the latter Tom Quick, Tim Murphy, Nat Foster, and Nick Stoner, "Injun fighters" all, whose exploits, real and legendary, probably influenced Cooper's "Leatherstocking." David Harum, too, has his traditional New York State counterpart in David Hannum, celebrated "hoss trader" and perpetrator of the still-remembered Cardiff Giant hoax. Ballads, proverbs, place names, tall tales, and other pieces of New York State lore also form a part of the author's panorama. He has not forgotten the interests of scholars and has been careful to list the sources, printed and oral, from which he and his students have drawn. His informal presentation and humorous style make this book unsually attractive to readers.

C. Folksongs and Ballads: General

5549. Buchanan, Annabel (Morris), ed. Folk hyms of America. New York, Fischer, 1938. xl, 94 p. 38–39313 M2117.B912F6

Fischer edition, no. 7375.

Bibliography: p. xxxv-xl.

Except for the efforts of a few scholars like George Pullen Jackson (nos. 5554–5555 and 5577), religious American folksongs have yet to be accorded the scholarly and popular attention which their secular counterparts have received. This collection of 50 folk-hymns with piano accompaniment is well suited to popular use and makes a useful supplement to the more academic collections and studies of Professor Jackson. The hymns themselves are preceded by a sketch of the background of American folk hymnody, and are provided with historical and analytical notes. The old modal tunes, many of them traceable to secular British ballads and songs, are music of great beauty, and the texts, some from the pens of known authors like Charles Wesley and Isaac Watts and some traditional, are an impressive evidence of the religious convictions of our pioneers. The piano arrangements are smooth and polished, but simple enough (mostly in four-part chorale style) to fit the simple eloquence of the verses and melodies.

5550. Coffin, Tristram P. The British traditional ballad in North America. Philadelphia, American Folklore Society, 1950. xvi, 188 p. (Publications of the American Folklore Society. Bibliographical series, v. 2) 51–1318 ML3553.C6

Bibliography: p. 171–181.

An important part of American folk music has its roots in the British Isles, and for some 70 years a major field of scholarly investigation has been the British ballad, or narrative song. A great many books and articles have been devoted to more specific definitions and accounts of the Anglo-American ballad. The great American work on British balladry, around which subsequent studies have oriented themselves, is Francis James Child's The English and Scottish Popular Ballads (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1883–98. 5 v.), which has recently undergone a modern reprinting by photographic process (New York, Folklore Press, 1956. 5 v. in 3.). A one-volume abridgment, edited by Helen Child Sargent and George Lyman Kittredge and first issued in 1904, is also available (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, ©1932. xxxi, 729 p.). Since Child's time numerous books and collections have been published which discuss and give evidence of British ballads in all the English-speaking parts of the world. Two recent American collections which compare ballads of the Old and New Worlds are MacEdward Leach's The Ballad Book (New York, Harper, 1955. 842 p.) and Albert B. Friedman's The Viking Book of Folk Ballads of the English-Speaking World (New York, Viking Press, 1956. xxxv, 473 p.). These books, as has been customary with modern ballad scholarship, include ballads of British origin which are not contained in Child's collection, as well as a large number of native American ballads. The present work is primarily a bibliographical key to Child ballad scholarship in America. Its greatest value is, Mr. Coffin points out on his introduction, as a research aid to the ballad scholar, "particularly the student of ballad variation." "A Critical, Bibliographical Study of the Traditional Ballad in America" (p. 29–162), in addition to comprehensive references, provides summaries of the principal "story types," and discussions of pertinent problems and theories arising out of each ballad. An introductory essay describes variation in traditional ballads, both with respect to altered words and phrases, which Mr. Coffin calls "textual variation," and to major extensions, abbreviations, or alterations in the basic plot, which he calls "story change." Also included is the author's index to borrowing in the Child ballads which was previously published in The Journal of American Folklore; it traces the movement of lines and stanzas from one ballad to another.

5551. Doerflinger, William Main, comp. Shantymen and shantyboys; songs of the sailor and lumberman. New York, Macmillan, 1951. xxiii, 374 p. illus. 51–577 M1977.S2D57

Music editors: Samuel P. Bayard, Hally Wood, and Joseph Wood.

Bibliography: p. 363–371.

Despite their opposed elements, the shantyman of the sailing vessels and the shantyboy of the lumber camps have a great deal in common. Both lived lives of hard physical work and, far from civilization and its pleasures, both were forced to provide their own entertainment in off hours. Moreover, technological advances have condemned the vocations and traditions of both to a progressive extinction which is now virtually complete. By faithfully recording the recollections of the last of the oldtime sailors and lumbermen and adding his own historical commentary, Mr. Doerflinger has compiled a book which is as entertaining as it is authentic. The sea shanty is a functional song used to set and maintain the pace of group tasks on board ship. The author organizes his chapters on the shanty according to function, giving many examples of the short-haul, halyard, and capstan shanties. Ballads and other songs sung for entertainment in the forecastle round out the nautical portion of the collection. The shantyboy's name comes not from a work song but from his log huts or shanties. The songs and ballads used for lumber camp entertainment originated in Maine and the Maritime Provinces of Canada, and eventually spread to the Great Lakes, the Northwest coast, and wherever the jacks went to work the big woods. For both groups unaccompanied tunes and complete texts, often in more than one version, are given in a well-documented and accurate form. The illustrations are plentiful and the detailed plan of a square-rigger is especially helpful.

5552. Greenway, John. American folksongs of protest. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1953. 348 p. 53–6929 ML3551.G7

"Musical transcriptions [unacc. melodies] by Edmund F. Soule."

"Songs of social and economic protest on records": p. 311–327.

Bibliography: p. 329–338.

An interesting aspect of American history is reflected in this study of songs of social and political unrest. The Knights of Labor, the Pullman strike of 1893, Coxey's Army, the I. W. W., the Negro's struggles before and after emancipation, and many other social movements and events are represented in the large collection of topical songs which Mr. Greenway has assembled. Topical songs with political and social "messages" have never had a very secure position in the folk repertory. A few songs left over from political campaigns and labor movements have caught on and been preserved in the oral tradition, but for the most part such songs rarely live long after the events which produced them. It is probable that many of the songs in this collection were contrived by fairly sophisticated intellects, and it is doubtful whether most of these got much closer to the folk than the printed song sheets and books distributed at meetings and rallies. Since oral perpetuation is implicit in the usual concept of folk music, some readers will feel that "American Songs of Protest," omitting any invocation of the folk tradition, would have been a more appropriate title. In his introduction, Mr. Greenway advances what is probably the best possible argument on behalf of protest songs as folklore. Those who find it unconvincing can still regard these songs and Mr. Greenway's contribution as of genuine importance to the study of American social history.

5553. Ives, Burl, comp. The Burl Ives songbook; American song in historical perspective. Illus. by Lamartine Le Goullon and Robert J. Lee. New York, Ballantine Books, 1953. 303 p.
M53–555 M1629.I9B8

"List of Burl Ives recordings": p. 297–300.

This handsome collection of songs with piano accompaniments and guitar chords will be popular for years to come among all who enjoy singing for the fun of it. As the subtitle implies, the contents are arranged in a roughly historical order, with chapters for the following epochs: "Colonial America, 1620–1775"; "Revolutionary America, 1775–1790"; "The Growing Country: On the Sea, 1790–1850"; "Religious, Professional and Folk Singing, 1800–1850"; and "The Frontiers of America, 1800–1850." Included are many of the most popular Anglo-American ballads and lyric songs—"Barbara Allen," "Edward," "The Golden Vanity," "The Fox," and "Paper of Pins," to name a few—as well as such native products as "Springfield Mountain," "Careless Love," and "The Grey Goose." To round out the historical perspective, there are a few songs not strictly in the folk tradition, but popular in their time and since. Among them are William Billings' hymn "Chester," Francis Hopkinson's "My Days Have Been So Wondrous Free," and Henry Clay Work's "Grandfather's Clock." The Burl Ives Songbook makes no claim to scholarly accuracy or completeness. The commentary is not very useful for study and the texts and melodies have been freely altered to suit the editor's taste. What it does is to present, in a highly singable form, some of the favorite songs of America's most popular ballad singer, as he sings them. The piano arrangements were made by Albert M. Hague. Mr. Ives' Wayfaring Stranger (New York, Whittlesey House, 1948. 253 p.), an anecdotal autobiography, describes his Illinois childhood (he was born in 1909) and his struggles as a music student and art-singer before he achieved success with the songs of his own family's traditional heritage. His description of life in a rural Midwestern community is especially entertaining and colorful.

5554. Jackson, George Pullen, ed. Spiritual folksongs of early America; two hundred and fifty tunes and texts with an introd. and notes. [2d ed.] Locust Valley, N. Y., J. J. Augustin, 1953. 254 p. illus. M53–861 M1629.J147S85 1953

Bibliography: p. [241]–244.

Originally published in 1937, this was the first of three valuable collections of white spirituals prepared by Professor Jackson. The others are Down-East Spirituals and Others, 2d ed. (Locust Valley, N. Y., J. J. Augustin, 1953. 296 p.), the first edition of which appeared in 1943, and Another Sheaf of White Spirituals (Gainesville, University of Florida Press, 1952. 233 p.). The three volumes bring a total of more than 900 religious folksongs and their unaccompanied melodies into print. The material is organized into three types of sacred vocal music: religious ballads, folk-hymns, and revival spiritual songs. The first group is comprised of narrative solo songs, many of which, like "The Cherry Tree Carol" and "Dives and Lazarus," come from ancient British tradition. The folk-hymns are largely congregational songs of praise, while the revival spiritual songs are what the author describes as "sung-to-pieces hymns," a fragmentary type of congregational song which evolved a simple repetitive form well suited to the revivalist camp meetings on the 19th century frontier. Within each of the three groups, the songs are arranged according to the modal and melodic kinship of their tunes.

5555. Jackson, George Pullen. White and Negro spirituals, their life span and kinship, tracing 200 years of untrammeled song making and singing among our country folk, with 116 songs as sung by both races. New York, J. J. Augustin, 1944. 349 p. illus. 44–3923 ML3551.J17

For many years the spiritual has commonly been regarded as an exclusively Negro form of musical expression of purely African lineage. The lifelong studies of the late George Pullen Jackson (1874–1953) have contributed immeasurably to a reassessment of this concept. The aim of this work is to demonstrate the Negro's debt to the hymnody of white pioneer America. The book is divided into two large parts, the first of which traces the development of congregational singing practices among the Methodists, Baptists, Shakers, and the many religious sects, large and small, which appeared on America's frontiers. The second part analyzes the body of Negro religious folksong in relation to the white tradition and describes many textual, melodic, and rhythmic peculiarities of the Negro variants of white spirituals. The most convincing evidence for Professor Jackson's thesis is massed together in Chapter XV, "The Tune Comparative List," which presents 116 white melodies side by side with their Negro counterparts.

5556. Laws, George Malcolm. Native American balladry; a descriptive study and a bibliographical syllabus. Philadelphia, American Folklore Society, 1950. 276 p. (Publications of the American Folklore Society. Bibliographical series, v. 1) 51–1319 ML3551.L3

Bibliography: p. 267–270.

The classic folk-ballads which our early settlers brought from the British Isles have always overshadowed the narrative songs which originated on this side of the Atlantic, in the eyes of collectors and scholars and even of the folk themselves. Mr. Laws' catalog of native American ballads still current in the oral tradition clearly shows that the indigenous product, while secondary, nevertheless constitutes a notable portion of the living folk tradition. His text puts forward a general definition of the ballad as dramatic narrative and continues with chapters on several aspects of American ballads, including the American "ballad makers," about whom much more is known than about their early British counterparts, and some pertinent remarks on the ballad as a record of fact. The classified catalog of American ballads in the appendices makes Mr. Laws' book a valuable reference tool. The first appendix lists the ballads still to be found in oral tradition and gives brief summaries, a stanza or two of text, extensive bibliographical references, and notes on history and distribution. The ballads have been classified, according to topics and functions, in nine categories: "War Ballads," "Ballads of Cowboys and Pioneers," "Ballads of Lumberjacks," "Ballads of Sailors," "Ballads about Criminals and Outlaws," "Murder Ballads," "Ballads of Tragedies and Disasters," "Ballads on Various Topics," and "Ballads of the Negro." The second appendix gives a similar treatment to ballads about whose currency the author is doubtful. There follow lists of traditional songs which, for want of strong narrative elements or for other reasons, fail to qualify as ballads, and lists of songs of probable Old-World origin. Together with T. P. Coffin's The British Traditional Ballad in North America (no. 5550) and Mr. Laws' American Balladry from British Broadsides (Philadelphia, American Folklore Society, 1957. 315 p. Publications of the . . . Society. Bibliographical and special series, v. 8), this work completes a general bibliographical survey of living American balladry undertaken by the American Folklore Society.

5557. Lomax, John A. Adventures of a ballad hunter. Sketches by Ken Chamberlain. New York, Macmillan, 1947. 302 p.

47–30155 ML429.U68A3

John Avery Lomax (1872–1948) began to collect and study the traditional songs of America's frontier in his youth during the closing decades of the last century—long before most Americans regarded their folk music and literature as of any importance. On the advice of one of his professors, the disillusioned young Lomax destroyed his first collection of cowboy song and ballad texts as worthless. It was not until Lomax went to Harvard and attracted the attention of Barrett Wendell and George Lyman Kittredge that his efforts were recognized. The rest of his life was devoted to gathering songs from Western prairies and saloons, Southern fields and prison camps, and many other areas of America. His extensive collection became the nucleus of the Archive of Folk Song in the Library of Congress. Adventures of a Ballad Hunter is only secondarily an autobiography; primarily it is a record of Lomax's many years' experience as a collector of folk music. Huddie "Leadbelly" Ledbetter, James "Iron Head" Baker, Dock Reed, and Vera Hall are a few of the folk-singing personalities whom Lomax discovered and who appear in its pages. It is written in an informal style which makes it attractive to general readers as well as to students who wish to benefit from the author's experience in the field.

5558. Lomax, John A., comp. American ballads and folk songs, collected and compiled by John A. Lomax and Alan Lomax; with a foreword by George Lyman Kittredge. New York, Macmillan, 1935. xxxix, 625 p.

38–9495 M1629.L85A52

Bibliography compiled by Harold W. Thompson: p. 613–621.

The nearly 300 pieces in this popular collection (originally published in 1934) represent a wide variety of spirituals, white and Negro, as well as a large assortment of ballads; lyric and social songs; songs of the cowboy, lumberman, sailor, and miner; and the Negro's work songs, hollers, and blues. A few venture beyond the English language, being samples of Creole Negro and Spanish-American lyrics. The principal source is the oral tradition itself, from which the Lomaxes made sound recordings, but a few of the songs are taken from other published collections. For the sake of completeness the editors have made up some of the texts by putting together stanzas from more than one source. The tunes, transcribed by Mary E. Gresham, are presented without instrumental arrangements or harmonizations. An important complementary collection by the same authors is Our Singing Country; a Second Volume of American Ballads and Folk Songs (New York, Macmillan, 1941. xxxiv, 416 p.). Here the topics are approximately the same as in the earlier volume, with the addition of some unusual items such as Negro songs from the Bahamas, French songs and ballads from southwestern Louisiana, and instrumental dance tunes. The tunes for the later book were transcribed by Mrs. Ruth Crawford Seeger, who supplies a noteworthy introduction on the principles of authentic transcription and performance.

677676 O–63–52

5559. Lomax, John A., comp. Best loved American folk songs (Folk song: U.S.A.) Collected, adapted, and arr. by John A. Lomax & Alan Lomax. Music arrangements by Charles Seeger & Ruth Seeger. [4th ed.] New York, Grosset & Dunlap, 1954, ©1947. xvi, 407 p.
M54–2021 M1629.L85F6 1954

First published in 1947 under the title Folk Song: U. S. A., this collection has since enjoyed a steady popularity. Intended as an album for singing, Best Loved American Folk Songs differs from the authors' earlier collections by the inclusion of piano accompaniments and a somewhat larger format. John Lomax and his son Alan selected what they considered the 111 best American folksongs. The categories into which they are divided are songs of children and animals, lovers, dancers, soldiers, sailors, lumbermen and pioneers, cowboys, farmers, railroadmen, bad men and jailbirds, and spirituals. The emphasis is strongly on native American materials rather than imported British or foreign-language songs. Mr. and Mrs. Seeger have arranged the music for voice and piano, with guitar symbols, in a simple folk-like style. Songs as well as sections are provided with informative introductions.

5560. Lomax, John A., comp. Cowboy songs and other frontier ballads. Rev. and enl. Collected by John A. Lomax and Alan Lomax. Edward N. Waters, music editor. New York, Macmillan, 1945. xxxviii, 431 p.
46–1145 PS595.C6L6 1945
M1629.L85C7 1945

The first edition of John Lomax's Cowboy Songs appeared in 1910. Since then it has undergone a number of printings and, in the present revised form, remains an indispensable source on the songs of the West. "Home on the Range," "The Buffalo Skinners," and "The Dreary Black Hills" are a few of the songs which this historic collection first brought to public attention. The improvements in the present edition are many. There are nearly twice as many songs. The rather haphazard arrangement of the first edition has been replaced by a subject-function classification with such headings as "Up the Train," "The Round-Up," "Dodge City, the End of the Trail," and "Campfire and Bunkhouse." The former practice of supplying piano accompaniment for the few melodies has been discarded by the music editor, Edward N. Waters, in favor of printing the melodies unaccompanied. This accomplishes the twofold purpose of allowing space for more music and freeing the songs from arbitrary harmonic confines.

5561. Odum, Howard W., and Guy B. Johnson. The Negro and his songs; a study of typical Negro songs in the South. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1925. 306 p.
25–13744 ML3556.O3

This study is one of a series on the story of the American Negro, which also includes the same authors' Negro Workaday Songs (1926. 278 p.) and Newbell Niles Puckett's Folk Beliefs of the Southern Negro (1926. xiv, 644 p.), both from the same publisher. The Negro and His Songs studies the Negro singer and his religious, social, and work songs. The song texts and the Negro's attitude toward them are analyzed with particular emphasis on their sociological significance. No music is included, but there are texts of more than two hundred songs, and an index to them.

5562. Sandburg, Carl, ed. The American songbag. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1927. xxiii, 495 p. illus.
28–681 M1629.S213A5

"An American bookshelf of song": p. xii–xiii.

In his introduction, Carl Sandburg calls this collection "a ragbag of strips, stripes, and streaks of color." This assemblage of "280 songs, ballads, ditties, brought together from all regions of America," was for the benefit of everyone who enjoys singing and, even though 30 years and many other similar collections have come and gone since it first appeared, The American Songbag is still foremost in the affections of those who sing for relaxation and delight. All manner of songs are included; there are the ancient "Tarnished Love Tales": "Barbara Allen," "Pretty Polly," and "The Maid Freed from the Gallows"; several musical installments of the saga of "Frankie and Her Man"; the shape-note hymns from The Missouri Harmony; and the "Darned Fool Ditties"; "The Horse Named Bill" and "Abdul, the Bulbul Ameer." Soldiers and sailors, lumbermen and railroad men, convicts and hobos, and many more groups have contributed to the making of The American Songbag. The piano arrangements have been made by a number of different musicians in varying styles, while a few of the songs are appropriately left unaccompanied.

5563. Seeger, Ruth (Crawford) American folk songs for children in home, school and nursery school; a book for children, parents and teachers. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1948. 190 p.
48–9384 M1629.S4A5

Both as a mother and a teacher, the late Ruth Crawford Seeger had a great deal of firsthand experience in using folk music in the development and education of young children. More concerned with such applications than with folklore research, Mrs. Seeger's detailed notes discuss the use of the songs at home and in school, and include suggestions for improvised games and the playing of the piano accompaniments. The songs come both from previously published collections and directly from the oral tradition. They are indexed not only by first line and title, but by subject (birds, food, snow, sunshine, etc.) and rhythmic applications (clapping, running, skipping, etc.). Both this collection and two supplementary ones, Animal Folk Songs for Children (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1950. 80 p.), and American Folk Songs for Christmas (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1953. 80 p.), are illustrated with woodcuts by Barbara Cooney, and arranged with simple and idiomatic piano accompaniments by Mrs. Seeger. The three collections have become popular with adults as well as children.

5564. White, Newman I. American Negro folksongs. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1928. 501 p. 28–21279 ML3556.W4
Bibliography: p. [469]–480.

The large number of song texts and documentary notes make this one of the most useful works on Afro-American folksong. The first chapter outlines the history of Negro music in America, with special emphasis on the changing attitudes of the white man, as well as the Negro, toward the music. Although there have been many significant contributions to Negro folksong scholarship since 1928, the late Professor White's summary of the several views obtaining up to that time is still a concise and pertinent introduction to the subject. In the controversy over ancestral African versus Christian white influences, the author tends to favor the side of New World assimilation later championed by George Pullen Jackson (no. 5554), and takes issue with the racial views earlier set forth by Henry Edward Krehbiel in his important study, Afro-American Folksongs (New York, Schirmer, 1914. 176 p.). The songs and commentary are arranged according to function ("Religious Songs," "Social Songs," "Work Songs"), and subject matter ("Songs about Women," "Songs about Animals," "Recent Events," "The Seamier Side"), with a few special categories reflecting social trends ("The Reaction from Religion," "Race Consciousness"). White's main concern was with the texts of the songs, and his conclusions are based on the literary rather than the musical aspects of the songs. The appendixes include 15 tunes, however, in addition to some interesting specimens of Negro folksong texts from pre-Civil War sources.

D. Folksongs and Ballads: Local

5565. Arnold, Byron, comp. Folksongs of Alabama. University, Ala., University of Alabama Press, 1950. 193 p.
50–14684 M1629.A77F6
Bibliography: p. 187–188.

Mr. Arnold collected the 153 songs in this book from Alabama singers during the summer of 1945. In his introduction and notes the editor describes a relatively current oral song tradition, whose richness is well proved by the songs themselves. Unlike most folksong collections, which group the songs in historical perspective or classify them according to plot or function, the present work focuses its attention on the singers. Mr. Arnold treats each singer individually, sketching his background and, in many cases, including a photograph. He follows with a selection from the singer's repertory, in the order in which they were sung to him. By this method not only the informants, but the social characteristics of this folk-song-producing area, are clearly outlined. The wide diversity in social, economic, and educational status represented by the singers is noteworthy. The songs, for all of which tunes are provided, represent some of the most widespread ballads of British and native origin, together with a sampling of standard play-party songs and Negro spirituals.

5566. Barry, Phillips, Fannie Hardy Eckstorm, and Mary Winslow Smyth. British ballads from Maine; the development of popular songs with texts and airs; versions of ballads included in Professor F. J. Child's collection. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1929. xlvi, 535 p.

29–20553 ML3553.B28
PR1181.B48

Phillips Barry (1880–1937) was one of the earliest and most learned pioneers in American folksong scholarship. Although most of his work centered around the British ballad in New England, the many articles he contributed to periodicals such as the Journal of American Folklore, the Bulletin of the Folk-Song Society of the Northeast (of which he was founder and editor), and the Southern Folklore Quarterly, cover a wide range of investigation. He never wrote a general book on American folk music, but some of his articles provided the material for such a work after his death. Edited by Dr. George Herzog and Herbert Halpert, Barry's Folk Music in America (New York, U. S. Works Progress Administration, Federal Theatre Project, 1939. 113 p.) was distributed in mimeographed form and, despite its comparative rarity today, remains a much-used work of scholarly theory and reference. Fifty-six Child ballads, with variants, make up the major portion of British Ballads from Maine, which Barry prepared with collaborators. In addition to these, there are eight ballads which the editors describe as "secondary"—distinct ballads related to or derived from Child ballads (see no. 5550 note). "Traces" or vestiges of some ballads in the memory of the region's inhabitants, with "jury texts" supplied by the editors, are separated from the more or less complete ballads actually collected, and placed in the final section of the book. The notes, which are both historical and analytical, are informative and detailed. Most of the melodies were transcribed by Dr. George Herzog. Barry's introductory essay discusses the music of the ballads, with attention to such stylistic features of ballad melody as mode and structure.

5567. Beck, Earl Clifton. Lore of the lumber camps. [Rev. and enl. ed. Ann Arbor] University of Michigan Press, 1948. 348 p. illus. (University of Michigan studies and publications)

49–7123 M1977.L8B4 1948

Bibliography: p. 343–344.

For the greater part of the 19th century, the Michigan woods were the center of America's logging industry. In the 1830's, 40's, and 50's, lumbermen took part in the general Westward migration and brought to the forests around the Great Lakes the songs, legends, and traditions of the New England lumber woods. The present book is a revised enlargement of Dr. Beck's Songs of the Michigan Lumberjacks (1941), but the emphasis is still on songs and on Michigan. Of the 118 songs and ballads which describe the work, the leisure, the tragedy, and the humor of the lumberman's life, 23 are provided with music. The final chapter recounts some of the jacks' favorite tall tales, including several redoubtable exploits of Paul Bunyan. The literature on lumberjack songs is small; Franz L. Rickaby's earlier Ballads and Songs of the Shantyboy (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1926. xli, 244 p.) and Phillips Barry's The Maine Woods Songster (Cambridge, Powell Print. Co., 1939. 102 p.) supplement Dr. Beck's Michigan collection. An introduction on the history of Michigan's lumber industry, concise descriptive headnotes for each song, and a profusion of photographs and drawings of log brands add considerably to the book's usefulness.

5568. Belden, Henry Marvin, ed. Ballads and songs collected by the Missouri Folklore Society. [2d ed. Columbia, University of Missouri] 1955. xx, 532 p. (University of Missouri studies, v. 15, no. 1)

55–7519 ML3551.B35B26 1955

5569. Randolph, Vance, ed. Ozark folksongs, collected and edited by Vance Randolph; edited for the State Historical Society of Missouri, by Floyd C. Shoemaker [and] Frances G. Emberson. Columbia, State Historical Society of Missouri, 1946–50. 4 v. illus.

47–1554 M1629.R2309

Bibliography: p. xvi-xx.

In collaboration with the Missouri Folk-Lore Society, the late Professor Belden (1865–1954) and his pupils began collecting the material represented in the first title in 1903. The result of many years of field work and transcription is one of the most valuable of the scholarly collections devoted to a specific region. The book was originally published in 1940; the second edition incorporates a few corrections and additions which Belden had made in his personal copy. More than 300 songs were found in all parts of Missouri, representing a wide variety of traditions. As has become customary, the first part of the collection is devoted to Missouri versions of the Child ballads (see no. 5550 note), and the next to other ballads of British origin. The later journalistic ballads, topical songs, and other indigenous items are treated at length, and children's games and play-party songs, religious songs, and a few songs imported into southeastern Missouri from France round out the geographical and stylistic representation. Professor Belden was primarily concerned with texts, but realized the vital role of music in the ballads and included some tunes which had been transcribed by his students. Vance Randolph's Ozark Folksongs complements Belden's volume with an exhaustive collection from the highlands of Missouri and Arkansas. Containing 883 songs in 1644 versions, 828 of which are given with unaccompanied melodies, these four impressive volumes prove to be the largest of all published American folksong collections, regional or general. Concerned with ballads and songs of British origin, the first volume prints the Ozark versions of 41 Child ballads and of 89 later importations. The succeeding volumes deal with native songs and ballads of the West, the Civil War, and the Negro, and temperance songs, game and play-party songs, and religious songs. A general introductory chapter in the first volume prescribes effective procedures in the technique and diplomacy of field collecting, a topic on which the author is a high-ranking expert. Substantial headnotes to the songs supply general background and bibliography. The last volume concludes with indexes of titles, first lines, towns, and contributors.

5570. Botkin, Benjamin A. The American play-party song, with a collection of Oklahoma texts and tunes. Lincoln, Neb., 1937. 400 p.
38–1348 GV1771.B58 1937

Thesis (Ph. D.)-University of Nebraska, 1931.

Published also as the University Studies of the University of Nebraska, vol. 37, no. 1–4.

Bibliography: p. 383–389.

The play-party is a completely American term designating a peculiarly American institution. In the preface Dr. Botkin points out that although dance-songs are well-nigh universal, there is nothing quite like the play-party outside of America. Several factors went into its making. Fiddles, fifes, and other musical instruments were often scarce items on the American frontier, so that dance music had to be provided by the dancers' own voices. True dancing, however, was taboo because of the religious beliefs of many of the pioneers. The simple rhythmic stepping, skipping, running, and jumping patterns of the play-party provided a vigorous sort of recreation which took the place of dancing. The first half of The American Play-Party Song is a detailed historical and stylistic analysis. Dr. Botkin carefully traces the play-party's connection with game, song, and dance, and points out the improvisatory elements of the texts, which intermingle snatches from traditional ballads and songs with incongruous bits of square-dance calls, spontaneous jingles, and nonsense syllables. Part two is devoted to 128 play-party song texts, 62 of them with tunes. Dr. Botkin gathered his material in Oklahoma, but his findings and examples have nationwide application and significance. The notes accompanying the songs and their variants give full data on the informants, directions for playing the games, and bibliographical references. Tunes, titles, first lines, subjects, and authorities are meticulously indexed, making this a valuable reference book as well as a definitive study of a neglected aspect of American folk recreation.

5571. Brewster, Paul G., ed. Ballads and songs of Indiana. Bloomington, Indiana University, 1940. 376 p. (Indiana University publication. Folklore series, 1) 40–28299 PS571.I6B7 ML3551.B83B2

Bibliography: p. 16–21.

Although Mr. Brewster observes that "ballad-singing, as an active tradition, is practically non-existent in Indiana," this collection from one of America's less isolated regions indicates that considerable vestiges of such a tradition have survived. Of the 100 pieces the first 27 are Child ballads (see no. 5550 note), with numerous variants. The other types included are later ballads and lyric songs, of both British and native origin, game songs, and a carol—"The Twelve Days of Christmas." Most of Mr. Brewster's collecting was done in the southern part of the State, and all of the songs are from white, Anglo-Saxon tradition. There are 37 unaccompanied tunes.

5572. Cox, John Harrington, ed. Folk-songs of the South, collected under the auspices of the West Virginia Folk-Lore Society. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1925. xxxi, 545 p.
25–4180 PS551.C6 ML3561.C8

Although the title and much of the material in the collection apply to the South in general, this collection is focused upon West Virginia, where Dr. Cox was a professor. The introduction describes the formation of the West Virginia Folk-Lore Society and its collecting activities preparatory to the publication of this book. About 35 of the 185 songs are Child ballads (see no. 5550 note). These figures do not take into account the numerous versions of many songs and ballads which are included. Miss Lydia I. Hinkel of West Virginia University edited the 29 tunes which are appended to the collection (p. 519–532). Photographs of many of the informants are included which, together with some introductory remarks about them, allow us to see the ballad-singers of the area as real persons.

5573. Eddy, Mary O., comp. Ballads and songs from Ohio. Introd. by James Holly Hanford. New York, J. J. Augustin, 1939. xxvii, 330 p. 39–25130 M1629.E24B2

Bibliography: p. xxv–xxvii.

For the most part this collection is based on an intensive study of a relatively small area of northeastern Ohio. The author collected the songs and ballads from oral and manuscript sources in her hometown of Perrysville, Ashland County, and in Canton, Stark County. In the light of the geographical limitation, the collection is remarkably large and varied. The various ethnic groups which settled the area are discussed in the preface, which also briefly outlines the history of the region. The proportion of British ballads is large, including particularly good versions of "Lamkin" (ballad 93 in Child's collection) and "The Bramble Briar." Still more unusual are the early native American topical ballads, "Major Andrew's Execution," about the death of Major John André during the American Revolution, and two local ballads recording Indian battles of the 1780's and 90's: "A Song on the Death of Colonel Crafford" and "On the Eighth Day of November." The more recent lyric songs include a good selection of Irish imports. There are 153 songs in the collection, most of them with melodies. Professor Hanford's introduction discusses folksong in general terms and briefly traces its study from Bishop Percy, in the 18th century, to John A. Lomax and other collectors of our own day.

5574. Flanders, Helen (Hartness), and Marguerite Olney, comps. Ballads migrant in New England. With an introd. by Robert Frost. New York, Farrar, Straus & Young, 1953. xiv, 248 p. M53–552 M1629.F58B3

The rich store of ballads from Vermont and other New England States now preserved in the Helen Hartness Flanders Collection at Middlebury College has provided material for a number of valuable books by Mrs. Flanders and, more recently, for recordings as well. Several factors make the present collection distinctive. More than half of the contents are Child ballads (see no. 5550 note), and there are some unusual ones. "Babylon," "The Bonny Earl of Murray," "Adam Gorman," and two Robin Hood ballads have been reported in the United States rarely or never. There are, moreover, local ballads such as "Kingston Jail" which are seldom found elsewhere. Mrs. Flanders describes the arrangement of the book as a "vagantes" procedure, with the songs ordered much as the collectors found them instead of according to Child numbers, etc. In this way, the collectors' experience of acquiring the material here and there, with indirection and interruption, is in a measure imparted to the reader. The occasional commentary, with elements of historical background and personal association, also helps the reader "to share vicariously the excitement of ballad-hunting." In keeping with a book designed for general reading rather than scholarly reference, the documentation and bibliographical notes are minimal. The melodies were transcribed by Miss Olney who shared in the original collecting. A brief introduction by Robert Frost describes in poetic fashion the nature of oral tradition.

5575. Gardner, Emelyn Elizabeth, and Geraldine Jencks Chickering, eds. Ballads and songs of southern Michigan. Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1939. xviii, 501 p. illus. 39–28434 M1629.G23B18

Bibliography: p. 491–494.

The 201 songs and ballads in this collection were culled from 7 Michigan counties over a period of about 25 years. The material is organized according to subject: "Unhappy Love," "Happy Love," "War," "Occupations" (where the Michigan lumberjacks figure prominently), "Disasters," "Crimes," "Religion," "Humor," and "The Nursery." Within each category the songs are arranged in a more or less chronological order, with the Child ballads (see no. 5550 note) at the beginning of each section. Melodies are provided for about a fourth of the collection, and the headnotes give historical and collecting data. The titles of other songs which the collectors found in Michigan are appended, with sources (p. 477–483). The volume's general attractiveness is enhanced by line drawings of rural Midwestern scenes.

5576. Hudson, Arthur Palmer. Folksongs of Mississippi and their background. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1936. 321 p. 36–23296 ML3551.H81936 PS571.M7H8

As its title implies, Professor Hudson's collection devotes much attention to a study of the peoples and backgrounds which have preserved the white folk-music tradition in Mississippi. The first quarter of the book, specifically concerned with backgrounds, asserts the predominance of British and Irish groups, a thesis which is borne out by the clear British-Isles lineage of the collected songs. Finding three social and economic levels among the first Mississippi immigrants, Professor Hudson credits both the planter aristocrats and the humble tillers of the poorest soil with a knowledge and love of the traditional ballads of their common heritage, but reserves for the middle group, the small landholders, the greatest share in the importation and perpetuation of the tradition. The songs themselves include imported folksongs, with a rich supply of Child (see no. 5550 note) ballad variants; native American songs, subdivided according to regional origins and subject matter; and a miscellaneous group of comic, nursery, play-party, and game songs. Financial limitation prevented the publishers from printing the tunes which Dr. Hudson collected with the song texts, but, with the editorial assistance of Dr. George Herzog and Herbert Halpert, they were later published in a mimeographed volume, Folk Tunes from Mississippi (New York, U. S. Works Progress Administration, Federal Theatre Project, 1937. 45, xxii l.).

5577. Jackson, George Pullen. White spirituals in the Southern uplands; the story of the fasola folk, their songs, singing, and "buckwheat notes." Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1933. xv, 444 p. illus. 33-3792 ML3551.J2

Bibliography: p. 434–436; "List of song books in the four-shape notation": p. [25]; "Important seven-shape song books . . . 1832 . . . [to] 1878": p. 323; "Southern musical periodicals": p. 389.

The part-singing movement in colonial New England gave rise to a tradition of religious song which lasted through the 19th century and which, in a few rural areas, still continues. This, the first of Professor Jackson's many studies of the subject, tells how the singing movement evolved its characteristic "buckwheat" notation system, with differently shaped noteheads representing different pitches, and ultimately moved from the urban centers to the young Republic's Western frontiers—down the Shenandoah Valley and across the Appalachians. The book gives a large number of song texts and tunes, but differs from Jackson's other white spiritual books in that it is primarily a history rather than a collection. Folk tradition though it was, the white spiritual was perpetuated not only by word of mouth, but by the many songbooks, published in various systems of "buckwheat" notes, which were used by many in the Southern Highlands. Some of the most celebrated and enduring songbooks were "Singin' Billy" Walker's Southern Harmony (1843), and B. F. White and E. J. King's The Sacred Harp (1844), both in the old "fasola," four-shaped notation; and the Harp of Columbia, which W. H. and M. L. Swan published in 1848, employing the city-influenced seven-shaped system. The numerous books of this sort, and the men who made them, form a significant part of Dr. Jackson's history. The melodies are analyzed in detail, and classification according to tune, text, and function is discussed. A chapter on the Negro spiritual compares texts and melodies from the white and Negro traditions and outlines the problems which the author was later to treat at length in his White and Negro Spirituals (no. 5555).

5578. Korson, George G., ed. Minstrels of the mine patch; songs and stories of the anthracite industry. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1938. 322 p.

39–958 PS508.M5K6
M1629.K84M5

Bibliography: p. 321–325.

In the introduction to this book, Mr. Korson tells of his first experiences with the traditional song literature of the Pennsylvania anthracite miners, and his surprise at finding that it was an area of folk music which, unlike the songs of lumbermen, cowboys, and sailors, had gone virtually unnoticed. Songs and Ballads of the Anthracite Miner (New York, F. H. Hitchcock, 1927. xxviii, 196 p.) was his first attempt to rectify this situation. Mr. Korson has gone on to publish other books on the songs of the American coalminers and has thereby opened a whole important field of study in American folklore. Minstrels of the Mine Patch is a greatly enlarged edition of the earlier book of anthracite miners' songs. The "mine patch" of the title is the small village of shacks which grew up on the mining site, around a "breaker," the building in which anthracite is processed. The earliest miners having been Irish, Welsh, Scottish, or English immigrants, Mr. Korson found that a majority of their songs were in the English language, with a particularly strong Irish element in the musical style. He also found effects of the later Slavic immigrations. In addition to the songs and ballads, for which a few tunes are included, the author relates many tales, legends, and superstitions of the miners, and describes disasters, strikes, and the notorious exploits of the "Molly Maguires," all of which figure importantly in the miners' songs and lore. The appendixes give biographical sketches of the singers and, many of the ballads having been of known authorship, the creators of the miners' songs, together with a glossary of technical terms and jargon. Mr. Korson went on to produce a complementary study: Coal Dust on the Fiddle; Songs and Stories of the Bituminous Industry (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1943. xvi, 460 p.), which is considerably larger in its geographical scope. Whereas the anthracite industry is centralized in a small area of Pennsylvania, Mr. Korson's search for material on the bituminous industry took him to Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Alabama, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia as well as his home State. As in the anthracite study, the author here combines the songs, tales, and superstitions of the miners with an absorbing account of the history of the bituminous mine-worker in America. Once again the tragic lives of the miners, mine disasters, and labor-management troubles figure importantly in Mr. Korson's account and in the songs. Thirteen of the songs appear with tunes, as transcribed by Ruth Crawford Seeger.

5579. Korson, George G., ed. Pennsylvania songs and legends. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1949. 474 p. illus.
49–9849 ML3551.K85

The variety of ethnic and occupational groups comprising Pennsylvania's population make the State something of a microcosm of the United States as a whole, and this book a summing up of many aspects of American folklore. After the initial English colonization, the 18th-century immigrants included peoples from other parts of the British Isles and from Northern and Western Europe, including a large body of Germans—the so-called "Pennsylvania Dutch." The editor's introduction describes these early groups and the later immigrants from Southern and Eastern Europe, emphasizing the contributions each has made to the Pennsylvania folk tradition. The essays which follow are detailed studies of 13 specialized phases of Pennsylvania folksong and lore, each by a notable authority on the subject. Several ethnic groups are examined, including the area's aboriginal inhabitants, whose descendants still retain their identity and ancient lore. The legends and tales of several groups are presented, as well as their songs. The occupational groups included are the Conestoga wagoners, canallers, railroaders, lumberjacks and raftsmen, coalminers, and oilmen. The industrial songs of Pittsburgh bring the occupational studies up to the present time. The chapters dealing with music have numerous song texts and airs.

5580. Linscott, Eloise Hubbard, ed. Folk songs of old New England. New York, Macmillan, 1939. xxi, 337 p.
40–27042 M1629.L64F7

"References": p. 319–337.

Many familiar British and American ballads and lyric songs, as well as some which are less familiar, are given in this large collection of New England songs and tunes, but it is in the area of country dance tunes and game songs that Miss Linscott's book offers the greatest amount of fresh material. The words and music are accompanied by descriptions of how the games and dances are executed. Some of these are to be found in other local collections, but many appear to be rare outside of New England. In addition to these a fourth section deals with popular sea shanties and fo'castle songs. The headnotes for each song or tune detail the author's sources and give some historic background. Nearly 200 tunes are included, most of them arranged with piano accompaniment. The appendixes include biographical data on Miss Linscott's singers, fiddlers, and dance-callers.

5581. Morris, Alton Chester, ed. Folksongs of Florida. Musical transcriptions by Leonhard Deutsch. Gainesville, University of Florida Press, 1950. xvi, 464 p. illus.
50–9048 M1629.M858

Bibliography: p. 451–457.

Following a procedure similar to A. P. Hudson's in his Folksongs of Mississippi (no. 5576), Professor Morris prefaces this State collection with a valuable study of the social, cultural, and folkloristic history of the region. The first section, "Songs of the New World," includes a number of unique local items such as "The West Palm Beach Storm" and the "Miami Hairikin." The cowboy and lumberjack songs, however, must have traveled long distances before reaching Florida. A large number of English and Scottish ballads, both in and out of the Child canon, are represented in "Songs of the Old World." A special rarity, never previously reported in the United States, is "Lord Derwentwater" (ballad 208 in Child's collection), called by Professor Morris' informant "The King's Love Letter." Bahaman versions of British songs, a Negro rowing song, and an American Indian version of a white hymn are a few of the other items of special interest. Condensed from Professor Morris' doctoral dissertation, Folksongs of Florida is still a large and comprehensive collection, totaling 243 songs plus variants. A number of unaccompanied tunes are included.

5582. Scarborough, Dorothy. A song catcher in Southern mountains; American folk songs of British ancestry. New York, Columbia University Press, 1937. xvi, 476 p. illus.
37–4992 M1629.S29S6

On one of Dorothy Scarborough's trips into the Blue Ridge, a young mountain boy recommended a friend as a good source of local ballads: "He's a song catcher, he is." The term applied so well to Miss Scarborough and her quest that she adopted it and employed it in the title of this book. A Song Catcher in Southern Mountains was nearly finished at the time of Miss Scarborough's death in 1935, and was prepared for publication by John H. H. Lyon and Vernon Loggins. The first part describes collecting experiences in the Blue Ridge Mountains, Buchanan County, Virginia, and western North Carolina. These colorful background chapters form an attractive introduction to the Anglo-American ballads and songs which occupy the major part of the book. Appended to the collected ballad texts are unaccompanied tunes and a discussion of the modal aspects of the music. Miss Scarborough's last work does for the people of the Southern Appalachians what her On the Trail of Negro Folk-Songs (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1925. 289 p.) had done with the secular songs of Southern Negroes.

5583. Sharp, Cecil J., comp. English folk songs from the Southern Appalachians; comprising two hundred and seventy-three songs and ballads with nine hundred and sixty-eight tunes, including thirty-nine tunes contributed by Olive Dame Campbell. Edited by Maud Karpeles. London, Oxford University Press, H. Milford, 1932. 2 v. 33-3796 M1629.S53E6 1932

Bibliography: v. 1, p. 427-430; v. 2, p. 402-405.

At a time when the ballad and other forms of folk music were considered the domain of students of literature, ethnology, and folklore, Cecil Sharp (1859-1924) began a more musically oriented approach to the subject. With careful attention to the transcription of the melodies, Sharp first covered his native England and the rest of the British Isles, and then followed the British songs across the Atlantic. With the assistance of Miss Maud Karpeles, who took down the words while he notated the music, Sharp spent parts of 1916, 1917, and 1918 studying the British traditional songs preserved by the mountain people of the Southeastern United States. In addition to the material gathered by Sharp and Karpeles, English Folk Songs from the Southern Appalachians prints 39 tunes, with texts, which Olive Dame Campbell had collected in the region between 1907 and 1910. First published as a single volume in 1917, the collection was reissued in its present enlarged form after Sharp's death, but still based on his transcriptions. It was reprinted in 1952, with an additional prefatory note by Miss Karpeles describing the changes she had observed in the area during a 1951 field trip. The first volume contains ballads, and the second songs, hymns, nursery songs, jigs, and play-party games. Both the editor's preface and Sharp's introduction give special attention to the stylistic characteristics of the melodies, which are printed with the song texts. The introduction also gives a general description of the region and the ethnic background of its inhabitants.

5584. Thomas, Jeannette (Bell). Ballad makin' in the mountains of Kentucky, by Jean Thomas; with music arr. by Walter Kob. New York, Holt, 1939. xviii, 270 p. 39-31805 ML3551.T4B2

Miss Jean Thomas has spent her life among the people of the Kentucky highlands, and has brought much of their music before the public by means of her books and the annual folk festivals held at her rustic cabin near Ashland. Known to her Kentucky neighbors as "the traipsin' woman," Miss Thomas traveled throughout the area both as a circuit judge's stenographer and as a ballad collector. Emphasizing the native ballads of recent origin, Ballad Makin' describes the hill people who still compose ballads and the events which inspired their compositions. The chapters deal with the ballads and their makers according to subject matter: feuds, which the hill people usually call "troubles" or "wars"; chanteys, composed by ballad makers who have never even seen a large river; war, flood and fire; the railroad; "stillin' and drinkin' "; "killin' "; laments and farewells; and "hymn makin'." The ballad makers and ballad subjects are illustrated by photographs and the songs are printed in simple piano arrangements.

E. Games and Dances

5585. Brewster, Paul G. American nonsinging games. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1953. 218 p. illus. 53-5476 GV1203.B68

Students of folklore have long collected and studied the traditional games of children as significant vestiges of ancient beliefs, customs, and rituals. The author points out, however, that most collectors have emphasized singing games to the near exclusion of those in which music figures slightly or not at all. This large collection of nonsinging games is an important step toward supplying the earlier omissions. In an effort to make his material useful to teachers and recreation leaders, as well as to folklorists, Mr. Brewster separates his description of each game from his ethnic and historical analyses, bibliographical notes, and other scholarly apparatus. The games, which he gathered from students and friends, and other non-literary sources, are presented in 14 general categories, including "Guessing Games," "Forfeit Games," "Hiding Games," "Ball Games," "Paper and Pencil Games," and "Courtship Games." Many variants are included for the rope-jumping, ball-bouncing, and other games, such as hopscotch, nine versions of which are given.

5586. Chase, Richard, comp. Hullabaloo, and other singing folk games. Illus. by Joshua Tolford. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1949. 57 p.
49–8127 GV1771.C5

Mr. Chase's foreword states that the "golden age" for singing games falls between the years of eight and eleven. The games and play-parties in this collection seem to be directed toward children in this group, but teen-agers in some areas continue to find them of recreational value. The games involve simple group steps and dramatic action, taken from the traditional Midwestern play-parties, and employ popular play-party songs which direct the action of the group as it sings them. Many of the games, such as "Goin' to Boston," "Pawpaw Patch," and "Three Dukes," are still popular in some parts of the country, while others, "The Allee Allee O," recently collected in New England, and the ancient British "Roman Soldiers," are seldom heard. Mr. Chase's language and diagrams will be easily understood by youngsters, and the tunes, six of which are given piano settings by Hilton Rufty, are in a simple singing style.

5587. Mayo, Margot. The American square dance. Illus. by Selma Gorlin. [Rev. and enl.] New York, Sentinel Books, 1948. 119 p.
48–8015 GV1763.M3 1948

Bibliography: p. 116–[120].

Miss Mayo's American Square Dance Group in New York has for many years been an important factor in the renewed urban interest in American folk dancing. Her handbook is designed to give useful hints to other organizations and individuals wishing to join in an increasingly popular form of recreation. The term "square dance" is used here not to describe a particular form, but is applied to American folk dances in general, including square sets, quadrilles, longway sets, running sets, play-party games, and round dances, each of which is described. After some further hints on the music, calling, and the general planning of a square-dance party, 13 dances are described and their direction indicated with the aid of illustrations. Also included are an illustrated glossary of square-dancing terms, 10 tunes in piano arrangements (p. 96–104), and suggestions for "Dancing to Recorded Music" (p. 106–114).

5588. Newell, William Wells. Games and songs of American children. New and enl. ed. New York, Harper, 1903. xv, 282 p.
3–29283 GV1203.N54 M1993.N49

"Collections of children's games": p. [267]–269. "Comparisons and references": p. 270–282.

Although the first edition of this collection appeared as long ago as 1883, it is still generally recognized as the standard source on the immense subject of the folklore of children's games in America. An introductory chapter describes the rhyme and chant formulas which characterize a large part of children's game lore, compares them with the ballad and the dance, and speculates on their origins, which in many cases are quite ancient, and their diffusion in the Old and New Worlds. The author also took into account the children themselves, contrasting their resourcefulness in invention with their conservatism in the retention of old traditions: "The formulas of play are as Scripture, of which no jot or title is to be repealed." For these reasons, in the absence of excessive organization by adults, the game traditions of children are of particular interest to students of strictly orally transmitted custom. Mr. Newell's 15 basic chapters group the games according to subject, function, and type of activity. Among them are "Love-Games," "Histories," "The Pleasures of Motion," and "Ball, and Similar Sports." Counting-out rhymes, the chants used to determine who will be "it" at the beginning of a game, are also accorded a generous chapter. In addition to quoting the rhymes, describing the play, and, in many cases, providing the music for 190 games, Dr. Newell's text makes some comments upon the games' distribution here and abroad, and on their origins. Added to this edition is a final chapter of miscellaneous additional games and variants, and a Preface offering further suggestions on the Old-World origins of American games, making particular reference to this book's British counterpart, Lady Alice Gomme's The Traditional Games of England, Scotland, and Ireland (London, D. Nutt, 1894–98. 2 v.).

5589. Putney, Cornelia F. Square dance U. S. A. Musical arrangements by Jessie B. Flood; historical background and descriptive material by Cornelia F. Putney. Dubuque, Iowa, W. C. Brown, 1955. 110 p. 55–4642 GV1763.P8

The square-dance revival, which continues to grow in many parts of the country, has a continual need for practical books offering new dances and tunes, together with instructions on the fundamentals of calling, playing, and execution. Although there are some general historical notes by Prof. Louise Pound and by the author, this book, conveniently published in a spiral binding, is meant for application rather than study. There are hints for the musicians, the callers, and the program planners, followed by a wide selection of dances and tunes, some new and some traditional. Singing calls, which have been popular in some parts of the country for many years, are also included, with their music. All of the music is given in simple piano arrangements. A final section is devoted to accounts of recent developments in the square-dance revival in several parts of the country.

5590. Ryan, Grace L., comp. Dances of our pioneers. Music arrangement by Robert T. Benford; illus. by Brooks Emerson. New York, A. S. Barnes, 1939. 196 p.
39-27508 M1629.R95 1939

The characteristic American quadrille whose four-sided formation gives it the name of square dance remains the favorite among the dances of our pioneers, and so bulks greatly in this collection as in most others. Nevertheless, there are other group-dance forms, notably the contra and circle dances and, of course, the couple dances, which have long enjoyed great popularity, particularly in the Eastern States. These too play their part in this popular book of instruction, which was originally published in 1926. Among the contra dances are a variety of reels and hornpipes, and the circles include the popular hybrid Sicilian Circle and Paul Jones. Some of the couple dances outlined are schottisches, polkas, and waltzes. The directions are made plain by drawings and diagrams, and an introductory chapter defines the standard terms. There are over two dozen tunes, in piano arrangements, and the directions frequently cite appropriate calls.

5591. Shaw, Lloyd. Cowboy dances, a collection of Western square dances; with a foreword by Sherwood Anderson. Appendix, cowboy dance tunes arr. by Frederick Knorr. Rev. ed. Caldwell, Idaho, Caxton Printers, 1949. 417 p.
49-4858 GV1767.S5 1949

"Phonograph records": p. [395]-413.

Lloyd Shaw has long been an active performer and teacher of American country dancing and a student of its history as well. Both aspects of his experience are evident in this book on the folk dances of the West. As in most recent books on the square dance, practical considerations figure importantly, and many square-dance enthusiasts will benefit from the descriptions of 75 dances, some with several variants, which are included and illustrated by diagrams and by photographs of Mr. Shaw's popular cowboy-dance troupe. There is also much historical and ethnic analysis. The first chapter traces the distinctive Western square dances back through the Kentucky running sets and the New England quadrilles, eventually to European ancestors. Further notes observe the natural evolution and adaptation which have characterized the unique cowboy-dance forms, just as the Old World names, Polka and Varsovienne, became "Pokey" and "Varsity Anna." In a companion volume, The Round Dance Book (Caldwell, Idaho, Caxton Printers, 1948. 443 p.), Mr. Shaw has made a similar practical and historical examination of other American folk dances, including polkas, waltzes, schottisches, and circle mixers.

5592. Withers, Carl, comp. A rocket in my pocket, the rhymes and chants of young Americans. Illus. by Susanne Suba. [New York] Holt, 1948. 214 p. illus. 48-4881 PZ8.3.W76Ro

This selection of varied rhymes and chants, taken from the folklore of modern American children, is designed primarily for the children themselves, but Mr. Withers points out in his postscript that adults too will find them entertaining and instructive. From the first ("Silence in the courtroom!/The monkey wants to speak") to the last ("If this book should chance to roam,/Box its ears and send it home"), virtually all of this children's lore was collected directly from or verified in the oral tradition. The 14 chapters include popular rhymes for ball-bouncing, rope-jumping, and counting-out. Among the mental exercises and tricks in which children find constant delight are tongue twisters, spelling rhymes, riddles, and finger-plays. Although no music is provided, a few are meant to be sung ("The Bear Went Over the Mountain," "The Green Grass Grows All Around"), but most of the items are in the rhyme and chant categories. Mr. Withers has appended a brief note explaining his procedure in gathering the material, suggesting ways in which it might be used, and stressing the value of children's folklore to educators, sociologists, and child psychologists. The contents are indexed, but for children's rather than for scholars' use; there is no bibliography or list of sources.

F. Folk Art and Crafts

5593. Bolton, Ethel (Stanwood), and Eva (Johnston) Coe. American sampler. [Boston] Massachusetts Society of the Colonial Dames of America, 1921. 416 p. 21-18488 NK9112.B6

This monumental treatise was promoted by Mrs. Barrett Wendell and the Massachusetts Society of Colonial Dames in order to record the domestic virtues of our ancestors, and to supply the lack of publications on early American needlework, of which the sampler was "the primary basis and training school." It covers the period from the earliest settlements to 1830, after which year samplers declined rapidly in quality and quantity. The examples were obtained primarily from New England, but other state societies, especially the New Jersey Dames, lent their assistance so that other regions could be represented. The earliest mention of a sampler is in an English account book of 1502, and by 1630 it was a well-established form, a longitudinal pattern book in cloth in which the housewife worked specimens of such designs as she wished to use in her incessant needlework, "practically the only relaxation of most women." The earliest American samplers that have survived seem to be quite as old as their English counterparts. By the 18th century the sampler had become transformed into a square or horizontal display piece with elaborate design and lettering demonstrating the girl's or young lady's proficiency. Here the general description of each period is followed by a register of existing samplers, listed alphabetically by their makers and with their 1921 owners named. Separate plates illustrate 126 of them, but only the dozen colored plates begin to do justice to their subjects. There are also a 100-page anthology of sampler verse; an enumeration of early girls' schools in which needlework was taught; a much too brief section on "Materials, Designs, Stitches"; and a special treatment of "Embroidered Heraldry," not all specimens of which are genuine samplers.

5594. Christensen, Erwin O. The Index of American design. Introd. by Holger Cahill. New York, Macmillan, 1950. xviii, 229 p. 378 illus. (part col.) 50–10215 NK1403.C5

Bibliography: p. 219–221.

The complete "Index of American Design," whose more than 15,000 documentary paintings are now housed in the National Gallery of Art, was prepared between 1935 and 1942 by the Federal Art Project. The present volume, drawn from that immense collection, covers a great diversity of indigenous folk arts and crafts from the first white settlement to the end of the last century. The water-color illustrations, which show a remarkable realism and accuracy in detail, are accompanied by a historical and comparative commentary by Mr. Christensen. The first section, "Our Wide Land," deals with several minority groups which have made significant contributions to American folk art. These include the Pennsylvania Germans, whose objects of daily use are richly decorated with predominant bird and tulip motifs; the Shakers, whose furniture and utensils show an extreme simplicity of form and perfection of workmanship, together with great ingenuity; and the peoples of the Southwest, who combined Spanish and Indian traditions in their religious objects, furniture, woven baskets, and saddles, spurs, and stirrups. Some of the other arts illustrated and described are ship figureheads, tavern signs and cigarstore Indians, weather vanes and hitching posts, whittling and wood carving, toys, and carrousel horses, and such gadgets as an apple peeler and a fly catcher. The final section, "The Years Pass," makes chronological surveys of lights, lamps, and candlesticks; of costume; and, finally, of the "Symbols of a Nation": the American Eagle, personifications of Liberty and Justice, and portraits of American heroes. This enumeration does not begin to exhaust the contents of an extraordinarily rich volume.

5595. Colonial Williamsburg, inc. The Abby Aldrich Rockefeller folk art collection: a descriptive catalogue by Nina Fletcher Little. [Williamsburg, Va., Published by] Colonial Williamsburg; distributed by Little, Brown, Boston, 1957. xvi, 402 p. 165 col. illus. 57–6251 N6510.C66

Abby Greene Aldrich (1874–1948), the daughter of Senator Nelson W. Aldrich of Rhode Island, married the younger John D. Rockefeller in 1901. In 1929 she was a cofounder of the Museum of Modern Art, and subsequently made many gifts to its collections. In the early 1930's, advised by Edith Gregor Halpert and Holger Cahill, she began to accumulate American folk art, and before long put together the first of the great collections in the field, which was first exhibited as a unit by Colonial Williamsburg in 1935. Most of it was presented to this Rockefeller family foundation in the same year; portions of it which had been given to the Museum of Modern Art and to the Metropolitan Museum were reunited with the main collection after Mrs. Rockefeller's death, and a special building has now been erected to house and exhibit it. The total is 424 pieces in all kinds, of which 165 are here reproduced in fine colored plates printed in England, while the remaining 259 are described in some detail in a catalog (p. 349–382) following the illustrations. Both the illustrations and the catalog are arranged under the following six media categories: "Paintings in Oil"; "Paintings in Watercolor and Pastel"; "Needlework and Painted Textiles"; "Paintings on Glass"; "Fracturs, Calligraphic Drawings, and Engravings"; and "Sculpture in Wood and Metal." Notes on the illustrations are on the facing pages, and the 58 artists whose names are known or surmised are indexed on p. 389–390. The volume is a contribution to the subject as monumental as it is beautiful, and a worthy memorial of the collector. Meanwhile another very remarkable collection, limited to paintings in various media, was put together by Colonel and Mrs. Garbisch. In 1954 a representative group of 300 paintings and 200 miniatures was presented by them to the National Gallery of Art, which has published two installments of American Primitive Paintings from the Collection of Edgar William and Bernice Chrysler Garbisch (Washington, U. S. National Gallery of Art, 1954–57), each reproducing 100 oil paintings in halftone.

5596. Drepperd, Carl W. Pioneer America, its first three centuries. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1949. 311 p. 49–10623 E161.D74

The author illustrates the social history of America, through the 19th century, through its popular arts and crafts. Of particular interest to collectors of antiques, the text outlines the background of pioneer artifacts and tells of their makers. The chapters cover architecture, cooking utensils, firearms, tools, jewelry, toys, pottery, tin, pewter, and silverware, and many other gadgets and frills of early America which the collector of today seeks out. In his introductory chapter Mr. Drepperd underrates his interesting commentary by calling this a picture book, but it is true that the illustrations, mostly black and white drawings, are abundant. Many of the items here described or pictured are properly classified as decorative or industrial rather than folk art, but the latter element is pervasive enough to justify the book's inclusion in this chapter. The same consideration applies to Mr. Drepperd's A Dictionary of American Antiques (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1952. 404 p.), which defines for collectors more than 15,000 terms such as acorn basket, embroidered pictures, persimmon beer, and zephyr moss. Many of the entries are for individual craftsmen or manufacturers, and some, such as those for Chippendale or ironstone, are miniature historical essays. Separate pages are devoted to small drawings, as many as twenty to a page, and there is a brief entry bibliography (p. 398–404).

5597. Ford, Alice E. Pictorial folk art, New England to California. New York, Studio Publications, 1949. 172 p. (An American Studio book) 49–48983 ND205.F65

Bibliography: p. 169–170.

An introduction to American folk art for the general reader, which emphasizes its variety but is not, as the title might suggest, geographical in its structure. There is, to be sure, a section on "Regional Painting and Drawing," which introduces the Shaker "spirit prickings" of the 1840's and 50's and the santos of Spanish New Mexico as well as more familiar fractur and Indian material; but the others are concerned with types such as portraiture, landscape, religious and allegorical painting, and "scrimshaw" incising on whalebone. There is a brief narrative of the "rediscovery" of this art, which Miss Ford dates from the mid-1920's when Mrs. Isabel Carleton Wilde began her collecting, and a postscript on recent or contemporary "primitives": Joseph Pickett, John Kane, Horace Pippin, Grandma Moses, and Clara Williamson. A concluding "Evaluation" protests against the recent tendency to magnify with the name of "abstractionism" what is in fact only the ineptitude of the untutored. The bulk of the book (p. 51–160) is devoted to halftone reproductions which, unfortunately, are regularly too crowded (sometimes four to a page) and too dark.

5598. Gould, Mary Earle. Early American wooden ware & other kitchen utensils. Fully illustrated by the author. Springfield, Mass., Pond-Ekberg Co., 1942. 230 p. 42–18677 E161.G6

The author's collecting specialty is antique wooden utensils and receptacles, handmade in America's colonial period. Her collecting has centered in New England, but familiarity with the woodworker's craft in other colonies has enabled her to make some observations on regional varieties. The early chapters describe the raw materials with which the pioneers worked and the tools they used to fashion their simple utensils. Also discussed are the means of determining the function, locale, and authenticity of various pieces of antique wooden ware. The succeeding chapters describe the utensils themselves: bowls, mortars and pestles, buckets, baskets, and sieves, and how they were made and used. The book is illustrated by nearly 150 photographs.

5599. Lichten, Frances. Folk art of rural Pennsylvania. New York, Scribner, 1946. xiv, 276 p. 47–1192 NK835.P4L5

5600. Stoudt, John J. Pennsylvania folk-art; an interpretation. Allentown, Pa., Schlechter's, 1948. xix, 402 p. 49–855 NK835.P4S7 1948

Bibliography: p. [397]–402.

Miss Lichten's volume is a labor of love throughout, and one of the most thorough and sympathetic studies of a folk art that has been made. The art of the Pennsylvania Dutch, she emphasizes, was the flowering of a peasant culture, for the Germans who came to Penn's province exchanged oppression and poverty for freedom and, in time, a solid prosperity earned by frugality and hard labor. The first half-century of the province had little to show, but by about 1750 the land had been conquered, the log huts of the settlers had been replaced by substantial stone houses most of which are still standing, and decoration of a naive but distinctively original kind was lavished upon all the objects of craftsmanship. The second half of the 18th century was the great age of this folk art; after 1800 designs became simpler and labor less lavish; while after 1850 industrialism destroyed it altogether. In 1891–92 Dr. Edwin Atlee Barber made the finest collection of Pennsylvania decorated ceramics for the Philadelphia Museum, but appreciations of its other achievements had to wait for the antique fever of the 1920's. Miss Lichten, whose authority in the field was developed as supervisor of the Pennsylvania "Index of American Design," arranges her book by the materials upon which the craftsmen worked, beginning with clay, flax, and wool. Of exceptional interest are "The Salvage Arts," which turned textile fragments into quilts, and rags into rugs or into illuminated paper. The illustrations are excellently reproduced, and accompanied by unusually satisfactory explanatory letterpress. The concluding 30 pages reproduce a variety of original designs in their original colors, always gay and often garish. Mr. Stoudt's volume does not approach Miss Lichten's in the quality of its numerous illustrations, but it provides a valuable supplement by relating the images used in decoration to the symbolism of the German Pietistic sects. "The motifs and designs of the folk-art of Eastern Pennsylvania are non-representational expressions of traditional Christian imagery." The rod of Jesse, the rose of Sharon, the dove who is the believer languishing for the Savior, the pelican who is Christ, and the peacock who stands for the Resurrection are among the images identified.

5601. Lipman, Jean (Herzberg). American primitive painting. New York, Oxford University Press, 1942. 158 p. 42–14277 ND205.L5

"Selected bibliography": p. 139–142.

Although American primitive painting is not often regarded by folklorists as a branch of their science, the anonymity of most of the artists and the naiveté of their style lead many observers to regard their work as folk art. In the introduction the author discusses the meaning of the word "primitive" in the history of American art. Antiquity is not an important factor, for the height of the primitive school fell in the middle of the last century. Nor is it determined by prevailing features of the society as a whole. Rather the "primitiveness" of such work lay in the artist's experience and attitudes, and the effect which these had on his productions. The primitive painters, most of whom are unknown by name, were unschooled in the classical sense and developed independently of European tradition. The result is akin to abstraction, for visual qualities are deemphasized in favor of geometric forms, restricted movement, emphasized contour lines, and heightened color-contrast. A group of plates near the beginning of this book effectively demonstrates the differing values of the academic and primitive schools. Except for some historical and analytical notes, the balance of the work is given over to illustrations, some in color: portraits, landscapes, and various kinds of decorations, which show the range of the primitive school. Mrs. Lipman has also published an important volume on our relatively little known folk sculpture: American Folk Art in Wood, Metal and Stone (New York, Pantheon, 1948. 193 p.). Its substance lies principally in its 183 illustrations, a few of which are in color.

5602. New York. Museum of Modern Art. American folk art; the art of the common man in America, 1750–1900. New York, Museum of Modern Art, 1932. 52 p.

32–34218 N6505.N44

Bibliography: p. 47–52.

This illustrated catalog, published in connection with an epoch-making exhibit at the Museum of Modern Art, did much to establish the present vogue of folk art among the art public. It covers the useful and decorative arts in America during the latter part of the 18th and all of the 19th centuries. A substantial introduction by Mr. Holger Cahill (p. 3–28) discusses the relative merits of the terms "primitive," "provincial," and "folk" in describing this type of art, and settles on the last. He suggests that "folk art" best characterizes this kind, made by "the common people," expressing their ideals, and fulfilling their needs. He further describes the historical background of the largely unknown and untutored house painters, sign painters, portrait limners, carpenters, cabinetmakers, shipwrights, wood carvers, stonecutters, metalworkers, blacksmiths, sailors, and all the other artist-artisans whose work is illustrated from the exhibition. There are 175 items in the catalog (p. 29–46) and 172 fine-screen halftone plates.

5603. Pinckney, Pauline A. American figureheads and their carvers. New York, Norton, 1940. 223 p. 32 plates on 16 l. 41–1172 VM308.P5

Bibliography: p. 204–210.

Not only figureheads, but billetheads, stem and stern decorations, and all products of the shipcarver's art are included in this history of American ship sculpture. The chapters, in historical sequence, trace the ancestry of American figureheads through shipcarvings of Egypt, Phoenicia, Rome, Scandinavia, and Western Europe, and then tell what has been discovered about the American carvers and their craft. The masters Simeon and John Skillin of Boston, and the Philadelphia craftsman, William Rush, who made an important contribution to the first American Navy, are studied in particular detail. The author's fullest sources are Navy records, since the merchant fleet, large as it was, is poorly documented for the 18th and 19th centuries. With the advent of ships of iron and steel, figureheads fell into disuse, although some futile efforts were made to adapt metal figures to the new vessels. At the conclusion of her book, the author introduces the few remaining practitioners of an art which has been virtually extinct since the turn of the century. Some drawings and many photographs illustrate extant figureheads and carvings, some in a fine state of preservation, while others were too much "exposed to the hazards of wind and sea and to the blasts of powder and shot."

5604. Robertson, Elizabeth Wells. American quilts. New York, Studio Publications, 1948. 152 p. 48–28158 NK9112.R6

Bibliography: p. 151–152.

"A quilt is anything made of two pieces of material with padding between and held together with stitches." From this bare definition Miss Robertson proceeds to develop the esthetic as well as the utilitarian values, the social connotations, the techniques, and the folklore of quilts. She begins by sketching in the background of frontier society, its development of the quilting party, and the origin out of necessity of techniques and traditions such as the "crazy quilt." Succeeding parts describe the fabrics such as calico, gingham, and percale; their manufacture, dyeing, and printing or painting; and give instruction in the stitches and patterns for the benefit of modern quiltmakers. Part four gives a particularly complete account of the standard designs (birds, flowers, fruits, stars, and many others), their sources, and their nomenclature. Over half the volume (p. 61–150) is given to photographic halftones of specimens the greater part of which are in public museums, with a smaller number drawn from private collections.

XXV

Music

A.	General Histories and Reference Works	5605–5614
B.	Contemporary Surveys and Special Topics	5615–5625
C.	Localities	5626–5630
D.	Religious Music	5631–5634
E.	Popular Music	5635–5640
F.	Jazz	5641–5646
G.	Orchestra and Bands	5647–5654
H.	Opera	5655–5663
I.	Choirs	5664–5667
J.	Music Education	5668–5672
K.	Individual Musicians	5673–5687

IN 1858, two and a half centuries after the first settlement, when Longfellow published The Courtship of Miles Standish, the elder Holmes published The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, Lincoln met Douglas on the hustings of seven Illinois towns, and Theodore Roosevelt was born, no one wrote a book on American music, and if anyone had, it could only have been a thin and shamefaced volume. Of all the great Western traditions, the one which had made the transit to America in the most attenuated or mutilated form was the musical heritage. On the eve of the Civil War there were none too lively survivals in folksong and hymnody, a somewhat desultory concert life in the cities of the Northeastern seaboard, and a rousing welcome for any visiting star with news value, but the only really flourishing musical institution was a strange if delightful domestic hybrid, the minstrel show. Indeed, by 1858, the United States had generated its own antimusical tradition, which is still with us: music had somehow come to be regarded as detracting from the manliness of the American male, and the Yankee style of humor took the professional musician for a figure of fun.

The past century has seen a complete transformation of this picture, gradually at first and then with much acceleration. Its early manifestations were in large measure the effects of the new concentrations of wealth which followed the Civil War: thus during its first 37 years the Boston Symphony Orchestra was maintained by the bounty of one wealthy man. By whatever means, the cultivation of an active concert life has spread from its early centers to every metropolitan area in the country, and the support of a symphony orchestra has become an article of municipal patriotism. After the Civil War the American composer of large-scale music began to make his appearance, at first usually trained in Germany or on German models; latterly eclectic or resolutely nationalist. There has come about a definite stratification of music, which can be roughly indicated by the labels of highbrow (subscription symphony concerts, string quartets, harpsichord recitals, etc.), middlebrow (pop concerts, sophisticated musicals, café singers, etc.), and lowbrow (the Hit Parade, hill-billy); it is the lower two which are the best remunerated. The extraordinary phenomenon of jazz (Section F), which spread out of the Negro quarter of New Orleans in the second decade of this century, and has become America's only large musical export, can and does exist at all three levels. Its relation to the old tradition of "serious" or "classical" music remains uncertain and shifting, but there has been and is much cross-fertilization, the most conspicuous example being the attractive figure of George Gershwin (no. 5678).

Doubtless because of the relative recency of these developments, the literature of American music is rather recent and rather scanty; save in the fields of jazz and singers' autobiographies, the following pages list a quite considerable proportion of it. The titles have been chosen to exhibit American music, and especially music in performance, in close relationship with American society, and to give samples of the varieties of musical experience in America. Section B contains a number of surveys or diagnoses of the musical state of the Nation; nearly all evidence a considerable sense of dissatisfaction. In spite of the tremendous increase in musicians, organizations, and audiences, there is a lingering uneasiness that "serious" music is still something of an exotic, artificially and precariously maintained. In the perspective of a century it is safe to say that difficulties thus reflected spring out of the recent rapid changes in technology, economic life, and society: the musical heritage of the West has been assimilated, coexists in a reasonable relationship with the current of popular musicmaking, and, whatever adaptations of means may prove necessary, is in not the slightest danger of being jettisoned.

A. General Histories and Reference Works

5605. Ewen, David, comp. American composers today, a biographical and critical guide. New York, H. W. Wilson, 1949. 265 p. illus.
49–8927 ML390.E82

Mr. Ewen circulated a questionnaire in gathering the information for this dictionary, and most of the entries are ingeniously fitted together from the words supplied by the composers themselves. At the end of each biography is a list of principal works, recordings if any, and one or more references to other literature. The "American" in the title is hemispheric in scope, and includes, along with approximately 130 composers whose careers have largely unfolded in the United States, several Canadians, 10 Latin Americans (including the late Manuel de Falla), and well over 40 Europeans whose careers were thoroughly established abroad before they came to this country. Although some of this last group have now returned to their original homes, it cannot be denied that those who remained have contributed to the cosmopolitan product that is American music. Mr. Ewen's definition of "today" is similarly broad, since the birthdays of his composers range from 1853 to 1923. This wide stretch has apparently resulted from the dividing line between a pair of similar compilations, earlier in date and international in scope: Composers of Today (New York, H. W. Wilson, 1934. 314 p.) and Composers of Yesterday, issued by the same publisher three years later (488 p.). Users of the present work are referred to the latter for the biographies of such men as Charles T. Griffes and Victor Herbert, even though their music is still very much alive, while a number of lesser talents, dead for as long as 27 years, have been carried over into this newer compilation simply because they were alive in 1934. With no second edition of Composers of Yesterday, there was no other place to put them.

5606. Historical Records Survey. District of Columbia. Bio-bibliographical index of musicians in the United States of America since colonial times. 2d ed. Washington, Music Section, Pan American Union, 1956. xxiii, 439 p.
PA57-4 ML106.U3H6 1956

Bibliography: p. xvii–xxiii.

"A list of special studies, biographies, and autobiographies pertaining to the persons whose names appear in the Index": p. 421–439.

In a subject area that has been comparatively as little studied as is unfortunately the case with American music, a volume such as this can be the most useful reference tool available. With only two general histories in the field, too little notice has been taken of the multiplicity of singers, instrumentalists, and even composers who make up the total picture of our musical life. But if there are only two general histories, there are a variety of more restricted studies of special periods, regions, and topics. If in one's reading a name has been picked up, it often becomes a very real problem to find out something more about the person. This union index of a large part of the musical literature earlier than World War I, which was planned by Keyes Porter and completed under the supervision of Dr. Leonard Ellinwood, is often the simplest and quickest solution to that problem. Unpretentious in appearance, it is nonetheless the most sought-after volume by those working in the field, and was particularly hard to come by before the second printing made it more accessible. The Historical Records Survey had quietly slipped away before the volume was completed, and in 1941, when the Pan American Union was persuaded to step in and see that the compilation was not entirely lost, funds were available only for a first edition of 500 copies.

677676 O–63–53

5607. Howard, John Tasker. Our American music, three hundred years of it. With supplementary chapters by James Lyons. 3d ed., rev. and reset. New York, Crowell, 1954 xxii, 841, A77 p. illus. 54-11944 ML200.H8 1954
Bibliography: p. 693-743.

5608. Chase, Gilbert. America's music, from the Pilgrims to the present. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1955. xxiii, 733 p.
54-9707 ML200.C5
Bibliography: p. 679-706.

These are the only two books that attempt to cover the whole field of American music. When Mr. Howard published his first edition in 1931, there were numerous studies of special periods or aspects of the subject, but he nevertheless had much original research to carry out in addition to bringing earlier work into focus. He was able to locate the descendants of a number of important early figures, such as Francis Hopkinson, James Hewitt, Oliver Shaw, and Benjamin Carr, as well as closer relatives of Lowell and William Mason, Edward MacDowell, Ethelbert Nevin, and Horatio Parker, and thus could offer much new documentation in his book. Even in this edition revised by James Lyons the basic strength of the earlier editions is apparent, and Mr. Howard's formulation of our musical history still remains very useful. Nevertheless, by the time Gilbert Chase set out to reformulate that history, the study of sociology and folk music had changed many musicological attitudes. Whereas Mr. Howard was willing to take the amateurs and rather inexpert immigrant professionals of the early 19th century much on their own terms, Mr. Chase views their efforts and affectations more sceptically. He casts his book into three sections with significant headings: "Preparation," "Expansion," and "Fulfillment." Only during the last two or three decades, he feels, has serious American music made any real contribution to the art. Largely because of this strong element of interpretation in the Chase book both volumes can still be profitably used. In devoting his space to the development of the total picture, Mr. Chase slights many details and individuals. Howard's index therefore runs to 97 pages, while Chase's has only 23. However, Mr. Chase's book makes better reading, partly because of his challenging thesis, but also because there are fewer unrelated facts to cope with.

5609. Reis, Claire (Raphael). Composers in America; biographical sketches of contemporary composers with a record of their works. Rev. and enl. ed. New York, Macmillan, 1947. xvi, 399 p. 47-31210 ML390.R38 1947

Mrs. Reis, by dint of much hard work, social prestige, and the financial backing she could thereby obtain, has been one of the best friends the American composer has had. In her semiautobiographical Composers, Conductors, and Critics (no. 5620) she tells of her work as chairman of the League of Composers for 25 years. By bringing together in the present book information on the composers of North America and their works, she puts them further in her debt. In the earlier editions (1930, 1932, and 1938) she limited herself to "significant living composers, American-born or American citizens," but in the present edition she redefined its scope to include a rather large number of foreign-born composers who had come here and made a definite contribution to American music. The period covered is very much the same as that in Ewen's American Composers Today (no. 5605), which goes back to Arthur Foote (1853-1937) whereas Mrs. Reis starts with Edgar Stillman Kelley (1857-1944), but both have as their youngest composer Peter Mennin, born in 1923. In between these extremes, the distribution by date of birth is similar, but Mrs. Reis gives a larger number of somewhat shorter biographies. She includes 234 composers who were born in the United States or who were brought here young and untrained; 8 who were born in Canada but have pursued at least part of their careers in the United States; 42 others who were born and trained abroad but were in the United States by the 1920's and showing distinct signs of acclimation; and finally 44 composers who arrived here in the later 1930's and early 1940's largely because of political events abroad. At the end she lists 424 names without individual comment, indicating that neither she nor Mr. Ewen has exhausted the potentialities of the subject. Madeleine B. Goss' Modern Music-Makers, Contemporary American Composers (New York, Dutton, 1952. 499 p.) has essays on 37 composers, some of whom are very little known, and furnishes a good full-page photograph of each.

5610. Sonneck, Oscar George Theodore. A bibliography of early secular American music (18th century). Rev. and enl. by William Treat Upton. [Washington] Library of Congress, Music Division, 1945. xvi, 616 p. illus.
45-35717 ML120.U5S6 1945

5611. Dichter, Harry, and Elliott Shapiro. Early American sheet music, its lure and its lore,

1768–1889. Including a directory of early American music publishers. New York, Bowker, 1941. xxvii, 287 p. 41–7397 ML112.D53

"Famous American musical firsts": p. xxv-xxvii.

"Lithographers and artists working on American sheet music before 1870, by Edith A. Wright and Josephine A. McDevitt": p. 249–257.

Bibliography: p. 259.

Although neither of these books is designed primarily for reading, both are valuable introductions to important bodies of primary material and each has much to offer in addition to its list of titles. Most of the entries in both are thoroughly annotated, and Sonneck in particular usually provided a historical essay on each of the more important melodies (see, for instance, his discussion of "Washington's March"). Mr. Upton's revision of Dr. Sonneck's book, originally published in 1905, covers a briefer period, stopping at the end of 1800, and so is able to offer as comprehensive an alphabetical listing as could be brought together. One or more library locations are given for most of the entries; the others are known only through advertisements or other descriptions. The main bibliography (p. 1–487) is followed by lists of early articles and essays on music, of composers, songsters, first lines, patriotic music, opera librettos, and publishers, printers, and engravers. The Dichter-Shapiro book aims only at reporting important editions of songs celebrated in their own day, many of which are still well known in our day. The titles are presented in chronologically arranged groups, sometimes devoted to editions of a single famous song, and sometimes to songs of like subject matter—"Skating Items," "Railroad Items," and so forth. The sections usually have an introductory paragraph giving the general setting, and each entry is annotated, sometimes extensively. The illustrations, which include 32 facsimiles, are especially attractive.

5612. Sonneck, Oscar George Theodore. Early concert-life in America (1731–1800). New York, Musurgia, 1949. 338 p. A50–7306 ML200.3.S6 1949

This is a photographic reproduction of the original edition published at Leipzig by Breitkopf and Härtel in 1907; the author headed the Music Division of the Library of Congress from 1902 to 1917, and was chiefly responsible for the eminence which its collections and services have ever since enjoyed. With the persistence of a German-trained scholar and the enthusiasm of an American, Sonneck (1873–1928) diligently examined every 18th-century American newspaper, magazine, book, and piece of music he could find. The newspapers proved an especially valuable repository of information on American concert-life, which began in the 1730's, flourished during the decade before the Revolution, and was resumed in the mid–1780's. Sonneck's account is based on program announcements, around which is woven a thorough and perceptive discussion of the details of this growth, the whole giving, as Carl Engel said, "the first methodical and correct picture of musical conditions in America prior to 1800."

5613. Turpie, Mary C., comp. American music for the study of American civilization. [v. 1] Formal compositions. Folk and popular songs. Minneapolis, Program in American Studies, University of Minnesota [1955] 90 l. 55–1919 ML120.U5T8

This annotated bibliography was assembled to record materials relevant to the study of American cultural history. The first two sections in the volume are devoted to serious music and folksongs; a projected third section will include jazz. An intentionally abbreviated list of 130 "formal compositions" is arranged by composers, and followed by 158 folksongs, arranged by title. Annotations describe the music and locate it in currently available song collections and on records, while an index lists the subjects of the songs. The book has no specified audience; those who are commissioned with the task of planning a concert of American music can use it advantageously. College teachers of American civilization will be able to draw from it, as will public school teachers in building "units" around events in American history. The annotations display a resolute antipathy to any evidences of "romanticism."

5614. Upton, William Treat. Art-song in America; a study in the development of American music. Boston, Oliver Ditson Co., 1930. 279 p. illus. 30–33445 ML2811.U7

——— A supplement to Art-song in America, 1930–1938. [Boston] Oliver Ditson Co., 1938. 41 p. ML2811.U7 Suppl.

In surveying an unexpectedly large field from various viewpoints, Mr. Upton produced a compilation which is more encyclopaedia than narrative. It has probably been most valuable to singers in search of American repertoire, and notes on that repertoire. The main volume covers the period from the Revolutionary Francis Hopkinson to 1930, and the supplement extends through 1938. Most of the composers are American by birth, and the works of a few, such as Stephen Foster, are probably thought of today as popular rather than art songs. Mr. Upton's extensive coverage of early 20th-century composers is noteworthy; these men must be thought of today as backward-looking in comparison with the important European composers of their time. The discussion includes biographical material, but its principal value is for analyses of, and comments on, the musical idiom of these songs.

B. Contemporary Surveys and Special Topics

5615. Barzun, Jacques. Music in American life. With a foreword by Edward N. Waters. Garden City, N.Y., Doubleday, 1956. 126 p.
56–7651 ML200.5.B3

Dean Barzun of Columbia University, who includes music in his multifarious interests, analyzes in this essay the state of music in America at the mid-century. He is concerned with economics as well as art, and he is especially interested in the new and unprecedented relation between amateur and professional at a time when "music lovers" are increasing while musicians find the going harder and harder. Popular music, our philosophy of education, government subsidies, music criticism, and the anomalous position of the composer are among the many topics discussed. The author's outlook is moderately optimistic, but he does not attempt to gloss over a number of disquieting factors in the total situation. The book is one of a series initiated and sponsored by the Committee on Musicology of the American Council of Learned Societies. In the same year appeared another general view, this time from the inside, by a widely esteemed American composer, Roger Sessions (b. 1896). His Reflections on the Music Life in the United States (New York, Merlin Press, 1956. 184 p. Merlin music books, v. 6) is unmarked by clarity or grace of writing, but it is the product of genuine reflection and offers many valuable insights. He points out, for instance, that in the absence of both patronage and subsidies, musical enterprises must be entrusted to managers who are competent businessmen, and that it is the necessity of remaining solvent, not abstract or perverse "commercialism," which assimilates such situations to the dynamics of business. He is particularly concerned, of course, with the relation of American composers to the European heritage, deprecates a one-sided striving after nationalism, and welcomes the influence of Arnold Schönberg, "one of the truly great figures of our time," as an enrichment of American resources.

5616. Browne, C. A. The story of our national ballads. Rev. and enl. ed. New York, Crowell, 1931. 315 p. illus.
31–10497 ML3551.B88 1931

National songs owe their success to popular tradition. In the process they usually acquire an aura of anecdotes and assemble an entourage of inspirers, authors, composers, singers, promoters, and their descendants. A few writers have attempted to make their way to the original sources, often with somewhat complex and inconclusive results. Such a study was Oscar G. T. Sonneck's Report on "The Star-Spangled Banner," "Hail Columbia," "America," and "Yankee Doodle" (Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1909. 255 p.). By 1914, additional material had necessitated a complete new edition of "The Star Spangled Banner" (Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1914. 115 p.) alone! Browne's book employs the opposite approach, with no particular attempt at critical scholarship, and selects anecdotes usually on the basis of their story-value. Some of these, especially those concerning the earlier songs, were dubious or worse even at the time of the first edition of 1919. The revised edition has individual treatments of 16 songs from "Yankee Doodle" to "America the Beautiful," and concluding chapters on the songs of the Spanish American War and World War I.

5617. Clarke, Eric. Music in everyday life. New York, Norton, 1935. 288 p.
35–6558 ML3795.C59M8

This book was written in response to two queries which the Carnegie Corporation of New York asked Mr. Clarke to answer: "What aspects of music in America to-day seem the most important? How can music best be furthered?" The author describes his work as a panorama of the musical landscape for the eyes of the ordinary citizen, and while it is the landscape of the mid-1930's, a surprisingly large number of his conclusions remain pertinent more than two decades later. The great desideratum, Mr. Clarke believed, was to make the transition from musical activity called into being by the generosity of wealthy patrons to a musical culture based on universal musical literacy springing out of true enjoyment and love. "A nation of music lovers" will place less emphasis on the exceptionally talented individual and on success as the goal of a musical career, and more on the cultivation of music as "a language which everybody is capable of understanding if not of speaking," and on amateurs playing together for enjoyment. With such goals in mind the author examined the study of music, performance and reproduction, the musical profession, and helps to music such as libraries, publications, and foundations; and at most points made constructive suggestions marked by realism and good sense.

5618. Gelatt, Roland. The fabulous phonograph, from tin foil to high fidelity. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1955. 320 p. illus.
55–9154 ML1055.G4

Despite biographies of such inventors as Edison (no. 4780) and Berliner and despite fragmentary studies and technical writings on many of its aspects, the phonograph had to wait some 75 years before it achieved, in this book, a sound and substantial recounting of its history. The book deals with foreign as well as domestic phases of that history, but inevitably the bulk of its pages have to do with the technical, commercial, and artistic development of sound recordings in the United States. Edison's basic invention goes back to the fall of 1877, but the commercial recording of music was not begun until 1890. By 1895 various improvements had warranted the large-scale promotion of the original cylinder recording, but Emile Berliner was already in the field with his potentially superior disc. The Victor Talking Machine Company joined the disc-users in 1901, and the exploitation of operatic stars and arias on its Red Seal records was the first artistic and business triumph in the field; but the production of cylinders was kept up until 1911. Technical improvements have since gone hand in hand with the addition of further areas of repertory to the phonograph's resources.

5619. Leiter, Robert David. The musicians and Petrillo. New York, Bookman Associates, 1953. 202 p. illus. 53–2437 ML3795.L35
Bibliography: p. [196]–197.

The "organized" musician in America, and especially the American Federation of Musicians, is the object of this sympathetic but reasonably objective study. The author deals both with the short history of musicians' unions in this country and with the many present-day problems raised by the various forms of "canned" music (except television, the full impact of which had not been felt at the time this book was written). The drawbacks as well as the advantages of strongly centralized unionism are discussed, and the part played by James Caesar Petrillo (b. 1892) and other personalities in shaping the destinies of the organized muscian is narrated. Petrillo, a dance-band musician who turned to union politics when he "lost his lip," became the dictator of the Chicago Federation of Musicians in 1922 and of the American Federation of Musicians, succeeding Joseph N. Weber, in 1940. His rigorous maintenance of the economic interests of union members soon made him a national figure.

5620. Reis, Claire (Raphael). Composers, conductors, and critics. New York, Oxford University Press, 1955. 264 p. illus.
55–8122 ML423.A2R4

For over 30 years Mrs. Reis has been a leading missionary for contemporary music in the United States; for 25 of those years (1923–48) she was chairman of the League of Composers (now merged into the American Section of the International Society for Contemporary Music), which provided modest financial help to composers in the form of commissions, arranged international exchanges of composers and performers, and in general waged the battle for contemporary music. Her book is largely a report on that battle, partly narrative and partly anecdotal. Its tone is enthusiastic but not hortatory, and it contains few value judgments on, or qualitative comparisons of, individual composers or their works.

5621. Rothenberg, Stanley. Copyright and public performance of music. The Hague, M. Nijhoff, 1954. xv, 188 p. 56–1411 Law
Bibliography: p. [177]–179.

An American Fulbright scholar in Holland and a leading Dutch publisher joined forces to produce the most useful book on American copyright law and common law as they apply to music. It discusses not only statutes and legal theory, but also actual cases and the performing rights societies such as ASCAP (The American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers) and BMI (Broadcast Music, Inc.). Differences between European and American law with regard to performing rights are pointed out. The style of the book is sufficiently free of legal jargon for it to be readily usable by the interested layman.

5622. Sargeant, Winthrop. Geniuses, goddesses, and people. New York, Dutton, 1949. 317 p. 49–10549 ML423.S3

Written by a well-known music critic and former orchestra musician, this book has been included less for its biographical sketches (some devoted to nonmusicians such as Lana Turner and Frank Lloyd Wright) than for its opening section of reminiscences and anecdotes. These reminiscences give a uniquely perceptive and amusing glimpse into that workaday orchestra world that audiences never see and that those who write of music and its star performers seldom touch upon. Among the biographical sketches, first published in Life, is one of Arturo Toscanini (under whose baton the author served for some years) that retains its interest despite later and more pretentious biographies. Another valuable illumination of a little-explored area of American musical life is contained in the relevant portion (Part 6, p. 433–574) of Arthur Loesser's Men, Women, and Pianos (New York, Simon & Schuster, 1954). Technical developments—to which America contributed its share—and the evolution of the piano industry; concert artists and the music they played; piano rolls, recordings, and broadcasting; the role of the parlor piano in American life: these and other aspects of the piano from colonial times to the present are described soundly and urbanely by a noted American pianist, teacher, and critic.

5623. Smith, Cecil Michener. Worlds of music. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1952. 328 p.
52–9538 ML200.5.S53

There are 12 worlds in this cosmography of American musical life as it appeared to one viewer—a leading music critic and journalist—at the midpoint of the 20th century. These worlds are those of individual managers, the Columbia concert management, the organized audience, the performer, New York, the "provinces," the opera, the orchestra, the composer, the dancer, the electrical technician, and the music teacher. The book undertakes to demonstrate, sometimes with resignation and sometimes with asperity, how these worlds all revolve around a single sun: the concentration of managerial power in the hands of a few men whose goal is business success rather than artistic excellence. Even if one is inclined to discount this thesis to a greater or lesser degree, the book contains many vivid glimpses of professional music circles from the inside which most laymen will find unusually revelatory. A similar charge was brought, more harshly and with somewhat different emphases, in Paul S. Carpenter's Music, an Art and a Business (Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1950. 245 p.).

5624. Taubman Hyman Howard. Music as a profession, by Howard Taubman. New York, Scribner, 1939. 320 p.
39–27946 ML3795.T23M9

Mr. Taubman, who has been a music journalist for 30 years and is now music editor of The New York Times, is an exceptionally gifted exponent of technical and professional matters for the layman. This book was written just before World War II, when the baritone Nelson Eddy was earning over half a million dollars a year, while thousands of other musicians were drawing a subsistence from the Federal Music Project. It was admirably calculated to achieve its purposes, to "clear away some of the illusions and give a few elementary tips to aspirants for a musical career or to their patents or vocational counselors," and even to discourage "some prospects from trying music as a career and turning them to a field where there is more assurance of a living." The developments of the last two decades both inside and out of the realm of music have been so far-reaching that no one should now resort to the book as a practical guide to details, but it remains a vivid picture of professional life in the interwar period, enlivened by many apt anecdotes. The author's essential thesis, that many feel themselves called but few are chosen by the great Amercan audience, continues to be valid. There are good chapters on "The Prodigy," "First Public Appearances," and especially on "Building a Career," which drives home the point that for success a concert artist needs not only the "break" which brings him to public notice, but the imaginative and intelligent exploitation of his opportunity.

5625. Zanzig, Augustus Delafield. Music in American life, present & future. With a foreword by Daniel Gregory Mason. London, New York, Oxford University Press, 1932. 560 p. illus.
32–4346 ML3795.Z2

Bibliography: p. [547]–552.

Despite its misleading title—for it deals hardly at all with the professional music activity that constitutes the heart of "music in American life"—this book offers much of both historical and sociological interest to the student of American life. Written at the instance of the National Recreation Association, it surveys amateur musical activity in this country toward the beginning of the Great Depression—in the home, in school, in church, in industry, in playgrounds, museums, and summer camps, and especially in the "community singing" groups that grew to importance at the time of World War I. Although there are differences in scope and in emphasis, it may be compared with Mr. Barzun's book of the same title (no. 5615), which surveys essentially the same scene one depression, one war, and one generation later.

C. Localities

5626. Aldrich, Richard. Concert life in New York, 1902–1923. New York, Putnam, 1941. xvii, 795 p. 41–26614 ML200.8.N5A6

"Harold Johnson of the Library of Congress . . . selected the reviews and articles and compiled the index of concert performances in New York from the scrapbooks of Mr. Aldrich."—p. viii.

5627. Downes, Olin. Olin Downes on music; a selection from his writings during the half-century 1906 to 1955. Edited by Irene Downes, with a pref. by Howard Taubman. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1957. 473 p. illus.

56–9923 ML60.D73

Although the musical culture of the United States seems to have been widely diffused throughout its larger cities during the 19th century, since World War I—or perhaps somewhat before—New York has been the musical capital of the country. Artists feel they must make their debuts there, the concert season is longer and more intense, and most of the business side of music is concentrated there. The music critics of the chief New York newspapers are thus in a particularly strategic position for taking the musical pulse of the country. After gaining experience in other jobs, in 1891 Richard Aldrich (1863–1937) joined the staff of the New York Tribune, where he frequently assisted its chief music critic, Henry E. Krehbiel (see nos. 5658–5659). When William J. Henderson moved from The New York Times to The Sun in 1902, Aldrich succeeded him as the Times' chief music critic, and served until the spring of 1923. In the meantime, Olin Downes (1886–1955) had begun his career as a music critic at the age of 20 on the Boston Post, and was a thoroughly experienced writer when he was chosen to succeed Aldrich on the Times in January 1924. The two books above are made up of selected reviews and "Sunday articles" by the two men. All of Aldrich's reviews come from the Times, whereas in the Downes volume the first 76 pages were drawn from the Boston Post. Between them they cover the high spots in New York's musical life for more than half a century. That life, to be sure, is viewed through the eyes of two individuals who were living very much in the thick of things, and these accounts do not take the place of an objective history. Since the extracts in both books are arranged chronologically, they do give an extremely graphic presentation of changing customs, institutions, and attitudes that form the primary stuff of music history.

5628. Ayars, Christine Merrick. Contributions to the art of music in America by the music industries of Boston, 1640–1936. New York, H. W. Wilson, 1937. xv, 326 p.

37–3847 ML200.8.B7A8

Bibliography: p. 307–314.

Every musician is aware, if only subconsciously, of what an important role the music industries play in musical life, not merely in supplying the means of musicmaking but even in determining the course of musical evolution—as when the many technical improvements in wind instruments during the first half of the 19th century made possible the complex bands of today, not to mention the virtuoso wind playing required by orchestral composers since the time of Wagner. Yet the writers who satisfy the public's curiosity about composers and performers, and who instruct students and listeners alike in everything from "appreciation" to xylophone technique, seldom give a page to the instrument makers, the music engravers or copyists, the publishers, or the musical publicists themselves. The present book, which originated as a master's thesis at Boston University, is a unique study of the music industries in a leading American music center, and its value goes far beyond the information it provides about music in Boston itself. Its three main sections are devoted to music publishing (including music journals), music engraving and printing, and instrument making, and there are extensive appendixes which include lists of makers and descriptions of their extant instruments. Even unmusical historians and sociologists will find much to interest them, such as the discussion of the Revere family's music-engraving and bell-founding activities.

5629. Gerson, Robert A. Music in Philadelphia; a history of Philadelphia music, a summary of its current state, and a comprehensive index dictionary. Philadelphia, Theodore Presser, 1940. 422 p. illus.

41–1276 ML200.8.P5G4

Bibliography: p. 418–422.

In his University of Pennsylvania doctoral dissertation, Mr. Gerson has attempted to cover the entire history of Philadelphia music from 1700 to 1939. More than half the volume is concerned with the 20th century and deals not only with all types of music in performance but with the varieties of music education, with church music, music publishers, and the manufacturers of phonographs, records, and radios. A wide variety of secondary works, together with a number of primary sources, have contributed a huge body of data which overflows into an "Index-Dictionary of Philadelphia Music" (p. 365–414). The volume of this factual material has proved too great for the achievement of either a meaningful organization or a provocative interpretation of it; but the resulting compilation does serve as a convenient concentration of information concerning the cultural history of an important center of American music.

5630. Swan, Howard. Music in the Southwest, 1825–1950. San Marino, Calif., Huntington Library, 1952. 316 p. illus.

52–14504 ML200.7.S74S9

Bibliography: p. 295–300.

The rapid economic growth of this region of the United States has been accompanied by a no less remarkable musical growth. Omitting the Indian and Spanish periods in California, which have been thoroughly covered elsewhere, this history begins with the Mormon settlers of Utah, who had their own hymnody and "a particular regard for band music." The author traces the evidences of musical activity in the mining camps of Arizona and Nevada (especially Virginia City), in the final phase of the old Spanish institutions of California, and in the "cow counties" of the south of the State, which were filling up with immigrants from the East. The last six chapters narrate the rise of serious music in southern California and particularly in Los Angeles, where a season of eight symphony concerts was presented as early as 1893–94. Mr. Swan's book is not a technical treatise or a musicological study, but a colorful if somewhat miscellaneous portrayal of the development of musical life as an integral part of a region's social and economic development. The verses of several Mormon folk and railroad songs, and an amusing set of "Rules which should be Observed in Dancing Parties [St. George, Utah, 1887]," are among the appendixes. Mrs. Adella Prentiss Hughes' Music Is My Life (Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1947. 319 p.) is a view of the development of the concert life of Cleveland through the eyes of the woman who managed most of it during half a century.

D. Religious Music

5631. Davison, Archibald. Protestant church music in America. Boston, Schirmer Music Co., 1933. 182 p. 34–53 ML3111.D26P7

"Four brief lists of hymns, anthems, organ selections and junior choir selections": p. 173–175.

The eminent professor of music at Harvard (b. 1883) here presented a statement of his lofty conception of religious music. The first half of his book is a vigorously written polemic exposing those "Attitudes and Conditions" which have depressed Protestant standards of sacred music: indifference, complacency, isolation, deficient music education, individualism, association (bad music loved for the childhood memories it evokes), tradition, prejudice, and disorganization. In the second half, "The Theory and Practice of Church Music," Dr. Davison develops the more positive aspects of his credo. His ideals are austere, and he is willing to leave many of the best tunes to the devil; but his reasons are always presented logically and convincingly. In "The Uses of Music in Worship," he justifies these ideals with arguments both esthetic and religious, and in a long section on "The Material of Sacred Music (p. 94–150)," he provides one of the few astute and well-illustrated analyses of its musical idiom.

5632. Ellinwood, Leonard Webster. The history of American church music. New York, Morehouse-Gorham Co., 1953. xiv, 274 p. illus. 53–13402 ML200.E4

"Biographies of American church musicians"; p. 201–242.

This history of American church music, while extensive and thorough, does not attempt to be exhaustive. For instance, if one compares its contents with those of Foote's Three Centuries of American Hymnody (no. 5633), one finds that the two books have very little material in common. Dr. Ellinwood, an expert on pre-Renaissance church music, a deacon of the Washington Cathedral, and a Library of Congress cataloger of books on religion, has investigated a number of the less-known phases of this history. The book is divided into three chronological parts, with the breaks at 1820 and 1920, and there are chapters on such subjects as "[Religious Music] in New Spain," "Singing Schools and Early Choirs," "The First Organs and Bells," "The Oxford Movement and Boy Choirs," "Organ Repertory," and "[Contemporary] Matters Liturgical." Appendix B, "Selected Music Lists," is largely devoted to the repertory of the Washington Cathedral for the decade 1941–51, which extended from medieval plainsong to strictly contemporary American, English, Canadian, and Russian compositions. The book is well illustrated, and its material is carefully documented and presented in an authoritative and scholarly manner.

5633. Foote, Henry Wilder. Three centuries of American hymnody. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1940. 418 p. 40–34386 ML3111.F6T4

This objective and readable book by a distinguished Unitarian clergyman remains the most satisfactory general history of American religious music, although it is throughout more concerned with the words, and their quality as poetry and religious thought, than it is with the tunes and their quality as music. The mainstream of this tradition, beginning with the Bay Psalm Book of 1640, is traced with little deviation into bypaths, but the author finds space for a surprising number of anecdotes and other details. To Dr. Foote the great age of American hymn-writing fell in the four decades 1845–85, and he discovered, somewhat surprisingly in view of the coldly intellectual atmosphere supposed to have prevailed there, "that, throughout the nineteenth century, Harvard produced by far the most notable succession of hymn writers in the English-speaking world coming from any single institution." The only serious omission is the gospel-song tradition, the early history of which must be traced in George Pullen Jackson's White and Negro Spirituals (no. 5555), while its 20th-century history remains to be written. Dr. Foote acknowledges his debt to three more general books which are indispensable to the study of American hymnody: Louis F. Benson's The English Hymn (New York, Doran, 1915. 624 p.), Percy A. Scholes' The Puritans and Music in England and New England (London, Oxford University Press, 1934. 428 p.), and John Julian's Dictionary of Hymnology, rev. ed. (London, J. Murray, 1907. xviii, 1768 p.).

5634. Metcalf, Frank J. American writers and compilers of sacred music. New York, Abingdon Press, 1925. 373 p. illus.
25–18159 ML106.U3M3

This biographical dictionary covers the 18th and 19th centuries; it includes the better-known men, but its chief value is for brief, factual sketches of lesser-known figures. A pioneer scholar in this field, Metcalf (1865–1945) drew upon a huge and diversified body of source and secondary material. Some of his information has since been corrected or superseded, and much of it appears relatively insignificant now. But his scholarship still provides us with a convenient and generally reliable compilation of the biographical and bibliographical details of early American religious music.

E. Popular Music

5635. Goldberg, Isaac. Tin Pan Alley; a chronicle of the American popular music racket. New York, John Day Co., 1930. 341 p. illus.
30–31878 ML3551.G64T4

Tin Pan Alley did not receive its name until the turn of the century, but it crystallized out of American popular musicmaking in the early 1890's, when a cluster of songwriters and publishers settled along 14th Street in lower Manhattan, then the theatrical and amusement center of New York. The name, which Mr. Goldberg attributed to "a minor American poet," is elsewhere derived from "the tinny quality of the cheap, over-used pianos in music publishers' offices." The Alley moved uptown in stages as the theaters did, and with the advent of cinema and radio it has become a function of the motion picture and air-wave industries. Mr. Goldberg attributed the Alley's basic idea—"the scheme of building [one's] songs around and into stage productions"—to Charles K. Harris, who reached the Alley via Milwaukee and Chicago. Goldberg was considerably more interested in the music itself than in the mechanics of song selling, publishing, and plugging, and his impressionistic and rhapsodic writing does not make it easy to come at a fact. He carried his sketch of American popular music back to blackface minstrelsy, and included a somewhat irrelevant chapter on Sousa, de Koven, and Victor Herbert. The book nevertheless has the virtues of a pioneer work, full of enthusiasm for its subject: the Tin Pan Alley song "establishes a vital circuit with the life out of which it arises" and expresses "the real philosophy of the multitude—its aims and aspirations, its simple notions of hell, purgatory and paradise."

5636. Kahn, Ely J., Jr. The Voice; the story of an American phenomenon. New York, Harper, 1947. xvii, 125 p. illus.
47–2598 ML420.S656K3

"The Voice" is, of course, Frank Sinatra (b. 1917), who shot from relative obscurity in 1941 to major celebrity in 1943. Most of the material in this slim book appeared originally in the pages of The New Yorker and dates from a relatively early period in Sinatra's career when he was notorious as the idol of teen-age girls but had not yet solidified his reputation as a singer or made a new one as a straight actor in motion pictures. Mr. Kahn is therefore less interested in providing a consecutive picture of Sinatra's development, although he discreetly works in a few biographical facts, than in viewing with amazement the extraordinary antics of the teen-agers. Sinatra therefore serves as the focal point of Kahn's story, but it is rather the teen-agers who supply the "American phenomenon" of the title.

5637. Paskman, Dailey, and Sigmund G. Spaeth. "Gentlemen, be seated!" A parade of the old-time minstrels. With a foreword by Daniel Frohman; profusely illustrated from old prints and photographs and with complete music for voice and piano. Garden City, N.Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1928. xvii, 247 p. illus. 28–15892 ML3561.P2G3 PN3195.P3

The tradition of blackface, beginning in 1828 with "Daddy" Rice (Thomas Dartmouth Rice, 1808–1860) and extending into our own day with Al Jolson (1888–1950) and Eddie Cantor (b. 1892), could hardly fail to make an interesting subject for a book. This one is a miscellany of history (not especially reliable), songs (both texts and music), anecdotes, biography, and scripts. Its value as a reference source is slight, but as a book to be read for pleasure, it captures much of the carefree disorganization which characterized Negro minstrelsy, the most popular form of stage entertainment in the United States from the 1840's through the 1870's.

5638. Smith, Cecil Michener. Musical comedy in America. New York, Theatre Arts Books, 1950. 374 p. illus. 50–58209 ML200.S6

Light musicodramatic entertainments have regularly been with us in one form or another, at least since the early 18th-century beginnings of opera buffa in Italy and of the ballad opera in England, but Mr. Smith settles on the performance of The Black Crook in New York in 1866 as the time when "the popular musical stage in the United States reached major dimensions." From this point down to the presentation of Rodgers and Hammerstein's South Pacific in 1950, Mr. Smith manages to say something about practically every revue, operetta, and musical comedy produced on Broadway. This material is offered in chronological order, save when some composer has risen to particular eminence and a series of his musical comedies may be discussed in sequence. As a whole, however, the book is a tapestry of titles and personalities with little attempt to sort out trends or force the material into patterns, and hence probably offers a truer picture of the chaotic Broadway stage, with its fashions and fads and foreign influences, than would a more formal history.

5639. Spaeth, Sigmund G. A history of popular music in America. New York, Random House, 1948. xv, 729 p. 48–8954 ML2811.S7

"Additional popular music from Colonial times to the present": p. 587–657. Bibliography: p. 658–662.

America's most significant contribution to the world of music, many think, is to be found in its tough and virile popular music, pre-eminently the improvisatory style of performance deriving from the Negro and known successively as ragtime, jazz, swing, and "bop." This is by no means, however, the only type of popular music created in America that has found wide acceptance in many countries throughout the world, and indeed, since jazz is essentially a style of performance, it is more difficult to export than are the products of Tin Pan Alley and Broadway. It is to these latter that Mr. Spaeth devotes his attention almost exclusively. He does give something over 200 pages to the major songs of our "infancy" and "adolescence," but in this space he only reaches the 1880's, whereas nearly 400 pages are devoted to the next 70 years. Furthermore, Mr. Spaeth's mastery of his subject increases strikingly as he approaches the 20th century and is able to enrich his researches out of personal experience. This should not be surprising, for there seems to be something essentially contemporary about popular music, and few people are interested in it once it has ceased to be popular. Indeed, even with popular music not yet forgotten interest seems concentrated on specific "hit" songs rather than on their composers or the general evolution of a style, and hence Mr. Spaeth's book resembles more an annotated chronological bibliography than an ordinary history book. One famous song after another is briefly cited or discussed. The chronological tale is interrupted infrequently by a few pages devoted to the careers of such outstanding popular composers as Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, George Gershwin, Cole Porter, and Richard Rodgers, but for the most part there is a steady progress year by year through the crop of popular songs. Such a diet of details needs an exceptional appetite to make it palatable in any quantity, but Mr. Spaeth's grasp of the popular music of the 20th century makes his book excellent for reference, especially since his facts are generally accurate and his index is unusually full. Julius Mattfeld's Variety Music Cavalcade, 1620–1950 (New York, Prentice-Hall, 1952. 637 p.) is more strictly bibliographical in form, but is essentially not very different from Mr. Spaeth's book. The early years are covered by periods or decades, and finally there are annual lists. Each group is preceded by a paragraph giving nonmusical contemporary events as background, but the songs themselves are simply listed without commentary. Mr. Mattfeld does give their publishers, a type of information deliberately omitted by Spaeth, and he has space for rather more entries. The two books complement each other in several respects, but Mattfeld's is essentially a reference volume and could be read even less comfortably than Spaeth's.

5640. Wittke, Carl F. Tambo and bones; a history of the American minstrel stage. Durham, N.C., Duke University Press, 1930. 269 p. 31–2026 ML2870.W4 PN3195.W5

In the show-business tradition of "comics" and "straight-men," Paskman and Spaeth's book on minstrelsy (no. 5637) could be described as a "comic history," the present volume as a "straight history." The books complement each other insofar as Paskman and Spaeth recapture the fantasy of these entertainments, while Dean Wittke's account is more sober, factual, and objective. The first three chapters trace its history of 100 years, bringing in more details and organizing them better than do Paskman and Spaeth. The great days of the minstrel show, the author points out, were over by 1880, but the form took nearly half a century to die out, its extinction being marked by the sudden and final closing of the Al G. Field Minstrels in the spring of 1928. The last two chapters are concerned with performance techniques, originally standardized by the E. P. Christy Minstrels, and brief biographies of notable minstrels. What Dean Wittke's book lacks in charm and vitality is made up in reliability.

F. Jazz

5641. Blesh, Rudi, and Harriet (Grossman) Janis. They all played ragtime, the true story of an American music. New York, Knopf, 1950. xviii, 338, xviii p. illus.

50–12082 ML3561.J3B49 1950

"It has been two generations since ragtime piano came along to give its own first decade in the public eye the name of the 'Gay Nineties.' It was unmistakably a new idea in music. America took it straightway to its heart—it was love at first sight. And, following America by a matter almost of months, Europe too fell under the syncopated spell." So begins this story of one of the important phases of jazz—a style that lived a flourishing, colorful existence and that still exerts a strong effect on modern jazz. The Chicago World's Fair of 1893 first brought the ragtime players to the notice of a large pubiic, and they held the center of the stage until the jazz craze began in 1917, a year also marked by the death of one of the pioneers, "the king of ragtime composers," Scott Joplin (b. 1868). The other major figure in Mr. Blesh's narrative is John Stilwell Stark (1841–1927), publisher and propagandist of "classic ragtime." Chiefly by means of interviews, both with surviving musicians and with others who knew them, the authors have reconstructed a detailed account of the development of ragtime, with informed observations about the music, which they have examined extensively. Appendixes (p. 273–338) include a "Chronology of Important Ragtime Dates," "Lists of Ragtime and Other Compositions," "A List of Disk Phonograph Records," "A Selected List of Cylinder Phonograph Records Prior to 1914," and "A List of Player-Piano Rolls."

5642. Feather, Leonard G. The encyclopedia of jazz. Foreword by Duke Ellington. New York, Horizon Press, 1955. 360 p. illus.

55–10774 ML3561.J3F39

The core of this encyclopedia is a group of biographies of 1,065 jazz musicians (p. 75–332). The sketches are mostly short, but succinctly written and full of information. Clustered around the biographies are other sections, some of which are equally useful, while others merely add dispensable decoration to the cake. Among the former are "A Brief History of Jazz," "What Is Jazz? A Musical Analysis," "A Basic Collection of [50 LP] Jazz Records (p. 338–344)," "Glossary of Terms Used by Jazz Musicians" (from the Apple to zoot), "Jazz Organizations," "Record Companies," and a selective bibliography (p. 351–353). The "Hall of Fame" and "Giants of Jazz" are necssarily controversial and so of dubious value in a reference book, and the "Birthdays" can satisfy nothing more urgent than the curiosity of juvenile devotees. The book is profusely illustrated with good photographs, which include many published for the first time, and are usually so perceptively and vividly conceived as to constitute important documents by themselves.

5643. Lomax, Alan. Mister Jelly Roll; the fortunes of Jelly Roll Morton, New Orleans Creole and "inventor of jazz." Drawings by David Stone Martin. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1950. xvii, 318 p. illus. 50–8436 ML410.M82L6

From a recorded autobiography, from numerous interviews with contemporaries, and from a broad acquaintance with the music and the personages of jazz, Alan Lomax has narrated here the extraordinary life of one of the most colorful figures of American music, christened Ferdinand Joseph Morton (1885–1941) but universally known as Jelly Roll Morton. His "autobiography" was recorded during most of a month (May 1938) for the Archive of Folk Song in the Library of Congress by Mr. Lomax, and this source supplies the warp and woof of his skillfully woven fabric. The book reads almost like a fantasy, although Mr. Lomax points out some of Jelly Roll's illusions about himself, but if it seems extravagant here and there, the atmosphere it recreates is authentic, which is an important thing for a man of Morton's genuine creativity. The story is rather a sad one, for Morton, after reaching a peak of fame and prosperity during the 1920's, had difficulty in making a living during the depression, and his health was ruined when, soon after the Library recordings were concluded, a roughneck Negro stabbed him in a cheap Washington tavern. On the practical side, the appendixes include some of Jelly Roll's best tunes and arrangements, a chronological list of his copyrighted compositions (p. 292–296), and an extensive discography (p. 297–318).

5644. Ramsey, Frederic, and Charles Edward Smith, eds. Jazzmen. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1939. xv, 360 p. illus.
39–31807 ML3561.R24J2

The editors, aided by contributions from William Russell, Stephen W. Smith, Wilder Hobson, Roger Pryor Dodge, and others, cover the three cities where jazz arose, New Orleans, Chicago, and New York, together with the hot jazz of 1939, in 15 chapters. They describe the all-important atmosphere of these locales and give vivid material on the outstanding individuals and groups that took part in creating jazz, including Louis Armstrong, Bix Beiderbecke, King Oliver and his Creole Jazz Band, The Austin High School Gang, The Five Pennies, and others. These people and places have frequently been written about since Jazzmen appeared, but hardly with more skill or devotion.

5645. Sargeant, Winthrop. Jazz: hot and hybrid. New and enl. ed. New York, Dutton, 1946. 287 p. 46–7084 ML3561.J3S3 1946
Bibliography: p. 267–274.

The first serious studies of jazz appeared in Europe. Of the American books which followed them, Mr. Sargeant's (first published in 1938) was one of the first to approach jazz music analytically. In both the first and the present edition, the author's purpose is "to define jazz, to analyze its musical anatomy, to trace its origins and influences, to indicate the features that distinguish it from other kinds of music and that give it its unique place in the music of the world." Mr. Sargeant's ideas on the origins of jazz are as speculative and open to objections as are those of other writers before and since, but his analyses of scale-structure, rhythm, melody, harmony, form, and instrumentation are so clearly done that they will be long and widely meaningful, even if they leave room for occasional differences of detail. Mr. Sargeant, in conclusion, does not believe that jazz is a fine art.

5646. Stearns, Marshall W. The story of jazz. New York, Oxford University Press, 1956. 367 p. illus. 56–8012 ML3561.J3S8

Dr. Stearns, a professor of English literature at Hunter College who is also president of the Institute of Jazz Studies, is notably thorough in showing connections of jazz with other forms of music, and his tracing of the strands that make up the fabric of jazz has been termed panoramic. The multiple genesis from West Africa, Latin America, and early Afro-America; the multitude of components from blues, work songs, spirituals, minstrel shows, and camp meeting music; and the styles indigenous to particular centers of its flourishing life, from New Orleans to 52nd Street, create a complex problem in presentation, solved here with thoroughness and clarity. Jazz harmonies, melody, rhythm, and instrumentation are dissected in generally clear and perceptive fashion, and many of jazz's hitherto elusive traits are particularized.

G. Orchestras and Bands

5647. Grant, Margaret, and Herman S. Hettinger. America's symphony orchestras, and how they are supported. New York, Norton, 1940. 326 p. 40–27266 ML3795.G82A5

This study of the economic problems of American symphony orchestras on the eve of World War II, made in order to find means of improving their financial stability, was financed by the Carnegie Corporation of New York and carried out by the National Orchestral Survey under the chairmanship of J. Frederic Dewhurst. Questionnaires were filled out by 16 major orchestras (with budgets of $100,000 or more) and by approximately 135 secondary ones, professional, semiprofessional, or largely amateur. These documents were supplemented by interviews and by audience studies in three communities. The basic facts are set forth in Chapter 3, "Orchestra Budgets and Sources of Income," but the variation between orchestras of different types was so great as to make brief summary impossible. Chapter 9 contains suggestions for "Increasing the Operating Income," and Chapter 10 for "Meeting the Operating Deficit." The authors saw little likelihood "that in the predictable future symphony orchestras can be made entirely self-supporting," but thought that the best prospects lay in measures "to build the orchestra firmly into the community as an integral cultural force," and especially through "a careful diversification of services," including children's and youth concerts. Appendix A, Mrs. Miles Benham's plan of work and organization for the Women's Committee for the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, 1939–40 (p. 285–300), is a formidable document.

5648. Howe, Mark A. De Wolfe. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881–1931. Semicentennial ed., rev. and extended in collaboration with John N. Burk. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1931. 272 p. illus. 31–11067 ML200.8.B7B7 1931

5649. Johnson, Harold Earle. Symphony Hall, Boston. Boston, Little, Brown, 1950. 431 p. illus. 50–9646 ML200.8.B72S95 1950

Henry Lee Higginson (1834–1919) was frustrated in his attempt to become a professional musician, although he went to Vienna for the purpose; at the age of 33 he entered the family banking house of Lee, Higginson, and Co., and within 13 years had accumulated a fortune sufficient to permit his heart's desire—to give Boston a permanent, professional symphony orchestra (1881). For 37 years "The Major" paid the annual deficits of the Boston Symphony; only in the last year of his life did he turn its affairs over to a board of trustees, one of whose members was Mr. Howe. Not till its fourth season did the orchestra secure a conductor capable of building a first-class organization; but after five seasons under Wilhelm Gericke, whom Higginson had lured from the Vienna Opera, the Boston Symphony was ready for the leadership of Arthur Nikisch, the greatest virtuoso conductor of his day. Mr. Howe's concise narrative was originally published in 1914, when the orchestra was about to enter its years of crisis: its German conductor, Karl Muck, and its predominantly German personnel made it the target of hysterical attack during the war years; Higginson had set his face against unionization of the players; and Higginson's own finances were shaken by the war. Mr. Burk's supplementary narrative (p. 130–172) tells how these were all resolved during, and in large part through, the leadership of Pierre Monteux. Mr. Johnson's volume, issued to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the building which has been the orchestra's home since 1900, is able to survey the whole quarter-century (1924–49) of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian whose incandescent leadership reconciled Boston to an extraordinarily varied repertory. Its appendixes listing works performed by and soloists appearing with the orchestra (p. 311–420) supersede those in Howe. Chapter V, "Concert Life," reviews the recitalists and musical organizations other than the Boston Symphony that have appeared in the Hall. At the end of Chapter VI is a brief and hardly adequate description of the unique and delightful Boston Pops—summer programs of lighter music, with the audience at refreshment tables.

5650. Mueller, John H. The American symphony orchestra; a social history of musical taste. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1951. 437 p. illus. 51–13728 ML200.M8

Mr. Mueller, a professor of sociology at Indiana University, describes his book as "an analysis and survey of the public life of orchestra compositions as performed in American symphony orchestras, with the intention of tracing" and accounting for their fluctuations. It is based on 15 years' study of the programs of 17 leading American orchestras, and has numerous graphs and diagrams. After a brief presentation of the European background and the American beginnings of "the concert system," he gives in Chapter 3 "profiles" of these 17 orchestras in the order of their establishment, which provide a very convenient concentration of widely scattered information. Chapter 4, "Life Spans of Composers in the Repertoire," identifies the six leaders, in the order of their long-term popularity, as Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner, Tchaikovsky, Mozart, and Bach (for the period 1945–50 Richard Strauss was in 5th place and Bach only 10th). The remaining composers are divided into those "with low and stable trends" such as Haydn and Handel; those "in the ascending phase" such as Strauss and Sibelius; those "in the descending phase" such as Schumann and Schubert; those "with full life cycles" such as Dvorak and Grieg; and "the forgotten names" such as Spohr and Raff. Chapter 5, "National Sources of the Orchestral Repertoire," reveals that Austro-German music has slipped from a near monopoly of 80 percent to a mere huge lead of 50 percent; that Russian music, after running neck and neck with French for three decades, took a secure lead after 1920; and that since about 1905 American music has done better than English, Czech, Scandinavian, or Italian. Contemporary American composers run behind contemporary foreigners only because of the popularity of Prokofieff and Shostakovitch. Chapter 6 is a miscellany, with sections on "Management and Union" and "The Audience and Its Folkways," especially its listening and applause habits. The concluding chapter is an abstract and inconclusive discussion of the bases of musical taste.

5651. Otis, Philo Adams. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, its organization, growth and development, 1891–1924. Chicago, Clayton F. Summy Co., 1925. 466 p. illus. 25–9031 ML200.8.C5O84

5652. Russell, Charles Edward. The American orchestra and Theodore Thomas. Garden City, N.Y., Doubleday, Page, 1927. xx, 344 p. illus. 27-25803 ML1211.R88

Mr. Otis (1846–1930) became trustee, member of the Executive Committee, and secretary of the Orchestral Association during its fifth season (1895), and continued to serve until his death. His volume consists of conscientious annals of both the association and the orchestra which it maintained. Receipts and expenses of each season are regularly given; after the completion of Orchestra Hall in 1904, the rental of its offices frequently enabled the orchestra to conclude a season with a modest profit. The soloists of each season are listed, sample programs incorporated, and memorial performances given particular notice. The Appendix (p. 391–448) lists the members of the association and the personnel of the orchestra season by season. Mr. Otis was justly proud of his long association with Theodore Thomas, the hero of the second title, which received the Pulitzer prize for biography in 1928. Thomas (1835–1905), the son of the Stadtpfeifer of Esens in East Friesland, Germany, was brought to America at the age of 10, and made appearances as a violin prodigy. In 1862 he organized an orchestra of his own, which lasted under varying circumstances until 1888, and from 1869 he and it engaged in regular and widespread tours, which introduced artfully constructed orchestral programs to communities quite unfamiliar with them. The success of hs missionary efforts could be measured by the "Thomas Festivals" of later years, when he and his band joined with local choruses in large concerted works. The great proliferation of "the grand orchestra" in 20th-century America is here regarded as being largely the result of his work. Certainly Appendix G, "Works Introduced into this Country by Theodore Thomas" (p. 323–335), speaks for itself. Thomas was succeeded as conductor of the Chicago Orchestra by Frederick Stock (1872–1942), a German-born violist recruited for the season of 1895, who had gradually assumed the position of assistant conductor. Mr. Otis' annals cover Mr. Stock's first 19 seasons, but his final 18, and the checkered fortunes of the orchestra since his death, have yet to be chronicled.

5653. Schwartz, Harry Wayne. Bands of America. Garden City, N.Y., Doubleday, 1957. 320 p. illus. 57-6697 ML1311.S35

A chatty, knowledgeable volume based primarily on hearsay and personal recollections, and chiefly concerned with the so-called "military" bands from Patrick S. Gilmore (1829–1892) through J. P. Sousa—actually touring or town bands that were once as much a part of American show business as vaudeville or blackface minstrelsy. The author is perhaps unduly pessimistic about the passing of this form of entertainment, forgetting the thousands of school bands that are going concerns today—not to mention the "big time" bands of Goldman and the armed services. A no more scholarly but likewise unique treatment of true military bands, those of the armed services, is William Carter White's A History of Military Music in America (New York, Exposition Press, 1945. 272 p.).

5654. Sherman, John K. Music and maestros; the story of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1952. 357 p. illus. 52-11107 ML200.8.M52M58

The author, familiar with his subject from his daily activity first as music critic and then as arts editor of the Minneapolis Star and Tribune, was born five years before the inauguration of the Minneapolis Symphony on November 5, 1903. Minneapolis itself was a mere 36, having been incorporated in 1867, and has frequently congratulated itself on being the youngest city to form an orchestra of national prominence. This it achieved, furthermore, under the direction of a local musician, for Emil Oberhoffer (1867–1933), if Bavarian by birth, had been identified with the musical life of the Twin Cities for about a decade when he undertook the leadership of the new orchestra, with such success that his resignation in 1922, after increasing friction with the orchestra's chief sponsor, was generally regarded as a municipal calamity, and after three decades he was still warmly remembered. He inaugurated the policy of farflung orchestral tours, making the Minneapolis Symphony better known in the country than many older, bigger, and more sedentary orchestras. Mr. Sherman, with a journalist's instinct for the newsworthy and an uncommon narrative skill, has woven the various strands and levels of the orchestra's life into what is probably the most readable history of an American, if not of any orchestra. The regimes of each of Oberhoffer's successors—Henri Verbrugghen (1924–31), Eugene Ormandy (1932–36), Dimitri Mitropoulis (1938–49), and Antal Dorati (since 1949)—are individually characterized. The excellent "Listings for Reference" (p. 303–340) provided by Carlos Fischer, an orchestra veteran of 1903, include complete personnel and out-of-town engagements, abridged repertoire, and recordings as of September 1952.

H. Opera

5655. Graf, Herbert. Opera for the people. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1951. 289 p. illus. 51–13790 ML1711.G7

The author's preface states that the aim of his book is to offer "sufficient facts and suggestions to stimulate further thinking about the production of opera in America . . . and thus to contribute to the progress of opera as an integral part of the life of the American community." Drawing on his wide experience as stage director for some of the world's leading opera companies as well as for opera in films and television, Mr. Graf thoroughly covers the problems confronted in the production of opera, including adequate English translations, sponsorship, stage direction ("the stepchild of grand opera production in America"), buildings, and the training of the singers. The second section of the book records developments toward a popular American opera, emphasizing the musical theater on Broadway, and opera in communities, schools, motion pictures, and television. In his last section, "Blueprint for the Future," the author suggests ideas for the model opera house, ways to obtain financial support, patterns of cooperation with existing musical activities, and other information pertinent to any group interested in establishing a local opera company.

5656. Hipsher, Edward Ellsworth. American opera and its composers. A complete history of serious American opera, with a summary of the lighter forms which led up to its birth. Philadelphia, Theodore Presser Co., 1934. 478 p. illus. 35–2381 ML1711.H4 1934

Bibliography: p. 451–453.

The bulk of this book is devoted to short sketches of American composers who have written operas. These are arranged alphabetically and give a brief sketch of the composer and the names of his most important operas, as well as occasional anecdotes, illustrations, and plots. This section is preceded by a brief history of American opera, and followed by a survey of ballet and masque and a conclusion which observes, as of 1925, a flowering of American operatic culture. To the author an American opera is one "written in America, by one who is either a native or who has been long enough a resident to have absorbed something of American life. Or, it might be written by an American composer temporarily abroad." Mr. Hipsher is generous toward operas which he considers American, but he does not regard American opera as having reached its zenith. Meanwhile he does not decry foreign influences; rather he sees these as contributing to a culture from which will someday be written the "great native American Opera."

5657. Kolodin, Irving. The story of the Metropolitan Opera, 1883–1950, a candid history. New York, Knopf, 1953. xx, 607, xxxviii p. illus. 52–12212 ML1711.8.N32M45

This is a critical history of the major seat of opera in America. The first two sections cover the social and economic aspects of the Metropolitan. The major part of the book, "Operas and Artists," is chiefly concerned with the repertory, the performers, and the productions from 1883 to 1950. The detailed assessment of the caliber of individual performances reflects extensive research by the author. Of reference value is the "Compilation of Works" at the end (p. 597–607), which lists the operas, ballets, and choral pieces presented from 1883 to 1952, and gives the seasons in which each was produced and the number of performances. There are abundant and well selected illustrations.

5658. Krehbiel, Henry Edward. Chapters of opera; being historical and critical observations and records concerning the lyric drama in New York from its earliest days down to the present time. 3d ed., rev., with an appendix containing tables of the opera seasons, 1908–1911, etc. New York, Holt, 1911. xvii, 460 p. illus. 12–262 ML1711.8.N3K73

5659. Krehbiel, Henry Edward. More chapters of opera; being historical and critical observations and records concerning the lyric drama in New York from 1908 to 1918. With illustrations and tables of performances within the period described. New York, Holt, 1919. xvi, 474 p. 20–217 ML1711.8.N3K74

Among a galaxy of distinguished music critics of early 20th-century New York, Henry Edward Krehbiel (1854–1923) was the finest scholar. His research in the history of New York opera was accurate, but limited to highlights; for a more complete and detailed picture, Odell's Annals of the New York Stage (no. 4924) must be consulted. Among local histories of American opera, however, Krehbiel's work remains the finest. A few monographs, less detailed and usually less reliable, cover other cities, but the best accounts are usually to be found in the large general histories of local stages, such as Reese D. James' Old Drury of Philadelphia (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1932. xv, 694 p.) and Arthur Herman Wilson's A History of the Philadelphia Theatre, 1835 to 1855 (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1935. 724 p.) for early Philadelphia, and Edmond M. Gagey's The San Francisco Stage (no. 4918) for San Francisco. Chapters of Opera summarizes the years before 1825 and then delves into the beginnings of Italian opera in New York, a favorite subject of Krehbiel's. The next few decades are passed over lightly, but a more detailed narrative resumes with the early impresarios (the memoirs of two of whom are of great interest: Max Maretzek's Crotchets and Quavers (New York, S. French, 1855. 346 p.), and James Henry Mapleson's The Mapleson Memoirs (New York, Bedford, Clarke, 1888. 2 v.)). The establishment of the Metropolitan Opera, the rage for Wagner, and the success of Oscar Hammerstein are discussed, as Krehbiel's narrative begins to incorporate material from his own experience and his writings as critic for the New York Tribune, whose staff he joined in 1880. More Chapters of Opera carries this survey from 1909 through 1918. The musical problems of the times are discussed frankly, with acute critical insight, and in a dignified style. Whereas Chapters of Opera derives much of its worth from historical objectivity, the main value of the sequel is its critical commentary on the contemporary scene by one of the most capable and respected critics of the day.

5660. Moore, Edward C. Forty years of opera in Chicago. New York, Liveright, 1930. 430 p. illus. 31–26070 ML1711.8.C5M7

To write the history of four decades of opera in a great city is no mean task; to relate this history in an interesting and readable style requires even greater skill. Here is a wealth of information concerning the growth of opera in Chicago, but, unfortunately, it often takes the form of a tedious account of board meetings, correspondence, and finances, interspersed with anecdotes of temperamental singers. The absence of a table of contents and chapter headings lessens the value of the book. Statistics of performances from 1910 to 1929, board members and officers of each season, soloists, and cities visited on tours are listed in the appendix.

5661. Sonneck, Oscar G. T. Early opera in America. New York, G. Schirmer, 1915. 230 p. illus. 15–5039 ML1711.S73

CONTENTS.—pt. 1. Pre-Revolutionary opera.—pt. 2. Post-Revolutionary opera.

Sonneck's histories of 18th-century American music remain definitive. Some details in the history of early opera have been filled in since this book was published, but few of its facts have been corrected, nor has its organization of the material been improved upon. The section on pre-Revolutionary opera is concerned with performances by one Tony Aston as early as 1703, and with the more successful founding attempts about 1750, particularly those of the company of Hallam and Henry in Philadelphia. During the decade after the war, theatrical performances were forbidden, and Sonneck's next section concerns the circumvention and breakdown of this ban. When performances were again legalized in 1792, a rapid growth took place. With Hallam's "Old American Company," now in New York, the Wignell-Reinagle "New Company" in Philadelphia, and smaller companies in Boston and Charleston, the author is enabled to organize this period by cities, with an "Epilogue" on the French opera companies. Although some of Sonneck's information is taken from George O. Seilhamer's History of the American Theatre [1749–97] (no. 4905 note) most of it is drawn from his own research, especially in early newspapers. The details of the text are complemented by large charts of performances. Within the text the details alternate with digressions which reveal the insight of a profound scholar in American music history.

5662. Taubman, Hyman Howard. Opera—front and back, by H. Howard Taubman. New York, Scribner, 1938. 388 p. 38–10497 ML1711.8.N3T22

The opera fan who desires to look at the human side of operatic personalities and obtain a glimpse of backstage (as well as onstage) catastrophes, will find this book to his taste. The author, for many years on the staff of The New York Times, and since the death of Olin Downes its chief critic, has collected many fresh tales of personalities, rehearsals, and operatic performances at the Metropolitan. In the course of his barrage of anecdotes Mr. Taubman painlessly communicates a vivid idea of the multiple functions and the immense labor involved in bringing about a unified operatic production. A chapter of considerable interest is "What Audiences Pay For," which lists the most popular operas presented at the Met during the ten seasons 1924–34, as well as those most frequently performed during the 27 years of Gatti-Casazza's management. Many excellent photographs of backstage scenes at the Metropolitan are reproduced at the end of the book.

5663. Thompson, Oscar. The American singer; a hundred years of success in opera. With 108 illustrations. New York, Dial Press, 1937. 426 p. 37–4988 ML400.T8A5

Oscar Thompson (1887–1945) was successively music critic of the New York Evening Post and Sun, esteemed for his high standards in criticism of vocal performances. This volume, however, contains a minimum of his astute evaluations and limits itself to brief biographical sketches of important singers associated with the American operatic stage. Mr. Thompson's criteria for inclusion are broad, and many artists are listed only because they were born in this country, or spent their flourishing years here. The well-written sketches include a chronological framework, the singer's most important roles, and frequently anecdotal material and an evaluation of the singer's significance in the development of American opera. The sketches are put in a roughly chronological progression, from Julia Wheatley, who made her singing debut in 1835, to Richard Bonelli, who returned to America in 1925.

I. Choirs

5664. Bergmann, Leola M. (Nelson). Music master of the Middle West, the story of F. Melius Christiansen and the St. Olaf Choir. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1944. 230 p. A44–5713 ML410.C543B4

"Sources": p. 202–209.

According to the preface this is a threefold story: "of the St. Olaf College as a center of Norwegian Lutheranism in America; the life story of F. Melius Christiansen as it unfolded in that setting; the story of his work in music and how it grew from regional to national significance." The author of this Iowa dissertation, a former member of the St. Olaf Choir, succeeds in catching the personality of this prominent choral director and composer. Frederik Melius Christiansen (1871–1955) was of Norwegian birth, came to America in 1888 and completed his musical education here and in Germany, and became director of music at St. Olaf's College (Northfield, Minn.) in 1903. The choir was his foundation and its national prestige the work of his skill and devotion. Lists of published compositions by Christiansen (p. 210–216), the St. Olaf Choir series compiled and edited by him, tours of the choir, and programs from 1912 to 1944 appear in the appendix.

5665. Hastings, Thomas. The history of forty choirs. New York, Mason Bros., 1854. 231 p. 6–12632 ML3925.H35

Thomas Hastings (1784–1872) ranks with Lowell Mason as the most influential teacher of sacred music in 19th-century America. From his experience he drew this collection of 40 "parables" illustrating the vicissitudes of the typical unpaid church choir of the day. These tales do not purport to recount musical history, of course, but rather are concerned to point a moral; their drift would seem to be that godliness finds a reflection in musical ability, and vice versa. Nevertheless these faded Victorian pages frequently reveal social mores and performance practices of religious music about 1850, such as a more formal treatment would probably miss.

5666. Messiter, Arthur H. A history of the choir and music of Trinity Church, New York, from its organization, to the year 1897. New York, E. S. Gorham, 1906. 324 p. illus. 7–20654 ML200.8.N5T7

Trinity Church was chartered in 1697 and opened for services the following March; Dr. Messiter examines its first two centuries in order "to sketch the history in this country of that system of Church music which is called Anglican, as distinct from Gregorian, Roman, and Lutheran." The resources of a commercial metropolis enabled Trinity to take the lead in many developments: here, in 1741, was installed the first organ in the Colonies; and here in 1770 the organist, William Tuckey (late of Bristol Cathedral) organized a performance of Handel's Messiah a year before its first presentation in Germany. Church and organ were burned during the Revolution, but a new building was consecrated in 1790 and a new organ imported from England. In 1846 another Bristol man, Edward Hodges, Mus. Doc. Cantab., became organist and choirmaster of the again rebuilt church, and inaugurated a choir of 26 voices, men, women, and boys. From that year the author is able to present specimen programs and to describe the musical part of the service in great detail. Dr. Henry S. Cutler of Boston, who took over in 1858, soon eliminated females from the choir, and got it into surplices from October 1860, when the Prince of Wales' attendance overawed the opposition. Messiter, a graduate of the Royal Academy of Music, was musical director from 1866 to 1897, and made Trinity a citadel of Victorian taste and practice.

5667. Walters, Raymond. The Bethlehem Bach Choir; an historical and interpretative sketch. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1918. 289 p. illus. 18–26489 ML200.8.B56W2

The rich musical tradition of the early German settlers of Pennsylvania and North Carolina, while still to be fully elucidated, is now increasingly appreciated in consequence of an organization of the archives and special festivals at Winston-Salem, N.C., and Bethlehem, Pa. The silver anniversary of the Bethlehem festivals was celebrated in this volume, compiled by a member of the executive committee who was also dean of Swarthmore College. Introductory chapters summarize the beginnings of the Collegium Musicum in 1744, the flourishing years through 1825, and the revival of the tradition in 1880. The first 25 festivals, held annually after 1900, as well as some special programs, are next described, with summaries of the music performed and quotations from favorable New York reviews. Sketches of the important leaders and performers, and lists of other personnel, complete the volume.

677676 O–63–54

J. Music Education

5668. Birge, Edward Bailey. History of public school music in the United States. New and augm. ed. Philadelphia, Oliver Ditson Co., 1939. 323 p. illus. 39–25132 ML200.B5 1939
Bibliography: p. 312–314.

Out of date and limited in scope though it is, this history provides a useful if pedestrian survey of institutions, trends, and some of the people most active in public school music from 1838 to the 1930's. The author discusses the New England singing schools, the pioneer period in Boston, the beginnings of method and of emphasis on reading music, and the newer, faster developments of the 20th century, such as the formation of nationwide music teachers' associations. Optimistically he concludes: "School music is no longer cloistered. Its spirit is that of co-operation and helpfulness. School and community are rapidly coming together." The historian will find the book especially useful for its rosters of organization officers and its many photographs of public school music leaders. The first edition of 296 pages was published in 1928.

5669. Davison, Archibald T. Music education in America, what is wrong with it? What shall we do about it? New York, Harper, 1926. 208 p. 26–11832 MT3.U5D26

Unlike Mr. Birge's book (no. 5668), this is not a historical study, but a stocktaking of what music meant to America in the 1920's and of how Americans were then teaching it to their children. In the three decades since its appearance we have come a long way from what Mr. Davison (professor of music and choral conductor at Harvard University) then found to be the general attitude. The "average American" liked a bit of popular music, jazzy and sentimental, but considered good music a nonessential frill and was unwilling to support its teaching in the schools. The book is nevertheless still worth reading, apart from its historical significance, in order to judge exactly how far we have come and how valid the author's suggestions for improvement remain.

5670. Jeffers, Edmund V. Music for the general college student. New York, King's Crown Press, 1944. 213 p. A44–1922 MT18.J4
"Selected bibliography on music for the general college student": p. [189]–192; "Bibliography of works cited in text": p. [193]–213.

This doctoral dissertation (Teachers College, Columbia University) sketches the development of music teaching in American colleges, with special reference to Harvard, Vassar, and Oberlin. It is useful for its figures (supplementing those in Randall Thompson's College Music; an Investigation for the Association of American Colleges (New York, Macmillan, 1935. xviii, 279 p.)) and its "philosophies of college music," but the fact that it does not consider the music programs of the larger universities restricts its value.

5671. Riker, Charles Cook. The Eastman School of Music; its first quarter century, 1921–1946. Rochester, N. Y., University of Rochester, 1948. 99 p. illus. 49–2415 MT4.R6E247

A history of this outstanding school of music necessarily extends major credit to three men: George Eastman, Rush Rhees, and Howard Hanson. Eastman (1854–1932), whose fortune was accumulated by the development of an inexpensive portable camera, also endowed the School of Medicine and Dentistry of the University of Rochester. Rhees (1860–1939) was president of the university during 1900–35, the period of Eastman's donations. Dr. Hanson (b. 1896), a composer and conductor of note, has been director of the school since 1924, and is chiefly responsible for its determined emphasis on American music of past and present. Mr. Riker records the devoted and unselfish contributions of each in the growth of the Eastman School of Music. The history of the school is traced from its beginnings to the time of publication with an outline of its departmental structure and of its many and varied activities. The widespread and significant influence that this institution has had on the American musical world is evident in the lists of publications and of recordings, and the roster of musically prominent alumni, which appear in the appendixes.

5672. Spalding, Walter Raymond. Music at Harvard; a historical review of men and events. New York, Coward-McCann, 1935. xiv, 310 p. illus. 35-20135 ML200.8.C2H3

Mr. Spalding (b. 1865) was a Harvard graduate and a professor of music there from 1903 until his retirement; and this book is a labor of love, albeit a prosaic one. Formal instruction in music began in the academic year of 1862–63, when John Knowles Paine (1839–1906) was engaged, at the very foot of the list of college officers, as instructor in music; in 1875 his achievement of the rank of full professor indicated that music had established itself in the liberal arts curriculum. But Professor Spalding's narrative has a much earlier point of departure, for music-making at Harvard long antedates music-teaching, and the students' orchestra, which rejoices in its traditional name of the Pierian Sodality, was organized on March 6, 1808. In 1837 it gave birth to the Harvard Musical Association for graduates, which has done much to further the musical life of Boston. The chapel choir dates from about 1814 and the glee club from 1833, but their potentialities were realized only with the coming of Archibald T. Davison (b. 1883) in 1910, who made them the means of revitalizing college choral music and Protestant church music throughout the United States. The list of distinguished graduates of the department of music includes such composers as Arthur Foote, Frederick S. Converse, Edward Burlingame Hill, Daniel Gregory Mason, John Alden Carpenter, Roger Sessions, Robert Nathaniel Dett, Randall Thompson, Virgil Thomson, and Walter Piston; as well as Ralph Kirkpatrick, the scholar-harpsichordist; Hugo Leichtentritt, the musicologist; and Henry T. Finck, Richard Aldrich, Arthur Elson, and John N. Burk, critics or writers on music.

K. Individual Musicians

5673. Anderson, Marian. My Lord, what a morning; an autobiography. New York, Viking Press, 1956. 312 p. illus. 56–10402 ML420.A6A3

A frank and factual autobiography, in which the famous Negro contralto describes her youth in Philadelphia, where she was born in 1902, her early training and subsequent concert career. There are chapters discussing her recordings, concert life, and repertory. The issue of race prejudice is handled with candor, and her musical philosophy is amply expounded. It is pleasantly free from the usual vices of prima donna autobiography.

5674. [Barber] Broder, Nathan. Samuel Barber. New York, Schirmer, 1954. 111 p. 54–13121 ML410.B23B7

This brief study of Samuel Barber (b. 1910) is divided into two parts; the smaller on "The Man" includes numerous extracts from the composer's letters, and the larger on "The Music" has many musical illustrations. Mr. Barber became a student at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia when it opened in 1924, and during his nine years there formed his lifelong friendship with the young Italian, Gian-Carlo Menotti. Mr. Broder describes his failure to make a career as a baritone, his frequent visits to Europe, and his service in the Army during World War II, when after a period spent transporting pianos he was commissioned to write a symphony for the Army Air Forces. In later years he has been one of the few American writers of serious music "earning enough from his compositions, in royalties, performance fees, and commissions for new works and awards, to enable him to devote all his time to composing." He is, nevertheless, a fastidious composer, and his opera from 1927 to 1953 number only 30. In part two Mr. Broder supplies a 13-page essay on "The Style" ("an attempt to fuse an essentially lyric spirit with an awakened awareness of the restlessness and discordance of our times") and descriptions of individual works in seven categories, from music for single voice to miscellaneous orchestral pieces. The Appendix (p. 100–109) includes a chronological list of works, a discography (both 78's and LP's), and a list of eight articles about Barber. There are 16 pages of excellent photographs.

5675. [Copland] Berger, Arthur V. Aaron Copland. New York, Oxford University Press, 1953. 120 p. 53–9183 ML410.C756B4

Mr. Copland, whom many regard as the foremost living American composer, was born in Brooklyn (1900), the son of Jewish immigrants from Lithuania. On finishing high school he studied harmony and composition with Rubin Goldmark, and in 1921 obtained his desire of going to Paris, where he was for three years the pupil of Nadia Boulanger. In the mid-1930's he abandoned his "esoteric" idiom and tried to say what he "had to say in the simplest possible terms"; he was rewarded by a gratifying popular acclaim for his scores written for broadcasting ("Music for Radio," 1937), for schools, films, and ballet, and became a regular recipient of awards and commissions. Arthur Berger (b. 1912), himself a composer of distinction, began his career as a disciple of Copland's and writes from a large personal knowledge of both the man and his music. He calls attention to Copland's "economy of means, the transparency of his textures, the preciseness of his tonal vocabulary." There is no artificiality in Copland's later manner, for "he has found the means of idealizing American folk tunes in their own terms and in terms of his own native experience." Julia Smith's Aaron Copland (New York, Dutton, 1955. 336 p.) cannot match Mr. Berger's interpretative insight, but it is done on a larger scale, adds some recent compositions, has much more biographical information, and, by discussing the music along with this material, makes the interrelationship of the two more evident. Both works have appendixes listing Mr. Copland's compositions, recordings, and writings.

5676. Damrosch, Walter J. My musical life. New York, Scribner, 1930. 390 p. illus.
30–23573 ML422.D16 1930

Damrosch (1862–1950) was born in Breslau, Germany, where his father Leopold conducted the Philharmonic Orchestra, but was brought to America at the age of nine. Responsibility and opportunity were thrust upon him by his father's sudden death in mid-season at the beginning of 1885; his intelligence, honesty, tact, and impressive personality ensured him a great career in spite of his lack of a first-rate musical talent. His autobiography was written in 1922 save for a final chapter, "Music and Modern Magic," added to the present edition of 1930. Since he retired after 23 years' service as the regular conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra in 1926, the greater part of his career as an operatic and orchestral conductor is sufficiently covered: his taking up his father's work as conductor of German and especially Wagnerian opera at the Metropolitan; his founding of the Damrosch Opera Company in 1894 when the Met was slighting Wagner; his work with the Oratorio Society of New York; his "crusading" tours of the United States with his orchestra; and his experiences during the trying times of World War I. To this point it is a clear picture of American musical life as the dean of American conductors saw it. What the book does not cover is its author's final and most original phase, when his conduct of the NBC Music Appreciation Hour from 1929 to 1942 made "Papa Damrosch" a familiar and a favorite personality in the homes and schoolrooms of the country.

5677. [Foster] Howard, John Tasker. Stephen Foster, America's troubadour. [Rev. ed.] New York, Crowell, 1954, ℗ 1953. xv, 433 p. illus.
53–11133 ML410.F78H6 1954

"The published works of Stephen Foster": p. 403–412.

"Give me the making of the songs of a nation, and I care not who makes its laws." More than any other man Stephen Foster (1826–1864) made the songs of America; they brought him contemporary celebrity and posthumous veneration, but in life he achieved neither happiness nor dignity. This wayward son of a solid Scotch-Irish merchant of Pittsburgh abandoned commerce when he found he could support himself by selling his songs to publishers such as Firth, Pond and Co. of New York (later he arranged a preliminary sale to E. P. Christy's Minstrels). Even after marriage and the birth of a daughter his royalties should have been adequate to middle-class comfort, but in the course of the 1850's Foster separated from his family and began a solitary life in New York City in which alcohol increasingly took over from music. As late as 1860 he could produce a ballad as absolute as "Old Black Joe," but within four years he died in complete squalor. The golden melancholy of Foster's plantation songs is unique, but he could bring off extraordinary successes in quite different veins ("Oh Susanna," "Jeanie with the Light Brown Hair"), and it would be hard to point to another untutored composer of comparable achievement. Mr. Howard's volume, originally published in 1934, incorporates the fragmentary evidence more or less in full and so makes rather heavy going, but is indispensable to anyone who wishes to form his own idea of this attractive but elusive songmaker. An early bibliography of the sheet music by Walter Whittlesey and O. G. Sonneck has been completed in James J. Fuld's A Pictorial Bibliography of the First Editions of Stephen C. Foster (Philadelphia, Musical Americana, 1957. 25, [181] p.).

5678. [Gershwin] Ewen, David. A journey to greatness; the life and music of George Gershwin. New York, Holt, 1956. 384 p. illus.
56–6192 ML410.G288E9

Lists of the composer's works: p. 330–355. Discography: p. 356–362. Bibliography: p. 363–368.

Gershwin (1898–1937), whose father was born Morris Gershovitz in St. Petersburg, Russia, began life on New York's East Side, but by no means in poverty or deprivation. Music was his own discovery and choice; he had good classical teachers from his 14th year, but followed popular music with intensity, and left high school to become a song plugger in Tin Pan Alley. By 1919 he had produced his first musical comedy score ("La, La Lucille") and his first song hit ("Swanee"); after the ovation which greeted Paul Whiteman's performance of his "Rhapsody in Blue" on February 12, 1924, he was an international figure. A succession of Broadway shows and motion picture scores, together with a steady stream of royalties from publications and performances, brought him wealth as well as fame. He made further ventures into symphonic jazz ("Piano Concerto in F," "An American in Paris"), which continue to divide critical opinion and to be very widely performed. His folk opera, "Porgy and Bess," which Mr. Ewen describes as his one completely successful "mingling of the serious and the popular," has had a greater balance of critical favor. An undiagnosed brain tumor struck Gershwin down in his 38th year and at the height of his powers. Until critical opinion concerning this quite unprecedented talent and career has crystallized, Mr. Ewen's open-mouthed success story will need little revision. In the year after the composer's death Merle Armitage gathered from 36 of Gershwin's friends tributes or reminiscences, which vary greatly in character but are nearly all marked by a sharp sense of personal loss. The roll of contributors to Armitage's George Gershwin (New York, Longmans, Green, 1938. 252 p.) is impressive—including, among others, Paul Whiteman, Walter Damrosch, DuBose Heyward, Rouben Mamoulian, Arnold Schönberg, Serge Koussevitzky, Eva Gauthier, and Olin Downes—and it is likely to remain a sourcebook of value. The Gershwin Years, by Edward Jablonski and Lawrence D. Stewart (Garden City, N.Y., Doubleday, 1958. 313 p.), also derives some immediacy from a reminiscent introduction by Carl Van Vechten and the active cooperation of Ira Gershwin, George's elder brother. The straightforward chronicle in which the authors alternate is provided with a wealth of illustrations, many of them from Ira's collection of family photographs.

5679. Gottschalk, Louis Moreau. Notes of a pianist. During his professional tours in the United States, Canada, the Antilles, and South America. Preceded by a short biographical sketch with contemporaneous criticisms. Edited by his sister, Clara Gottschalk. Translated from the French by Robert E. Peterson. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1881. 480 p. 6–3711 ML410.G68G6

Gottschalk (1829–1869), the first native American pianoforte virtuoso and composer of noteworthy music for the piano, was born in New Orleans of an English father and a Creole mother. At 13, for the completion of his musical education he was sent to Paris, where he studied with Berlioz. He began the career of a concert pianist in Europe and did not return to America until 1853. His compositions were long despised by the elect, but while many are thick sentimentalism or empty display, others have lately been discovered to incorporate rhythms regarded as characteristically American. Gottschalk died in Rio de Janeiro, where he had been entertaining the Emperor of Brazil, and his personal property of value was confiscated under a Brazilian droit d'aubaine; his family had great difficulty in retrieving the trunk in which the diaries of his tours were contained. His sister, Clara Gottschalk Peterson, prepared them for publication, and her husband, Dr. Peterson of Philadelphia, translated them from Gottschalk's French. Gottschalk was an alert and observant traveler, and his record of concert life from 1853 to 1868 is well-nigh unique; at Sandusky, Ohio, he was arrested in mid-recital because a $6.00 license fee had not been paid to the town. The brief life by his sister which preceded the diaries may now be supplanted by Vernon Loggins' Where the Word Ends; the Life of Louis Moreau Gottschalk (Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1958. 273 p.), which utilizes the Gottschalk manuscripts in the New York Public Library as well as a number of supplementary printed materials. He describes Gottschalk as "a man of pity—a prey to relatives, friends, and doting women," who wore himself out trying to satisfy the financial demands of his growing string of dependents. A record of American musical life in the next decade is supplied by the master of French operetta, Jacques Offenbach, who described his American sojourn of 1876 in Offenbach en Amérique (Paris, Calmann Lévy, 1877. xxxi, 252 p.). Two American translations appeared the same year; a recent one by Lander MacClintock has the title Orpheus in America (Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1957. 200 p.).

5680. [Griffes] Maisel, Edward M. Charles T. Griffes; the life of an American composer. New York, Knopf, 1943. xviii, 347, xi p. 43–6607 ML410.G9134M2

Charles Tomlinson Griffes (1884–1920) is the classic American example of the composer who is cut off by death just as he arrives at the fullness of his powers and wins public acclaim. Mr. Maisel's biography, filled with extracts from Griffes' letters and diaries, makes fascinating reading, but lacks clarity of outline as well as a list of works, and is a difficult book to use. It probably exaggerates the lugubriousness of Griffes' story, which is that of a delicate boy who became the favorite pupil of Miss Broughton, the English spinster who taught piano in Elmira, N.Y., and who lent the money to give him four years of advanced study in Berlin. On his return (1907) he became music instructor at Hackley School in Tarrytown, N.Y., which prepared boys for ivy-league colleges. Here Griffes' limited income, slow recognition, fastidious tastes, and homosexual inclinations doubtless provided an element of strain. Mr. Maisel emphasizes overwork, and Griffes did sit up late copying his scores as opportunity at last came his way; but the influenza epidemic of 1919 cut down many more robust people than he. His musical development had led him from German to French, Russian, and oriental models, but his later work in this vein is finished and effective, and his long piano sonata (1918), quite individual in style, indicates that he had not exhausted his potentialities. Mr. Maisel analyzes it at length and calls it "the first major utterance in American music."

5681. [Herbert] Waters, Edward N. Victor Herbert; a life in music. New York, Macmillan, 1955. xvi, 653 p. 55–1675 ML410.H52W3

"Compositions by Victor Herbert": p. 577–592. "Phonograph recordings made by Victor Herbert": p. 593–595.

Herbert (1859–1924) was born in Dublin of upper-class Irish parents, but his youth was spent in Stuttgart, Germany, where he received a thorough musical education and became a promising cello virtuoso. He came to America in 1886 when Walter Damrosch, recruiting talent for the Metropolitan, engaged the singer Herbert wished to marry, and obligingly included her suitor as a member of the orchestra. After miscellaneous beginnings as orchestra and chamber musician, soloist, conductor, and composer of instrumental music, his first large opportunity came when the players of the late Patrick Gilmore's celebrated military band chose him as their leader (1893–1900). The next year he entered the sphere which made him the most conspicuous American musician: for The Bostonians he composed his first operetta, "Prince Ananias" (1894). In the following 30 years he composed no fewer than 43 such works; "The Serenade" (1897), "Babes in Toyland" (1903), "The Red Mill" (1906), "Naughty Marietta" (1910), and several others were the greatest successes in the musical theater of their day. Herbert was also a capable and successful conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra (1898–1904), leaving only because of a widening breach with its manager; he thereupon formed his own orchestra for lighter music. He made two attempts at opera seria: "Natoma" (1911), which utilized Indian themes, and "Madeleine" (1914), but neither gave much satisfaction at the time or since. Mr. Waters here tells for the first time the full story of Herbert's successful lawsuit against the blackmailing Musical Courier (1902), his advocacy of the Copyright Act of 1909, and his part in founding the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers (ASCAP) in 1914. Most reviewers have demurred at Mr. Waters' high revaluation of the operetta music, but nearly all agree that this is a masterly piece of research and documented biography, a lifelike portrait of a great musical personality, and an exceptionally solid contribution to four decades of American music history.

5682. [Ives] Cowell, Henry, and Sidney (Robertson) Cowell. Charles Ives and his music. New York, Oxford University Press, 1955. 245 p. illus. 54–10000 ML410.I94C6

Bibliography: p. 235–238.

The musical career and fortunes of Charles Ives (1874–1954) are probably the most singular of any considerable composer in music history. The son of the town bandmaster of Danbury, Conn., he obtained a diversity of musical training and experience in his youth, and at 14 was "the youngest organist in the State." But his father, wearying of hand-to-mouth finance, entered a bank two years before his death; and on graduating from Yale Ives entered a New York insurance office. In 1907 he set up his own agency, affiliated with Mutual Life of New York; it was extremely successful, and a pamphlet setting forth his own ideas became "the Bible of insurance agents." Meanwhile, and especially from 1910 to 1918, he went on composing great quantities of music, in a great variety of forms; the "Chronological List of Compositions" (p. 211–233) is a long one. A severe illness in 1918 damaged his heart and brought his production to an almost complete stop; in 1929 he retired from business and spent his remaining quarter-century in valetudinarian comfort. His music was almost completely unknown and unplayed, but from time to time a zealous advocate appeared. After Henry Bellamann and Nicholas Slonimsky had failed to arouse public interest, in 1939 John Kirkpatrick finally succeeded with his performances of the "Concord Sonata." From the beginning Ives had gone his own way in polyphony (melodic lines set against each other, "each with its own key and perhaps also its own rhythm"), harmony ("at a time when consecutive extreme dissonances were unknown, Ives used them constantly"), melody ("in the extension of his motifs, Ives sometimes employs melodic inversion, retrograde and inverted retrograde"), rhythm ("in some spots and in some ways probably more involved than that to be found in any other written music"), and form (the creation of "an underlying unity out of a large number of diverse elements, used asymmetrically"). After World War I the musical avant-garde began doing many of the things which Ives had been doing 25 years earlier; when his music was at length performed, critics found it influenced, among others, by Hindemith—who had not begun to compose until Ives had stopped, and of whose music Ives had never heard a note!

5683. [MacDowell] Gilman, Lawrence. Edward MacDowell; a study. New York, J. Lane, 1909. 190 p. illus. 9–609 ML410.M12G52

MacDowell (1861–1908) was born in New York City, studied music at Paris and Frankfort, and at the age of 19 became head piano teacher at the Darmstadt Conservatory. On returning to America in 1884 he pursued a career as pianist and composer until 1896, when "the assurance of an income freed from precariousness" led him to undertake the organization and direction of the new Department of Music at Columbia University. Eight years of administration and heavy teaching, combined with continued composition and occasional performances, brought him to the point of nervous exhaustion, and his resignation in 1904 failed to halt a progressive mental collapse: his creation was over and death ahead. His professorship had been offered to him as "the greatest musical genius America has produced," and Gilman considered, 13 years later, that "he gave to the art of creative music in this country its single impressive and vital figure." Seldom has so unrivaled a contemporary reputation been succeeded by such complete neglect; it was MacDowell's misfortune that his disappearance from the scene coincided with a revolutionary change in musical fashions, and his great creative achievement was shortly regarded as old hat. Gilman's memorial volume, which has had no successor, is divided into two parts: "The Man" consists of a brief biography and a character study; "The Music-Maker" characterizes his style as a refined and sincere romanticism, traces his emergence as "A Matured Impressionist," and has separate treatments of his piano sonatas and songs. A "List of Works" (p. 181–190) is appended.

5684. [Mason] Rich, Arthur Lowndes. Lowell Mason, "the father of singing among the children." Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina press, 1946. 224 p. 46–7444 ML410.M398R5

"Lowell Mason's writings": p. 138–172. "Other related sources": p. 172–194.

Lowell Mason (1792–1872) made significant contributions both to sacred and to public school music in this country. The two careers are interwoven in Mason's activities, so that although, as its subtitle indicates, this book is concerned with Mason's teaching, it is also important to the study of his sacred music. The story of Mason's life and of the Boston Academy of Music, the school he founded in 1833, is painstakingly related and well documented. His importance is strikingly demonstrated in chapter 9, where parallel texts show how Mason's statements anticipate significant quotations from music educators of today. But while Mason's importance remains unquestioned, other students of American music history credit him with less priority and originality than does Mr. Rich. The extensive bibliography adds to the value of the work.

5685. [Rodgers] Taylor, Deems. Some enchanted evenings; the story of Rodgers and Hammerstein. New York, Harper, 1953. 244 p. illus. 53–7750 ML410.R6315T3

Other composers may have written more significant music for the Broadway stage during the first half of the 20th century, but Richard Rodgers (b. 1902) has indubitably been the most consistently successful. Throughout his long professional career, he has been associated with only two lyrists: Lorenz Hart from 1918 to 1942 and, after Hart's death, Oscar Hammerstein II (b. 1895). Mr. Taylor casts his book into four parts: the first covers Rodgers' early years, his meeting with Hart, and the musical comedies and motion pictures they wrote together; the second goes back to sketch Hammerstein's earlier theatrical experiences. Part three deals with the Rodgers and Hammerstein collaborations, while in the short part four Mr. Taylor says what little he has to say on a variety of topics, contrasting typical Hart and Hammerstein lyrics, describing a characteristic Rodgers melody with 14 short musical examples, and ending with brief accounts of "Victory at Sea" and "Me and Juliet," which had apparently been produced after the main body of the book had gone to press. Mr. Taylor admits in his introduction that there are difficulties in writing a biography of two personal friends whom he admires inordinately, and there is here no probing of personalities, no adverse criticism, and no careful weighing of the relative merits of other writers for the contemporary Broadway stage. These limitations are offset by Mr. Taylor's deft pen and ready wit, and if the descriptions of so many shows follow a repetitive pattern, the essential facts are all assembled for convenient reference. David Ewen has devoted a single volume to Richard Rodgers (New York, Holt, 1957. 378 p.).

5686. Samaroff Stokowski, Olga. An American musician's story. New York, Norton, 1939. 326 p. illus. 39–27277 ML417.S18A2

The author was born Miss Hickenlooper in San Antonio, Texas; was for a few years Mme. Boris Loutzky of Berlin and St. Petersburg; became Olga Samaroff at the outset of her concert career in 1905 (her manager rejected not only her maiden name but all the Anglo-Saxon surnames in her ancestry); added Stokowski when she married the conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony in 1911 (the year before his transfer to Philadelphia); and retained his name after her separation from Leopold Stokowski in 1923. Madame Samaroff Stokowski (1882–1948) had an exceedingly varied musical career: as a student at the Paris Conservatoire and in Berlin; as an informal coach to Geraldine Farrar; as a touring pianist in America and Europe; as wife of the conductor of a major orchestra; as an early maker of piano records for Victor; as a teacher at the Juilliard Graduate School of Music from its opening in 1925, and at Philadelphia Conservatory; as music critic for the New York Evening Post; as founder of the Schubert Memorial, a foundation which enables promising young American musicians to give concerts; and as a pioneer in the "Layman's Music Courses" intended to create more "active" and responsive musical audiences. All these phases are narrated dispassionately and with some reflective commentary, and the final chapter is an equally thoughtful view of American musical life in general.

5687. [Schuman] Schreiber, Flora Rheta, and Vincent Persichetti. William Schuman. New York, G. Schirmer, 1954. 139 p.
54–14322 ML410.S386S3

Miss Schreiber contributes part one, "The Man" (p. 1–48). Mr. Schuman (b. 1910) comes of a middle-class German Jewish family of New York City; for his first two decades his musical interest was limited to participation in a jazz band and the composition of popular songs. The first concert of serious music he ever attended, the New York Philharmonic's on April 4, 1930, brought about what can only be called a conversion; he began the study of music theory, and in 1936 became a pupil of Roy Harris at the Juilliard Graduate School. An outpouring of compositions in a variety of forms resulted, and by 1945 Mr. Schuman was chosen to head the Juilliard School, which he has done ever since, with some diminution but no suspension of his composition. There is an abundance of good photographs. Mr. Persichetti, himself a composer and a member of the Juilliard faculty, writes part two, "The Music." Schuman's style, he says, is marked by "the strong-flavored energy that generates a constant boil of movement," but is always based on singable melodies, and is definable as "structural derivatives of melodic character." Five works are analyzed at length with numerous examples in musical notation. The Appendix (p. 126–134) has lists of works, records, and articles by and about Schuman.

XXVI

Art and Architecture

A.	The Arts	5688–5697
B.	Architecture: General	5698–5703
C.	Architecture: Special	5704–5725
D.	Interiors	5726–5732
E.	Sculpture	5733–5740
F.	Painting	5741–5759
G.	Painting: Individual Artists	5760–5776
H.	Prints and Photographs	5777–5783
I.	Decorative Arts	5784–5793
J.	Museums	5794–5800
K.	Art and History	5801–5807

THE WORKS listed in this chapter, which deals with the visual arts and with practitioners, collections, and exhibitions thereof, range from the scholarly and the critical to the popular. Although a widespread interest in the arts did not arise in this country until the 19th century, a very considerable literature on American art has accumulated, principally since the 1920's, from which we can present only a selection intended to be both representative and stimulating. Certain somewhat arbitrary omissions have been made. For example, books on the architecture of single states and cities have been almost wholly excluded. Section C includes only six monographs devoted to individual architects, of whom but one is an exponent of the modern idiom; alternative or additional choices will doubtless occur to the reader. Sculpture, treated in Section E, may appear to have been slighted, but it would seem that American achievements in this field are rather less distinguished than those in architecture or painting, a conclusion warranted, perhaps, by the scarcity of published material on the subject. In Section G, a mere sampling, only three contemporary artists have received full treatment; many others are briefly presented in three albums of recent paintings listed in the previous section. Some omissions reflect the nonavailability of material. Thus, if the great post-Civil War exemplar of the mystical strain in American painting, Albert Pinkham Ryder, receives less than his due share of attention, it is because of a lacuna in art scholarship. In Section H, prints and photographs are interpreted as high art, as art for the people, and as records of the American scene and event; more material of the last kind is included in Section K. There is, of course, no clear line of demarcation between the decorative arts treated in Section I, such as the metalwork, glassware, pottery, and needlework produced by artisans and craftsmen prior to the industrial revolution, and the folk arts and crafts—quilting, figureheads, samplers, kitchenware, and the like—dealt with in Chapter XXIV. In each will be found titles of interest to both the student and the collector. During recent years, the picture book has become an exceedingly popular medium for the portrayal of American history; selections for inclusion in Section K, however, have been drawn from those which notice the artistic as well as the documentary elements, and which accompany their pictures with a substantial text of some kind.

A. The Arts

5688. Baur, John I. H. Revolution and tradition in modern American art. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1951. 170 p. (The Library of Congress series in American civilization)
51–13174 N6512.B3

Defines and traces the development of the chief movements, particularly those revolutionary in subject or form, such as impressionism and abstract art, in American painting and sculpture of the last 50 years. The author considers the relations of the new schools to each other, their reflections of the American scene or their transformation from the European to the American idiom, and their effects upon traditional survivals. Three final chapters are concerned with the position of the artist in modern civilization, current trends in art and criticism, and the "Americanism" of American art. The 199 illustrations, averaging two or three to the page, are in black and white.

5689. Cahill, Holger, and Alfred H. Barr, eds. Art in America; a complete survey. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1935. 162 p.
36–1288 N6505.C32

"Lists and bibliographies": p. 153–162.

A broad historical review of the American arts by a number of contributors, sponsored by the General Federation of Women's Clubs with the cooperation of several museums and the National Broadcasting Company. Part I deals with painting, sculpture, and architecture from their respective beginnings to the Civil War. Part II continues the annals of these arts from 1865 to 1934, and adds brief essays on stage design, photography, and the motion picture. Both of the main sections are revisions of separate 1934 publications. There are numerous halftones in the text and a group of 17 colored plates following page 62.

5690. Dunlap, William. A history of the rise and progress of the arts of design in the United States. New ed., edited, with additions, by Frank W. Bayley and Charles E. Goodspeed. Boston, Goodspeed, 1918. 3 v. 18–11108 N6505.D9 1918

Bibliography: v. 3, p. 346–377.

First published in 1834 by William Dunlap, who "became permanently a painter" only at the age of 51, this work has since served as a primary source of information for the student of early American art. Dunlap's method was to present a history of painting, and in smaller degree of engraving, architecture, and sculpture, through a series of biographical notices of the artists, from John Watson, a portrait painter who came to the colonies in 1715, to Freeman Rawdon, a New York engraver, born in 1804. He gives three chapters of autobiography, some notes on technical developments, accounts of the establishment of the early academies, and information upon early collectors and collections. The editors have ventured upon "judicious pruning and corrections of conspicuous errors" in the text as originally printed, and have provided a list of several hundred additional artists working in this country before 1835 (vol. 3, p. 281–343).

5691. Kouwenhoven, John A. Made in America; the arts in modern civilization. Garden City, N.Y., Doubleday, 1948. xv, 303 p.
A49–1905 N6505.K6 1948a

Thesis—Columbia University.

"List of sources and references": p. [271]–290.

Develops the theme that the unique factor of a "democratic-technological vernacular" tradition has been overlooked in the interpretation of American arts and culture. "The purest form of this vernacular," says the author, "is represented by technological design." This functional, vernacular design, characterized since the middle of the 19th century by economy, simplicity, and flexibility, has interacted with the "tradition of cultivated taste" which emanated from Europe. "It is in their interpenetration and in their alternate ascendancy in the work of different men and different periods that the history of American art consists." Dr. Kouwenhoven traces the increasing influence and acceptance of vernacular forms and techniques from "Fordism," time and motion studies, and jazz, to literature and the fine arts.

5692. La Follette, Suzanne. Art in America. New York, Harper, 1929. 361 p.
29–29377 N6505.L3

A critical history of the arts in America from the 17th century to 1929, and of the changes in taste evoked by the evolution of its social, cultural, and economic structure. To the author the United States has always been a nation of "cultural poverty." "The Puritan sought to suppress the artistic impulse in order that it might not divert him from spiritual interests; his descendants sought to suppress it in order that it might not divert them from material interests." Early colonial art was utilitarian, ornament being subordinated to structure.

In the 18th century, under European influences, ornament became an integral part of structure and eventually even weakened it. In the 19th, under the egalitarian influences of the frontier West and machine industry, the main drift was "toward the dull and the commonplace in art"; the appeal of a picture lay in subject, not artistic merit. Except for skyscraper and factory, architecture during the years 1900–1925 was bound to "archaeology," but modern painting taught the public to seek "significance rather than verisimilitude." The 103 gravure illustrations average one or two to a page.

5693. Larkin, Oliver W. Art and life in America. New York, Rinehart, 1949. xviii, 547 p.
49–11231 N6505.L37

"Bibliographical notes": p. 483–514.

Interprets for the informed layman the American arts and the ways in which they have expressed our manner of living, and provides for the general student of American civilization a very serviceable introduction to American art history. The six major sections together span the years 1600–1945. As the author observes, usefulness was the chief criterion of the colonial arts. The buildings and sculpture of American neoclassicism served as symbols of political independence. The Jacksonian era saw a flourishing "art for the people" in a proliferation of genre paintings which furnished popular subjects for the new lithographs, and saw, as well, a persistence of "art by the people" in the richness and variety of the so-called primitives. The last three decades of the 19th century, when size and slickness were the international fashion, were a time of malaise for true artists, but a few continued to seek "palpable truth" in "an age of surfaces"; and there was a whole new departure in architecture. The 20th century has seen the rise of urban realism and the development among artists of social consciousness and participation. Closely linked to the text is a brilliant repertory of illustrations.

5694. Lynes, Russell. The tastemakers. New York, Harper, 1954. 362 p.
54–8968. E169.1.L95

A popular and readable survey of popular taste in the visual arts from the advent of Jacksonian democracy, when "taste became everybody's business and not just the business of the cultured few," to the present day. The "tastemakers" are those who have sought to influence the public's preference, from Andrew J. Downing and James J. Jarves to Pepsicola and Corning's Glass Center. The author, editor of Harper's Magazine, does not believe that American taste is improving, but thinks that varieties and conflicts in taste are a sign of artistic vitality.

5695. Mumford, Lewis. The brown decades; a study of the arts in America, 865–1895. [2d ed.] New York, Dover, 1955. 266 p.
55–14851 N6510.M8 1955

Includes bibliographies.

Originally published in 1931 and based upon lectures delivered by the author in 1929, this book is written in an informal vein for the layman. It emphasizes the positive aspects of American culture in the reckless and extravagant years 1865–95. "Beneath the crass surface," observes Mr. Mumford, "a new life was stirring in departments of American thought and culture that had hitherto been barren, or entirely colonial and derivative." The creative manifestations of the "brown decades" have been overlooked, he believes, and he points out the accomplishments of philosophers and men of letters as well as the shift in the whole culture to a concern with the industrial and plastic arts. "The architect, the engineer, the landscape architect, the painter, all rode in together on the rising tide of industrialism." Mr. Mumford considers, among others, the architects Louis Sullivan, H. H. Richardson, and the young F. L. Wright; John A. Roebling, designer of the Brooklyn Bridge; Frederick Law Olmsted, planner of New York's Central Park; the painters, Ryder, Eakins, George Fuller, and Homer; and Alfred Stieglitz, "photographer and interpreter."

5696. New York. Museum of Modern Art. Abstract painting and sculpture in America, by Andrew Carnduff Ritchie. New York, 1951. 159 p. 51–10619 ND212.N395

"Catalogue of the exhibition . . . January 23 to March 25, 1951," by Margaret Miller: p. 148–156.

Bibliography, by Bernard Karpel: p. 156–159.

A picture book and catalog of Mr. Ritchie's selections for an exhibition of abstract art of the years 1912–50 "which seeks to display, at as high a level of quality as possible, enough distinctive examples of abstract painting and sculpture produced by Americans, or foreigners long resident in America, to give the observer and reader a sufficient appreciation of the variety and extent of this form of art in this country." "Protest against the established order of traditional perspective, naturalistic space and color, conventional subject matter," in Mr. Ritchie's opinion, forms the factor common to all motivations toward abstract art. Recent work he classifies into the following, admittedly somewhat arbitrary, categories: pure geometric, architectural and mechanical geometric, naturalistic geometric, expressionist geometric, and expressionist biomorphic. Unfortunately, only a few of the many illustrations are in color. An earlier sampling assembled by Sidney Janis, Abstract & Surrealist Art in America (New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1944. 146 p.), presents work by 30 20th-century painters classified as abstract, and 30 more classified as surrealist; the layman would find it difficult to say why some pieces are assigned to the one school rather than to the other, and the paucity of color plates certainly does not make for clarification.

5697. Purcell, Ralph. Government and art, a study of American experience. Washington, Public Affairs Press, 1956. 129 p. 56–8543 N6512.P8

Government in America—Federal, State and local—has done considerably less than in Europe to encourage the fine arts, but its total patronage has been by no means negligible. This volume traces that patronage in all fields save the most important one—the architecture of public buildings. From 1817 to 1933 the Federal Government commissioned a number of murals, acquired some paintings, and engaged a few painters to report Western expeditions or wartime scenes. From 1933 to 1939 the Roosevelt administration subsidized several thousand artists stranded by the economic collapse, not only through the Federal Art Project of the Works Progress Administration, but also by the embellishment of public buildings through the Treasury's Fine Arts Section. Contemporary trends include the wide circulation of exhibitions of American art abroad by the State Department, and a remarkable development of collections and activities at the National Gallery of Art. The author concludes: "If private patronage of the Arts declines as it seems likely to do, patronage by the government will become a necessity if the Arts are to continue."

B. Architecture: General

5698. Andrews, Wayne. Architecture, ambition and Americans; a history of American architecture, from the beginning to the present. New York, Harper, 1955. 315 p. 55–8014 NA705.A5

"A selected bibliography": p. 289–303.

A report on architectural taste in the Anglo-American main current of United States history, taste being defined as "the record of the ambition which leads the architect to spend more time and energy than is reasonable, and the client, often but not always, to invest more money than common sense would dictate." This, then, is a chronicle mainly of imposing residences, "those that were the last word in their time and place." The steady economic advance of the United States in the 19th century kept generating new fortunes, the masters of which looked for fresh ways to impress their neighbors and thereby encouraged professional architects and builders to make stylistic innovations. Mr. Andrews delights in the resultant variety that ranges from the formal, impersonal architecture created for the "symbolic businessman," to the informal, irregular styles created in our own day. He has spent 16 years and has visited 39 States in making the splendid photographs which illustrate this lively and catholic record of the mansions of America.

5699. Fitch, James Marston. American building; the forces that shape it. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1948. 382 p. 48–5133 NA705.F5

The "umbilical relationship between men and buildings" forms the chief concern of this thought-provoking, if somewhat doctrinaire, book. Its first third traces the major forces that have shaped American architecture from the beginning to the Victorian era and the Columbian exposition of 1893, and even here the point of view is that of the technologist. The latter two-thirds explores the "nature and function of contemporary building equipment . . . in relation to the respective environments which they modify": the atmospheric, thermal, luminous, sonic, spatial, and animate elements, in the author's classification. In order to achieve his ideals of the multiple use and the flexible organization of space, "democratic long-range planning" is necessary. A democratic esthetic can achieve rising standards of quality, he believes, only when an increase in the quantity and continuity of building makes intense creative activity possible.

5700. Hamlin, Talbot Faulkner. The American spirit in architecture. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1926. 353 p. The Pageant of America, v. 13) 26–9196 NA705.H3 E178.5.P,v.13

A picture book, presenting an exceptionally large and varied selection of materials, but the 832 halftones are small and indifferently executed. The author gives half of his space to developments since 1880 and presents such types as railroad stations, state capitols, county courthouses, museums, banks, public libraries, tombs, monuments, schoolhouses, university buildings, factories, warehouses, apartment houses, hotels, and theaters. He points out the representative and the horrible as well as the excellent. The text emphasizes environment and local materials, contact with the mother country, particularly England, economic conditions, urbanization, and westward expansion as factors of primary importance in the development of American architecture.

5701. Mumford, Lewis. Sticks and stones; a study of American architecture and civilization. [2d ed.] New York, Dover, 1955. 238 p.
55–14852 NA705.M8 1955

First published in 1924, this important chronological survey of American architecture demonstrates "how architecture and civilization develop hand in hand." Mr. Mumford traces here the major trends: the "medieval tradition" of the "close village-community" in 17th-century New England; the early 18th-century derivations from the Renaissance; the vernacular work of the craftsmen, and the classical work of the educated gentlemen and professional architects of the early republic, among them Jefferson and Latrobe. The "period of disintegration" in the early 19th century was followed by a number of discordant styles and combinations of them. The durable in romanticism was expressed by H. H. Richardson's continuator, Louis Sullivan. McKim, White, Hunt, and Burnham exemplify the magnificence and opulence of the ensuing "imperial age," while a new electicism was pursued by Bertram Goodhue. The subsequent "machine age" and the dilemmas posed by it to the architect and to society form the subjects of Mr. Mumford's final chapters.

5702. Pickering, Ernest. The homes of America, as they have expressed the lives of our people for three centuries. New York, Crowell, 1951. 284 p. (The Growth of America series)
51–4857 NA7205.P5

"Architectural structures," in Professor Pickering's opinion, "form the most permanent and revealing record of a civilization." Domestic architecture has yielded to the pressures of climate and geography, and has "expressed the materials, construction, and social order of the time." About two-thirds of the book is devoted to the colonial, the Georgian and Federal periods, and the Roman and Greek revivals. The "era of confusion," after 1865, and the present century are more sketchily presented, since the author is considerably more interested in outstanding examples of early design than in the more recent constructions which constitute the great majority of American homes. Numerous halftones illustrate the text.

5703. Tallmadge, Thomas E. The story of architecture in America. New, enl. and rev. ed. New York, Norton, 1936. 332 p.
36–23858 NA705.T3 1936

First published in 1927.

A history of American architecture from the 1630's to 1935, written by an architect primarily for the layman. Stylistic periods are defined as: "The Colonial—1630–1800," subdivided into Early American, 1630–1700, and Georgian, 1700–1800; "The Post-Colonial—1790–1820"; "The Greek Revival—1820–1860"; "The Parvenu Period—1860–1880"; "The Romanesque Revival—1876–1893"; "Eclecticism—1893–1917"; and since 1917. Separate chapters consider Spanish and Creole architecture, the World's Fair of 1893, and Louis Sullivan as the precursor of functionalism. Particular attention is paid to architectural details and the ornamentation of both exteriors and interiors. Although nothing in our architectural history is "more beautiful, more vigorous, more expressive of its times" than Georgian of 1750, "the skyscraper is far and away the most important architectural achievement of America, her great gift to the art of building." Along with numerous halftone illustrations are a few typical plans.

C. Architecture: Special

5704. Bridenbaugh, Carl. Peter Harrison, first American architect. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1949. xvi, 195 p. illus.
49–9109 NA737.H3B7

"Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Virginia."

A "biographical essay" about Peter Harrison (1716–1775) who arrived as a colonist at Newport, R.I., in 1739. This English seaman became the master of no fewer than 10 skills, among them shipbuilding and woodcarving, as well as "America's first important architect." In his design of the Redwood Library at Newport, 1749, Harrison introduced the Palladian style of architecture to this country, and so anticipated Thomas Jefferson in the revival of classical models. Although Harrison was possessor of "the largest and best-selected architectural library of colonial America," the plans for his churches, synagogue, and market at Newport, Boston, and Cambridge, Mass., were those "of the designer, not the copyist." His story is here documented from the fragmentary surviving sources and set forth against the background of contemporary colonial history.

5705. Condit, Carl W. The rise of the skyscraper. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1952. 255 p. 52–6468 NA712.C65

A comprehensive history of the Chicago school of architecture and of the evolution of the commercial skyscraper, from the time of the great fire of 1871 to World War I, and from the first structural innovations of the engineers to the functional designs and architectonics of men like Dankmar Adler, Sullivan, Burnham, and William Holabird. The work is based in large part upon contemporary periodicals, the records of engineering and architectural firms, and the files of commercial photographers. Although it designed every type of building, the "Chicago school is associated with the invention and mastery of steel framing and with the consequent development of the modern office building, hotel, and apartment block." Their success is attested by "the largest concentration of first-rate commercial architecture in the world. The 108 halftones from photographs have been carefully selected.

5706. Forman, Henry Chandlee. The architecture of the Old South: the medieval style, 1585–1850. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1948. 203 p. 48–8948 NA720.F6

Bibliography: p. [185]–191.

Based upon the author's wide field experience in archaeology, this book incorporates lectures originally presented at Goucher College. "It is our premise . . . that en bloc American architecture of the Southern Colonies in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries belonged to the English medieval period, which, far from terminating with the accession of Elizabeth, continued until close to 1700. Distance did not dilute or corrupt the style in America." An introductory section considers our English late Gothic heritage; Parts II–III, constituting the bulk of the book, deal respectively with Virginia and Maryland architecture; and Part IV devotes brief chapters to the medieval architecture of Bermuda, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. Professor Forman's many sketches and plans include reconstructions of ruined or vanished edifices and contribute in large measure to the comparisons made in his text between American buildings and their English prototypes.

5707. Garvan, Anthony N. B. Architecture and town planning in colonial Connecticut. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1951. xiv, 166 p. (Yale historical publications. History of art, 6) 51–14684 NA7235.C8G3

"Bibliographical note": p. 152–159.

"An investigation of the relationship between domestic architecture and the demography and national origins of colonial Connecticut." The book, an outgrowth of a dissertation, makes use of aerial photographs, as well as manuscript land surveys and other cartographical materials. "The colony's architecture, town plans, and land division were like its settlers—rural, Protestant, and English." Choosing a site with an eye both to defense and to pasturage, the settlers reserved "a few central acres within the village unit for a meetinghouse and for the minister's own house." Beyond the symmetrical center lay an area of "wandering, haphazard lanes" which frustrates 20th-century traffic and is often scrapped by the modern planner. Since conservatism marked Connecticut design, style changes from English models were made chiefly in "small things and subtle details." An original "rich variety of architecture" gave way to the predominance of the "clapboard lean-to house, directly descended from the yeoman post-enclosure farmhouse of eastern England," which crowded out the other styles and furnished the basis for later developments. Many plates and figures illustrate the text.

5708. Hamlin, Talbot F. Benjamin Henry Latrobe. New York, Oxford University Press, 1955. xxxvi, 633 p. 55–8117 NA737.L34H3

Based upon the "priceless Latrobe papers and sketchbooks" as well as other sources, both primary and secondary, this Pulitzer prize winning book is a detailed biography of Benjamin Henry Latrobe (1764–1820), the "single-minded creator of the architectural profession in the United States." His designs for the Bank of Pennsylvania and the water system of Philadelphia (1798) established him at once as "the most accomplished and imaginative of the architects and engineers in the United States." Restrained and geometric in much of its composition, his revolutionary work was "naturally classic in detail and turned always to Greek precedent for inspiration." He achieved his ambition "to establish architecture as a high and respected profession" through his own works, such as the Baltimore Cathedral (1805) and portions of the United States Capitol (1803–17), and through the accomplishments of his students, Robert Mills and William Strickland. Numerous plates and figures illustrate the text.

5709. Hamlin, Talbot F. Greek revival architecture in America: being an account of important trends in American architecture and American life prior to the War Between the States. New York, Oxford University Press, 1944. xl, 439 p. 44–865 NA707.H32

"A list of articles on architecture in some American periodicals prior to 1850, by Sarah Hull Jenkins Simpson Hamlin": p. [356]–382.

Bibliography: p. [383]–409.

A broad yet detailed history of Greek revival architecture in the United States during the years 1820–60. Seeking monumental permanence and conceived in terms of function rather than of archaeology, this architecture was inspired by classical Greek style, using its details, but incorporating them in original building forms. Greek revival architecture received a "distinguished start" in the designs of Benjamin Henry Latrobe as early as 1798. The use of Greek style did not become universal, however, until the late 1820's, and then largely through the work of two of Latrobe's pupils, Robert Mills (1781–1855) and William Strickland (1787–1854), who brought the movement to its mature structural inventiveness, soundness of construction, and excellence of execution. It flourished in a culture "learned, founded on classic myth, classic literature, classic art." The "emergence of the millionaire was as fatal to the artistic ideals of the Greek Revival as were the speed, the speculation, and the exploitation that produced him."

5710. Hitchcock, Henry Russell. The architecture of H. H. Richardson and his times. New York, Museum of Modern Art, 1936. xxiv, 311 p. 36–3985 NA737.R5H5

A study of the architectural accomplishments of Henry Hobson Richardson (1838–1886) in the light of the setting within which he worked. The author has visited almost all of Richardson's extant buildings and has had access to his sketchbooks. During the 1850's, the intellectuals had succeeded in terminating the Greek revival, and with it a certain integrity of constructon. "It is in relation to this almost complete loss of the sense of architecture as sound building that Richardson's achievement after the Civil War is most remarkable." He developed a personal style characterized chiefly by "massive walls, lintel-covered openings, . . . broad arches," and vigorous polychromy; he "was ready to find inspiration in any part of the past that appealed to him. The Romanesque was perhaps most useful." A great individual, he raised American architecture "from the slough of the late sixties." By the 1880's, he had achieved an "excessive popularity, which led to over-production." The text is illustrated by 145 photographic reproductions of drawings, façades, and plans.

5711. Hitchcock, Henry Russell. In the nature of materials, 1887–1941; the buildings of Frank Lloyd Wright. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1942. xxxv, 143 p. 42–13893 NA737.W7H5

"Chronological list of executed work and projects: 1887–1941": p. 105–130.

5712. Wright, Frank Lloyd. An American architecture. Edited by Edgar Kaufmann. New York, Horizon Press, 1955. 269 p. 55–12271 NA737.W7K3

Professor Hitchcock's book aims "to display as fully as may be the architectural work and projects of Wright, with particular emphasis on the expression of the 'Nature of Materials.'" Subordinated to the section of plates and linked closely to it, the introductory text provides a rapid historical survey of Frank Lloyd Wright's architecture. Parts I–II show the influences exerted upon him, especially by Richardson's followers and by Sullivan, and the steps by which he attained maturity during the late 1880's and the 1890's. Parts III–VI are devoted to Wright's mature work of the years 1901–41. Mention is made of such buildings as the Willitts House (1902), a masterpiece among the Prairie houses; Taliesin (1911–25), his own studio, dwelling, and farm, which "quite literally grows" from the hillside; and the Imperial Hotel at Tokyo (1915–22), a "building which is from foundation to roof all of new materials and new devices compounded." Also considered are the California houses of the 1920's, illustrating Wright's "capacity to renew again and again his architectural imagination by drawing on the implications of particular uses of materials and the opportunities of very carefully chosen sites," the Kaufmann House, "Falling Water" (1936), and the Johnson Administration Building (1936–39), the two latter "widely recognized as classic masterpieces even before they were finished." The 413 photographs and plans are accompanied by descriptive captions. A special 92-page issue of the Architectural Forum (v. 88, Jan. 1948), devoted wholly to the architecture of Frank Lloyd Wright, complements Professor Hitchcock's volume by showing many of the architect's later designs. This issue was "completely designed and written by him; the plans and sketches appear as they were drawn by the 50 young men who now compose the Taliesin Fellowship." A number of his Usonian houses are depicted, as are group housing projects, more ambitious dwellings, commercial and industrial establishments, buildings for Florida Southern College, and others.

The editor of An American Architecture has skillfully excerpted from various of the author's writings published between 1894 and 1954 in order to present the basic principles upon which his architecture is founded. His ideal of "organic architecture," conceived as one with its setting and environment, and designed "for human use and comfort," is amply set forth in the 262 illustrations of projects and completed works from the period 1893–1955, some of which have never before been published.

5713. Kimball, Sidney Fiske. Domestic architecture of the American colonies and of the early republic, by Fiske Kimball. New York, Scribner, 1922. xx, 314 p. 22–24675 NA707.K45

"Chronological chart": p. [263]–269.

"Notes on individual houses": p. [271]–300.

In this pioneer work, Dr. Kimball, with the "aid of building contracts and accounts, inscriptions, and original designs, as well as inventories, wills, deeds, and other documents in favorable cases," indicates the dates and original forms of nearly 200 houses erected in the English colonies and American republic between the time of settlement and 1835. The 17th-century colonial style was "still essentially mediaeval," but with the opening of the 18th century the "academic spirit and the academic architectural forms" prevailed. "The triumph of literal classicism in 1825, with its ideal formal schemes of temple and rotunda, had been prepared by Jefferson's prophetic insistence on these very types, from the time of the Revolution itself." Many plans and elevations are included among the 219 illustrations and figures.

5714. Morrison, Hugh S. Early American architecture, from the first colonial settlements to the national period. New York, Oxford University Press, 1952. xiv, 619 p. 52–7831 NA707.M63

"Reading suggestions" at end of each chapter.

A comprehensive but concise one-volume history of architecture in the North American colonies from St. Augustine in 1565 to San Francisco in 1848. Professor Morrison surveys such edifices as houses, churches, forts, log cabins, markets, mills, and public and institutional buildings. He covers all the styles, English, Dutch, French, Spanish, and, to a lesser extent, Swedish, that were developed from the time of the first settlements: to the American Revolution on the Atlantic seaboard; to 1803 in French Louisiana; and to 1848 in the Spanish colonies. The primary emphasis is placed upon the colonial style of the 17th century and the Georgian style of the 18th, and the conditions under which they were produced. The author has made use of all of the earlier literature, and has presented the several styles "both in text and illustrations, by a selection of typical . . . examples, by monuments of unusual historical importance, and particularly by buildings that are dated with reasonable certainty." He has further attempted "to bring out the distinctive quality and color of architecture in the many different regions of the country." Many of the 484 illustrations were specially drawn for this work.

5715. Morrison, Hugh S. Louis Sullivan, prophet of modern architecture. New York, Museum of Modern Art and W. W. Norton, 1935. 391 p. 36–27013 NA737.S9M6

"A bibliography of the writings of Louis Sullivan": p. 306–309.

"General bibliography": p. 310–317.

An enthusiastic evaluation of the achievements of Louis Henry Sullivan (1856–1924) in architecture, of his theories concerning it, and of his position in relation to present-day architectural practice. His Wainwright Building (1890), "the first successful solution of the architectural problem of the high [office] building," incorporates Sullivan's "whole conception of architectural design as the symbolic expression of an emotion aroused by practical conditions." To him, the thesis that form follows function "was simply natural law." "His work and his thinking have made architecture once more plastic in the hands of the creative artist, and rendered possible the development of a true architectural style in the present day." The book includes 87 illustrations and 16 figures. John Szarkowski's The Idea of Louis Sullivan (Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1956. 161 p.) is an album of halftone reproductions of photographs, most of them quite clear, documenting the architect's fundamental concepts as to functional forms, "vertical continuity," and organic systems of ornamentation; accompanying them is a "Profile of Louis Sullivan," together with quotations from Sullivan and others germane to the pictures. Just before he died Sullivan completed a lyrically written sketch of his own life, The Autobiography of an Idea (1924; reprint with additional material by Ralph Marlowe Line, New York, Dover Publications, 1956. 333 p.), which seeks to reveal the origin and development of his central conception: "a sane philosophy of a living architecture, good for all time, founded on the only possible foundation—Man and his powers," issuing in a functional, democratic, and indigenously American style of both structure and ornament.

5716. Mumford, Lewis, ed. Roots of contemporary American architecture; a series of thirty-seven essays dating from the mid-nineteenth century to the present. New York, Reinhold, 1952. 454 p. 52–10519 NA710.M8

A collection of papers, together with an introductory essay and biographical sketches by Mr. Mumford of the 29 writers whose work appears here. The book assembles a "body of thought that helped form modern architecture in the United States during the last century." Later interpretations, mainly the editor's own, fill gaps in the first-hand documents. The writers, among them critics, historians, naturalists, and regional planners, as well as architects, range from Horatio Greenough (1805–1852) to Matthew Nowicki (1910–1950). The American tradition of architecture Mr. Mumford defines as "a mode of thinking and feeling, of planning and organizing and building, that Americans became conscious of only after they had established their political independence, had thrown off their colonial ways, and had begun to create a new mold for their life, in which past habits were modified by new processes, new activities, new purposes." The point of departure was a break with the concept of an architectural absolute, and it was made in architectural writings long before it was translated into new building forms.

5717. New York. Museum of Modern Art. Built in USA, 1932–1944, edited by Elizabeth Mock. New York, 1944. 127 p.
44–7779 NA712.N45

5718. New York. Museum of Modern Art. Built in USA: post-war architecture, edited by Henry Russell Hitchcock and Arthur Drexler. New York, Distributed by Simon & Schuster [1952] 128 p. 53–568 NA712.N47

Two catalogs designed to accompany exhibitions of outstanding modern American architecture that were assembled by the Museum of Modern Art in 1944 and 1952. Listing 47 edifices chosen by a committee mainly "on the basis of total design," the first volume is perhaps strongest in the field of domestic architecture. This was an area in which the American architect had "had the most opportunities and the freest hand." During the years 1932–44, he was interested particularly in the "straightforward use of material," and a more intimate adaptation of structure to climate and topography, as well as in the exploitation of such materials as reinforced concrete and laminated wood, the strength of which permitted a new freedom of design in both plan and elevation. Choice of the 43 buildings included in the 1952 catalog has been the "final responsibility" of Professor Hitchcock, whose criterion is a double one, "quality and significance of the moment." His introduction notes that "it has been business, interested in the advertising value of striking architecture, which has sponsored many of the more luxurious—and not to balk at a word—beautiful buildings of the last few years." Modern design, the author observes, is nationally standardized but not monolithic, and the "international mode" has been thoroughly domesticated. Both catalogs provide a two-page spread for each building dealt with, including a brief description of its salient architectural features, a plan, and photographs of exterior and, usually, of interior views.

5719. Newcomb, Rexford. Architecture of the Old Northwest Territory; a study of early architecture in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, & part of Minnesota. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1950. xvii, 175 p.
50–9051 NA725.N4

Bibliography: p. 162–167.

"The result of some thirty years of observation and study," this comprehensive synthesis "attempts to set forth, for the first time, a connected story of the career of architectural art in the Old Northwest from the earliest days down through that moving formative period which came to a close with the Civil War." Mr. Newcomb begins with a discussion of French colonial architecture of the early 18th century, which he reconstructs, so far as possible, from contemporary descriptions and travel reports. He goes on to describe the half-faced camps, forts, and cabins of the American pioneers, and to discriminate Southern and New England influences in the more ambitious structures derived from early American styles. Examples of the Georgian and Federal modes are few, he observes, and "in general, it was the Greek Revival—in its heyday during the developing period of the Northwest," the years 1825–60—"that followed the cabin when better homes could be built." The text is illustrated by 97 plates and 49 figures.

5720. Place, Charles A. Charles Bulfinch, architect and citizen. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1925. xiv, 294 p. 25–27877 NA737.B8P5

This biography of Charles Bulfinch (1763–1844), the first American architect of native birth, relies upon oral tradition as well as family letters, contemporary journals, the Boston town records, and other documents. The Hollis Street Church in Boston (1788) was apparently his first executed design, and the State House at Hartford, Connecticut (1796), was the first public building constructed from his plans. His design of a state house for Massachusetts was adopted in 1795, and he enjoyed a "connection with this structure . . . more personal and intimate than with any other of his designs." He executed a number of residences, churches, and public buildings in the Federal style during the years 1796–1818, among them the Massachusetts General Hospital. The remainder of his career, 1818–30, he devoted to the Capitol at Washington. "Bulfinch's work . . . was to complete the wings partially restored by Latrobe after the destruction by the British troops in 1814, and to construct the central portion for the most part from plans made by Latrobe, making such changes as were necessary." The illustrations consist in large part of photographs of buildings long since demolished.

677676 O–63–55

5721. Pratt, Dorothy, and Richard Pratt. A guide to early American homes. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1956. 2 v. 56–10867 NA7205.P68

CONTENTS.—[1] North.—[2] South.

An informal handbook to surviving American houses of the years 1680–1850, designed for tourists to use in conjunction with road maps. Geographically arranged, brief histories and descriptions are furnished of more than 900 early homes in the 14 states of the North between the Atlantic seaboard and the Mississippi, and of nearly 700 in 16 states of the South including Missouri and Arkansas. Approximately two-thirds are public museums; the remainder are private dwellings, many of which are conditionally open to visitors. General commentary on the architecture of each state is provided, as is specific information regarding locations of the houses, requirements for admission, and ownership. There are numerous rather small black-and-white illustrations, predominantly of façades.

5722. Pratt, Richard. A treasury of early American homes. New York, Whittlesey House [1949] vii, 136 p. 49–50069 NA7205.P7

These 22 color-illustrated articles, devoted to fine American homes, many of them manorial in scale, of the period 1650–1850, were originally published in the Ladies' Home Journal. With the exception of the ones in Natchez, New Orleans, and Monterey, all of the houses covered lie within the region of the English colonies along the Atlantic seaboard, from Woodstock, Vermont, and Portsmouth, New Hampshire, to Charleston. An introduction provides a thumbnail history of American domestic architecture. Deliberately subordinated to the illustrative material, the chronologically arranged text is limited to historical summaries, and to descriptions of the major features of the houses and of the interiors and furnishings depicted. Similar in format, The Second Treasury of Early American Homes, by the author in collaboration with his wife, Dorothy Pratt (New York, Hawthorn Books, 1954. 144 p.), is an "entirely new collection of early American homes in color." "Chosen for their age and their charm together," the 57 houses and more than 140 interiors delineated here are geographically arranged—south from Maine to Georgia, and west to Tennessee. The color is less satisfactory in the sequel, the reds and yellows having an unnatural intensity.

5723. Sanford, Trent Elwood. The architecture of the Southwest; Indian, Spanish, American. New York Norton, 1950. 312 p. 50–10641 NA720.S3

Lists of pueblos and missions: p. 276–299.

An architectural history of the American Southwest, where Indian, Spanish, and Anglo-American cultures are blended. Part one considers Pueblo Indian architecture which culminated during the years 1050–1300. Comprising the bulk of the book, parts two to five are devoted to Spanish architecture, particularly to the influential 17th-century Spanish-Pueblo style in which Spanish ideas and methods were applied "to an indigenous architecture of local materials put in place by Indian labor," and to the florid 18th-century Spanish baroque. A concluding section is devoted to Anglo-American contributions to the architecture of the Southwest, the most notable, perhaps, being Thomas Oliver Larkin's 19th-century adaptation of the Cape Cod mode to adobe in a two-story house with a hipped roof and a balcony. Numerous halftones illustrate the text. Rexford Newcomb's Spanish-Colonial Architecture in the United States (New York, J. J. Augustin, 1937. 39 p. 130 plates) briefly describes and illustrates, in many halftones and measured plans and drawings, surviving Spanish-Colonial structures, as well as the best modern adaptations of the old styles in the "regional vernaculars" of Florida, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California.

5724. Sloane, Eric. American barns and covered bridges. New York, W. Funk, 1954. 112 p. 54–12510 NA8201.S6

This book springs out of its author's enthusiasm for antique American handhewn woodwork, its materials and tools, and its characteristic end products. The importance of wood in early American life, the importance of seasoning, and the characteristics of native American woods are described. Early American tools are described and illustrated in the author's skillful drawings or diagrams. Barn design altered little in the two centuries after 1650; the author admires New England and Pennsylvania patterns and compares them at length, but considers that, in the trans-Allegheny migration, "many of the arts of woodworking and seasoning were lost." Covered bridges were devised at the very end of the 18th century and continued to be built for about 70 years; the covering strengthened the structure, and kept water out of the joints, and rain and snow off the roadway. There are some 1600 left, but they are disappearing very rapidly. American Yesterday (New York, W. Funk, 1956. 123 p.) pursues the author's nostalgic interest in antique artifacts down a number of curious byways, such as foot stoves, hammocks, weathervanes, and shutters, and has the same kind of attractive illustrations.

5725. Waterman, Thomas Tileston. The dwellings of colonial America. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1950. 312 p. 50–14735 NA707.W42

Bibliography: p. 291–293.

"Glossary of architectural terms": p. 294–298.

"This study of the dwellings of colonial America is confined to the period between the first English settlement and the close of the Revolution, and to the area occupied by the United States in 1783." The four main chapters trace, in considerable detail, the patterns of evolution, and the intricate and varied influences involved in the domestic architecture of the Southern colonies, the Delaware Valley and Pennsylvania, the Hudson Valley and eastern New Jersey, and New England. Each chapter discusses the primitive one-room shelters of the original settlers, the vigorous, even "homely" styles of the 17th century, and the mature and sophisticated Georgian mode of the 18th. Numerous photographs of exteriors, interiors, and details, together with the author's plans, illustrate the text.

D. Interiors

5726. Brazer, Esther (Stevens). Early American decoration; a comprehensive treatise revealing the technique involved in the art of early American decoration of furniture, walls, tinware, etc. Memorial [i. e. 2d] ed. Springfield, Mass., Pond-Ekberg, 1947. 265 p.

48–490 NK1403.B7 1947

First published in 1940.

A study of 18th- and early 19th-century American methods of applying designs in one or more colors to the surfaces of movables and interior walls, based upon the author's observations of the designs themselves, her research in early instruction books, and her own experiments. In the hope that "antique furniture and tinware, old-time decorated walls and floors, may be restored with their proper designs and with their own methods of painting," she works out the old principles of design, the first of which is that decorative design must emphasize construction; the materials, tools, and their properties and uses; and the various techniques of design, such as stenciling, brush-stroke painting, striping and banding, freehand bronze painting, gold leaf work, japanning, retouching, restoring, and antiquing. A final part offers a "step-by-step pictorial exposition" of the copying of the old decorations. Mrs. Brazer contributes many photographs and drawings, some in excellent color.

5727. Cornelius, Charles Over. Early American furniture. New York, Appleton-Century [1936?] xx, 278 p. 36–13493 NK2406.C6 1936

Bibliography: p. 263–268.

First published in 1926.

This history of the development of American furniture from the 17th century to 1850 shows the "growth in artistic consciousness from a time when utilitarianism predominated over esthetic demands . . . to the time when a highly organized society expressed itself in sophisticated terms." Executed by carpenter-joiners, the earliest furniture preserved the "primitive rectangular character inherited from medieval times." By the first decade of the 18th century, cabinetmaking had achieved a new excellence, and the "baroque forms, based preferably upon the curved rather than the straight line, began to affect the structure"; especially influential were the light and delicate classical proportions of Sheraton's designs. From 1820 to 1850, when mechanical methods predominated, "interest was less in esthetic values" than in ingenuity. The book is illustrated by 63 photographic plates and 12 figures.

5728. Cornelius, Charles Over. Furniture masterpieces of Duncan Phyfe. Measured detail drawings by Stanley J. Rowland. Garden City, N.Y., Published for the Metropolitan Museum of Art by Doubleday, Page, 1922. 86 p.

22–23282 NK2439.P5C6

An examination of the "sincere craftsmanship and consummate artistry" of Duncan Phyfe (1768–1854), New York cabinetmaker, in the first quarter of the 19th century. The author sees Phyfe, in his earlier practice, as heir to the age of George Hepplewhite and Thomas Sheraton, "able to profit by all the accomplishments of the last great English cabinet-makers," and to "pick and choose those treatments which his native good taste and feeling for his craft told him were legitimate and appropriate for his use." In a second phase, he adopted many motifs of Directoire and Consulate origin, but "combined them skillfully with those of his earliest practice, still keeping the delicate scale and fine finish of the latter." Mr. Cornelius analyzes in detail the architectural proportions, lines, and decorative methods and motifs, particularly the acanthus and lyre, of Phyfe's best-designed chairs and benches, sofas, tables, and other pieces. Five plates of detail drawings supplement the 56 halftone photographs of whole pieces. Duncan Phyfe and the English

Regency, 1795–1830, by Nancy V. McClelland (New York, W. R. Scott, 1939. 364 p.), stresses the "beauty and suavity" of the tables, chairs, sofas, window seats, and the like, which Phyfe produced before 1825, as well as the "clean, well-defined lines, the accents of light and shade, and the flatness of carving that might actually have been done by a sculptor of stone or marble."

5729. Kettell, Russell Hawes, ed. Early American rooms; a consideration of the changes in style between the arrival of the Mayflower and the Civil War in the regions originally settled by the English and the Dutch. Portland, Me., Southworth-Anthoensen Press, 1936. xvii, 200 p.
37–392 NK2003.K4

"Color schedule": p. xvii.

Mr. Kettell and 19 collaborators here present 12 chapters on 12 rooms, "permanently available for public study," each of which was a center of social activity in its own particular time. Of the rooms, one is from 17th-century and 6 are from 18th-century New England; one each is from 18th-century New York, Philadelphia, and Virginia; one is from early 19th-century New Jersey, and one from Victorian New York. Included are living rooms, dining rooms, and parlors, as well as a drawing room, a barroom, and a ballroom. Each chapter contains a discussion of the history and everyday living of the period; a general exposition of the contemporary styles exemplified by the room under consideration; a document "selected to throw light on the period as a whole or on some particularly colorful aspect of it"; and 2 leaves of a contemporary newspaper in type replica. The drawings in direct orthographic projection show the room completely furnished. One plate for each room reproduces its color scheme.

5730. Little, Nina Fletcher. American decorative wall painting, 1700–1850. Sturbridge, Mass., Old Sturbridge Village, in cooperation with Studio Publications, New York, 1952. xvi, 145 p.
52–10836 ND2606.L58

"Selective bibliography": p. 138–140.

A pioneer survey based mainly upon the author's investigations of old buildings, museum materials, and 18th-century newspaper advertisements. Because little of such painting has survived in the South, most of her examples come from New England houses. Earlier techniques included graining, marbleizing, and japanning of woodwork, painting of wall panels and overmantels in scenic or still life motifs, and decoration of fireboards and floors. By the end of the 18th century, panoramic scenes, stenciled patterns, and freehand floral designs were being painted directly on the plaster walls. Decorative wall painting gave way to machine-printed paper in the mid-19th century. There are lists of painters, with biographical sketches, and of important works in and out of museums (p. 129–138.) A few of the 146 illustrations are in badly blurred color.

5731. Miller, Edgar G. American antique furniture, a book for amateurs. New York, M. Barrows [1948, ©1937] 2 v. (1106 p.)
48–9713 NK2406.M55 1948

First published in 1937.

Designed "not only to show to the amateur collector what is fine, but also to show what is not fine," these elaborately detailed volumes provide a wealth of information about furniture produced, chiefly in America, during the years 1650–1840, as well as 2,115 illustrations of the objects described. The photographs, taken for the most part especially for the work, are of articles in private homes rather than museums. After four introductory chapters dealing with sundry matters such as the danger of encountering fakes, each chapter is devoted to a chronological treatment of a single type of furniture, as for example, the sofa, highboy, cupboard, mirror, and clock. The very extensive footnotes consist of documentation, explanation or amplification, and pithy comment; they are, in the author's opinion, almost as important as the text, "and sometimes are more interesting."

5732. Rogers, Meyric R. American interior design; the traditions and development of domestic design from colonial times to the present. New York, Norton, 1947. 309 p.
47–12416 NK2003.R6

Bibliography: p. 297–302.

"This book is intended to survey . . . the tradition, evolution and qualities of the American domestic interior," from 1630 to 1947. Four of the five chapters trace the development of design in American household furniture and accessories from colonial times to 1920. The author analyzes successively the Jacobean style of the 17th century, the Queen Anne and Chippendale styles of the 18th, the Federal and Empire styles of the 19th, and the "battle of the styles" which extended into the first decades of the 20th century. The concluding chapter, "The Age of Social Readjustment," takes the story from 1920 to 1947, and discusses the implications of Functionalism for the future. Each chapter summarizes briefly the political, economic, social, and architectural background of its period. A glossary and biographical notes, together with 196 illustrations and 39 plates, a number of them colored, complete the volume.

E. Sculpture

5733. Brummé, Carl Ludwig. Contemporary American sculpture. New York, Crown, 1948. 156 p. 48–9357 NB212.B75
"Biographical notes": p. 145–149.
Bibliography: p. 150–156.

5734. Schnier, Jacques P. Sculpture in modern America. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1948. 224 p. 48–11026 NB205.S35
Bibliography: p. 65–67.

The first of these picture books presents, in the words of William Zorach's introduction, "all directions and schools of thought in sculpture, in this way giving an over-all picture of what is happening today." "In this survey," states Mr. Brummé, "emphasis is, of course, placed on the younger sculptors, for the task of further developing a contemporary esthetic direction is primarily theirs." In their work, a "broadened perspective plus the findings of 20th-century experimenters in pure form have engendered the esthetic philosophy of form needed in our age of individual expression." Having virtually eliminated text in order to conserve space, Mr. Brummé has arranged the 130 illustrations alphabetically by sculptor, from George Aarons to William Zorach.

After pointing out the indebtedness of 19th-century American sculptors to European artists, Mr. Schnier turns to a style the development of which, in the years 1909–12, represents "a turning point in the evolution of sculpture in this country." He notes three major trends in the treatment of representational content. In the one "followed by the majority of American sculptors, easily recognizable subject matter is integrated into effective designs, but with no attempt at realistic interpretation." In that of the pure abstractionists, Alexander Calder, Isamu Noguchi, and, more recently, Claire Falkenstein, "forms have been completely divorced from representational content, and the entire emphasis is placed on formal arrangement." In that of the surrealists, "recognizable elements are arranged in a completely unreal and bizarre manner or combined with abstract forms." The 139 plates are classified under the headings: heads, figures, animals, reliefs, and explorations in form.

5735. Cortissoz, Royal. Augustus Saint-Gaudens. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1907. 85 p. 7–40526 NB237.S2C8

An appreciation of the work of Augustus Saint-Gaudens (1848–1907) by Royal Cortissoz (1869–1948), who was for many years art editor of the New York Herald-Tribune. He believes that Saint-Gaudens "was not only our greatest sculptor, but the first to break with the old epoch of insipid ideas and hide-bound academic notions of style, giving the art a new lease of life and fixing a new standard." His own style "was remarkable for its blending of polish with freedom." He executed portrait medallions of delicacy, spontaneity, and realism during the 1870's and '80's. In modeling the single draped figure of the Adams Monument (1887), Saint-Gaudens was "the poet, the dramatist, intermingling with the concrete qualities of plastic art the more elusive qualities of mind and soul." His other great triumphs were portraits in the round and on the scale of the public monument: Admiral Farragut, Abraham Lincoln, and Deacon Chapin in the '80's; the Robert Gould Shaw Memorial, unveiled in 1897; and the equestrian statue of General Sherman, unveiled in 1903. The text is illustrated by 24 heliotype plates.

5736. Cresson, Margaret (French). Journey into fame; the life of Daniel Chester French. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1947. xv, 316 p. 47–30328 NB237.F7C7
Bibliography: p. [315]–316.

An intimate and anecdotal biography of Daniel Chester French (1850–1931) by his daughter. She delineates a man of great energy, self-confidence, and tenacity of purpose, a career of ever-increasing artistic significance, and a financial success in the true 19th-century American tradition. When his first commission, "The Minute Man," a symbol of the youth, vigor, and determination of the country, was unveiled at Concord, Mass., in 1875, this New England sculptor "suddenly vaulted into fame." The claim has been made for his greatest work, the colossal seated figure in the Lincoln Memorial dedicated at Washington in 1922, that it has "established the image of Lincoln for posterity." Although herself a sculptor, Mrs. Cresson offers relatively little analysis of her father's style, noting only his efforts to gain "crispness in modeling" and "a kind of native classicism" in him.

5737. Fite, Gilbert C. Mount Rushmore. Norman, University of Oklahom Press, 1952. xiv, 272 p. 52–7919 NB237.B6F5

"Selected bibliography": p. 255–260.

Based upon both official and private records, this is mainly a history of the association of Gutzon Borglum (1867–1941) with the controversial Mount Rushmore National Memorial. The sculptor was commissioned in the early 1920's to carve in the Black Hills of South Dakota a "gigantic monument" commemorating some aspects of American history. Impressed by the size and greatness of the United States, he wished to leave behind a "monument which would stand for all time as a record of supreme achievement—a monument to the nation and to himself." Even on a reduced scale the work was beset by financial difficulties and personal conflicts, and the last of the four enormous figures of Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and Theodore Roosevelt was not unveiled until July 2, 1939. Criticism of the colossi has come chiefly from two sources: those who account them a desecration of nature, akin to the incising of initials in the bark of a tree, and others who object to the romantic naturalism of Borglum's style. The 32 photographs document the evolution of the memorial.

5738. Gardner, Albert Ten Eyck. Yankee stonecutters; the first American school of sculpture, 1800–1850. New York, Published for the Metropolitan Museum of Art by Columbia University Press, 1945. 84 p. 45–8846 NB210.G3

These informal essays attempt to place early 19th-century American "sculptors and their works in relation to the life of the time." George Washington, as a symbol of liberty and national unity, was the "most important single factor in the encouragement of the sculptural arts in the young nation." After 1815, the rebuilt Capitol and other public buildings had "to be redecorated in an appropriate classical manner to satisfy the Greco-Roman republicans of the New World." Most of the artists concerned were "timid, provincial amateurs of art" aiming at faithful copies mechanically produced. William Rimmer (1816–79), however, was a creative artist far above his contemporaries, whose works are presented "unadorned with anecdote, as direct studies in the art of sculpture, and not as petrified dramas." Horatio Greenough (1805–52) also towered over the rest, but as a thinker who grasped the basic principles of functionalism and organic relationships. The author lists sculptors, stonecutters, carvers, and modelers in America before 1800; sculptors born between 1800 and 1830, for whom brief biographies are supplied; and some born between 1830 and 1850. The illustrations, averaging two to a plate, are clearly reproduced.

5739. Smith, Chetwood, and Mary Smith. Rogers groups, thought & wrought by John Rogers, by Mr. and Mrs. Chetwood Smith. Boston, C. E. Goodspeed, 1934. 145 p. 35–932 NB237.R65S6

A biography of John Rogers (1829–1904), based upon his letters, scrapbooks, and catalogs, together with an illustrated catalogue raisonné of his work. This New England sculptor, who enjoyed a tremendous popular vogue in the years 1860–90, illustrated with his statuettes especially the humorous and sentimental aspects of everyday life. He modeled and patented 80 clay sculptures from which plaster casts were made and sold, in a variety of shades of pearl and slate grays, fawn, snuff, and cinnamon browns. Among the most popular of the "Rogers Groups" were "The Slave Auction" and other frankly abolitionist pieces; "Coming to the Parson," often used as a wedding present; "The Charity Patient"; and "Playing Doctor." "The last two, together with 'Fetching the Doctor' and 'The Foundling', were much used for decorating doctors' offices; in fact, the Medical Record advertised them." It is estimated that there were sold 100,000 of these "real and friendly creatures, made by the man who was justly called 'The Laureate of Home.' "

5740. Taft, Lorado. The history of American sculpture. New ed., with a supplementary chapter by Adeline Adams. New York, Macmillan, 1930. 622 p. 30–32611 NB205.T3 1930

"General bibliography": p. 607–618.

This history of his predecessors and contemporaries by the eminent sculptor, Lorado Taft (1860–1936), first appeared in 1903, and was revised for an edition of 1924. The first artists noticed, men like William Rush and John Frazee, were woodcarvers and stonecutters, who labored without education and without a tradition. Tutored in the Italian classical style, Horatio Greenough, Hiram Powers, and Thomas Crawford began their real work in the 1830's and soon attained national prominence. They chiseled realistic portrait busts and drew inspiration from myth, allegory, and the Bible for their "ideal figures." Between 1850 and 1876, "timidly but hopefully American sculpture began to grow contemporaneous in spirit; the 'actual' crept at last upon the stage, while classic themes gradually receded." With the unveiling of his statue of Admiral Farragut in 1881, Augustus Saint-Gaudens "took his place at the head of American sculpture." "Our sculpture is pledged mainly to the safe and sane," Mrs. Adams observed in her chapter, but "as the passion for novelty increases, the faith in fundamentals declines." There are numerous illustrations in a halftone which did not improve with successive reprintings.

F. Painting

5741. American painting today. Washington, American Federation of Arts, 1939. 179 p. 40–209 ND212.A57

A picture book containing 249 monochrome and 10 color reproductions of easel paintings in oil, watercolor, tempera, and gouache, and of murals in fresco, tempera, and oil, executed mainly during the 1930's. Many of the plates first appeared in the Magazine of Art. "The effort has been to illustrate, on a wide front, by means of a great variety of visual material picked by successive editors, what American painters, known and unknown, young and old, conservative and liberal, have been doing in the past ten years or so." In his introduction, Forbes Watson notes the domination of the art world by the School of Paris and by French dealers during the 1920's, and the subsequent rediscovery of his own country as a source of inspiration and subject matter by the American painter. Thanks to the depression and the artist relief program of the Federal Government, "we are moving away from a period which produced individuals of unquestionable capacity into a period when we are laying the foundations of a great body of art."

5742. Barker, Virgil. American painting, history and interpretation. New York, Macmillan, 1950. xxvii, 717 p. 50–10368 ND205.B29

A comprehensive and carefully organized interpretative history of American painting through the colonial and "provincial" periods, which latter is dated from 1790 to 1880. These large periods are further subdivided, and within each lesser era the known painters are minutely classified, principally by their subject matter, but also by their region, function ("Painters working for reproduction") or style ("Poetic figure painting"). Major figures receive one or more chapters to themselves; the lesser ones are grouped as many as 19 to the chapter. Attention is given to the painters' own ideas of their art, and to the social milieu in which they worked. The "provincial" period actually witnessed a complete transformation in the basis and nature of American painting, for as late as 1775 most of the native-born American painters remained at the craft level. "The exceptions were as striking in quality as they were few in number: [Matthew] Pratt [1734–1805],with his subtle tastefulness; [Robert] Feke [c. 1705–c. 1750], with his talent; and Copley, with his genius." Patronage of painting by wealthy merchants permitted its existence as an art, but only after 1820 was there a demand for pictures other than portraits. The post-Civil War trio, Ryder, Homer, and Eakins, "became in their achievements representatively American to a degree which had probably been impossible before their time." There are 100 halftone illustrations; the thorough bibliography follows the organization of the book.

5743. Born, Wolfgang. American landscape painting; an interpretation. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1948. 228 p. 48–8092 ND1351.B6

A review of the sequence of styles in American landscape painting which selects for study "significant examples of the trends determining the evolution." "The roots of the American landscape proper were the topographical drawing, water color, and print," the harbor view being the most popular from mid–18th century to the beginning of the 19th. The romantic Washington Allston "ushered in the development of American landscape painting" in 1804 with two scenes of imaginative mood, but the first authentic school of landscape painters, which flourished at mid-century, was inspired by the scenic beauty of the Hudson River Valley. The panoramic school of 1840–70 reflected the "mentality of the American expansion" in a weakness for melodrama and show. After the Civil War, however, a break in tradition occurred, and, under French influence, dramatized presentation of subject was superseded by a succession of technical interests. The 142 black-and-white illustrations are disappointingly small and dark.

5744. Born, Wolfgang. Still-life painting in America. New York, Oxford University Press, 1947. xiv, 54, [98] p. 47–5146 ND1390.B6

An interpretation of American still-life painting "all but forgotten by art historians until the present century," which distinguishes a succession of styles and schools. The objectivist "botanic-decorative" style, initiated about 1810 at Philadelphia by the remarkable Charles Willson Peale family, launched the American still life as an independent art form. Up to the Civil War, flower and fruit pieces were favorite subjects with amateur and primitive painters. The best still-life painter of the mid-century was John F. Francis (1810–1885), who departed from convention in order to study volumes, textures, and colors. In the 1880's, William M. Harnett (1848–92) scored a tremendous success with his "heightened interpretation of reality expressed by the old technique of the trompe l'oeil" only to be quite forgotten after his early death. Charles Demuth (1882–1935) "was the first American painter who undertook to adapt the achievements of French post-impressionism to the American feeling for mechanization." "The quiet labor of American still-life painters" has achieved "the establishment of a consistent American tradition." The 134 gravure illustrations, averaging one or two to a page, are quite clear. In After the Hunt; William Harnett and Other American Still Life Painters, 1870–1900 (Berkeley, University of California Press, 1953. 189 p. 136 illus.) Alfred V. Frankenstein tells the story of a remarkable course of detective work by which he was enabled to establish the canon of Harnett's genuine work (102 extant and 21 lost paintings), and to distinguish it from the work of his skillful admirer and disciple, John Frederick Peto of Philadelphia (1854–1907), most of whose surviving canvases had been given Harnett signatures by later forgers. Another unique personality of the American trompe-l'oeil school, John Haberle of New Haven (1856–1933), whose canvases "bestow fantastic consequence on the inconsequential" and so suggest the surrealists, is given a chapter to himself.

5745. Boston. Museum of Fine Arts. M. and M. Karolik collection of American paintings, 1815 to 1865. Cambridge, Published for Museum of Fine Arts, Boston [by] Harvard University Press, 1949 [i.e., 1951] lx, 544 p.
51–8136 ND210.B73

An elaborate, alphabetically arranged catalogue raisonné, together with monochrome plates, of the 233 paintings which Mr. and Mrs. Maxim Karolik presented to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts in 1948. Because many of the artists are forgotten or virtually unknown, biographies have been supplied. The collectors had "one purpose only: To show what happened in this country in the art of painting in the period of half a century . . . and to show the beginning and the growth of American landscape and genre painting." In his introductory essay, "Trends in American Painting, 1815 to 1865," John I. H. Baur notes that although realism was a sine qua non of art, the broadly romantic spirit of the age demanded an "image of the Ideal." Painters who failed to conform to the standard of idealized realism tended to be "forgotten." Among the recently rediscovered talents represented here are Martin J. Heade and Fitz Hugh Lane, realists in landscape, James G. Clonney and William T. Ranney, realists in genre, and John Quidor, a nonrealist.

5746. Brown, Milton W. American painting, from the Armory Show to the depression. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1955. 243 p.
53–10147 ND212.B74

Bibliography: p. 201–237.

Based upon contemporary reports and articles, exhibition catalogs, and interviews, this is a survey of a transitional period in American art (1913–29) when modern European concepts of art displaced the older American tradition of conservative realism. The radical tendencies emanated from two sources: the native, socially critical realism of Robert Henri and the "Ash Can School," and the controversial French modernism and estheticism introduced later by Alfred Stieglitz. The artistic revolution was confined to small art groups until the radicalism of the 1913 exhibition at the New York Armory of modern European and American art shocked the public and many artists. Dr. Brown discusses the reactions of critics and collectors, and traces the emergence of Cubism, Fauvism, and related tendencies as well as the continuation of the realist strain. Numerous rather dark gravure illustrations are included.

5747. Burroughs, Alan. Limners and likenesses; three centuries of American painting. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1936. 246 p. (Harvard-Radcliffe fine arts series)
36–10264 ND205.B8

Bibliography: p. [223]–226.

An historical critique of the American tradition in painting from its 17th-century beginnings to "American Modernism" of the 1930's, distinguished by its author's encyclopedic knowledge of individual painters and their works, methods of authentication, and artistic techniques. As early as 1670, he believes, an American taste had begun to form. The early qualities of the art of the limner, "static realism, self-sufficiency, and friendly charm," recur in American painting "like a theme with variations, scarcely heard at times because of the louder themes of English and European art, yet nevertheless existent." Although the realistic tradition continued through the Federal period, mainly under the dominance of English practice, two major waves of French influence, the neoclassical after 1800 and the impressionistic after 1880, came to replace direct realistic feeling with an admiration for technical effects. Yet the author found "groups of American painters" who were "working away from European domination in taste" and who were engaged in a "struggle for nationality," for a "simple, realistic view." The 191 halftone illustrations average two to a page.

5748. Encyclopaedia Britannica. Contemporary American painting; the Encyclopaedia Britannica Collection, edited by Grace Pagano. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1945. xxviii, [241] p. 45–35086 N5220.E5 1945a

An album of reproductions of the 116 paintings by as many artists that were in the Encyclopaedia Britannica Collection in 1945. Some 40 plates are in color. This frankly experimental and incomplete collection, assembled with the aid of a committee of specialists, is intended to illustrate the "trends, times, and personalities" of about the last 30 years. Emphasis has been placed upon "American painting of still living artists," and particularly the regionalism of the 1930's. Each full-page reproduction is accompanied by a photograph of the artist, a brief description of his background and the subject matter and method of his work, and, in nearly every instance, his own statement of his intention in the painting illustrated. An introduction by Donald Bear traces the inheritance of the 20th-century American artist and discusses such divergent traditions of contemporary American painting as regionalism and the American scene, the painting of manners, of message or protest, and of mood or sensibility, experimentalism, and abstract art. Peyton Boswell's Modern American Painting (New York, Dodd, Mead, 1939. 200 p.) consists of an album of 86 color illustrations of paintings, chiefly modern, originally reproduced by Life magazine for its "Pageant of America" series, together with a historical sketch of the principal movements and trends in American art, brief, alphabetically arranged biographies of the artists, and a catalog of the paintings. A very few of the paintings illustrated were commissioned by Life. A second edition with 89 color illustrations and slightly condensed text was published in 1940. In 1942, the latter edition was reissued by Garden City Publishing Company, but with much inferior color printing.

5749. Flexner, James Thomas. America's old masters; first artists of the New World. New York, Viking Press, 1939. 332 p. 39–27903 ND207.F55

Bibliography: p. 317–326.

These four popularly written biographical essays constitute a history of the work of the first great native-born American painters, who "enjoyed a greater European acclaim than was to come to any other American artists for at least a century." Benjamin West (1738–1820), in 1760 the first American artist to study abroad, was before long regarded "all over the world as the leading exponent of the 'grand style' " of neoclassic art, and went on to become a founder and a president of the Royal Academy, a close friend of George III, and a precursor of the French romanticists. At heart a realist, John Singleton Copley (1738–1815) produced portraits of great solidity and power in Boston, but when he removed to London, deteriorated artistically under the pressure of a sophisticated environment. Charles Willson Peale (1741–1827), a "craftsman so able that he became a universal genius," was "one of the most charming portrait painters of the early American tradition." "Well-nigh incomparable" in the painting of faces, Gilbert Stuart (1755–1828), "who had never learned to draw, was uncertain in executing full-lengths." The 33 plates are tolerably reproduced in black and white.

5750. Flexner, James Thomas. First flowers of our wilderness. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1947. xxi, 367 p. (His American painting, 1) 47–12171 ND207.F57

"Bibliography of general sources": p. 323–[326].

5751. Flexner, James Thomas. The light of distant skies, 1760–1835. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1954. 306 p. (His American painting, 2) 54–9727 ND207.F58

"Bibliographies and source references": p. [251]–283.

The first in a projected many-volume social history of American painting, these books attempt "to show the relationships between life in America and the long tradition of American painting." The author reveals how colonial portraiture, progressing from the "provincial version of the illuminators' tradition" common to the primitive 17th-century limners, reached its culmination in the work of John Singleton Copley (1737–1820), "the first man to express American life in art maturely, profoundly, and with beauty." With the exception of John Trumbull (1756–1843), who called his historical paintings "my national work" but "considered it more important to be a gentleman than a painter," these early professional painters were "nurtured in a craftsman's world." The following generation of gentleman painters, on the other hand, men like Washington Allston and Samuel F. B. Morse, who were born to prosperity and political power, boasted of being artists and connoisseurs but were stifled by affectations of taste. When the new equalitarian forces accompanying "that plebeian on horseback, Andrew Jackson," prevailed, these older men were supplanted by popular young landscape and genre painters. Each volume contains a formal catalog of its numerous illustrations.

5752. Gruskin, Alan D. Painting in the U.S.A. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1946. 223 p. 47–791 ND212.G77

Bibliography: p. 213–215.

An album of 140 reproductions of paintings by American artists who were living in 1946, of which 63 are well processed in color and 77 in halftone; they average one or two to a large page. The selection aims to provide a cross section of modern trends. Several popular periodicals and business organizations have lent color plates to the author, a New York art dealer. Mr. Gruskin's loosely organized sequence of observations urges the reader "to look and keep looking at pictures" for true esthetic satisfaction, points with pride to the many flourishing museums and commercial galleries and the widely circulated popular magazines that bring painting to the public, proposes collections of modern art and the encouragement of living artists, and furnishes a historical vignette of American art.

5753. Monro, Isabel Stevenson, and Kate M. Monro. Index to reproductions of American paintings; a guide to pictures occurring in more than eight hundred books. New York, Wilson, 1948. 731 p. 48–9663 ND205.M57

An index to reproductions of the paintings of "artists of the United States occurring in 520 books and in more than 300 catalogs of annual exhibitions held by art museums." Each painting is entered in two or three places: under the artist, whose dates are given if obtainable, together with title of the picture, and a brief entry for the book where the reproduction may be found; under title and alternative title or titles; and, in some cases, under subject. Preceding the main index are a "List of Works Indexed" and a "Key to Symbols Used for Locations of Paintings." The compilers have listed attributed works and have entered the large number of portraits under the sitters as well as the artists; they have also noted the locations of paintings in permanent collections so far as stated in the books indexed.

5754. New York. Metropolitan Museum of Art. 100 American painters of the 20th century; works selected from the collections of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. New York, 1950. xxiii, 111 p. 50–13015 ND212.N39

A picture book consisting of 100 reproductions, 8 of them in color, of works by as many American painters in the collections of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Ten of the paintings were executed before 1900, and while canvases of the 1930's and 40's are abundant, there are only 8 pieces from the years 1916–29. In his brief introduction, Robert Beverly Hale asserts that modern American artists, if neither wholly understood nor appreciated, have "caught the essence of our country" and our times. If modern art is violent, dealing "with weird dreams," and "filled with broken shapes," that is because the artist is in part a prophet . . . the shadows that have lately haunted us have for some time been visible upon his canvas."

5755. Richardson, Edgar P. American romantic painting; edited by Robert Freund. New York, E. Weyhe, 1944. 50 p. 168 plates on 84 l. 45–878 ND205.R5

Catalog with biographical notes: p. 23–50.

An album of 236 paintings from the first three quarters of the 19th century, held in American public collections, or in a minority of instances, by private owners, and reproduced in usually clear halftone, but often on too small a scale. Colonial painting, the introductory text affirms, had been strong but narrow; about the turn of the century there took place a great change in the imagination which enabled painting to deal with "the whole circle of inner and outer experience," and to become "an art as wide as our national life." The grandiose designs of Allston and his fellows of the first generation ended mostly in disappointment. The second romantic generation of the 1830's, less aspiring, produced smaller canvases appropriate to private houses, and secured a far wider response. Among the third generation of the 1850's, the spreading weakness, sentimentalism, and breakdown in the color sense were resisted by only a few major talents, who soon became isolated figures. After 1876, "romantic art became unfashionable and rapidly disappeared." David Howard Dickason's The Daring Young Men (Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1953. 304 p.) discusses the American Pre-Raphaelite movement of the latter half of the 19th century, which advocated "truth to nature" and served as a "lively, corporate antidote to the materialism and artistic stagnation of 'American Victorianism,'" but produced no artists of outstanding talent.

5756. Richardson, Edgar P. Painting in America; the story of 450 years. New York, Crowell, 1956. 447 p. (The Growth of America series) 56–7793 ND205.R53

Bibliography: p. 417–427.

The thesis of this survey of American painting is that painting is both an art and a craft, sharing the "unpredictable nature of the imagination" and the "social character of an organized skill in human society," and that nowhere is the mutual action and reaction of these two elements "more striking, their interplay more curious, than in their creation of a new national tradition of painting in America." Mr. Richardson considers American artists largely within the context of his theory: whether they belonged to the currents of their day, like West, Allston, Whistler, and Marin; whether they did not belong to those currents, like Homer, Ryder, and Hopper; or whether the direction of attention was opposed to the artist's natural bent and produced a fatal conflict, as with John Vanderlyn. Lesser painters are usually treated in groups, with each receiving a sentence or brief paragraph to himself. The author interprets the century of painting from 1780 to 1876 as successive phases of romanticism and devotes to them three large chapters, considerably more than to any other school or movement. Most of the 172 halftone illustrations are quite unhackneyed; there are also 17 plates in indifferent color.

5757. Turpie, Mary C. A selected list of paintings for the study of American civilization. Minneapolis, Program in American Studies, University of Minnesota [1953] 109 l.
54–31893 ND45.T85

"Books and catalogs useful for illustrations": l. 101–106.

"An elementary guide to resources for the study of American civilization through painting"; only murals have been omitted as insufficiently studied. The 712 paintings selected are not necessarily great, but all "are cultural documents which contribute significantly to an understanding of American life past or present—either as sheer illustration, or as revelation of representative tastes and attitudes, or as the commentary of an artist who interprets—or even rejects—his own milieu in his own terms." Dating from 1666 to 1950, the paintings are arranged alphabetically by artist within three chronological divisions. Dates and present locations of the paintings are provided so far as known, together with descriptive and interpretative annotations. Most of the paintings listed are in public collections; for those privately owned, reproductions or slides are available, and references are furnished to these for both classes. Appended are directories of firms and institutions that can supply slides and inexpensive reproductions.

5758. Walker, John, and Macgill James. Great American paintings from Smibert to Bellows, 1729–1924. New York, Oxford University Press, 1943. 36 p., 104 plates on 56 l.
43–18438 ND205.W35

"Catalogue notes": p. 21–26.

"Suggestions for further reading": p. 27–31.

Reproductions of carefully chosen paintings, of which the eight in color are quite unsuccessful, while the remainder in monochrome are on the dark side. The great majority are from public collections. The compilers terminate with the work of Bellows because it seems "to close an epoch in American style." The brief text distinguishes two currents in American style: a realistic main stream, from the portraits of Copley to the "Ash-can School," which "has usually been on the level [sic] with the best contemporary painting of its kind done in Europe"; and a secondary one, "imaginative, poetic, at its best visionary," which "has been on the whole more derivative, more inclined to be literary and self-conscious." The latter produced "only one artist of outstanding genius, Albert Ryder" (1846–1917).

5759. Wehle, Harry B. American miniatures, 1730–1850; one hundred and seventy-three portraits selected with a descriptive account by Harry B. Wehle . . . & a biographical dictionary of the artists by Theodore Bolton. Garden City, N. Y., Garden City Pub. Co., 1937. xxv, 127 p. 48 plates on 27 l. 37–6103 ND1337.U5W4 1937

First published in 1927.

"General bibliography of early American miniature painting": p. [115]–118.

A descriptive history of American portraiture "in little," closely tied to the 48 color and halftone plates which usually reproduce the miniatures full-size. Most miniaturists, the author notes, working with water colors on ivory, learned "to build up their textures and to state their forms by the cautious means of stippling and hatching" in a minute and dexterous fashion. In 18th-century Philadelphia, James Peale (1749–1831) became a "prolific worker," and Henry Benbridge (1744–1812) painted in a style "only a little less masterly than Copley's." Edward Greene Malbone (1777–1807) moved from New England to New York, Philadelphia, and the South, and painted the "finest miniatures in the history of the art in America." During the first two decades of the 19th century, the bustling city of New York attracted ambitious and talented young miniaturists. The advent of photography about the middle of the century, however, together with the decline of the aristocratic heritage, first corrupted, and then killed, the art of miniature painting. Mr. Bolton's dictionary includes 47 names, a number of which are well known in the larger art forms.

G. Painting: Individual Artists

5760. [Allston] Richardson, Edgar Preston. Washington Allston, a study of the romantic artist in America. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1948. 233 p. 48–8917 ND237.A4R5

"Catalogue of the existing and recorded paintings of Washington Allston [by] Edgar Preston Richardson and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow Dana": p. 183–219.

Bibliography: p. 220–228.

A critical study of the art of Washington Allston (1779–1843) and a reappraisal of his position as our first full-scale romantic artist, based on the Dana Collection and family tradition. An uneven and by no means prolific painter (183 finished works) he was nevertheless "the pioneer in creating an ideal art upon American soil." He wished, moreover, to explore the whole range of painting: monumental, narrative, portrait, landscape and architectural, and animal and still life. "His work and the influence of his life as an artist were felt throughout the imaginative being of this country in its first years of independent effort." After its 18th-century apprenticeship, American painting became "an instrument of the reflective and imaginative life." Allston, chief figure in this enlargement of scope, introduced dramatic and lyric sentiment, quiet reverie, and meditation. The 59 halftone illustrations are printed on 30 leaves.

5761. [Bingham] Christ-Janer, Albert. George Caleb Bingham of Missouri; the story of an artist. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1940. xx, 171 p.
40–7789 ND237.B59C5

"Selected bibliography": p. 146–148.

A scholarly biography which aims "to analyze and clarify the genre work of George Caleb Bingham [1811–1879] by presenting some hitherto unpublished drawings" and to amplify knowledge of his life and personality from recently discovered letters and other new sources. Although Bingham, like many of his contemporaries, painted portraits for a living, he aspired to genre painting, "to pictures that tell a story." The Missouri painter completed the first canvas in his "river life" series, "Jolly Flatboatmen," early in 1844, and by 1851 was working upon the first in a political series, "County Election" and "Canvassing for a Vote." The subjects and spirit of these series won them a contemporary popularity: their painstaking design and drawing, derived from prints of Renaissance masters, impress present-day artists and critics. Besides the 56 illustrations of Bingham's figure drawing on 4 leaves, there are 8 halftone plates and 6 in unsatisfactory color.

5762. [Burchfield] Baur, John I. H. Charles Burchfield. [Research by Rosalind Irvine] New York, Published for the Whitney Museum of American Art by Macmillan, 1956. 86 p.
56–322 ND237.B89B3

"Selected bibliography": p. [82]–85.

Based largely upon the artist's journal, "an illuminating record of his thoughts, feelings, struggles and artistic aims over nearly half a century," this biography and critique of Charles Burchfield (b. 1893) grew out of a retrospective exhibition of his watercolors and drawings (his oils are relatively few and unsuccessful), held at the Whitney Museum in January and February 1956. From 1917 to 1921 in Salem, Ohio, Burchfield painted fantastic and decorative scenes chiefly in calligraphic style, fanciful interpretations of nature, or symbolic representations of moods. In Buffalo, New York, from 1921 to 1943, he depicted the city, alternating "a predominantly esthetic pleasure in the shapes and textures of the industrial scene" with concern for its romantic moods. His realist-industrial phase is his best known and most honored. In 1943, Burchfield abandoned realism, weather-beaten houses, and industry, and has since painted the changing moods and aspects of nature in a fusion of his early fantastic manner with the technical skill and painterly style acquired in the realistic works of his maturity. Five of the 75 variously-sized illustrations are in color.

5763. [Copley] Parker, Barbara Neville, and Anne Bolling Wheeler. John Singleton Copley; American portraits in oil, pastel, and miniature, with biographical sketches. Boston, Museum of Fine Arts, 1938. 284 p. 130 plates on 65 l.
38–4135 ND237.C7P3

This is a massive catalogue raisonné consisting of descriptions of all portraits believed to have been painted by Copley before he left for England in June 1774. Biographical sketches of the sitters, an unusual feature in such a work, precede the descriptions of the portraits; those for portraits belonging to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts are by G. Philip Bauer. For the other biographies, the authors have gone to primary sources when standard authorities have failed. Descriptions of the portraits are limited in most instances to their sizes and colors; when direct evidence is lacking, datings are based "entirely on grounds of style." The portraits are listed in three sections: oils; pastels, drawings, and engravings; and miniatures; and in each section are arranged alphabetically by sitter. A section on "Attributed Portraits" includes a number that present problems as yet unsolved. A final section lists a group of unlocated portraits known, through references in unquestioned sources, to have been painted by Copley.

5764. [Eakins] Goodrich, Lloyd. Thomas Eakins, his life and work. New York, Whitney Museum of American Art, 1933. 225 p.
33–5157 ND237.E15G6

Bibliography: p. [217]–220.

A biography of Thomas Eakins (1844–1916) and an analysis of his art, together with a chronologically arranged catalog of his 515 known pieces, and 72 halftone plates. Eakins, whose temperament was remarkable for its blend of artistic and scientific capacities, began his long career as a painter in the early 1870's. The masterpiece of these years was "The Gross Clinic," painted in 1875. "In its truth of characterization, its formal strength and balance of design, it shows a power and completeness of realism that could be matched by no other American painter of the time." The artist executed his most important commission, the similarly conceived but less formally portrayed "Agnew Clinic," in 1889. Like its predecessor, it was rejected by the art critics, and Eakins fell into obscurity during the 80's and 90's. Recognized belatedly in the decade 1900–1910, he painted, during this culminating phase of his career, more portraits than in any corresponding period. In his era, "Eakins stands out as an isolated figure, belonging to no school"; few of his contemporaries "approached his humanity, understanding of character, penetration into the heart of truth, or formal power."

5765. [Homer] Goodrich, Lloyd. Winslow Homer. New York, Published for the Whitney Museum of American Art by Macmillan, 1944. 241 p. 63 plates on 32 l.
44–7780 ND237.H7G6

Bibliography: p. 234–236.

Based upon family tradition, contemporary accounts, and the artist's letters, this is a biography and an analysis of the work of Winslow Homer (1836–1910), a self-made Boston painter who began as a magazine illustrator. His earlier oils, of everyday army life in the Civil War, however unsophisticated, "were pieces of direct, simple naturalism, showing no trace of any other artist's style." His favorite theme, at first, was country life, with emphasis upon "pretty girls and fashion," but he executed a notable series of sympathetic scenes from Negro life in the 1870's. After settling at Prout's Neck, Maine, in 1884, Homer turned for his dominant themes to the sea and the wilderness and the men who wrested a living from them. He reached the "climax of his art" during the 1890's with his watercolors of the forests and lakes of the Adirondacks: nothing like their "resonant" color harmonies and breadth of treatment had before been seen in American watercolor painting. Homer also produced some of his greatest and most influential seascapes in the 1890's. The recognition he then achieved has proved enduring, but to this critic "he was a powerful naturalist rather than a great plastic artist." The 93 illustrations in black and white average two to a page.

5766. [Inness] McCausland, Elizabeth. George Inness, an American landscape painter, 1825–1894. New York, American Artists Group, 1946. xvi, 87 p. 46–3370 ND237.I5M3

Catalog of the exhibition, February 25 to March 24, 1946: p. 73–82.

Bibliography: p. 84–87.

George Walter Vincent Smith, who collected the art of his American contemporaries over a span of 70 years, regarded George Inness as an important artist, and purchased his canvases from the painter himself. The museum which Mr. Smith founded in Springfield, Mass., and which now bears his name, celebrated its first half-century, therefore, with an exhibition of 44 Inness canvases assembled by the director, Cornelia Sargent Pond; it was subsequently shown in Brooklyn and in Montclair, N. J., where Inness lived and painted during his later and more prosperous years. Miss McCausland presents the artist as one of the most authentic if least appreciated of 19th-century American painters, a master of American landscape who maintained the best ideals of the Hudson River School in a drabber age, and whose quite independent style eschews spurious bigness and cultivates instead a calm and often radiant serenity: "the land will endure, his paintings say, the coming storm will pass, the harvest will ripen." "Those closed-in valleys were the common home and amphitheater of American life." Unfortunately the 40 illustrations, mostly half-page halftones, quite fail to convey the hazy glow of the paintings themselves.

5767. [Marin] Helm, MacKinley. John Marin. Boston, Pellegrini & Cuhahy in association with the Institute of Contemporary Art, 1948. 255 p. 48–10619 ND237.M24H4

A biography and sympathetic analysis of the works of John Marin (1870–1953), who, as early as the 1890's began "inventing his own private symbols for the American landscape." In 1914, having discovered Maine to be his spiritual home, he began "to play deliberate tricks with reality for plastic effect." His range included violent renditions of the Manhattan scene, Maine seacoast pieces with framework and broadly indicated planes, and lyrical landscapes and seascapes. There are 64 halftone and 9 color plates. To John Marin: Tributes (Berkeley, University of California Press, 1956. [78] p.), Mr. Helm contributes a "Conclusion to a Biography" which is actually a final and equally admiring appraisal. In this collection of tributes and appreciative essays occasioned by the John Marin Memorial Exhibition, organized by the Art Galleries of the University of California, Los Angeles, 1955/56, Duncan Phillips hails Marin as a poet-painter independent of all isms, whose "genius for explosions of line and color, especially in the Manhattan street scenes, was dedicated to the theme of energy." Frederick S. Wight, in another eulogistic survey, suggests that "Marin's art rose in three waves, his etchings, his water colors and his oils—and it is not certain that the third wave is not the greatest." Marin's own theories are expressed in The Selected Writings of John Marin (New York, Pellegrini & Cudahy, 1949. 241 p.), which consists of revealing and thought-provoking letters written to his friends, particularly Alfred Stieglitz, from 1910 to 1949, expounding his views of art, current events, people, and life in the Maine country.

5768. [Mount] Cowdrey, Mary Bartlett, and Hermann Warner Williams. William Sidney Mount, 1807–1868, an American painter, by Bartlett Cowdrey and Hermann Warner Williams. New York, Published for the Metropolitan Museum of Art by Columbia University Press, 1944. xiii, 54 p. A44-4242 ND237.M855C7

Bibliography: p. [43]–47.

A catalog, album, and brief study of the landscape, flower, and genre paintings of William Sidney Mount, the first native-born artist to venture largely outside the profitable field of portraiture. He was a reporter of the American scene in the heyday of nationalism, depicting everyday life in the rural Long Island community in which he had been reared. In the 1830's, he won the public with his individuality, realism, and "good-natured fun," and the critics with his luminous style and sound craftsmanship. The pioneer catalog of 168 paintings is a "reasonably complete" listing of Mount's major works exclusive of portraits, but "does not pretend to the rank of a catalogue raisonné." The 78 illustrations in gravure average two or three to a page and are very clear even when rather too small.

5769. [Peale] Sellers, Charles C. Charles Willson Peale. Philadelphia, 1947. 2 v. (Memoirs of the American Philosophical Society, v. 23, pt. 1–2) 47-5562 ND237.P27S43 Q11.P612, v. 23

Volume 1 published in 1939 under title: The Artist of the Revolution; the Early Life of Charles Willson Peale.

Bibliography: v. 2. p. 424–440.

Based mainly upon his diaries, drafts of letters, and Autobiography, this is a detailed scholarly biography of Charles Willson Peale, inventor, "candid and direct" portraitist of the revolutionary era, and founder of the first American museum of natural history and of the first American academy of art. Peale, a student of Benjamin West at London in 1767 and 1768, by the 70's and 80's was painting such notables as Washington, Lafayette, and Steuben, among others, in a style distinguished not so much for flair or sophistication as for strength and sincerity. Although his drawing was sometimes poor and his sitters awkwardly posed, "his coloring was delicate and harmonious." The museum, conceived in the ideal of pure science and opened in the 1780's, "was this artist's masterpiece, built up through many years of tireless labor." To it, and to Peale's successive ventures into politics, war, science, invention, and hygiene, the author devotes considerably more space than to his achievement as a painter.

5770. [Remington] McCracken, Harold. Frederic Remington, artist of the Old West. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1947. 157 p. 47-11799 ND237.R36M3

Based upon his own books, articles, manuscript diaries, and notebooks, as well as the recollections of his contemporaries, this is an anecdotal biography of Frederic Remington (1861–1909), foremost portrayer of the American frontier West. It was still "the land of the riders of the open cattle range and of the war trail," in 1880 when the youthful New Yorker first roamed it, and to record its way of life for permanent preservation became his main purpose. In Arizona, Wyoming, the Dakotas, and Montana, this largely self-taught artist found his subjects: cowboys, troopers, Indians, and, in particular, the horses of the West. The drawings for an edition of Longfellow's The Song of Hiawatha in 1890 firmly established Remington's reputation as an illustrator. In 1895, he added sculpture to his media with "Bronco Buster." An arrangement with Collier's Weekly in 1903 permitted him the freedom to paint as he pleased, and he produced "His First Lesson," "Fight for the Water Hole," and the many other fine pictures for which he is best known today. The "Bibliographic Check List of Remingtoniana" (p. 123–155) establishes the first appearance of each of the 2,739 drawings and paintings completed by the artist and published in 41 periodicals and 142 books. There are 29 line drawings and 48 plates, of which 32 are in color of varying adequacy, 8 are halftones, and 8 reproduce bronzes.

5771. [Sargent] Mount, Charles Merrill. John Singer Sargent, a biography. New York, Norton, 1955. xv, 464 p. 55-13654 ND237.S3M6

"Sargent's works in oil": p. 427–453.

This is an artist's sympathetic biography of John Singer Sargent (1856–1925), best known as portrait painter to the English and American haut monde of the Edwardian era. The author has drawn upon many hitherto unavailable materials, such as diaries and private papers of Sargent's associates, to fill the lacunae created by the destruction of the artist's own papers. From 1887 to 1909, after which he declined all but a very few commissions from industrial and financial tycoons, Sargent was hailed both in the United States and in England for his portraits revealing fundamental traits of character, for their smartness, even sumptuousness of style, realistic illusion, fine values, and impressionistic color. The 54 halftone illustrations are reproduced on 12 leaves. Evan Charteris' John Sargent (New York, Scribner, 1927. 308 p.) affectionately celebrates the life and work of his friend of 30 years' standing, and points out the "splendour" of Sargent's personality, "his dynamic energy, his largeness of outlook, his complete immunity from what was small or unworthy." Sargent's Boston (Boston, Museum of Fine Arts, 1956. 132 p.), by David McKibbin, commemorates the centennial of Sargent's birth with an essay that emphasizes both the architectural aspects of his decorations for the Museum and the importance of his portraits as "footnotes for history." A catalog of the centennial exhibition (p. 67–75) and an alphabetically arranged checklist of his portraits (p. 81–132) are included.

5772. [Sheeler] Rourke, Constance M. Charles Sheeler, artist in the American tradition. With 48 halftones of paintings, drawings, and photographs by Charles Sheeler. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1938. 203 p.
38–27601 ND237.S47R6

An "informal biography" of Charles Sheeler (b. 1883), whose work makes a "fresh and original use of the American subject" and reflects "forms which strongly and essentially belong to us." The author has drawn upon Sheeler's own notes and conversations, and has so interwoven halftone reproductions of his paintings and drawings as to show the development of his art from the early experimental phases to those of maturity. "A pathfinder in the use of American traditions," he has employed "the proportionate ratios, the materials, and the final design of the provincial buildings at hand": in Bucks County architecture, the communal architecture at Ephrata, and Shaker architecture and crafts. In the 1920's he discovered "the industrial subject for American art," and in his portrayals of this, "immense intricacies of structure have been boldly reduced to essentials." For many years Sheeler supported himself by photography, painting only on weekends. His photographs are noteworthy for their sense of inherent design and their rendering of textures; a few are included among the illustrations.

5773. [Sloan] Goodrich, Lloyd. John Sloan. New York, Published for the Whitney Museum of American Art by Macmillan, 1952. 80 p.
52–7168 ND237.S57G6

"Selected bibliography": p. 78–80.

A brief critique of the work of John Sloan (1871–1951), who began his career in 1892 as a Philadelphia newspaper illustrator and who found himself as an artist only after he moved to New York in 1904 and began painting his unique glimpses of the life of lower Manhattan. Thereafter "his art had that quality of being a direct product of the common life, absolutely authentic and unsweetened, that has marked the finest genre art of all times." Applicable to many other canvases is his own statement about his "Sixth Avenue and 30th Street": "it has surely caught the atmosphere of the Tenderloin, drab, shabby, happy, sad, and human." After having depicted the contemporary spectacle for a quarter century, Sloan very largely abandoned it in 1928 for an "intensive study of the nude," in which he experimented with "linework to complete the modeling," but achieved no such individuality as in his earlier manner. There is no list of the many illustrations, three of which are in color. Van Wyck Brooks' John Sloan; a Painter's Life (New York, Dutton, 1955. 246 p.) is a sympathetic narrative by a friend of long standing, emphasizing the personal traits and relationships of "this good man, fearless, truthful, innocent and wise."

5774. [Stuart] Whitley, William T. Gilbert Stuart. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1932. xiv, 240 p. 32–13585 ND237.S8W5

A history of the life and particularly the works of Gilbert Stuart (1775–1828), largely based upon contemporary newspapers, periodicals, and memoirs from which the author quotes very generously. Stuart, a pupil of Benjamin West, first achieved success with "Portrait of a Gentleman Skating," exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1782. A master portraitist, he was greatly admired for the exactitude of his likenesses and characterizations, for originality and power, and in 1787 he was dubbed by the London World "The Vandyck of the Time." Stuart returned to the United States in 1793, achieving his ambition to paint George Washington in 1795. Dissatisfied with the first study, the artist destroyed it after making several copies. In 1796, Stuart painted the full-length figure of Washington, renowned as the Lansdowne portrait, of which he made several copies; shortly thereafter, he painted from life the famous head of Washington now at the Boston Athenaeum. "This and the Lansdowne portrait, whether exact likenesses or not, represent Washington with the distinction he deserves, and give him the appearance of a great man, as the world regards him." In 1805, Stuart settled permanently at Boston where, notwithstanding his persistently Bohemian temperament, his success was "immediate and complete," and his authority in matters of art became "unquestioned in America."

5775. Trumbull, John. The autobiography of Colonel John Trumbull, patriot-artist, 1756–1843; edited by Theodore Sizer. Containing a supplement to [the editor's] The Works of Colonel John Trumbull. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1953. xxiii, 404 p. 53–7771 ND237.T8A32

First published in 1841, this is the shrewd and vigorous but defensive and not altogether candid memoir of John Trumbull, aide-de-camp to General Washington, student of Benjamin West in London, portrayer of major events and personages of the American Revolution, and occasional architect, mercantile speculator, and minor diplomat. Drawn by the octogenarian from abundant recollections as well as private papers, it has been meticulously edited and provided with copious notes; an appendix (p. 291–382) supplies much additional information, especially concerning Trumbull's later life, from contemporary sources. Sixty percent of the book is devoted to the quarter of his life spent in Europe. It is filled with vivid descriptions and estimates of Old Masters, European architecture and landscape, and with vignettes of historical events and such notable persons as Edmund Burke, Talleyrand, and Lafayette. Trumbull records his decision of 1785 to make the events of the Revolution his principal subjects, and reports fully the transaction whereby his four large canvases, including the "Declaration of Independence" were commissioned for the United States Capitol in 1817 and executed by 1824. Professor Sizer's The Works of Colonel John Trumbull (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1950. 117 p.) consists mainly of a complete checklist in which portraits are arranged alphabetically by sitter and historical subjects chronologically by event. All types are listed, including mythological, allegorical, literary, and religious subjects, landscapes, figure studies, architectural drawings, and maps. Sketches and studies are listed along with the finished compositions. Brief sections are devoted to Trumbull's prices and painting techniques. Forty-six halftone illustrations are reproduced on 20 leaves.

5776. [Whistler] Pennell, Elizabeth R., and Joseph Pennell. The life of James McNeill Whistler, by E. R. and J. Pennell. 5th ed., rev. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1911. xx, 449 p.
A12–142 ND237.W6P4 1911a

An authorized biography of Whistler (1834–1903), the expatriate American painter and dandified wit who was idolized by his followers and abused or misunderstood by most of the Victorian press. Mr. and Mrs. Pennell, noted etcher and writer, respectively, were intimate friends as well as warm admirers of the artist, and present much information in his own words as well as reminiscences from members of the Whistler coterie. Although his etchings were hailed as comparable to those of Rembrandt, Whistler's paintings of 1859 and the early 60's were neither so well nor so consistently received. To both he brought realism and a sense of pattern and design. In 1865, Whistler sent to the Academy "the most complete, the most perfect picture he ever painted, 'The Little White Girl.'" Whistler first exhibited a portrait as an "Arrangement" and an impression of night as a "Nocturne" in 1872; such titles established his name for eccentricity, and for almost 20 years "ridicule was his portion." In the 1870's, he began great portraits, among them, "Mother," "Carlyle," and "Miss Alexander," but not until the 90's was he "acknowledged as one of the great artists of the century." Numerous halftone plates reproduce oils, etchings, pastels, watercolors, and drawings.

H. Prints and Photographs

5777. Jackson, William H. Picture maker of the Old West, William H. Jackson; [text] by Clarence S. Jackson. New York, Scribner, 1947. 308 p. 47–30481 F591.J3

Assembled by his son from the family collection and supplementary sources, this album reproduces in chronological sequence 393 splendid photographs, sketches, and paintings of the frontier Far West by an artist whose long life span (1843–1942) paralleled the white man's conquest of the region. The views of railroad building, mining towns, Indians, pueblos, the wonders of the Yellowstone and Yosemite Valleys, mountains, including the Grand Teton, the Mountain of the Holy Cross, and Pike's Peak, and the Mesa Verde and other cliff dwellings are taken with an artist's eye for composition and tonal contrasts. Based largely upon Jackson's early diaries and notebooks, a running commentary accompanies the pictures, and treats mainly of his expeditions of 1870–78 as a staff member of the Hayden Geological and Geographical Survey.

5778. Peters, Harry T. Currier & Ives, printmakers to the American people. Garden City, N.Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1929–31. 2 v.
30–1290 NE2415.C7P4

5779. Peters, Harry T. America on stone; the other printmakers to the American people; a chronicle of American lithography other than that of Currier & Ives. [Garden City, N.Y., Doubleday, Doran] 1931. 415 p. 31–33726 NE2303.P4

These companion works by an enthusiastic collector survey the whole of American lithography from the first experiments made by the painter, Bass Otis, in 1819 to the decline of this popular art in the 1880's. "Chief among these printmakers, because they served over a longer period, seem to have issued more prints, and more good prints, and filled the need most completely, were Currier & Ives, who had predecessors and competitors, but really no rivals." Currier and Ives employed skilled artists and offered for sale at low prices a wide variety of effectively drawn and colored pictures of easily understood American subjects: horses, seascapes, landscapes, especially of New York, political cartoons, portraits, notable events, everyday life, and scenes of romantic, sentimental, moralizing, or humorous intent. From 1840, when Nathaniel Currier scored his first great success with a lithograph of the sinking Lexington, to the 1880's, "his business was a national institution." The total number of prints produced, as distinct from copies, is estimated at "more than 4317." Five other lithographic firms maintained substantial catalogs of prints for general distribution, on a smaller scale than Currier and Ives, but the remaining publishers, approximately 100 in number, relied chiefly upon jobs commissioned for special purposes: commissioned portraits, maps, illustrations for books and periodicals, music sheets, advertisements, architectural plans, phrenological charts, and the like. Although these firms and artists enjoyed far less stability than Currier and Ives, all of the old printmakers "attempted to succeed by making art within the means of all—truly a great endeavor." Volume one of Currier & Ives, Printmakers to the American People contains reproductions of 142 prints and originals and a checklist of all Currier and Ives prints known in 1929; volume two includes reproductions of 177 prints, 24 in color, and 1600 "newly discovered" titles, here completed to 1931. America on Stone includes 18 colored and 136 black-and-white plates, as well as 20 other reproductions inserted in the "prologue." It takes the form of an alphabetical list of all firms, individuals, craftsmen, and artists concerned in the production of lithographs, with information concerning their productions. Successive addresses are given for print publishers.

5780. Reese, Albert. American prize prints of the 20th century. New York, American Artists Group, 1949. xix, 257 p. 49–11409 NE508.R4

"A brief description of the principal graphic processes": p. xvii–xix.

"Biographical notes": p. 235–257.

An alphabetically arranged album reproducing, in clear if occasionally dark halftone, a selection of 216 prize-winning prints, including wood engravings, etchings, lithographs, drypoints, woodcuts, and serigraphs, by Americans still living in 1949, and 14 prints by deceased artists, a number of whom had accomplished their major work before the awarding of prizes became general practice. About two-thirds of the prints were produced in the 1940's, most of the remainder in the 1930's. Each reproduction is accompanied by a paragraph which interprets its subject and, in most instances, quotes the artist as to his intention. Citing the names of Edward Hopper, Reginald Marsh, and Stow Wengenroth, among others, the introductory text asserts that the contemporary American practitioners of this "democratic medium" constitute the "finest school of printmakers in our history." The prints employ the styles of realism, impressionism, "super-realism," or nonobjectivism; their subjects range through the American rural and urban scenes, industry and machinery, manners, customs, and occupations, emotion, and pure decoration.

5781. Taft, Robert. Photography and the American scene, a social history, 1839–1889. New York, Macmillan, 1938. 546 p.
38–30617 TR23.T3

The first survey of the "effects of photography upon the social history of America, and in turn the effect of social life upon the progress of photography." News of Daguerre's process first reached this country in September 1839. By 1845 Mathew B. Brady was collecting portraits of all the notable persons he could induce to sit. Daguerrotypy was replaced by collodion (wet plate) photography during the 50's, and in 1857 "the paper photograph assumed a position of commanding importance in this country—a position which it has maintained." "Card photographs" of soldiers, the eminent, and the notorious, popular from 1860 to 1866, made necessary the family album; and stereoscopes appeared in most homes during the 1850's, 60's, and 70's. After the Civil War, William Kurtz and others won success with the "cabinet size" portrait, which required skillful posing, lighting, and handling of background. George Eastman, in the 1880's, made technical advances with a gelatin process dry plate, flexible film, and a roller holder system. In 1889 he introduced the portable and relatively inexpensive Kodak, which opened up the whole world of amateur photography. The numerous halftone illustrations are as clear as their small size permits.

677676 O–63–56

5782. Weitenkampf, Frank. American graphic art. New ed., rev. and enl. New York, Macmillan, 1924. 328 p.
24–12503 NE505.W4 1924

Bibliography: p. 291–298.

First published in 1912.

A topically arranged review of the whole field of American printmaking from the 18th century to about the end of the 19th, when the printing processes became debased through commercial exploitation, and photography administered the coup de grâce. The book reflects the author's vast experience, but salient personalities and tendencies are often obscured by the dense mass of details. Mr. Weitenkampf surveys the history of etching, engraving, mezzotint, aquatint, wood engraving, and lithography. He discusses the application of their techniques not only to creative art but to such secondary undertakings as the reproduction of paintings; illustrations for books, textbooks, periodicals, "tokens," and "keepsakes"; caricatures, cartoons, and social satires for the humorous press; as well as bookplates, business cards, certificates, and other lesser productions. There are numerous illustrations and halftone plates.

5783. Zigrosser, Carl. The artist in America; twenty-four close-ups of contemporary printmakers. New York, Knopf, 1942. xxi, 207 p.
42–25527 NE508.Z45

